had ascended. See OETINGER. He had previously (1845) become a pastor; and in 1848 he followed Hofacker (q. v.) in that office. In 1849 he became rector at Tübingen, and in 1851 professor extraordinary at Basel. In the same year he married the daughter of Wolfgang Menzel. From this time his labors as teacher, preacher, and author were most abundant and successful to the time of his death. He published in 1855 Zehn Predigten (Basel, 8vo); Der Prophet Daniel und die Offenbarung Johanns (Basel, 1854, 2d ed. 1857; translated into both French and English), a work which contributed greatly to the revival of sound Biblical theology in Germany; Zehn Vorträge zur Verantwortung des Christlichen Glaubens (Basel, 1861, 8vo); Die Göttliche Offenbarung, ein apologet. Versuch (vol. i, 1861; vol. ii, posthumous, 1864). In part one he undertakes to show "that, even if we accept only those New Testament Scriptures which the most destructive of the Tübingen critics grant to be genuine, to wit, the Epistles to the Galatians, Corinthians, and Romans, a strictly scientific and logical method of interpretation forces us to the inevitable conclusion that the extraordinary gifts of the apostolic church, the miracles of the apostles, the resurrection of Christ, his manifestation of himself to Saul on the way to Damascus, as also his continued intercourse with him, are FACTS. In the gospels he asks but one concession, to wit, the historical genuineness of Christ's testimony respecting himself when on trial (and this is granted by Baur, Strauss, etc.), in order to put all deniers of the divinity of Christ in a very disagreeable predicament. In the same regressive way he goes back to the Old Testament, and by a sure induction mounts from the patent and undeniable fact-phenomena of the Old Dispensation to a supernatural and divine factor in the whole history. The result of this part of the discussion is this: 'Were the revelations of God, the miracles, not facts, then has the inmost consciousness of all the holy men of old—that is to say, of the noblest and mightiest spirits, the real pillars of human history—reposed upon illusion and mental derangement. The world is either a Boddam, an insane asylum, or it is a temple, a place of divine epiphanies.' The second, or historical part, is a succinct history of the long struggle in Germany between rationalism and supernaturalism." A translation of part of vol. i. by Professor Hackett, is given in Bibliotheca Sacra, July, 1865. His career was prematurely cut short by consumption, May 2, 1864. In the last hour he said, in the fulness of Christian faith, "God be thanked, of death I have no fear; the Lord Jesus is my light and my song" (sketch of his life in preface to 2d vol. of Die Göttl. Offenbarung).—Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, Suppl. i, 793; Bibliotheca Sacra, 1865, p. 395, 517.

Aubertin, EDMOND, one of the most learned divines of the French Protestant Church, was born at Chalons-sur-Marne in 1596, and became minister at Chartres in 1618. He was called to Paris in 1631, and died there April 5th, 1652. He wrote Conformité de la Créance de l'Eglise et de St. Augustin sur le Sacrement de l'Eucharistie (1626, 8vo), which attracted great attention, and was afterward enlarged into L'Eucharistie de l'ancienne Eglise, etc. (1633, fol.). This work awakened great attention and controversy. Arnauld answered it, but ineffectively. It was translated into Latin by Blondel, De Eucharistia sive cœna Domini libri tres (Deventer, 1654).—Haag, La France Protestante, i, 149.

Aubigné, THÉODORE-AGÉSSA D', a French writer and historian, born the 8th of February, 1550, at Saint-Maury en Saintonge. He showed at a very early age signs of what he was afterward to become. At six years of age he studied Latin, Greek, and Hebrew; at ten he translated the Crito of Plato, on his father's promise to print it with his portrait. A year after, his father, who was a zealous Protestant, made him swear (upon the scaffold on which some Protestants were executed) eternal hatred to Rome. He kept the vow. At fifteen he was a student at Geneva under Beza, but soon quit his studies to serve in the army under the Prince de Condé and the King of Navarre. He soon rose to the first rank of Protestant warriors, and did not lay down his sword till Henry IV was established on the throne. He served his king only too faithfully, and by his plain rebukes often brought down upon his head the wrath of the monarch. After the death of Henry he published l'Histoire universelle de son temps de 1550 à 1601 (Paris and Amsterdam, 1616-26, 3 vols. fol.). The book was condemned to be burnt by the Parliament, and the author took refuge at Geneva, where he died the 29th of April, 1630. He was a species of Admirable Crichton, combining the statesman's skill, the warrior's intrepidity, the scholar's learning, and the poet's genius with all the sterling virtues of the Christian. His daughter became afterward the mother of Madame de Maintenon, who inherited many of the qualities of her ancestor, but not his religion. A new Life of D'Aubigné, from a MS. found in the library of the Louvre in 1851, was published in 1854 by M. Lalanne (Paris, 8vo), who also published reprints of the minor writings of D'Aubigné (Les Tragiques; 1857; Aventures de Faneste, edited by Merimee, with a sketch of D'Aubigné, 1855).—Haag, La France Protestante, s. v.; Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, Suppl. p. 117; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, iii, 576.

Aucher, PASCAL, an Armenian monk, born 1771 in Armenia, died 1854. He was, while yet very young, sent, together with his elder brother, J. B. Aucher (born 1760, died 1853), to the Armenian convent of San Lazaro at Venice, where they were educated, and subsequently joined the order of Mechitarists. Both deserved well of the theological literature of Armenia by publishing a number of important works of ancient Armenian literature (e. g. the Chronicles of Eusebius, the Discourses of Philo, etc.). Paschal Aucher also published an Armenian-English Dictionary (2 vols. Venice, 1821).

Audæans, Audeans, or Audians, followers of Audæus or Audius (A. D. 340 or 350), a native of Syria, who boldly castigated the luxury and vice of the clergy, and who finally left the church. He and his followers afterward deviated from the usages of the church, especially on the date of Easter. He was charged with anthropomorphism. He had himself irregularly consecrated as bishop; was banished to Scythia, and died before 372. His personal character was remarkably pure. The sect died out in the fifth century. See Schröder, De Audæo et Audianis (Marburg, 1716); Lardner, Works, iv, 176; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. i, 309; Neander, Ch. Hist. ii, 705.

Audientia Episcopalis (i. e. episcopal judgment), a name first used in the code of Justinian, and thence generally employed in the ecclesiastical law of the Middle Ages to designate the right of the bishops to act as arbiters in civil affairs. Audin, J. M. V., a French litterateur, was born at Lyons in 1793, and studied theology at the seminary of Argentière. He soon abandoned theology for the study of the law, but after being admitted to the bar he never practiced. In 1814 he came to Paris and commenced bookseller, at the same time keeping up his literary pursuits. The books for which his name is mentioned here are Histoire de la St. Barthelemy (1826, 2 vols. 12mo); Histoire de la V. des Ouvrages, et des Doctrines de Luther (2 vols. 8vo; translated by Turnbull, London, 1854, 2 vols. 8vo); Histoire de la Vie, etc., de Calvin (1843, 2 vols. 8vo); Henry VIII et le Schisme d'Angleterre (2 vols. 8vo; transl. by Browne, Lond. 1852, 8vo). He died February 21st, 1851. His lives of Luther and Calvin are written in a controversial spirit, and are often unjust as well as inaccurate. Brownson (Roman Catholic) says of him that, as a writer of history, "he is conscientious and painstaking, but we cannot regard him as very sagacious or profound; and, under the relation of style and manner, he is not sufficiently grave and dignified to suit our taste, or to inspire us with full confidence in his judgment. He takes too much pains to be striking and brilliant, and appears to weigh the phrase more than the thought. Regarded as popular works, as they probably were designed to be, we esteem very highly Audin's biographies; but, regarded as studia on the Reformation, they are deficient in philosophical depth and comprehensiveness. They take, in our judgment, quite too narrow and too superficial a view of the great Protestant movement, and afford us very little aid in understanding its real causes and internal character."—Hoefler, Nour. Biog. Générale, iii, 604; Brownson's Review, January, 1855.

Auditōres (hearers). The Manichæans were divided into electi and auditores, corresponding, according to some writers, to clergy and laity, and, according to others, to the faithful and catechumens. By the Manichæan rule a different course of conduct was prescribed to the elect from that of the auditors. The latter might eat flesh, drink wine, bathe, marry, trade, possess estates, etc., all which things were forbidden to the elect.—Mosheim, Comm. ii, 399; Farrar, s. v.

Au'gia (Ab'gia), the daughter of Berzeleus and wife of Addus (1 Esdr. v, 38), probably a conjecture of the copyists or translator, since her name is not given in either of the genuine texts (Ezra ii, 61; Neh. vii, 63), nor even in the Vulg. at the passage in Esdras.

Augian Manuscript (CODEX AUGIENSIS), a Greek and Latin MS. of the epistles of Paul, supposed to have been written in the latter half of the ninth century, and so called from Augia major, the name of a monastery at Rheinau, to which it belonged. After passing through several hands, it was, in 1718, purchased by Dr. Bentley for 250 Dutch florins, and it is now in the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge. This noted MS. P, is contained on 135 leaves of good vellum, 4to (the signaturæ proving that 7 more are lost), 9 inches by 7½, with the two languages in parallel columns of 28 lines on each page, the Greek being always inside, the Latin next the edge of the book. It is neatly written in uncial letters, and without accents; not continnâ scribit, as is common with more ancient copies, but with intervals between the words, and a dot at the end of each. The Greek text is very valuable. The Latin is a pure form of the Vulgate, but in the style of character usually called the Anglo-Saxon, whence it is tolerably clear that it must have been written in the west of Europe, where that formation of letters was in general use between the seventh and tenth centuries. The first sheets, containing Rom. i, 1 iii, 19, are wholly absent; in four passages (1 Cor. iii, 8 16; vi, 7 11; Col. ii, 1-8; Philem. 21-25), the Greek column is empty, although the Latin is given; in the epistle to the Hebrews, the Latin occupies both columns, the Greek being absent. Tischendorf examined it in 1812, and Tregelles in 1845. Scrivener published an edition of this Codex in common type (Lond. 1859, 8vo), with prolegomena and a photograph of one page.—Tregelles, in Horne's Introd. iv, 197, 255; Scrivener, Introd. p. 133 sq. Augsburg Confession (Confessio Augustana), the first Protestant confession of faith.

1. History.—After Charles V concluded peace with France, he summoned a German Diet to meet at Augsburg April 8, 1530. The writ of invitation called for aid against the Turks, who in 1529 had besieged Vienna; it also promised a discussion of the religious questions of the time, and such a settlement of them as both to abolish existing abuses and to satisfy the demands of the pope. Elector John of Saxony, who received this writ March 11, directed (March 14) Luther, Jonas, Bugenhagen, and Melancthon to meet in Torgau (q. v.), and draw up a summary of the most important and necessary articles of faith, in support of which the evangelical princes and states should combine. These theologians (with the exception of Jonas, who joined them somewhat later) drew up a profession of their faith on the ground of the seventeen articles which had been prepared by Luther for the convention at Schwabach (q. v.), and fifteen other articles, which had been drawn up at the theological colloquy at Marburg (q. v.), Oct. 3, 1529, and subsequently presented to the Saxon elector John at Torgau. (The articles of Schwabach were for the first time published by Heppel, in Niedner's Zeitschrift für histor. Theologie, 1848, 1st number.) The first draft made by the four theologians, in seventeen articles, was at once published, and called forth a joint reply from Wimpina, Mensing, Redoerfer, and Dr. Elgers, which Luther immediately answered. The subject of the controversy had thus become generally known. Luther, Melancthon, and Jonas were invited by the Saxon elector to accompany him to Augsburg. Subsequently it was, however, deemed best for Luther's safety to leave him behind. Melancthon, soon after his arrival at Augsburg, completed the Confession, and gave to it the name of Apologia. On May 11 he sent it to Luther, who was then at Coburg, and on May 15 he received from Luther an approving answer. Several alterations were suggested to Melancthon in his conferences with Jonas, the Saxon chancellor Brück, the conciliatory bishop Stadion of Augsburg, and the imperial secretary Valdes. To the latter, upon his request, 17 articles were handed by Melancthon, with the consent of the Saxon elector, and he was to have a preliminary discussion concerning them with the papal legate Pimpinelli. Upon the opening of the Diet, June 20, the evangelical theologians who were present—Melancthon, Jonas, Agricola, Brenz, Schnepf, and others—presented the Confession to the elector. The latter, on June 23, had it signed by the evangelical princes and representatives of cities who were present. They were the following: John, elector of Saxony; George, margrave of Brandenburg; Ernest, duke of Lüneburg; Philip, landgrave of Hesse; John Frederic, duke of Saxe; Francis, duke of Lüneburg; Wolfgang, prince of Anhalt; and the magistrates of Nuremberg and Reutlingen. The emperor had ordered the Confession to be presented to him at the next session, June 24; but when the evangelical princes asked for permission to read it, their petition was refused, and efforts were made to prevent the public reading of the document altogether. The evangelical princes declared, however, that they would not part with the Confession until its reading should be allowed. The 25th was then fixed for the day of its presentation. In order to exclude the people, the little chapel of the episcopal palace was appointed in the place of the spacious City Hall, where the meetings of the Diet were held. In this episcopal chapel the Protestant princes assembled on the appointed day, Saturday, June 25, 1530, at 3 P.M. The Saxon chancellor Brück (Pontanus) held in his hands the Latin, Dr. Christian Bayer the German copy. They stepped into the middle of the assembly, and all the Protestant princes rose from their seats, but were commanded to sit down. The emperor wished to hear first the Latin copy read, but the elector replied that they were on German ground; whereupon the emperor consented to the reading of the German copy, which was done by Dr. Bayer. The reading lasted from 4 to 6 o'clock. The reading being over, the emperor commanded both copies to be given to him. The German copy he handed to the archbishop of Mayence, the Latin he took along to Brussels. Neither of them is now extant. He promised to take this highly important matter into serious consideration, and make known his decision; in the mean while the Confession was not to be printed without imperial permission. The Protestant princes promised to comply with this; but when, soon after the reading, an erroneous edition of the Confession appeared, it became necessary to have both the Latin and German texts published, which was done through Melancthon. On June 27 the Confession was given, in the presence of the whole assembly, to the Roman Catholic theologians to be refuted. The most prominent among them were Eck, Faber, Wimpina, Cochleus, and Dietenberger. Before they got through with their work a letter was received from Erasmus, who had been asked for his opinion by cardinal Campegius, recommending caution, and the concession of the Protestant demands concerning the marriage of the priests, monastic vows, and the Lord's Supper. On July 12 the Roman Catholic "Confutation" was presented, which so little pleased the emperor, that "of 280 leaves, only twelve remained whole." A new "Confutation" was therefore prepared and read to the Diet, August 3, by the imperial secretary Schweiss. No copy of it was given to the evangelical members of the Diet, and it was not published until 1573 (by Fabricius, in his Harmonia Conf. Aug. Colone, 1573; the German text in Chytraeus, Historie der Augsburg Conf., Rostock, 1576). Immediately after the reading of the Confutation, the Protestants were commanded to conform to it. Negotiations for effecting a compromise were commenced by both parties, but led to no result. Negotiations between the Lutherans and the Zuinglians were equally fruitless. Zuinglius had sent to the emperor a memorial, dated July 4 (Ad Carolum Rom. Imperatorem comitia Auguste celebrantem fidei Huldrichi Zuinglio ratio), and Bucer, Capito, and Hedio had drawn up, in the name of the cities of Strasburg, Constance, Memmingen, and Lindau, the Confessio Tetrapolitana, which was presented to the emperor July 11. Neither of these two confessions was read, and both were rejected.

Against the Roman Catholic "Confutation," Melancthon, at the request of the evangelical princes and cities, prepared an "Apology of the Confession" (Apoloogia Confessionis), which was presented by the chancellor Brück, on Sept. 22, to the emperor, who refused to receive it. Subsequently Melancthon received a copy of the "Confutation," which led to many alterations in the first draft of the Apology. It was then published in Latin, and in a German translation by Jonas (Wittenberg, 1531). A controversy subsequently arose, in consequence of which Melancthon after 1540 made considerable alterations in the original Augsburg Confession, altering, especially in Art. x, the statement of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper in favor of the Reformed view. Melancthon, who had already before been charged with "crypto-Calvinism," was severely attacked on account of these alterations; yet the "Confessio Variata" remained in the ascendancy until 1580, when the Confessio Invariata was put into the "Concordienbuch" in its place, and thus the unaltered Confession has come to be generally regarded as the standard of the Lutheran churches. But the altered Confession has not ceased to find advocates, and several branches of the Lutheran Church have even abrogated the authoritative character of the Confession, and do not demand from the clergy a belief in all its doctrines.

II. The following is the table of contents of the Confession and of the Apology: PART I.—1. Acknowledges four œcumenical councils:—2. Declares original sin to consist wholly in concupiscence:—3. Contains the substance of the Apostles' Creed:—4. Declares that justification is the effect of faith, exclusive of good works:—5. Declares the Word of God and the sacraments to be the means of conveying the Holy Spirit, but never without faith:—6. That faith must produce good works purely in obedience to God, and not in order to the meriting justification:—7. The true church consists of the godly only:—8. Allows the validity of the sacraments, though administered by the evil:—9. Declares the necessity of infant baptism:—10. Declares the real presence in the Eucharist, continued with the elements only during the period of receiving; insists upon communion in both kinds:—11. Declares absolution to be necessary, but not so particular confession:—12. Against the Anabaptists:—13. Requires actual faith in all who receive the sacraments:—14. Forbids to teach in the church, or to administer the sacraments, without being lawfully called:—15. Orders the observation of the holy days and ceremonies of the church:—16. Of civil matters and marriage:—17. Of the resurrection, last judgment, heaven, and hell:—18. Of free will:—19. That God is not the author of sin:—20. That good works are not altogether unprofitable:—21. Forbids the invocation of saints. PART II.—1. Enjoins communion in both kinds, and forbids the procession of the holy sacrament:—2. Condemns the law of celibacy of priests:—3. Condemns private masses, and enjoins that some of the congregation shall always communicate with the priest:—4. Against the necessity of auricular confession:—5. Against tradition and human ceremonies:—6. Condemns monastic vows:—7. Discriminates between civil and religious power, and declares the power of the church to consist only in preaching and administering the sacraments.

The Apology of the Augsburg Confession contains sixteen articles, which treat of original sin, justification by faith, fulfilment of the law, penitence, repentance, confession, satisfaction, number and use of the sacraments, human ordinances, invocation of the saints, communion in both kinds, celibacy, monastic vows, and ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The "Confessio," with the "Apologia," may be found in Francke, Libri Symbolici Ecclesie Lutherane (Lips. 1847, 12mo); in Hase, Libri Symbolici Evl. Evangelice (Lips. 1846, 12mo), which contains also the papal Augustane Confessionis Responsio of Faber, in Tittmann, Libri Symbolici (1817, 8vo). It has also been edited by Winer (1825), Zwieter (1840, 1856), Francke (1846), Müller (1848), Heppé (Kassel, 1855). There are works on the history of the Confession by Chytraeus (Rost. 1576); Müller (Jena, 1765); Cyprian (Gotha, 1730); Salig (*Historie der A. Augusta, JOHN, a Bohemian theologian, born at Prague in 1500, died Jan. 13th, 1575. He studied at Wittenberg under Luther and Melancthon, with whom he subsequently remained in correspondence, without, however, adopting all the views of Luther. He became a minister of the Bohemian brethren, and subsequently a bishop in the Church. He tried to bring about an understanding among the Protestants at an interview with Luther in 1542. After the Schmalkaldie war many of the Bohemian brethren were banished, and Augusta, together with the chief preachers, was arrested. To recover his liberty, he consented to join again the "Utraquists," to whom he had originally belonged, but he refused to make a public retraction. He was liberated in 1564, but had to pledge himself by an oath not to teach or preach. He is the author of an "Outline of the doctrine of the Bohemian Brethren," and of two works on "the Duties of the Christian Religion" and on "Temptations."—Hoefler, Biographie Generale, iii, 642

Augusti, CHRISTIAN JOHANN WILHELM, a German theologian, was born 27th of October, 1772, at Eschenberg, near Gotha, where his father was pastor. He was educated in the gymnasium of Gotha and at the University of Jena, where, under Griesbach, he devoted himself to theology and philology. In 1798 he began teaching at Jena. In 1800 he was made professor extraordinary, and in 1803 he succeeded Ilgen in the chair of Oriental literature, which he exchanged in 1807 for that of theology. In 1812 he accepted the chair of theology in the University of Breslau, in addition to which he was honored with a seat in the consistory of the province of Silesia. His influence upon the University of Breslau, and upon all the educational establishments of Silesia, was very great. At the time when the French marched into Russia, Augusti was rector of the university, and it was owing to his intrepidity and patriotic spirit that the property of the university was saved. In 1819 he was appointed professor of theology in the newly-established University of Bonn, and received the title of councillor of the Consistory at Cologne. In 1828 he was appointed director of the Consistory of Coblenz. Notwithstanding his numerous duties, he still continued his lectures in the university until his death, 28th April, 1841. Augusti was one of the most voluminous theological writers of Germany. He was originally led by the influence of Griesbach to join the critical or philosophical school of theology, but this did not suit his natural bias, which was more inclined to maintain things as they are than to speculative investigations; and during the last forty years of his life he was a zealous, although not a bigoted advocate of the established form of religion. In doctrine he may be considered an orthodox Lutheran. His writings, most of which are of a historical or archaeological nature, are useful as works of reference, but they are deficient in elegance and simplicity of form, and contain more evidence of learning and industry than of the true spirit of a historian. The most important of all his works is the Denkwürdigkeiten aus der christlichen Archæologie (12 vols. 8vo, Leipz. 1817-1831), which he subsequently condensed into the Handbuch d. christl. Archæologie (Leipz. 1837, 3 vols. 8vo). Among his other works are Lehrbuch d. christl. Dogmengeschichte (Leipz. 1825, 4th ed. 8vo); Beiträge z. christl. Kunstgeschichte u. Liturgik (Leipz. 1811-45, 2 vols. 8vo); Einführung in das alt-Testament (Leipz. last ed. 1827); System der christl. Dogmatik (Leipz. last ed. 1826); Corpus librorum synodal. ecclesie reform. (Eberf. 1827).—English Cyclopæd. i: Herzog, Real-Encyclop. Suppl. i, 123.

Augustine, bishop of Hippo, in Africa, was born at Tagaste, in Numidia, November 13th, 354. His mother, Monica, was a Christian and a woman of piety, who took care to have her son instructed in the true faith and placed among the catechumens. His father was as yet unbaptized, and appears to have cared more to advance his son in worldly knowledge: he spared nothing for his education; and, after giving him the rudiments of grammar at Tagaste, sent him to Madaura, a town in the neighborhood, and afterward removed him to Carthage, to learn rhetoric (this was about the end of the year 371); and here he first imbibed the Manichean errors. He also fell into immoral habits, of which he afterward gave a minute account in his remarkable "Confessions." In 383 he left Carthage, against the will of his mother, and repaired to Rome; and, still adhering to his sect, he lodged at the house of a Manichean, where he fell ill. After his recovery he was sent by Symmachus, the prefect of the city, to Milan, where the inhabitants were in want of a professor of rhetoric. Here he came into intercourse with Ambrose, and was in a short time so convinced by his doctrine that he resolved to forsake the Manichean sect: this design he communicated to his mother, who came to Milan to see him. "Augustine listened to the preaching of Ambrose frequently, but the more he was forced to admire his eloquence, the more he guarded himself against persuasion. Obstinate in seeking truth outside of her only sanctuary, agitated by the stings of his conscience, bound by habit, drawn by fear, subjugated by passion, touched with the beauty of virtue, seduced by the charms of vice, victim of both, never satisfied in his false delights, struggling constantly against the errors of his sect and the mysteries of religion, an unfortunate running from rock to rock to escape shipwreck, he flees from the light which pursues him—such is the picture by which he himself describes his conflicts in his Confessions. At last, one day, torn by the most violent struggles, his face bathed in tears, which flowed involuntarily, he fled for solitude and calm to a retired spot in his garden. There, throwing himself on the ground, he implored, though confusedly, the aid of Heaven. All at once he seemed to hear a voice, as if coming from a neighboring house, which said to him, Tolle; lege: Take and read. Never before had such emotion seized his soul. Surprised, beside himself, he asks himself in vain whence came the voice, or what he was to read. He was sustained by a force he knew not, and sought his friend Alype. A book was placed before him—the epistles of St. Paul. Augustine opens it at hazard, and falls upon this passage of the apostle: 'Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness. . . . But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof.' Augustine needed not any further reading. Hardly had he finished this passage before a ray of divine light broke upon him, enlightening his understanding, dissipating all his shadows, and kindling in his heart a flame of celestial fire. The conversion of Augustine was fully as striking and efficacious as St. Paul's had been. All the apostle's spirit had passed in an instant into the new proselyte. He was then in his thirty-second year. When once again with his mother, the virtuous Monica, to whom his wanderings had cost so many tears, he related to her all that had passed, and also communicated his new resolutions, with that peaceful firmness which changes not. Monica heard this consoling recital with lively joy. All these particulars he himself gives in his Confessions, with a charm and simplicity which have, before or since, never been surpassed."

After remaining for the space of two years among the catechumens, he was baptized by Ambrose at Easter, 387. Soon after his baptism, having given up his profession, he resolved to return to his own country; and on his way thither, while at Ostia, his mother died. About this time he wrote his treatises De Moribus Eccl. Catholicæ et de Moribus Manichæorum, also De Quantitate Animæ. He arrived in Africa at the end of 388, and removed to Tagaste, where he dwelt for three years with some of his friends, occupied solely with prayer, meditation, and study. At this period he wrote the treatises De Genesi contra Manichæos and De Vera Religione. In 391 he went to Hippo; and while there, in spite of his tears and reluctance, the people of that city chose him to fill the office of priest in their church, and brought him to Valerius, their bishop, that he might ordain him. When priest, he instituted a monastery in the church of Hippo, where he entirely devoted himself to works of piety and devotion, and to teaching. Valerius, the bishop, contrary to the custom of the African churches, permitted Augustine to preach in his place, even when he himself was present; and, when this was objected to, he excused himself on the ground that, being himself a Greek, he could not so well preach in Latin. After this the practice became more general. About 393 Augustine wrote the treatise De duabus animabus, contra Manichæos. In 395 he was elected colleague to Valerius in his episcopacy, and consecrated Bishop of Hippo, contrary to the canons of the church. The duties of his office were discharged with the greatest fidelity; but, amid all his labors, he found time for the composition of his most elaborate works. His treatise De Libero Arbitrio was finished in 395; the Confessionum Libri XIII in 398; most of the treatises against the Donatists between 400 and 415; those against the Pelagians between 412 and 428. The De Civitate Dei was begun in 413 and finished in 426. The singular candor of Augustine is shown in his Retractationes (written in 428), in which he explains and qualifies his former writings, and not unfrequently acknowledges his mistakes of opinion. In 430, the Vandals, under Genserich, laid siege to Hippo, and in the third month of the siege (August 28) Augustine died, in his 76th year.

His whole career, after his profession of the Christian faith, was consistent with his high calling; the only faults with which he can be charged are an occasional undue severity in controversy and the share which he bore in the persecution of the Donatists (q. v.). His intellect was acute, vigorous, and comprehensive; his style rapid and forcible, but not remarkable for purity or elegance. "Of all the fathers of the Latin Church" (says M. Villemain, in his Tableau de l'Eloquence de la chaire au quatrième siècle, 1849, 8vo), "St. Augustine brought the highest degree of imagination in theology, and the most eloquence and even sensibility in scholasticism. Give him another century, place him in the highest civilization, and a man never will have appeared endowed with a vaster or more flexible genius. Metaphysics, history, antiquities, science, and manners, Augustine had embraced them all. He writes on music as well as on the freedom of the will; he explains the intellectual phenomenon of the memory as well as reasons on the fall of the Roman Empire. His subtle and vigorous mind has often consumed in mystical problems an amount of sagacity which would suffice for the most sublime conceptions. His eloquence, tinged with affectation and barbarisms, is often fresh and simple. His austere morality displeased the corrupt casuists whom Pascal had so severely handled. His works are not only the perennial source of that scientific theology which has agitated Europe for so many ages, but also the most vivid image of Christian society at the end of the fourth century."

"If we contemplate Augustine as a scholar, our judgment of him will vary according to the different demands we make of a theologian. If we compare the famous bishop with learned theologians of the present time, he can scarcely deserve the name of such a one; for we shall not readily reckon among learned theologians any one who knows nothing at all of Hebrew and but little of Greek. But if we estimate Augustine according to his own period, as it is proper we should, he was by all means a learned man, and was surpassed by few, and among the Latin fathers perhaps only by Jerome, though by him in a high degree. Thus much, however, is certain, Augustine had more genius than learning, more wit and penetration than fundamental science. Augustine's was a philosophical and especially a logical mind. His works sufficiently prove his talent for system-making and a logical development of ideas. We also find in them much philosophical speculation peculiar to himself. But the value of those speculations is not to be highly rated, since he was far from being so much of a metaphysician in general as he was of a logician. Nor was he wanting in a knowledge of philosophical systems and the speculations of others. His weakest point as a scholar was in a knowledge of languages. In this he was surpassed even by Pelagius, who was only a layman; for although, as before remarked, he was not entirely ignorant of Greek, his knowledge of it was very limited, and we meet with a multitude of oversights on this account. Hence he generally used only the Latin translation of the Bible, which is so often faulty; and even in the New Testament he recurs but seldom to the original text. His ignorance and incapacity in expounding the Scriptures, at least of the Old Testament, he himself acknowledges (Retract. i, 18). Hence he very often founds his arguments from the sacred books on erroneous interpretations. He also employed philosophical reasons to support his positive doctrines, and strove to unite the rational with the revealed belief, as Christian theologians had before attempted to do from the time of Justin. His supernatural system he defended not only with exegetical, but also with philosophical weapons. His knowledge of the opinions of the earlier fathers often failed him. In a letter to Jerome (Ep. 67; Opp. Hieron. Vall. ed.), he frankly confesses that he knows not the errors charged upon Origen, and begs Jerome to point them out to him. His taste was not sufficiently formed by the study of the classics. Hence his style (though we find some good remarks of his on grammar, and his ability for eloquence is sufficiently manifest in particular passages) was on the whole defective in purity and elegance, as could not but be expected in an age when the study of Cicero had begun to be regarded as a sin. He also believed that rhetorical eulphony was rather hurtful than beneficial to the presentation of Christian truths, as they thus lose their dignity. In other respects he did not despise the liberal arts, but believed they could be profitably used only when those who practice them are inspired by the Christian spirit (Ep. 101, ad Memorinum).—Wiggers, Augustinism and Pelagianism, chap. i.) His knowledge of Greek was moderate, and his biblical criticisms are therefore of comparatively little value (see Clausen, Augustinus S. Scr. interpres, Hafn, 1828); but as a theologian he made a deep impression upon his own age, and, indeed, upon the whole theology of the church down to the present time. "His influence may be compared with that of Origen in the East, but it was more general and enduring in the West. He was one of those great men, of world-wide celebrity, whose agency is not limited to their own times, but is felt afresh at various epochs in the lapse of centuries. His position in reference to theology was similar to that of Plato and Aristotle in the department of philosophy. On the one hand, the development of the Catholic dogma which appears in the writings of the schoolmen proceeded from him, and, on the other hand, a reaction of the pure Christian consciousness against the foreign elements of the Catholic dogma. Those tendencies within the pale of the Catholic Church from which a new Christian life emanated connect themselves with him. Even the more complete reaction at the Reformation, and the various revivals which the evangelical church has experienced, may be traceable to the same source. He resembled Origen in his turn for speculation, but surpassed him in originality, depth, and acuteness. Both passed through Platonism in the process of their culture; he did not, however, like Origen, mingle the Christian and Platonic elements, but developed the principles of Christianity independently of Platonism, and even in opposition to it. But Origen excelled him in greater mental freedom and erudite historical culture, while Augustine's mind was fettered by a definite church system. The union of their mental elements would, without doubt, have made the most complete church teacher. Nevertheless, many qualities were united in Augustine, which we find scattered in separate tendencies of theological development, and hence we see the various periods of the church shadowed forth in his mental career' (Neander, Hist. of Dogmas, ii, 258).

"In estimating Augustine as a theologian, we must remember that he commenced life as a Manichean; and many believe that traces of the Manichean doctrine (of the evil nature of matter, etc.) can be traced in the later and severer forms of his belief. In attacking the Manicheans, he wrote his treatise De Libero Arbitrio, which certainly would have received a different shape had he written it at a later period, i. e. during his disputes with the Pelagians. In the various discussions which have arisen concerning predestination and the doctrines with which it is connected, some modern divines have quoted the arguments of Augustine against the Manicheans, and others those which he employed against the Pelagians, according to the discordant views which the combatants severally entertain on these controverted points. One of them has thus expressed himself, in his endeavor to reconcile Augustine with himself: 'The heresy of Pelagius being suppressed, the catholic doctrine in that point became more settled and confirmed in the opposition; such freedom being left to the will of man as was subservient unto grace, co-operating in some measure with those heavenly influences. And so much is confessed by Augustine himself, where he asks this question, "Doth any man affirm that free will is perished utterly from man by the fall of Adam?" And thereunto he makes this answer: "Freedom is perished by sin; but it is that freedom only which we had in Paradise, of having perfect righteousness with immortality." For, otherwise, it appears to be his opinion that man was not merely passive in all the acts of grace which conduced to glory, according to the memorable saying of his, so common in the mouths of all men, "He who first made us without our help, will not vouchsafe to save us at least without our concurrence." If any harsher expressions have escaped his pen (as commonly it happeneth in the heats of a disputation), they are to be qualified by this last rule, and by that before, in which it was affirmed that "God could not with justice judge and condemn the world, if all men's sins proceeded not from their own free will, but from some overruling providence which enforced them to it." Another admirer of this father offers the following as an attempt at reconciliation: 'Augustine denied that the co-operation of man is at all exerted to produce the renewal of our nature; but, when the renewal had been produced, he admitted that there was an exercise of the will combined with the workings of grace. In the tenth chapter of his work against the Manicheans, the bishop of Hippo thus expresses himself: "Who is it that will not exclaim, How foolish it is to deliver precepts to that man who is not at liberty to perform what is commanded! An law unjust it is to condemn him who had not power to fulfil the commands! Yet these unhappy persons [the Manicheans] do not perceive that they are ascribing such injustice and want of equity to God. But what greater truth is there than this, that God has delivered precepts, and that human spirits have freedom of will?" Elsewhere he says, "Nothing is more within our power than our own will. The will is that by which we commit sin, and by which we live righteously." Nothing can be plainer than that the writer of these passages admitted the liberty of the human will, and the necessity of our own exertions in conjunction with divine grace. How this is to be reconciled with his general doctrine is perhaps indicated in the following passage from his book De Gratia et Lib. Arbitrio, c. 17. Speaking of grace, he says "that we may will God works without us; but when we will, and so will as to do, he co-works with us; yet, unless he either works that we may will, or co-works when we do will, we are utterly incapable of doing any thing in the good works of piety." These are but very slight specimens of the mode in which learned and ingenious men have tried to give a kind of symmetrical proportion to this father's doctrinal system. Several large treatises have been published with the same praiseworthy intention; the pious authors of them either entirely forgetting, or having never read the rather latitudinarian indulgence of opinion which St. Augustine claims for himself in his 'Retractions.' If, however, an estimate may be formed of what this father intended in his various pacificatory doctrinal explanations from what he has actually admitted and expressed, it may be safely affirmed that no systematic writer of theology seems so completely to have entered into the best views of the bishop of Hippo, or so nearly reconciled the apparent discordances in them, as ARMINIUS has done" (Watson, Theol. Dictionary, s. v.). The changes in Augustine's theology are described as follows by Neander (History of Dogmas, ii, 347). "In his treatises of Lib. Arbitrio and de Vera Religione he supposes everything in man to be conditioned on free will. In his exposition of Rom. ix (A. D. 394) he expressly opposes the interpretation of that passage as implying predestination and the exclusion of free will. Man indeed, he says, could not merit divine grace by his works, for, in order to perform works that are truly pious, he must have first a suitable state of heart, the inward justitia. But this source of goodness man has not from himself; only the Holy Spirit can impart it to him in regeneration; antecedently to this all men are in equal estrangement from God; but it depends on themselves whether, by believing, they make themselves susceptible for the Holy Spirit or not. (Cap. 60.—Quod credimus nostrum est; quod autem bonum operamur illius qui creditibus in se dat Spiritum Sanctum.) God has chosen faith. It is written, God works all in all men, but he does not believe all in all. Faith is man's concern. (Non quidem Deus elegit opera que ipse largitur quam dat Spiritum Sanctum ut per caritatem bona operemur; sed tamen elegit fidem.) From this point we can trace the gradual revolution in Augustine's mode of thinking to its later harsher form. Yet in his treatise De 83 diversis questionibus (written about A. D. 388), he says, in explaining Rom. ix, 18 ("Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth"). This will of God is not unrighteous, for it is conditioned by the most secret relations of congruity; all men, indeed, are corrupt, but yet there is a difference among them; there is in sinners something antecedent by which they become deserving of justification or of hardening (Questio 68, § 4.—Venit enim de occultissimis meritis, quia et ipsi peccatores cum propter generale peccatum unam massam fecerint, non tamen nulla est inter illos diversitas. Præcedit ergo aliquid in peccatoribus quo, quamvis nondum sint justificati digni efficiantur justificatione et item præcedit in aliis peccatoribus quo digni sunt obtusione). The calling of individuals and of whole nations belongs to those high and deep things which man does not understand if he is not spiritually minded. But it must be always maintained that God does nothing unrighteous, and that there is no being who does not owe everything to God. The more Augustine advanced in a deeper perception of faith, the more he recognised it as a living principle, and not as a mere faith of authority, and he acquired a stronger conviction that faith presupposed a divine operation in the soul of man, and that the Bible referred it to divine agency. He was now easily impelled to the other extreme, and to give a one-sided prominence to the divine factor in faith. Resignation to God became his ruling principle, and, looking back at his earlier life, he learned more and more to trace everything to his training by divine grace. He now allowed the conditioning element of free human susceptibility to vanish altogether. That theodicy now appeared to him untenable, which made the attainment of faith by individuals or nations, or their remaining strangers to the Gospel, dependent on their worthiness and the divine prescience; in opposition to this view, he now sought for a foundation in the secret absolute decrees of God, according to which one was chosen and another not. This view was confirmed by the opinion prevalent in the North African Church, that outward baptism was essential to salvation. He now inquired how it was that one child received baptism and another not, and this seemed to confirm the unconditionality of the divine predestination. The alteration in his mode of thinking occupied perhaps a space of four years. In the deverse questiones ad Simplicianum, written about A.D. 397, this is shown most decidedly, as he himself says in his treatise de dono perseverantie that he had then arrived at the perception that even the beginning of faith was the gift of God. In that work (lib. i, questio 2) he derives all good in man from the divine agency; from the words of Paul, 'What hast thou that thou hast not received?' (1 Cor. iv, 7), he infers that nothing can come from man himself. 'How can it be explained,' he asks, 'that the Gospel reaches one man and not another? and that even the same dispensations act quite differently on different persons? It belongs to God to furnish the means which lead every man to believe; consequently, the reason of the difference can only be that, according to his own decree, it seems good to withhold it from one and not from another. All men, in consequence of the first transgression, are exposed to perdition; in this state there can be no higher movement, therefore none at all, in them toward conversion. But God, out of compassion, chooses some to whom he imparts divine grace, gratia afficit, which operates upon them in an irresistible manner, but yet in accordance with their rational nature, so that they cannot do otherwise than follow it. The rest he leaves to their merited perdition.' From the preceding remarks it is clear that Augustine reached the standpoint fixed by his own experience; and we perceive how false it is that his system in this form was derived from his excessive opposition to Pelagianism, since it had been formed ten years before his conflict with it. We might rather affirm of Pelagius that he would not have developed his doctrine in its actual form had he not been opposed to Augustine."

In the year 412 Augustine began to write against the doctrines of PELAGIUS, a native of Britain, who had resided for a considerable time at Rome, and acquired universal esteem by the purity of his manners, his piety, and his erudition. In the defense of his opinions Pelagius was seconded by Celestius, a man equally eminent for his talents and his virtues. Their principles were propagated rapidly, and were speedily transplanted to almost every corner of Christendom. If the brief notices which have come down to us respecting their tenets, in the writings of their adversaries, be correct, they (1) denied the regeneration of infants in baptism and the damnation of all unbaptized infants; (2) they denied that Adam's sin was imputed to his posterity, and went so far as to reject original sin entirely; (3) they asserted the freedom of the will, and its capacity for good without supernatural grace. "It is not," they said, "free will if it requires the aid of God; because every one has it within the power of his own will to do any thing, or not to do it. Our victory over sin and Satan proceeds not from the help which God affords, but is owing to our own free will. The unrestricted capability of men's own free will is amply sufficient for all these things, and therefore no necessity exists for asking of God those things which we are able of ourselves to obtain; the gifts of grace being only necessary to enable men to do that more easily and completely which yet they could do themselves though more slowly and with greater difficulty, seeing that they are perfectly free creatures." These opinions were assailed by St. Augustine and St. Jerome, as well as by Orosius, a Spanish presbyter, and they were condemned as heresies in the Council of Carthage and in that of Milevis. In his eagerness to confute these opponents, St. Augustine employed language so strong as made it susceptible of an interpretation wholly at variance with the accountability of man. This led to further explanations and modifications of his sentiments, which were multiplied when the Semi-Pelagians arose, who thought that the truth lay between his doctrines and those of the Pelagians. Concerning original sin, he maintained that it was derived from our first parents; and he believed he had ascertained in what the original sin conveyed by Adam to his posterity consisted. In his sentiments, however, upon the latter point he was rather inconsistent, at one time asserting that the essence of original sin was concupiscence, and at another expressing doubts respecting his own position. This subject was bequeathed as a legacy to the schoolmen of a subsequent age, who exercised their subtle wits upon all its ramifications down to the period of the Council of Trent. On the consequences of the fall of our first parents, St. Augustine taught that by it human nature was totally corrupted, and deprived of all inclination and ability to do good. Before the age in which he lived, the early fathers held what, in the language of systematic theology, is termed the synergistic system, or the needfulness of human co-operation in the works of holiness; but, though the freedom of the will was not considered by them as excluding or rendering unnecessary the grace of God, yet much vagueness is perceptible in the manner in which they express themselves. In fact, there was no scientific view as yet on these topics. Those early divines generally used the language of Scripture, the fertile invention of controversial writers not having as yet displaced itself, except on the divine nature of Jesus Christ, and subsidiary terms and learned distinctions not being then required by any great differences of opinion. But as soon as Pelagius broached his errors, the attention of Christians was naturally turned to the investigation of the doctrine of grace. The personal experience of Augustine, coinciding with the views of the great body of the Christian Church, admitted the necessity of divine grace, or the influence of the Holy Spirit, for our obedience to the law of God. He ascribed the renovation of our moral constitution wholly to this grace, denied all co-operation of man with it for answering the end to be accomplished, and represented it as irresistible. He farther affirmed that it was given only to a certain portion of the human race, to those who showed the fruits of it in their sanctification, and that it secured the perseverance of all upon whom it was bestowed. His view of predestination has been summed up as follows: 1. That God from all eternity decreed to create mankind holy and good. 2. That he foresaw man, being tempted by Satan, would fall into sin, if God did not hinder it; he decreed not to hinder. 3. That out of mankind, seen fallen into sin and misery, he chose a certain number to raise to righteousness and to eternal life, and rejected the rest, leaving them in their sins. 4. That for these his chosen he decreed to send his Son to redeem them, and his Spirit to call them and sanctify them; the rest he decreed to forsake, leaving them to Satan and themselves, and to punish them for their sins. After Augustine had thus almost newly moulded the science of theology, and had combined with it, as an essential part of divine truth, that the fate of men was determined by the divine decree independently of their own efforts and conduct, and that they were thus divided into the elect and reprobate, it became necessary, in order to preserve consistency, to introduce into his system a limitation with respect to baptism, and to preserve the opinions concerning it from interfering with those which flowed from the doctrine of predestination. He accordingly taught that baptism brings with it the forgiveness of sins; that it is so essential that the omission of it will expose us to condemnation; and that it is attended with regeneration. He also affirmed that the virtue of baptism is not in the water; that the ministers of Christ perform the external ceremony, but that Christ accompanies it with invisible grace; that baptism is common to all, while grace is not so; and that the same external rite may be death to some and life to others. By this distinction he rids himself of the difficulty which would have pressed upon his scheme of theology, had pardon, regeneration, and salvation been necessarily connected with the outward ordinance of baptism, and limits its proper efficacy to those who are comprehended, as the heirs of eternal life, in the decree of the Almighty. Many, however, of those who strictly adhere to him in other parts of his doctrinal system desert him at this point. See PELAGIANISM. His honest anxiety for the honor of the grace of God led him to overlook the human side of the question, and to make the operation of grace more like physical necessity than moral influence. The traces of his Manichaean habit of thought appear plainly here. "Here," says Kling, in his excellent article on Augustine in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie (i, 623), "is a weak side in Augustine's system. In the attempt of his fiery and impulsive intellect to give fixity and stability to the doctrine of Christian anthropology, and to leave no room in his system for self-righteousness, he fell into the labyrinth of unconditional predestination, implying a dualism in the Divine will which has never gained the mind of the Christian Church as a correct interpretation of Scripture as a whole. In fact, the system has been a stumbling-block in the church from Augustine's time till now. As for the better part of Augustine's doctrine, which is, in fact, its true essence, viz. that the entire glory of the renewal of human nature is due to divine grace, and is due in no respect whatever to mere human ability, because the consequences of the fall have left that nature incapable of renewal except by a divine power of renovation, this doctrine has penetrated the heart and intellect of the church, and has found expression in her creeds and confessions in all ages." See AUGUSTINISM.

The Donatist controversy was one of the bitterest waged by Augustine, and was, perhaps, on the whole, the least honorable to him. Before this controversy, and even during the earlier period of it, he had always treated heretics with mildness and charity, and opposed the passage of several laws against the Donatists. But at a later period, after the Donatists had made alarming progress among the African churches, the urgent representations of his colleagues caused a radical change of his views. He became the most ardent advocate of the compulsory suppression of every heresy, and he based this shocking theory on the passage in Luke xiv, where the master of a house, after the invited guests have declined to come, orders the servants to bring in the poor, the maimed, the halt, the blind, from the streets and lanes of the city, and, when there was yet room, to 'go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in.' This interpretation by a church father so profoundly revered, has been, in all following centuries, the source of incalculable mischief. It is one of the principal weapons with which ecclesiastical and royal despots have attempted to justify the murder of millions on the charge of heresy. Even men like Bossuet were induced, by the weight of Augustine's authority, to advocate compulsory measures against heretics" (Neander, Church History, iii, 197-217; Flottes, Étude sur Saint Augustin, Paris, 1862).

St. Augustine's works have been printed in a collected form repeatedly: at Paris, in 10 vols. folio, 1532; by Erasmus, from Frobenius's press, 10 vols. folio, 1540-43; by the divines of Louvain, 10 vols. folio, Lugd. 1586; and by the Benedictines of the congregation of St. Maur, 10 vols. folio, Paris, 1679-1700, 12 vols. folio, 1688-1703, and 12 vols. folio, Antwerp, 1700-1703; reprinted, Paris, 1836-39, 11 vols. 4to. The latest edition (not the best) is that of the Benedictines, edited by Migne (Paris, 1842, 15 vols. imp. 8vo). A review of his literary activity is given by Busch, Librorum Augustini recensio (Dorpat, 1826). Of his separate works many editions have been published. The Benedictine edition gives a copious Life of Augustine; and the 13th vol. of Tillemont's Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire Ecclesiastique is a 4to of 1075 pages devoted entirely to his biography. Dupin (Eccles. Writers) gives a copious and minute analysis of all of Augustine's works. English versions of the Confessions, and of the Expositions of the Gospels and Psalms, may be found in the Library of the Fathers (Oxf. 1839-1855). A translation of the Confessions, with an introduction by Prof. Shedd, has also been published at Andover (1860). M. Poujoulat, the author of a Life of St. Augustine and numerous other works, has commenced (1864), in connection with abbé Raulx, a translation of the complete works of St. Augustine. The translators claim that this is the first complete French translation of the great church father. The work will be completed in twelve volumes (Saint Augustin; Œuvres Complètes). Recent editions of the De Civitate Dei have been published by Bruder (Leipsic, 1838) and Stranze (Cologne, 1859); of the Confessions, by Bruder (Leipsic, 1837), Pusey (Oxford, 1838), Raumer (Stuttgart, 1856); of the Meditations, by Sintzel (Sulzbach, 1844) and Westhoff (Münster, 1854). German translations of the Confessions have been published by Rapp (3d edit. Stuttgart, 1856), Grüniger (4th edit. Münster, 1859), and by several anonymous translators (Passau, 6th edit. 1856; Ratisbon, 1853; Reutlingen, 1858); and of the City of God, by Sillert (1825, 2 vols.).—Neander, *Ch. Augustine (or AUSTIN), first archbishop of Canterbury, was a monk of the Benedictine monastery of St. Andrew, at Rome, and was sent by Pope Gregory, who had been prior of that convent, soon after his accession to the papal throne, as a missionary into England, together with forty companions, also Benedictines, A.D. 596 (Bede, Hist. Eccl. i, 23). Augustine and his company became discouraged, and Augustine was dispatched back to Rome to obtain the pope's leave for their return; but Gregory disregarded his remonstrances, and providing him with new letters of protection, commanded him to proceed. Augustine and his companions landed late in 596 in the isle of Thanet, whence they sent messengers to Ethelbert, king of Kent, to inform him of the object of their mission. Ethelbert's queen, Bertha, daughter of Cherebert, king of the Parisii, was a Christian, and by the articles of her marriage (as early as 570) had the free exercise of her religion allowed her. Ethelbert ordered the missionaries at first to continue in the isle of Thanet, but some time after came to them and invited them to an audience in the open air. Although he refused at first to abandon the gods of his fathers, he allowed them to preach without molestation, and assigned them a residence in Canterbury, then called Dorobernia, which they entered in procession, singing hymns. After the conversion and baptism of the king himself, they received license to preach in any part of his dominions, which Bede assures us (c. 25) extended (probably over tributary kingdoms) as far as the river Humber, and proselytes were now made in remarkable numbers. In 597, Augustine, by direction of Pope Gregory, went over to Arles, in France, where he was consecrated archbishop, and metropolitan of the English nation, by the archbishop of that place; after which, returning into Britain, he sent Lawrence, the presbyter, and Peter, the monk, to Rome, to acquaint the pope with the success of his mission, and to desire his solution of certain questions respecting church discipline, the maintenance of the clergy, etc. which Bede (l. i. c. 27) has reported at length in the form of interrogatories and answers. Gregory sent over more missionaries, and directed him to constitute a bishop at York, who might have other subordinate bishops, yet in such a manner that Augustine of Canterbury should be metropolitan of all England. Augustine now made an attempt to establish uniformity of discipline in the island, and, as a necessary step, to gain over the Welsh bishops to his opinion. For this purpose a conference was held in Worcester-shire, at a place since called Augustine's Oak, where the archbishop endeavored to persuade the prelates to make one communion, and assist in preaching to the unconverted Saxons; but neither this, nor a second conference, in which he threatened divine vengeance in case of non-obedience, was successful. After Augustine's death, Ethelfrid, king of Northumberland, marched with an army to Caerleon, and near twelve hundred monks of Bangor were put to the sword. In the year 604 Augustine consecrated two of his companions, Mellitus and Justus, the former to the see of London, the latter to that of Rochester. He died at Canterbury, probably in 607, but the date of his death is variously given from 604 to 614. The observation of the festival of St. Augustine was first enjoined in a synod held under Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury (Gervase, Act. Pontif. Cantuar. Script. x. col. 1641), and afterward by the pope's bull in the reign of Edward III. See Bede, Hist. Eccl. lib. i and ii; Gregorius, Epistole, l. vii, ep. 5, 30; l. ix, ep. 56; Joan Diacon. *Vita S. Augustinian Monks are divided into two classes:

I. CANONS REGULAR.—In the year 1038, four canons of the Church of Avignon, called Arnaldus, Odelo, Pontius, and Durandus, being desirous of leading a more strictly religious life, betook themselves, with the permission of the bishop Benedict, to a solitude, where they led an ascetic life; and having thus originally been under the canonical institution before the monastic, they acquired the name of "regular canons." A large number of canons, both lay and clerical, induced by their example, set themselves to follow this new rule of life, and ere long monasteries were built in various places, but chiefly in solitudes, and filled with these new candidates for the regular life, who differed from the monks in name only. At first they appear to have had no rule peculiar to themselves, and probably followed that of Aix-la-Chapelle (A. D. 816); but subsequently they assumed for their rule that of Augustine (i. e. his letter ad Sanctimoniales), adding to it various constitutions taken from the rule of Benedict and elsewhere. Stevens says that they did not take any vows until the twelfth century, nor do they appear to have assumed the name of "Regular Canons of St. Augustine" until Innocent II, at Lateran, in 1129, ordained that all regular canons should be under the rule of St. Augustine, contained in his 109th epistle. The dress of the regular canons was usually a long black cassock, and a white rochet over it, and over that a black cloak and hood; they also wore beards and caps. They were a numerous body in England, where they were probably first settled at Colechester in 1105. They are said to have had 170 houses in England. They were established in Scotland in 1134, at the desire of Alexander I, and had in that country 28 monasteries, of which the chief were Scone, Loch Tay, Inch Colme, St. Andrew's, Holyrood, Cambuskenneth, and Jedburgh.—Dugdale, Monasticon, vi, 57.

II. HERMITS, one of the four great mendicant orders [see MENDICANT ORDERS] of the Roman Catholic Church. The Augustinians endeavor to trace their origin back to the time when St. Augustine, after his conversion, lived for three years in a villa near Tagaste, wholly given up to ascetic exercises. But even the Romanist historians generally reject this claim as utterly without foundation. The order originated in 1256, when Pope Alexander IV, in pursuance of a decree, compelled eight minor monastic congregations, among which the John-Bonites (founded in 1168 by John Bon), the Britinnians, and the Tuscan hermits were the most important, to unite. The united order was called the Hermits of St. Augustine, because most of the congregations followed the Rule of Augustine, a compilation of precepts taken from two sermons of St. Augustine on the morals of priests and from his letter to the nuns of Hippo. Though now monks, they retained the name hermits, because all the congregations had been hermits. In 1257 they were exempted from the jurisdiction of the bishops, and divided into four provinces, Italy, Spain, France, and Germany. Unlike the other mendicant orders, they started with a lax rule, and gross disorders and immorality grew up among them sooner and more generally than among the others.

Usual Style of the Augustinian Hermits. 1. In-doors; 2. Abroad.

Since the fourteenth century many attempts at introducing a stricter discipline have been made by zealous members, and have resulted in the formation of a large number of special congregations, of which the congregation of Lombardy, with 86 convents, became the most numerous. The congregation of Saxony, which was established in 1493, and with which the convents of Germany generally connected themselves, separated itself entirely from the order, and its superior, John Staupitz, assumed the title of vicar-general. Among the friends of Staupitz was MARTIN LUTHER, the most celebrated of all who ever wore the habit of Augustine, and through whose influence the majority of the convents of the Saxon congregation seceded from the Roman Catholic Church.

THE DISCALCEATED or BAREFOOTED AUGUSTINIANS (Observants, Recollects) owe their origin to the Portuguese monk Thomas a Jesu de Andrade (died in 1582), though their first convent was not organized until after his death, in 1588, by order of the king of Spain. They adopted a rule which in strictness surpasses the primitive one, and were afterward divided into three separate congregations, the Italian-German, until 1656, in four provinces, subsequently in seven (2 of Naples, 2 of Sicily, 1 of Genoa, 1 of Germany, 1 of Piedmont), the French in three provinces, and the Spanish, the most rigorous of all, which extended to the East and West Indies, to the Philippine Islands, to Japan and Rome. They have in every province a retired convent, with a hermitage close by, in which monks desirous of a particular ascetic perfection may live.

In the sixteenth century, when Pius V conferred on them the privileges of the other mendicant orders, the Augustinians counted 2000 convents of men and 300 of females, together with 35,000 inmates. The order has fallen in the general suppression of convents in Portugal, Spain, France, Northern and Western Germany, and quite recently in Italy. At the beginning of 1864, the Augustinian Hermits had 131 convents in Italy, 19 in Germany, 6 in Poland, 1 in France, 13 in Great Britain, 1 in Holland, 2 in Belgium, 22 in Mexico, 2 in the United States (in the dioceses of Philadelphia and Albany), 13 in South America, and 1 in the Philippine Islands. The Barefooted Augustinians had 6 monasteries in Italy, 1 in Germany, 2 in South America, and 6 in the Philippine Islands.

The Augustinians have never been able to gain the same importance as the other mendicant orders, and at present they exert no great influence in the Church of Rome. The most remarkable men, besides Luther, which the order has produced, are Onuphrius Panvini (of the sixteenth century), Cardinal Norris, Abraham a Santa Clara, and Ludovicus Leon. The constitution, which was established at the general chapters of 1287, 1290, 1575, and especially at that of 1580, is aristocratic. The general chapters, which assemble every sixth year, elect a prior-general, and may depose him. His power is limited by the definitores, who, as his councillors, reside with him. Every province has a provincial, four definitores, and one or several visitators. Every convent has a prior. The Discalceated Augustinians have their vicar-generals, while the general of the order is taken from the calceated (conventuals).

Augustinian Nuns, a religious order of the Roman Catholic Church following the rule of Augustine. Like the Augustinian monks, they have claimed Augustine as founder, without, however, any historical proofs. They partly form congregations under the guidance of the Augustinian monks, and partly are placed under the jurisdiction of the diocesan bishops. Congregations of Discalceated or Barefooted Augustinian nuns were founded in 1589, 1597, and 1601 in Spain, and one about the same time in Portugal by Queen Louisa, wife of John IV. The most recent congregation of Augustinian nuns is that called Augustines de l'Intérieur de Marie, established on Oct. 14, 1829. It had, in 1839, only one house, at Grand Montrouge. In 1860 the Augustinian nuns had, altogether, 42 establishments in France, and a few others in Italy, Switzerland, Prussia, Spain, Holland and Belgium, Poland, Canada (at Quebec), and South America. The sources of information are the same as those mentioned at the close of the preceding article. See also Migne, Dict. des Ordres Religieux, tom. iv, p. 105-116.

Augustinism, the theological system of St. Augustine, as developed in opposition to Pelagianism and Semi-Pelagianism. "Augustine considered the human race as a compact mass, a collective body, responsible in its unity and solidarity. Carrying out his system in all its logical consequences, he laid down the following rigid proposition as his doctrine: 'As all men have sinned in Adam, they are subject to the condemnation of God on account of this hereditary sin and the guilt thereof'" (Smith's Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, i, 299). Wiggers (Augustinism and Pelagianism, p. 268) gives the following summary view of the theological system of Augustine: I. Infant Baptism.—The baptism of infants as well as adults is for the forgiveness of sin. Children have, indeed, committed no actual sins, yet by original sin they are under the power of the devil, from which they are freed by baptism. Hence Christian children who die before baptism no more escape positive punishment in the future life than do all who are not Christians. II. Original Sin.—By Adam's sin, in whom all men jointly sinned together, sin, and the other positive punishments of Adam's sin, came into the world. By it human nature has been both physically and morally corrupted. Every man brings into the world with him a nature already so corrupt that he can do nothing but sin. The propagation of this quality of his nature is by concupiscence. III. Free Will.—By Adam's transgression, the freedom of the human will has been entirely lost. In his present corrupt state, man can will and do only evil. IV. Grace.—If nevertheless man, in his present state, wills and does good, it is merely the work of grace. It is an inward, secret, and wonderful operation of God upon man. It is a preceding as well as an accompanying work. By preceding grace, man attains faith, by which he comes into an insight of good, and by which power is given him to will the good. He needs co-operating grace for the performance of every individual good act. As man can do nothing without grace, so he can do nothing against it. It is irresistible. And as man by nature has no merit at all, no respect at all can be had to man's moral disposition in imparting grace, but God acts according to his own free will. V. Predestination and Redemption.—From eternity God made a free and unconditional decree to save a few from the mass that was corrupted and subjected to damnation. To those whom he predestinated to this salvation, he gives the requisite means for this purpose. But on the rest, who do not belong to this small number of the elect, the merited ruin falls. Christ came into the world and died for the elect only.

These are the principles of Augustinism. Its anthropological principle, of the native corruption of man, and of his utter incapacity to do good apart from divine grace, has remained fixed in the church to this day. Pelagius maintained, on the contrary, that "every man, in respect to his moral nature, is born in precisely the same condition in which Adam was created, and has the capacity of willing and doing good without God's special aid. It was Augustine's mission to enunciate clearly and to fix forever the Christian doctrine as to the condition of human nature in its fallen state. But the anxiety of Augustine to save the divine glory in the work of man's salvation led him to the doctrine of unconditional election and predestination—a doctrine to which the mind and heart of the church, as a whole, has never acceded. It has been a stumbling-block from Augustine's day until now. But Augustine, in his combat against Pelagius, was entirely successful. The church of his times sided with him, and Pelagius and his adherents were condemned by a number of synods, and by Zosimus, the bishop of Rome. After the death of Augustine, the controversy about the chief points of his system continued for a long time to agitate the entire church. The General Synod of Ephesus (431) condemned the Pelagians, together with the Nestorians; yet, on the whole, the Greek Church did not take any real interest in the controversy, and never adopted the doctrines of absolute predestination and irresistible grace. In Africa and Rome a tendency to Augustinism prevailed; and at the synods of Arausio (Orange) and Valentia (529) a decision was obtained in favor of the exclusive operation of divine grace, although predestination was evidently evaded. In Gaul Augustinism did not exercise the same influence; and although the authority of Augustine was too great to permit an open opposition to his system, Semi-Pelagian tendencies seemed to be for a long time in the ascendancy.

The authority of Augustine's name remained unimpaired, although his peculiar doctrines were but little understood by the church of the Middle Ages. The first important controversy concerning Augustinism was that called forth by the monk Gottschalk (q. v.), who in the most decided forms of expression announced the doctrine of a double predestination, founded upon the absolute foreknowledge of God, according to which some were devoted to life, and others were consigned to destruction. Gottschalk, who pretended to be a strict follower of Augustine, was condemned by the Synod of Mayence (848), and died in prison (868). His doctrine was a development, not of the good side of Augustinism, viz. its anthropology, but of the false side, viz. its view of the relations between God and man in the work of salvation. Augustine maintained unconditional election, but not reprobation; he held that God chose from the massa perditionis such and such persons to be saved, because he pleased to choose them, and for no other reason whatever; while the rest were lost, not because God chose to damn them, but because they were sinners. Gottschalk was the first to announce in clear terms the doctrine of the divine reprobation of sinners, i. e. that they are damned, not simply because of their sins, but because of God's decree to damn them, for no other reason than because it pleased him so to do. In the subsequent centuries, the rise of scholasticism and mysticism, and the controversy between these two systems, diverted the attention of the church from Augustinism. Anselm, Peter Lombard, and Thomas Aquinas endeavored to retain Augustine's doctrine of an unconditional election, though with many limitations. The current of theological opinion in the church in general was in a direction toward Pelagianism, and the learned Thomist, Thomas de Bradwardina (q. v.), a professor at Oxford, and subsequently archbishop at Canterbury (d. 1349), charged the whole age with having adopted Pelagianism. On the whole, the Thomists claimed to stand on the same ground as Augustine; yet, while they regarded original sin as a culpable offence, and divine grace as predestination, they nevertheless believed that man has some remnants of power by which he may make himself worthy of divine favor (meritum e congruo), and regarded divine grace as dependent upon divine foreknowledge. The Scotists (adherents of Duns Scotus), on the other hand, described both original sin and grace as rather the invariable condition of all men, and as developments of the spiritual world in the course of Providence. As Thomas was a Dominican and Duns Scotus a Franciscan, the controversy between Thomists and Scotists on the subject of original sin and divine grace gradually became a controversy between the two orders of mendicant friars. After the Reformation, the Jesuits, in accordance with the moral system of their school, adopted the views of the Scotists. Augustinism found very zealous champions in the professors of the University of Louvain. One of them, Baius (q. v.), was denounced by the Franciscans to Pope Pius V., who in 1567 condemned 79 propositions extracted from the writings of Baius, a sentence which was confirmed by Gregory XIII (1579). In return, the theological faculty of Louvain censured 34 propositions in the works of the Jesuits Less and Hamel, as opposed to the teachings of St. Augustine, and to the absolute authority of the Scriptures. As the controversy waxed very warm, Sixtus V forbade its continuance; but when this proved fruitless, a committee (the celebrated congregatio de auxiliis) was appointed by Clement VIII for the full decision of the question, "In what way is the assistance of divine grace concerned in the conversion of the sinner?" The congregation was, however, dismissed in 1607, without having accomplished its object, and the antagonism between the Augustinian school and its opponents continued as before. An elaborate representation of the Augustinian and Pelagian systems was given by Bishop Jansenius, of Ypres, in his work Augustinus s. doctrinæ Augustini de humane nature sanitate, aegritudine, et medicina adversus Pelagianum et Massilienses, which was published after the death of the author, and gave rise to the celebrated Jansenist controversy, and to the exclusion of the Jansenists from the church. See JANSENIUS and JANSENISTS. The condemnation of JANSENIUS and the Jansenists did, however, not terminate the controversy in the Roman Catholic Church concerning the Augustinian theology, though the subsequent history of the controversy is not marked by any prominent event. But the Roman Catholic Church, as a whole, rejects that part of Augustinism which teaches absolute predestination (see Möhler, Symbölicism, ch. iii, § 10).

Some of the forerunners of the Reformation during the Middle Ages, as Wickliffe and Savonarola, were strict Augustinians; but others, e. g. Wessel, urged the necessity of a free appropriation of divine grace on the part of man as a conditio sine qua non. Luther was an Augustinian monk, and, as a reformer, he was at first confirmed in his Augustinian views by the contests which he had to maintain against the doctrine of the meritoriousness of works. But there is reason to believe that, in common with Melancthon, he modified his views as to absolute predestination; and, under the guidance of Melancthon, the Lutheran Church has avoided the strict consequences of the Augustinian system by asserting that the decrees of God are conditional. Calvin was a strict Augustinian, and even went beyond Augustine, by maintaining reprobation. He, and the early reformed theologians generally, in their religious controversies, not only admitted all the consequences of the Augustinian system, but, having once determined the idea of predestination, went beyond the premises so far as to maintain that the fall of man was itself predestinated by God (supralapsarianism). This view, however, did not meet with much approbation, and was at last almost entirely abandoned. In opposition to the ultra Augustinian views, Arminius, admitting Augustine's anthropology, defined the true doctrine of the relations between God and man in the work of salvation. In Germany, the Rationalists and the school of Speculative Philosophy discarded Augustinism, while the Pietists, and other theologians who returned to the old faith of the church, and (though with various modifications) the followers of Schleiermacher, revived it in its essential points. At present, hardly one of the great theologians of Germany holds the extreme Augustinian doctrine of absolute predestination.

The first good work on the Augustinian system was written by Wiggers, Versuch einer pragmatischen Darstellung des Augustinismus und Pelagianismus (Berlin, 1821; Hamburg, 1833, vol. i translated by Prof. Emerson, Andover, 1840, 8vo). See also Gangau, Psychologie des heil. Augustinus (Augsb. 1852). More philosophical than theological, yet of great value for the history of the theological system of Augustine, is the work of Nourrisson on "The Philosophy of St. Augustine" (La Philosophie de Saint Augustin, Par. 1865, 2 vols.). This work received a prize from the French Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques. The first volume contains a memoir of the bishop, and a detailed exposition of his philosophical views; the second gives an account of the sources from which Augustine borrowed his ideas, an estimate of the influence which the Augustinian theories exercised, especially during the seventh century, and a critical discussion of the Augustinian theories. See ARMENIANISM; AUGUSTINE.

Augustus (venerable, Græcized Ἀγῶστρος), the imperial title assumed by Octavius, or Octavianus, the successor of Julius Cæsar, and the first peacefully acknowledged emperor of Rome. He was emperor at the birth and during half the life-time of our Lord (B.C. 30 to A.D. 14), but his name occurs only once (Luke ii, 1) in the New Testament, as the emperor who appointed the enrolment in consequence of which Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem, the place where the Messiah was to be born. See JESUS. The successors of the first Augustus took the same name or title, but it is seldom applied to them by the Latin writers. In the eastern part of the empire the Greek Σεβαστός (which is equivalent) seems to have been more common, and hence is used of Nero (Acts xxv, 21). In later times (after Diocletian) the title of "Augustus" was given to one of the two heirs-apparent of the empire, and "Cæsar" to their younger colleagues and heirs-apparent.

Augustus was descended from the Octavian family (gens Octavia), being the son of a certain prætor, Caius Octavius, and born in the year of Rome 691, B.C. 62 (Sueton. Octav. 5). His mother was Atia, daughter of Julia, the sister of C. Julius Cæsar. He bore the same name as his father, Caius Octavius. Being adopted and educated by his great uncle Julius Cæsar, he changed his name from Octavius to that of Caius Julius Cæsar Octavianus (i. e. ex-Octavius), in accordance with Roman usage. After the assassination of Cæsar, he went, although still a youth, into Italy, and soon acquired such political connections and importance (Suet. Cæs. 83 sq.; Octav. 8) that Antony and Lepidus took him into their triumvirate (Suet. Octav. 13). After the removal of the weak Lepidus, he shared with Antony the chief power over the entire Roman empire, having special charge of the western provinces, as Antony did over the eastern (Suet. Octav. 16, 54; Appian. Civ. v, 122 sq.). But there was no cordial union between these two ambitious men; their opposition gradually developed itself, and soon reached its crisis in the decisive naval battle of Actium (B.C. 31), in which Octavius was victor (Suet. Octav. 17; Dio Cass. l. 15 sq.; Vell. Patere. ii, 85). Two years afterward he was greeted as "emperor" (imperator) by the senate, and somewhat later (B.C. 27), when he desired voluntarily to receive the supreme power, as "Augustus" (Vell. Patere. ii, 91; Dio Cass. liii, 16). Liberality toward the army, moderation toward the senate, which he allowed to retain the semblance of its ancient authority, affability and clemency toward the populace, strengthened the supremacy which Augustus, uniting in his own person the highest offices of the republic, maintained with imperial power, but without a regal title. To Herod, who had attached himself to the party of Antony, he was unexpectedly gracious, instated him as king of Judæa ("rex Judæorum," Joseph. Ant. xv,

7, 8), raising also somewhat later his brother Pheroras to the tetrachate (Joseph. Ant. xv, 10, 3). In thankfulness for these favors, Herod built him a marble temple near the source of the Jordan (Joseph. Ant. xv, 10, 3), and remained during his whole life a firm adherent of the imperial family. After the death of Herod (A.D. 4) his dominions, almost in exact accordance with the will which he left, were divided among his sons (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 11, 4) by Augustus, who was soon compelled, however (A.D. 6), to exile one of them, Archelaus, and to join his territory of Judæa and Samaria to the province of Syria (Joseph. Ant. xxii, 13, 2). Augustus died in the 76th year of his age at Nola in Campania, August 19, in the year of Rome 767 (see Wurm, in Bengel's Archiv. ii, 8 sq.), or A.D. 14 (Suet. Octav. 99 sq.; Dio Cass. lvi, 29 sq.; Joseph. Ant. xviii, 3, 2; War. ii, 9, 1), having some time previously nominated Tiberius as his associate (Suet. Tib. xxi; Tacit. Annal. i, 3). The kindness of Augustus toward the Herods, and the Jews through them (Philo, ii, 588, 591, 592), was founded, not upon any regard for the Jewish people themselves (as the contrary appears to have been the case with all the Roman emperors, Suet. Octav. 93), but upon political considerations, and, as it would seem, a personal esteem for Herod. Augustus not only procured the crown of Judæa for Herod, whom he loaded with honors and riches, but was pleased also to undertake the education of Alexander and Aristobulus, his sons, to whom he gave apartments in his palace. When he came into Syria, Zenodorus and the Gadarenes waited on him with complaints against Herod; but he cleared himself of the accusations, and Augustus added to his honors and kingdom the tetrarchy of Zenodorus. He also examined into the quarrels between Herod and his sons, and reconciled them. See HEROD. Syllæus, minister to Obodas, king of the Nabathæans, having accused Herod of invading Arabia, and destroying many people there, Augustus, in anger, wrote to Herod about it; but he so well justified his conduct that the emperor restored him to favor, and continued it ever after. He disapproved, however, of the rigor exercised by Herod toward his sons, Alexander, Aristobulus, and Antipater; and when they were executed he is said to have observed "that it were better a great deal to be Herod's swine than his son" (Macrob. Saturn. ii, 4). It was through the warm attachment of Augustus for M. Vipsanius Agrippa that the latter was enabled to exercise a strong influence in favor of the Jews. See AGRIPIA. After the death of Lepidus, Augustus assumed the office of high-priest, a dignity which gave him the inspection over ceremonies and religious concerns. One of his first proceedings was an examination of the Silyli's books, many of which he burnt, and placed the others in two gold boxes under the pedestal of Apollo's statue, whose temple was within the enclosure of the palace. This is worthy of note, if these prophecies had excited a general expectation of some great person about that time to be born, as there is reason to suppose was the fact. It should be remembered, also, that Augustus had the honor to shut the temple of Janus, in token of universal peace, at the time when the Prince of Peace was born. This is remarkable, because that temple was shut but a very few times. For further details of the life of Augustus, see Smith's Dict. of Biog. s. v. On the question whether this emperor had any knowledge respecting Christ, there are treatises by Hasse (Regiom. 1805), Hering (Stettin, 1727), Köber (Gerl. 1669), Sperling (Viteb. 1703), Zieblich (Gera, 1718, and in his Verm. Beitr. i, 3), Zorn (Opusc. ii, 481 sq.).

Aurandt, JOHN DIETRICH, a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born on Maiden Creek, Berks county, Pa., 1760, and in his youth was apprenticed to a miller. In 1778 he enlisted as a soldier in the brigade of the Pennsylvania Regulars under Gen. Wayne. He continued in the army till 1781, when he received an honorable discharge. He now resumed his business as a miller, but after several years turned his attention to farming. Meanwhile his mind had been strongly turned toward the holy ministry. He began by exhorting in meetings for prayer, studying privately as best he could. He was licensed to preach in 1806, and ordained in 1809. He settled in Huntingdon county, Pa. His field of labor extended east and west sixty miles, north and south from forty to fifty miles. Here he labored with apostolic zeal as a pioneer, laying the foundation of numerous and flourishing congregations. His travelling over these mountain regions of Pennsylvania was done on horseback. This was his first and also his last field of labor. His health failed toward the last, and sometimes for a short period his labors were interrupted; but he continued his work, though often amid much suffering, till near his end. He preached his last sermon the latter part of the summer of 1830, and died April 24th, 1831, in the 71st year of his age. Mr. Aurandt's power of usefulness lay in extraordinary natural gifts, deep and earnest piety, rather than in acquired learning or intellectual polish. He was gifted with a good memory, quick perception, a ready flow of language, and a clear enunciation. He preached only in the German language.

Aur'anus (Αἰψανος), given as the name of the leader in the riots at Jerusalem against Lysimachus (2 Macc. iv, 40), where he is described as "a man far gone in years, and no less in folly." Other MSS., however (followed by the Vulg.), read Υψανος, Tyrannus, which may be taken either as a proper name or appellative, q. d. ring-leader.

Aurelius, MARCUS ANNIUS VERUS ANTONINUS, Roman emperor from 161 to 180, was born in 121, and at the age of eighteen adopted by the Emperor Antoninus Pius, whom he succeeded, in 161, on the throne. He was educated by Sextus of Chaeronea, a grandson of Plutarch, and became early in life an ardent admirer and adherent of the Stoic philosophy. On his accession to the throne he magnanimously shared the government with his adopted brother Verus. Shortly after a war broke out with the Parthians, which was victoriously terminated by the generals of Verus. Both emperors held a triumph, and assumed the title Parthicus. A more dangerous war broke out on the northern frontier of the empire with a number of German tribes, as the Marcomanni, Alani, and many others. It was carried on, with many vicissitudes, until 169, when the barbarians sued for peace. In the same year Verus died. Soon the war was renewed; and in the course of it, in 174, a celebrated victory was gained by Marcus Aurelius over the Quadri in consequence of a sudden thunder-storm, by which the Romans, who greatly suffered from want of water, were saved from apparently imminent defeat. The emperor ascribed the victory to Jupiter Tonans; but the twelfth legion, composed largely of Christians, ascribed it to their prayers. The statement of Eusebius, that the emperor gave to this legion the name Legio Fulminatrix (Thundering Legion), and threatened penalties on such as accused Christians merely on account of their religion, is generally rejected as inaccurate (Eusebius, Ch. Hist. v, 5). See Lardner, Works, vii, 178-198. Avidius Cassius rebelled against Aurelius, but was murdered by his own adherents. Aurelius pardoned the rebels, revisited Rome in 176, celebrated his victories by a triumph, and soon after marched again, with his son Commodus, against the Marcomanni; but before the conclusion of the war he died at Vindobona (now Vienna), in 180. Aurelius was one of the best emperors the Roman Empire ever had; truthful, just, severe against himself, but mild toward all other men; and his life, in the main, corresponded to his philosophical principles. The only blot in his reign is the persecution of Christians. The first persecution during his reign seems to have occurred at Lingona in 167, and in it Polycarp, the last surviving disciple of the apostle John, lost his life. In 177, the Christians of Gaul, especially the churches of Lyons and Vienna, were subjected to a cruel persecution, in which a great many Christians fell, and among them Pothinus, bishop of Lyons. See PERSECUTIONS. The philosophical emperor acted logically in persecuting the Christians, who disobeyed the laws of Rome, while he held it his duty to uphold those laws. He believed that the new religion was a superstition, and that it was dangerous to the state. This was enough for him. Aurelius wrote a work (in Greek) entitled Tá eis éantron (Meditations), from the composition of which he has received the title of "Philosopher." There are editions of it by Casaubonus (London, 1643), Gataker (Camb. 1654), Schulz (Schlesw. 1802), and Koræe (Par. 1816). It has been translated into the languages of all civilized nations, and even into Persian by Hammer (Vienna, 1831). A new English version by G. Long appeared in 1863 (London).—Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.; Neander, Ch. Hist. i, 105-115; Lardner, Works, l. c.; Neander, On Greek Ethics, Bibliotheca Sacra, x, 476 sq.

Auröla or Aureole (gold-crownlet), the crown of rays designed to represent flame, put by the old painters around the figures of saints, investing the whole body, as the nimbus (q. v.) does the head. Its form is generally ovoidal.—Didron, Chr. Iconography, 107 sq.

Auricular Confession, the confession of sin into the ear of the priest, which, as part of penance, is one of the sacraments of the Romish Church.

1. Before the time of Leo the Great (fifth century) it had been the custom for the more grievous offenders to make confession of their sins publicly, in the face of the congregation, or, at least, for the ministers occasionally to proclaim before the whole assembly the nature of the confessions which they had received. This public act, called exomologesis, included not only public confession, but public mortification in sackcloth and ashes; and, as such, was entirely different from auricular confession, which was wholly unknown to the ancient Church (see the authorities in Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xviii, ch. iii; Daillé, De Confess. Auricular. iv, 25). As for the Eastern Church, Sozomen, in his account of the confessional, says that the public confession in the presence of all the people, which formerly obtained, having been found grievous (φορηκόν ὡς εἰκόσις), a well-bred, silent, and prudent presbyter was set in charge of it; thus plainly denoting the change from public to auricular confessions. It was this penitential presbyter whose office was abolished by Nectarius in the fourth century, on account of a rape committed on a female penitent by the priest (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. vii, 16; Socrat. Hist. Eccl. v, 19). Pope Leo discouraged the ancient practice of public confession, or, rather, the publication by the priest of flagrant sins confessed, and permitted, and even enjoined with some earnestness, that confession should rather be private, and confided to the priest alone. The evil most obviously proceeding from this relaxation was the general increase, or, at least, the more indecent practice of the mortal sins, and especially (as Mosheim, Church, Hist. cent. v, pt. ii, ch. iv, has observed) of that of incontinence; unless, indeed, we are to suppose that the original publicity of confession was abandoned from its being no longer practicable in a numerous body and a corrupt age. But another consequence which certainly flowed from this measure, and which, in the eye of an ambitious churchman, might counterbalance its demoralizing effect, was the vast addition of influence which it gave to the clergy. When he delivered over the conscience of the people into the hands of the priests, when he consigned the most secret acts and thoughts of individual imperfection to the torture of private inquisition and scrutiny, Leo the Great had indeed the glory of laying the first and corner-stone of the papal edifice—that on which it rose and rested, and without which the industry of his successors would have been vainly exerted, or (as is more probable) their boldest projects would never have been formed.

2. But Leo made no law requiring private confession before communion. That step was not taken till the fourth council of Lateran, A. D. 1215, when it was decreed that all persons should confess privately, and be absolved once a year, under pain of excommunication (can. xxi; Hard, Conc. t. viii). The doctrine that penance is a sacrament seems to have been first broached by Aquinas (Summa, pt. iii, 2, 84). The Romish system of sacramental penance was completed by the Council of Trent (sess. xiv, cap. 5, 6), which declared that "from the institution of the sacrament of penance already set forth, the Church has always understood that an entire confession of sins was also appointed by the Lord, and that it is of divine right necessary to all who have lapsed after baptism. Because our Lord Jesus Christ, when about to ascend from earth to heaven, left his priests, his vicars, to be, as it were, the presidents and judges, to whom all mortal sins into which Christ's faithful people should fall should be brought, in order that, by the power of the keys, they might pronounce sentence of remission or retention. For it is plain that the priests cannot exercise this judgment without knowledge of the cause, nor can they observe equity in enjoining penalties if men declare their sins only generally, and not rather particularly and separately. From this it is inferred that it is right that the penitents should recount in confession all the deadly sins of which, upon examination, their conscience accuses them, even though they be most secret, and only against the last two commandments, which not unfrequently grievously wound the soul, and are more dangerous than those which are openly practised," etc. Here an attempt is made to invest the Christian priesthood with the prerogative of the Most High, who is a searcher of the hearts and a discernor of the thoughts, in forgetfulness of the very distinction which God drew between himself and all men, "Man looketh to the outward part, the Lord trieth the heart." As Christ has invested his ministers with no power to do this of themselves, the Tridentine fathers have sought to supply what they must needs consider a grievous omission on his part by enjoining all men to unlock the secrets of their hearts at the command of their priest, and persons of all ages and sexes to submit not only to general questions as to a state of sin or repentance, but to the most minute and searching questions as to their inmost thoughts. Auricular confession is unquestionably one of the greatest corruptions of the Romish Church. It goes upon the ground that the priest has power to forgive sins; it establishes the tyrannical influence of the priesthood; it turns the penitent from God, who only can forgive sins, to man, who is himself a sinner; and it tends to corrupt both the confessors and the confessed by a foul and particular disclosure of sinful thoughts and actions of every kind without exception.

3. The confessor must be an ordained priest; and no penitent can confess to any other than his parish priest without the consent of the latter, except in articulo mortis. Special confessors are provided for monks and nuns. For the place of confession, see CONFESSORIAL. The laws of confession may be found in the Romish directories and books of moral theology; and a glance at them is enough to satisfy any candid mind of the fearful dangers of such a system. Any one who may think it necessary to satisfy himself upon the point may consult the cases contemplated and provided for (among others) by Cardinal Cajetan in his opuscula (Lugd. 1562), p. 111. In the Bull of Pius IV, Contra sollicitudines in confessione, dated Apr. 16, 1561 (Eularium Magna, Luxemb. 1727, ii, 48), and in a similar one of Gregory XV, dated Aug. 30, 1622 (Gregory XV, Constit. Rom. 1622, p. 114), there is laid open another fearful scene of danger to female confitents from wicked priests. For a full account of the history of the system, its laws and its dangers, see Hopkins, History of the Confessional (N. Y. 1850, 12mo).

4. The Protestant churches reject auricular confession. The Lutheran Church, however, allows confession, only with this difference, that while the Catholic Church requires from the penitent the avowal of his particular and single crimes, the Lutheran requires only a general acknowledgment, leaving it, however, at the option of its members to reveal their particular sins to the confessor, and to relieve the conscience by such an avowal. The Reformed churches of the Continent generally practise only general confession preparatory to the sacrament. There is a tendency, however, in the high Lutheran reaction in Germany, to return to auricular confession. The Church of England, in some cases, exhorts to confession, but she makes it no part of her discipline, nor does she (as the Church of Rome insists upon, or as some of her own members would fondly introduce the practice) prescribe regular, complete, periodical confession. For the doctrine of the Church of England upon the subject of confession to a pastor, see (in the Prayer-book) the former of the two exhortations in giving warning for the Communion, and the order for the Visitation of the Sick. The Church of England has recently been greatly agitated by what appears to be a concerted attempt on the part of the Romanizing part of her clergy to restore auricular confession.—Bingham, l. c.; Hopkins, Hist. of the Confessional; Elliott, On Romanism, i, 312 sq.; Klee, Die Beichte, eine histor. krit. Untersuchung, (Frankf. 1828); Kliefoth, Die Beichte und Absolution (Schwerin, 1856).—Hook, Ch. Dict. s. v. See PENANCE; CONFESSION.

Austin, David, a Presbyterian minister, was born in New Haven, Conn., 1760, and graduated at Yale College, 1779. After studying with Dr. Bellamy, he spent some time in European travel, and in 1788 was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Elizabethtown, N. J. He labored faithfully till 1795, when he became deranged from fever. On his recovery the derangement continued, and he preached that Christ would appear in May, 1796. The failure of his prediction only confirmed his delusion, and he went about preaching the advent with great zeal, and creating great excitement. In 1797 he was dismissed from his pastorate. After some years he recovered his sanity, and was installed in 1815 pastor at Bozrah, Conn., where he remained until his death in 1831. He edited a Commentary and published several millennial pamphlets.—Sprague, Annals, ii, 197.

Austin, Samuel, D. D., was born in New Haven, 1760, graduated at Yale College in 1783. After teaching and travelling a few years, he was ordained, as the successor of Allen Mather, at Fairhaven, Conn., Nov. 9, 1786, where he remained until 1790. He then became pastor of a church in Worcester, Mass., where he labored faithfully nearly 25 years. In 1815 he was elected president of the University of Vermont, which office he resigned in 1821. After preaching a few years in Newport, he fell into ill health and melancholy, and died at Glastonbury, Conn., Dec. 4, 1830. He was eminently pious and distinguished as a minister. He published letters on baptism, examining Merrill's seven sermons, 1805; a reply to Merrill's twelve letters, 1806; and a number of occasional sermons.—Sprague, Annals, ii, 221.

Australasia, a division of the globe forming a part of Oceania. It comprises the continent of Australia, Tasmania (Van Diemen's Land), New Guinea, and the Louisiade Archipelago, New Britain, New Ireland, and neighboring islands, Solomon's Islands, New Hebrides, New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the isles to the southward, Kergueland Islands, St. Paul, and Amsterdam, and numerous coral reefs and islets.—Newcomb, Cyclopedia of Missions. See AUSTRALIA.

Australia, or NEW HOLLAND, a vast extent of land forming the main portion of Australasia. Its area is about 2,700,000 square miles. The population in the five English colonies, New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, West Australia, and Queensland, was, in 1862, about 1,240,000 souls. The native population is rapidly decreasing. Their numbers are estimated at from 15,000 to 20,000. Toward the close of the last century Episcopal chaplains were appointed by the British government in New South Wales, which at that time was a penal settlement. In 1795 the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts commenced its missionary operations. In 1836 the first bishop was consecrated, and in 1847 three new sees were constituted. In 1865 the Anglican Church had in Australia (exclusive of Tasmania, q. v.) seven dioceses, Sydney, Newcastle, Melbourne, Adelaide, Perth, Brisbane, and Goulburn. The Roman Church has an archbishop at Sydney, and bishops at Perth, Adelaide, Melbourne, Maitland, and Brisbane, and a population of about 80,000 souls. The Moravians established a mission to the aborigines in 1849. In 1858 they sustained there two missionaries, but no specific results are yet reported. The Wesleyan Missionary Society opened a mission in New South Wales in 1815, in South Australia in 1838, in Western Australia in 1839. Their missions, both among the English population and the natives, have been blessed with remarkable success. They had, in 1865, 99 circuits, 484 chapels, 256 other preaching places, 145 missionaries and assistant missionaries, 5226 subordinate agents, 16,246 members, 2707 on trial for membership, 35,612 scholars in schools, 91,870 attendants on public worship. There are also Congregationalists, Baptists, German Lutherans, and other denominations, though less numerous. The government contributes to the support of the churches and clergy of the Episcopalians, Wesleyans, Presbyterians, and Roman Catholics. In 1855 there were 613 public, Roman Catholic, and private schools, in which 40,000 children received instruction.—Almanac de Gotha; Schem, Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859.

Austria, one of the principal states of modern Europe (q. v.), with an area of 11,751 geogr. sq. miles, and a population in 1857 of 35,040,810 souls.

I. Church History.—For the introduction of Christianity into those countries which now constitute Austria, and for their early church history, we refer to the articles GERMANY; SCLAVONIANS; and to those on the several provinces of AUSTRIA (see below). The Reformation spread at first in Austria with great rapidity. In Bohemia, Moravia, Austria Proper (the archduchy), Styria, Carinthia, and the Tyrol, it soon became very powerful. See REFORMATION. Even one of the emperors, Maximilian II, favored it, and was believed secretly to belong to it. But Ferdinand II

have a general synod, which was to revise the draft of church constitution prepared by the government, and have hereafter the chief control of the ecclesiastical affairs of the two churches. The convocation of the first general synod was delayed no less than three years, and did not take place until the 22d of May, 1864. The synods of both the churches met in Vienna on the same day. Both synods passed a resolution to discuss such topics as are not of a strictly denominational character in joint session. The provisional draft of a church constitution was adopted in all its essential points. The synods resolved to present conjointly to the emperor the following memorial, containing the chief demands of the Protestants of the empire: The General Synod protests—1. Against the denomination of non-catholic, which is the term used in the decrees and ordinances of the political authorities to designate the adherents of the two Protestant confessions, the Augsburg and the Helvetic; 2. The Synod demands that those obstacles which, in some parts of the monarchy, are still presented to the establishment of Protestant congregations, shall be removed; 3. That booksellers shall be allowed to deal in Protestant books; 4. A community of cemeteries; 5. The admission of Protestant pastors, as of priests, into houses of retirement and charitable institutions, to exercise their functions in them; 6. The establishment of the equality of the Protestant and the Catholic festivals, in order that the authorities may be bound to protect the festivals of the Protestants in the localities in which they are the most numerous; 7. The Synod protests against all interference by the subordinate political authorities in the affairs of the schools of the Protestant congregations; 8. It protests against the ordinance which prohibits the children of Jews from frequenting Protestant, if there are Catholic schools in existence in the same locality; as it also protests against the ordinance which forbids Catholic parents placing their children with Protestant foster-parents; 9. The General Synod advances claims on the funds of the normal schools in favor of the Protestant schools; 10. It demands the admission of Protestant teachers in the medial Catholic schools; 11. The institution of Protestant catechists in the schools; 12. The incorporation of the Protestant theological faculty into the University of Vienna; 13. The representation of the Evangelical Church in the Diet and in the Municipal Council. The proceedings in both the General Synods were very harmonious. A union between the Lutheran and the Reformed churches, as it has been consummated in several German countries, was not resolved upon, but both synods will continue to meet simultaneously, and at the same place, and to deliberate on all subjects not strictly denominational in joint session. The nationality question, which produces so much trouble in the politics of Austria, led on some questions to a disagreement between the German majority and the Slavic minority, as the former were unwilling to concede everything the latter demanded, but it produced no open rupture.

11. Ecclesiastical Statistics.—The following table exhibits the membership of the several denominations in every province according to the census of 1857. It appears from this table that the Roman Catholic Church, if we include the United Greeks, has a majority in every province except Transylvania. In Galicia the United Greeks exceed a little in number the Roman Catholics of the Latin rite. The Roman Catholic Church (Latin rite) had, in 1859, 13 archbishops: Agram, Colezsa, Erlau, Gran, Goritz and Gradisca, Lemberg, Olmutz, Prague, Salzburg, Udine, Venice, Zara. The archbishop of Venice has the title patriarch, and the archbishop of Udine is merely nominal, not being at the head of an ecclesiastical province. The number of bishops since the separation of Lombardy is 52. There were, in 1851, 4285 parishes and local chaplaincies, and 49,816 priests,

The Greek United Church has two archbishoprics, Lemberg and Fogaras (the latter of recent erection), and 8 bishops; the United Armenian Church, 1 archbishop at Lemberg; these two churches together had, in 1851, 4285 parishes and local chaplaincies, and 5098 secular priests. The Greek (non-united) Church has a patriarch-archbishop at Carlovitz, 10 bishops, 3201 parishes or local chaplaincies, and 4036 secular priests. The number of convents is constantly increasing. In 1849, 739 convents of monks and 176 of nuns were counted in the Roman Catholic Church, and 44 convents of monks, with 271 members, in the Greek (non-united) Church. The Protestants of the Confession of Augsburg (Lutherans) were, until 1859, divided into 10 superintendencies, and the Protestants of the Helvetic Confession (Reformed Church) into 8, 4 superintendencies of each church being in Hungary. In a territorial respect the Protestant churches are divided into three groups, which, with regard to church government, are independent of each other: viz. 1, Hungary, with the adjacent countries; 2, Transylvania; 3, the other provinces. The two Protestant churches of the last group are under the jurisdiction of the Consistory of Vienna. Together they had, in 1851, 3162 parishes, which number has since considerably increased. The Unitarians have 1 superintendent at Klausenburg, Transylvania. Theological faculties for education of Roman Catholic priests are connected with each of the nine Austrian universities, that of the University of Innsbruck has been wholly transferred to the order of the Jesuits. Besides these theological faculties there are episcopal seminaries, in which theology and philosophy are taught, in nearly every diocese. In addition to them, seminaria puerorum (seminaries for boys who have the priesthood in view) have, since 1838, been erected in many dioceses. The priests of the United Greeks are educated at Lemberg and Fogaras, those of the Non-united Greeks at Czernowicz (Galicia) and Carlovitz (Hungary). For Protestant theologians there is a theological faculty at Vienna, which, however, is not connected with the university. Hungary has six schools for the study of theology and philosophy, three for each of the two churches. The Unitarians have a college at Klausenburg. See Coxe, History of the House of Austria. Authenticity, a term frequently used in reference to the literary history of the Holy Scriptures. (1.) In a broad and loose sense, by the authenticity of the canonical books is meant that they were really written by the authors whose names they bear; that those which are anonymous were written at the time in which they profess that they were written; and that their contents are credible. (2.) In careful and scientific language, authenticity implies authority; an authentic account is truthful, and therefore credible. A genuine book, on the other hand, is one written by the person whose name it bears, whether it be truthful or not. Thus, for instance, Alison's History of Europe is genuine, because it was written by Alison; but it is not authentic, because it looks at facts with partisan eyes.—Horne, Introduction, ii, 1.

Authority, (1.) in matters religious and ecclesiastical, an assumed right of dictation, attributed to certain fathers, councils, or church courts. On this subject Bishop Hoadley writes: "Authority is the greatest and most irreconcilable enemy to truth and argument that this world ever furnished. All the sophistry—all the color of plausibility—all the artifice and cunning of the subtlest disputer in the world may be laid open and turned to the advantage of that very truth which they are designed to hide; but against authority there is no defence." He shows that it was authority which crushed the noble sentiments of Socrates and others, and that by authority the Jews and heathens combated the truth of the Gospel; and that, when Christians increased into a majority, and came to think the same method to be the only proper one for the advantage of their cause which had been the enemy and destroyer of it, then it was the authority of Christians, which, by degrees, not only laid waste the honor of Christianity, but well-nigh extinguished it among men. It was authority which would have prevented all reformation where it is, and which has put a barrier against it wherever it is not. The remark of Charles II. is worthy of notice—that those of the established faith make much of the authority of the church in their disputes with dissenters, but that they take it all away when they deal with papists.—Buck, Theol. Diet. s. v.

(2.) In a proper sense, by the "authority of the church" is meant either the power residing generally in the whole body of the faithful to execute the trust committed by Christ to his church, or the particular power residing in certain official members of that body. The first-named authority is vested in the clergy and laity jointly, the latter in the clergy alone. In the interpretation of Scripture for any particular church, that church's authority does not belong to all divines or "distinguished theologians" who may be members of the church, but only to the authorized formularies. Single writers of every age are to be taken as expressing only their individual opinions. The agreement of these opinions at any one period, or for any lengthened space of time, may and must be used as proof to ourselves, privately, as to the predominant sentiments of the church at that time, but no opinions can be quoted as deciding authoritatively any disputed question. The universal church deserves deference in all controversies of faith; and every particular church has a right to deserve such rights and ceremonies as are not contrary to God's written word; but no church has a right to enforce any thing as necessary for salvation, unless it can be shown so to be by the express declaration of Holy Scripture. See the XXth and XXXIVth Articles of the Church of England, and the Vth and XXIIId of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Eden, Theol. Dict. s. v. See RULE OF FAITH; TRADITION.

Authorized (ENGLISH) Version of the Holy Scriptures. As this was not a strictly new or original translation, it will be necessary to consider briefly those earlier English versions upon which it was founded, and it will enable the reader better to appreciate its value and character if we prefix some account of the still earlier Anglo-Saxon versions which led the way to these. (See Mrs. Conant's Hist. of Engl. Bible Translation, N. Y. 1856.) See VERSIONS (OF THE BIBLE).

I. Anglo-Saxon Translations.—Though our Anglo-Saxon ancestors early possessed translations, chiefly from the Latin, of at least portions of the Scriptures, the first attempt with which we are acquainted is the rude but interesting poem ascribed to CERDMON, a monk of Whitby, in the seventh century. It contains the leading events of Old-Testament history, and renders several passages with tolerable fidelity; but the epic and legendary character of the composition preclude it from being ranked among the versions of Holy Writ. The first portion of it, entitled The Fall of Man, has been translated into verse by Bosanquet (Lond. 1860, 8vo). This work was succeeded in the following century by the Anglo-Saxon Psalter, said to have been translated by ALDHUEL, bishop of Sherborn, who died in 709; the first fifty Psalms are in prose, the others in verse. About the same period, GUTHLAC, the first Saxon anchorite, is reported to have translated the Psalms. The next laborer in the field was the Venerable BEDE, who turned the Apostles' Creed and the Lord's Prayer into Anglo-Saxon. He also translated the Gospel of John, and completed it just as death put an end to his learned labors, in the monastery of Jarrow, on the south bank of the Tyne, A.D. 735. The close of the next century probably produced the celebrated Darhoin Book, containing the four Gospels in Anglo-Saxon, written between the lines of an earlier Latin copy, by ALDRED, a priest. The following is the Lord's Prayer from this version—Matt. vi, 9-13:

Fader men thu arth in heofenn, sic gehalgod noma thin :
 Tu eameth ric thin; sic weillo thin swa's inheofne & in eorthis;
 Hlaf usreofe of eowillicnes & of us; todæg; & forgef us seylða usna swa we forgefod = yllicum usnum; and ne indled us ðu in costunge ah gefrigu-icth fram ylfe.

The Rushworth Gloss, having the Anglo-Saxon word placed over the corresponding Latin, was probably executed about the same period, by OWUX, aided by FARMAN, a priest at Harewood. About this time, ALFRED the Great set at the head of his laws an Anglo-Saxon translation of the Ten Commandments, with such of the Mosaic injunctions from the XXI, XXII, and XXIII chapters of Exodus as were most to his purpose.

He is also said to have entered upon a translation of the Psalms, which he did not live to finish. Next in order come some fragments of an imperfect interlinear version of the Book of Proverbs. Similar glosses were made on the Psalter; also on the Canticles of the Church, the Lord's Prayer, and other portions of Scripture. In the latter part of the tenth century, the monk ÆLFRIC translated—omitting some parts, and greatly abridging others—the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, a portion of the Books of Kings, Esther, Job, Judith, and the Maccabees. He also drew up, in Anglo-Saxon, a brief account of the Books of the Old and New Testaments; and, by the texts and quotations used in his homilies, he contributed greatly to the knowledge of the Scriptures. A third Anglo-Saxon version of the four Evangelists, of which there are two copies, and a few copies of the Psalms, appear to have been executed at a later period, probably but a little before the time of the Norman Conquest. With these, the series of Anglo-Saxon translations of parts of Scripture would seem to end; though it is not improbable that other portions of Scripture were translated which have not come down to us.

Before the middle of the eleventh century the language of Cadmon and Bede had undergone important changes, probably through the influence of Edward the Confessor and his Norman associates, among whom he had been educated. At the period of the Conquest, A.D. 1066, the Norman began rapidly to revolutionize the old Anglo-Saxon language. Soon after this period a version of the Gospels appears to have been made, of which there are three copies, and it is difficult to determine whether they are to be assigned to the Anglo-Saxon or Anglo-Norman class of literary remains. Before the year 1200 the Anglo-Normans had translated into their own dialect, in prose, the Psalter and Canticles of the Church; and towards the middle of the following century appear to have possessed not only a history of the Old Testament in verse, as far as the end of the books of Kings, but also, it is supposed, a prose version of a great part of the Bible. Nevertheless, the Anglo-Saxon versions and glosses of the Gospels, and other portions of Scripture, remained long after in partial use. See ANGLLO-SAXON VERSIONS.

II. Early English Translations.—The earliest essays of Biblical translation assumed in English, as in most other languages, a poetical form. The Ornamulum, written perhaps at the commencement of the thirteenth century, is a paraphrase in verse of the narrative of the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles. The Biblical poem called "Sunthele" was probably written about the same period. To a later period of the same century belongs the poem reciting the principal events in the books of Genesis and Exodus. Apparently coeval with this is the metrical version, from the Latin, of the whole book of Psalms. In some manuscripts a version is found partly similar, but with amendments and revisions, probably the partial adaptation of the same version to a more modern diction and orthography. The 100th Psalm is here given as a specimen of this ancient English version:

Mirthes to God al erthe that es
 Serues to honour in firmes.
 In go yhe al in his silt,
 In gladnes that is so briht.
 Whites that louerd god is he thus,
 He us made and our self noht us,
 His folke and shep of his fode;
 In go his yghates that are god;
 In schrift his worches belive,
 In ymnes to him yhe schrive,
 Heryhes his name for louerd is hence,
 In all his merci do in strende and strende.

The earliest version in English prose of any entire book of Scripture is the book of Psalms, translated by WILLIAM DE SCHORHAM, vicar of Chart Sutton, in Kent. The translation is generally faithful and literal. The following is a specimen of this version—Ps. xxiii, 1-6:

Our Lord governeth me and noþing schal defaillen to me; in the stode of pasture he sett me thier. He norissed me vp water fullynge; he turned my soule from the fende. He lad me vp the brestyets of ryytfulnes; for his name. For yif that ich hane gon amiddes of the shadowe of deth. Y schal nouyt doute inuels, for thou art wyth me. Thy disciplin and thy amending; comforted me. Thou maigest radi grace in my sight; owayns hem that trublen me. Thou maigest fatt myn heued wyth mercy; and my drynke makand drunken ys ful clere. And thy merci schal forwey me; alle daies of mi lif. And that ich woonne in the hous of our Lord; in lengthe of daies.

Schorham's version of the Psalms could scarcely have been completed, when another was undertaken by RICHARD ROLLE, chantry priest at Hampole, near Doncaster, who died in 1349. Of this work of Rolle, to which he subjoined a commentary, there were copies which differed from each other, showing that the original must have been altered to some extent. The following is a specimen of this version—Ps. lxxix, 1-6:

God, gens come in this heritag; thei filed thi holy tempul, thei sette Jerusalem in keepyn of appus. Thei sette the dyande bodies of the seruants mete to the fowles of the lyll; flesche of thi halowes to bestis of erthe. Thei spilt hore blode as watir in vngong of Jerusalem; and none was for to graue, hade we are repote to oure neighbors; skornynge and hellynge to alle that in oure vngong are. Howe longe, Lord, shalt thou be wrothe in ende; kyngeit schal be thi lut as fire. Hele, or hot, thi wrothe in gens that thee not knew; and in kyngdoms that thi nome incalde not.

All these versions were made from the Latin; and some of the venerable relics still exist in manuscript in the public libraries in the kingdom. A few of them have been printed as objects of literary curiosity.

It was not till about the year 1382 that our language was enriched with a complete copy of the Scriptures, by the hands of WYCLIFFE and his coadjutors, not improbably with the aid of other fragmentary portions then existing. This translation was made from the Latin Vulgate, collated with other old copies. For several centuries there had occasionally been found in England some scholars acquainted with the Hebrew and Greek languages; and, though Wycliffe occasionally introduced Greek words in some of his writings, yet it seems scarcely probable that the knowledge of Greek possessed by him was at all sufficient to enable him to translate from that language. Hence, if the Bible must be translated at all, it must be from the Latin. It belonged to a later and more critical age to use the originals in forming vernacular versions of the Scriptures. The translation of the New Testament was probably the work of Wycliffe himself. During its progress, the Old Testament was taken in hand by one of Wycliffe's coadjutors; and from a note written in one manuscript, at the end of a portion of the Book of Baruch, the translation is assigned to NICHOLAS DE HEREFORD. Not unlikely the cause of this manuscript, and also of another which is probably a copy, suddenly breaking off in the Book of Baruch, was the summons which Hereford received to appear before the Synod in 1382. The translation was evidently completed by a different hand, not improbably by Wycliffe himself. However this may be, it was certainly through Wycliffe's energy that the earliest translation of the whole Bible in the English language was carried on and executed. Many of the peculiarities of this translation are to be attributed to the time in which Wycliffe lived; and it is remarkable that, in his version of the Scriptures, he writes far more intelligible English than is found in his original works; the dignity of the book which he translated seems to have imparted an excellence of expression to the version itself. No part of the genuine version of Wycliffe was printed, excepting the Song of Solomon, by Dr. Adam Clarke, in his Commentary, until 1848, when Mr. L. Wilson published the New Testament in a beautiful Gothic-letter quarto volume. More recently, the entire Bible, accompanied with Purvey's revision, has been published. The following are specimens of Wycliffe's translation—Gen. iii, 7, 8; Luke viii, 31-33:

And the eizen of both being openyd; and whanne thei knewen hem silf to be naked, thei sowden to gidre leues of a fige tree, and maden hem brechis. And whanne thei herden the voys of the Lord God goynge in paradys at the shyngyn after myd dai, Adam hid hym and his wyf from the face of the Lord God in the myddel of the tree of paradys.

And thei preiden him, that he schulde not comaunde hem, that thei schulden go in to the depnesse. Forsothe a flok of manye hoggis was there leseyng in an hill, and thei preiden him, that he schulde suffre hem to entre in to hem. And he suffride hem. Therefore fendis wenten out from the man, and entre in to hoggis; and with bire the flok wente hedlynge in to the lake of water, and was stranglid.

As Wycliffe's translation was completed in a comparatively short space of time, and necessarily possessed blemishes incident to a first edition, it is not surprising that a revised version was contemplated even in the lifetime of Wycliffe himself. Accordingly, about the year 1388, not more than four years after the death of Wycliffe, the revision was accomplished, but with few substantial differences of interpretation, by PURVEY, who had been Wycliffe's curate, and, after his death, became the leader of the Lollard party. Purvey's revision rendered the version more correct, intelligible, and popular, and caused the earlier translation to fall into disuse. Copies of this revision were rapidly multiplied; even now, more than one hundred and fifty copies of the whole or part of Purvey's Bible are in existence. The following are specimens of Purvey's version—Gen. iii, 7, 8; Luke viii, 31-33:

And the izen of bothe weren opened; and whanne thei knewen that thei weren naked, thei sowden the leues of a fige tree, and maden brechis to hem self. And whanne thei herden the voys of the Lord God goynge in paradys at the wynd after myd-dai, Adam and his wyf hidden them from the face of the Lord God in the myddis of the tre of paradys.

And thei preiden hym, that he schulde not comaunde hem, that thei schulden go in to helle. And there was a flok of many swyne leseyng in an hill, and thei preiden hym, that he schulde suffre hem to entre into hem. And he suffride hem. And so the demelis wenten out from the man, and entre in to the swyne; and with a bire the flok went heedlynge in to the pool, and was drenchid.

Notwithstanding the prohibitory constitutions of Archbishop Arundel in 1408, and the high price of manuscripts, both versions were extensively multiplied; they contributed largely to the religious knowledge which prevailed at the commencement of the Reformation, and probably hastened that event. In the year 1420, the price of one of Wycliffe's Testaments was not less than four marks and forty pence, or £2 16s. 8d., equal to £12 6s. 8d. now, taking sixteen as the multiple for bringing down the money of that time to our standard. It is somewhat remarkable that the revised version by Purvey has been taken until recently for Wycliffe's own translation, and as such the New Testament portion was published by Lewis, 1731; by Baber, 1810; and again by Bagster, in his English Hexapla. It is, however, now known that the most ancient version is Wycliffe's, and the revised or more modern one is by Purvey. These two earliest English versions of the entire Bible by Wycliffe and Purvey were printed, column by column on the same page, with various readings from the several manuscripts, in four splendid quarto volumes, under the care of the Rev. J. Forshall and Sir F. Madden, Oxford University Press, 1850.

The circulation of Wycliffe's version, and that of his reviser, Purvey, in manuscript, was the sowing of seed destined to yield a mighty harvest. The downfall of the Eastern empire in 1453 contributed to the revival of learning by scattering learned Greeks, who carried with them manuscript treasures from Constantinople. The printing-press contributed immensely to revolutionize society throughout Europe. In several places on the Continent the Scriptures were printed not only in Latin, but in Hebrew and Greek, thus providentially preparing for setting forth the Inspired Oracles in the vernacular tongues. In England, however, the operation of the press was slow. In vain do we look over the list of works by Caxton, the father of the press in England, for a copy of any portion of the Scriptures. The earliest attempt at giving forth any portion of the Scriptures in print in English was a translation and exposition of the seven penitential Psalms, in 1505, by FYSHER, the Romish bishop of Rochester; and even this was printed on the Continent, though published at London. The instrument in the hand of God for translating the New Testament, and a great part of the Old, out of the original tongues into English, was WILLIAM TYNDALE. But in England Tyndale could find no place to print his translation of the New Testament. In the year 1524 he passed over to Hamburg, where he is said to have published the same year the Gospels of Matthew and Mark. As, however, no fragment of this first fruit of Tyndale's labor is known to be remaining, we suspect that it is merely another reference to the following fragment, printed at Cologne. In September, 1525, Tyndale, with his assistant Royle, was at Cologne, actually engaged in bringing the first edition of his New Testament, in quarto, through the press. When the sheets of this edition were printed as far as the signature K, the printer, through the influence of Cochlæus, a Romish deacon, was interdicted from proceeding further with the work. Tyndale and his assistant snatched away some of the printed sheets, and fled to Worms. In this city Tyndale immediately printed an octavo edition of his Testament; then, it is said, he completed the quarto which had been interrupted, and published both editions at the close of 1525 or early in 1526. The only relic of the precious old quarto, which was the first partially printed edition, for we are inclined to think that it never was completed, was discovered in 1834 by the late Mr. Rodd, and is now in the British Museum. It only contains the prologue, a table of the books of the New Testament, and part of the Gospel of Matthew—chap. i—xxii. The following is a specimen of this fragment, printed at Cologne by P. Quentell—Matt. ii, 1, 2:

When Jesus was borne in bethlehem a tounne of iury, in the tyme kynge Herode, hadde, there came wyse me fro the east to his wisdom sayinge: where is he that is borne kinge of the iewes, we have sene his starre in the este, and are come to worshipp him.

The only known perfect copy of the octavo, which was the second printed, but the first published complete edition of Tyndale's New Testament, is preserved in the Baptist College Library, Bristol. The following is a specimen of this edition, printed at Worms at the close of 1525 or early in 1526—Mark xiv, 3-5:

When he was in bethania, in the house off Simon the leper, even as he ate at meate, there cam a woma with an alabastrer boxe of oymnt, called narde, that was pure and costly, and she brake the boxe ad powred it on his heed. There were some that disdayned it thus, and sayde: what neded this waste of oymnt? For it might have bene soode for more the two hundred pens, and bene geve unto the poore. And they grudged agaynst hir.

In November, 1534, Tyndale published at Antwerp a third edition, "diligently corrected and compared with the Greke." The second or first complete edition, though a most important advance, certainly bears marks of haste; but the edition of 1534, revised by himself, stands in the first place as exhibiting Tyndale as a translator. The following is a specimen of this edition—Mark xiv, 3-5:

When he was in Bethania, in the house of Simon the leper, even as he sat at meate, there came a woman having an alabastrer boxe of ointment called narde, that was pure and costly; and she brake the boxe and poured it on his head. And there were some that were not content in themselves, & sayde: what needeth this waste of ointment? For it might have bene soode for more than three hundred pens, and been geve unto the poore. And they grudged agaynst hir.

That Tyndale's New Testament was translated from the Greek, no one can question who has examined it with care; it will be found continually to leave the readings of the Latin Vulgate, and adhere to the third edition of Erasmus's Greek Testament, printed in 1522. Sometimes, indeed, great deference is paid to the critical observations of Erasmus; but still the translation is made from the Greek, and not from his Latin version. When Erasmus departed from the Greek, as he does in several places, apparently through inadvertence, Tyndale does not follow him, but adheres closely to the original. As Tyndale's New Testaments were eagerly bought up, partly by earnest inquirers, and partly by others for destruction, numerous surreptitious copies rapidly issued from different presses, chiefly by the Dutch printers; so that in the translator's time about fourteen editions were issued, and eight or nine in 1536, the year of his death. A very curious edition of Tyndale's Testament was printed, probably at Antwerp in 1535, during the translator's imprisonment at Vilvorde. The letter and the spelling prove that it was printed in the Low Countries. Some suppose that it is executed in a provincial orthography, probably that of Tyndale's native county, peculiarly adapted to agricultural laborers; and that, by this edition, he nobly redeemed his bold pledge given to the priest in Gloucestershire many years before, "If God spare me life, ere many years I will cause the boy that driveth the plow to know more of the Scriptures than you do." He also put headings for the first time to the chapters. The following is a specimen of this edition—1 Cor. xv, 41:

There is oone manner glory of the sunne, & a noether glory of the moone, & a noether glory ye starres. For oone starre differth fro a noether in glory.

The edition of Tyndale's New Testament, printed in folio, at London, by Thomas Berthelet, in 1536, from the revised edition of 1534, was the first portion of the English Scriptures printed on English ground. The following is a specimen of this rare and interesting edition—1 Cor. xv, 45, 46:

The first man Adam was made a luyvynge soule, and the last Adam was made a synckromynng spiryte. Howe be it, that is not first which is spirituall; but that which is naturall, & than that which is spirituall.

The martyr Tyndale was also the first to translate the five books of Moses into English from the Hebrew. As the books of Genesis and Numbers are in Gothic letter, while those of Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy are in Roman type, it would appear that these books were printed at separate times and in different places. The following occurs at the end of Genesis: "Emprinted at Malborow, in the lande of Hesse, by me, Hans Luft, the yere of oure Lorde 1530, the 17 dayes of Januarii." Tyndale also translated and published the Book of Jonah. In the succeeding years of his life he was engaged in translating, perhaps in conjunction with Rogers, the remaining books of the Bible. Tyndale's translation, as far as the end of Chronicles, and other manuscripts, appear, at the time of his martyrdom, to have been in the possession of Rogers. The following is a specimen of Tyndale's Pentateuch of 1530—Gen. xxiv, 18-20:

And she hasted and late downe her ptycher upon hyr arme and gaue him drynke. And whi she had geuen hym drynke, she sayde: I will drawe water for thy camels also, vntill they haue dronke ynough. And she poured out hyr ptycher in to the trough hastily and ranne agayne into the well, to fette water: and drew for all his camels.

During the year 1530, the Argentine English Psalter was printed. The translator, who rendered from the Latin, calls himself JOHAN ALEPHI. The date at the end of this Psalter is January 10, 1530; it thus seems to have been, perhaps by antedating, the first whole book of the Old Testament which was printed in English, the completion of Tyndale's Genesis having been one day subsequent. In 1531 there was published a translation of Isaiah by GEORGE JOYE; in 1533, two leaves of Genesis; and in 1534 he published a translation of Jeremiah and the Book of Psalms. These portions were also translated from the Latin Vulgate.

MYLES COVERDALE was the first to publish, if not to translate, the whole Bible into English. He commenced this work in November, 1534, and it was printed, probably at Zurich, in October, 1535. Though

Coverdale had evidently the Hebrew and Greek before him, he freely used the translations of Tyndale, both printed and perhaps manuscript. He speaks of his having been aided by five sundry interpreters in the Dutch, German, and Latin languages. In the Old Testament he may have had, 1st, the Latin Vulgate; 2d, Pagninus's version; 3d, Luther's German translation; 4th, Leo Juda's German-Swiss version; 5th, the Latin version connected with Sebastian Munster's Hebrew Bible, the first volume of which was printed in 1534. The New Testament appears to be in part a revision of Tyndale's, in which Coverdale took much care, and availed himself both of the edition of 1525 and the amended one of 1534. This Bible, which was dedicated to King Henry VIII, had the following as the title: "BIBLIA. The Bible, that is, the holy Scripture of the Olde and New Testament, faithfully and truly translated out of Douche and Latyn in to Englyshe. 1535." However, it must be observed, the use of the words "out of Douche, i. e. German, and Latyn," was merely a book-selling artifice by the printers, to make the work circulate better, as being intimately connected with the reformed doctrines, which were then equally well known by the name of German or Dutch doctrines. In the new title inserted the following year, these terms were left out. Coverdale certainly did not follow the Latin, nor even Luther's version, but he no doubt availed himself of all the different means of assistance within his power. This Bible was reprinted with some amendments at Zurich in 1537, with a London title-page, and was then allowed by the king to "go abroad among the people," but without any regal imprimatur or license. The following is a specimen of Coverdale's translation—Ps. xc (xc), 4, 5:

He shal cover the vnder his wynges, that thou mayest be safe vnder his fathers: his faithfulnesse and truth shal be thy shyble and buckler. So yt thou shalt not neede to be afrayed for any bugges by night, nor for awee that flyeth by daye.

In the year 1537, the translations of Tyndale were published in a collected form, under the name of "Thomas Matthew." The editing of this Bible was really the work of the martyr Rogers. To this edition was prefixed, An Exhortation to the Study of the Holy Scriptures, beneath which stand J. R., the initials of his name. In the execution of this work, Rogers had the whole of Tyndale's translations, whether imprint or manuscript, before him. The Old Testament is a reprint of Tyndale's Pentateuch; the remainder, as far as the Second Book of Chronicles, was copied from Tyndale's manuscripts, which were undoubtedly in Rogers's safe keeping. The New Testament was Tyndale's of 1534. This Bible has the character of Tyndale's labors so stamped upon it as clearly to show that at least two thirds of the translation were his work; the remainder is the work of Rogers, who was probably aided by Coverdale's sheets. At the end of the Old Testament, the letters W. T. are printed in very large text capitals curiously flourished. This Bible was probably printed at Lubec; and it is not improbable that it was actually in the press, under the joint labors of Tyndale and Rogers, at the time of Tyndale's arrest and martyrdom. Much credit is due to Rogers, who probably resided at the place of printing, as the careful editor of this Bible; he was evidently a fine scholar, and he seems to have acted both as desiring to give his countrymen a Bible as correct as possible, and likewise to perpetuate the labors of Tyndale, his friend and instructor in the truth of the Gospel. This Bible was translated by the first Hebrew, Greek, and English scholars, and is executed most in conformity with the views of the latest and best Biblical critics. This revision, which is frequently but not inaptly called "Tyndale's Bible," appeared with the then much coveted words, "Set forth with the king's most gracious license;" hence it was the first properly authorized edition of the English Bible. This Bible—at least part of it—appears to have been printed at the expense of Richard Grafton and his partner, Edward Whitechurch—who afterwards married the widow of Archbishop Cramer. They, about the same period, became printers themselves, as their initials appear at the beginning of the Prophets, where, perhaps, the part of the expense which they defrayed commenced. "Thomas Matthew" may actually have been the person at whose cost the preceding portion was printed. This Bible was the popular translation, and from the various editions it appears to have been much used for many years. The following is a fine specimen of Tyndale's rendering from the Hebrew—2 Sam. i, 17, 18:

And Dauid sang this songe of mournynge ouer Saul and ouer Jonathas hys sonne, & had to teache the chyldren of Israhell the stanes therof.

In 1538, several editions of Coverdale's new version of the New Testament were published. He also issued several editions of the English New Testament, together with the text of the Latin Vulgate. The printing of this Diglot Testament was executed with great carelessness, so that Coverdale had it speedily reprinted in Paris. It is probable that Nicholson the printer, hearing that Coverdale's Latin and English Testament was about to be reprinted at Paris, with more attention to accuracy, printed the one bearing the name of "Johan Hollybushe" without delay, in order to anticipate the Paris edition. The following is a specimen of Coverdale's Testament—Matt. v. 13:

Ye are the salt of the earth. Put yf ye salt vanish away, wherin shal it be salted? It is therof forth good vnto nothing, but yt it be cast out, & trode vnder of men.

In the year 1539 was published the English translation known by the name of the "Great Bible." This edition was executed under the superintendence of GRAFTON, to whom Coverdale lent his aid as corrector. This Bible was printed at Paris by the permission of Francis I., obtained by Henry VIII. But, notwithstanding the royal license, just as the work was well advanced, the Inquisition interposed, and issued an order, dated December 17, 1538, summoning the French printers, their English employers, and Coverdale, the corrector of the work, and inhibited their farther proceeding. The impression, consisting of 2500 copies, was seized, confiscated, and condemned to the flames. Four great dry-fats full, however, of these books escaped the fire by the avarice of the person appointed to superintend the burning of them; and the English proprietors, who had fled on the first alarm, returned to Paris as soon as it subsided, and not only recovered some of these copies, but brought with them to London the presses, types, and even the workmen, and resuming the work, finished it in the following year. This Bible, which is a revision of Matthew's version, probably by the hand of Coverdale, has been unhappily confounded with "Cramer's Bible," issued in 1540. The preface written by Cramer for the edition of 1540 was inserted in some copies of the Great Bible, but subsequently to their completion. The statesman Cromwell, not Cramer, was the master-spirit, not only in getting up this edition, but in securing the royal injunction that "the whole Bible, of the largest volume in English," should be set up in the churches. This continued, with slight alterations, to be the authorized English version of the Bible—except, of course, during the revival of popery in Mary's reign—until, in 1568, it was superseded by the Bishops' Bible. The Psalms in this Bible were the same as those found in the book of Common Prayer, having seventeen interpolations from the Septuagint or Latin Vulgate, but printed in a smaller type, and between parentheses. These readings were marked in Coverdale's Bible as not being in the Hebrew text; they are also continued in Cramer's editions. The following is a specimen, with the interpolation in smaller type, which includes three verses—Psa. xiv, 3, 4:

But they are all gone out of the way, they are altogether become abominable : there is none that doth good, no not one (theyr throate is an open sepulchre : with their tongues they have deuyed, the poison of aspes is under their tythes. Their mouth is full of cursynge and bytterness, they fele are swyt to shede bloude. Destruynge vs our dettes, as we forgone our detters. And leade vs not into temptacion : but deluyer vs from euyl. For thynge they no knowlege, there is no feare of God before theyr eyes.) Hane they no knowlege that they are all such workers of mysschiefe, catynge up my people as it were breade.

In the year 1539, another edition of the Bible appeared, dedicated to the king. It was a mere recension of Matthew's Bible, executed by RICHARD TAVERNER, under the patronage of Lord Cromwell. The three editions through which this Bible almost immediately went prove that its circulation was considerable, though it is to be observed that they were private readers alone who used it, as it was never, even for a time, publicly made an authorized version. Taverner's New Testament, of which he published two editions, is a different recension from that which accompanied his "Recognition of the Bible."

In the year 1540 "CRANMER'S BIBLE" was issued from Grafton and Whitechurch's press. This was probably the first complete Bible ever printed in England. This edition, of which only five hundred copies were printed, was a mere revision of the Great Bible of 1539, and had a preface by Cranmer. Another edition, "overseen and perused," by the king's command, by CUTHBERT TONSTALL, bishop of Durham, and NICHOLAS HEATH, bishop of Rochester, who also made a few variations in the text, appeared in 1541. The following is a specimen from Cranmer's New Testament—Matt. vi. 9-13:

Our father which art in heauen, halowed be thy name. Let thy kyngdome come. Thy will be fulfilled, as well in erth, as it is in heuen. Geue vs this daye our dailly bread. And forgeiue vs our dettes, as we forgone our detters. And leade vs not into temptacion : but deluyer vs from euyl. For thynge is the kyngdom and the power, and the glorye for euer. Amen.

The only impressions of any portions of the Scriptures which were printed during the remainder of the reign of Henry appear to have been the Epistles and Gospels for the Sundays, in 1542, probably an edition of the Pentateuch in 1544, Joye's book of Daniel and the books of Solomon in 1545, and the New Testament according to the text of the Great Bible in 1546. The number of copies of the Scriptures in circulation at this time must, however, have been very considerable. In 1543 the Parliament prohibited the use of Tyndale's version, and in 1546 Coverdale's translation, as well as Tyndale's, was prohibited by a stringent proclamation, and all such books were to be delivered up to persons appointed for the purpose, in order that they might be burned. The diligence with which Henry's proclamation was executed, in the destruction of the earlier editions, accounts for the very few copies which have come down to our time. The destruction appears to have been almost as complete as that of the earlier editions of Tyndale's New Testament.

Among the early acts of the reign of Edward VI was the reversing of the restrictions which had been laid on the circulation and the reading of the Scriptures. Yet no new recension or translation was published, except a translation of the paraphrase of Erasmus in 1549-50. Among those who took part in this work was Coverdale; and the Princess Mary—the future persecuting queen—translated a portion of the Gospel of John. Cranmer contemplated a new translation of the Bible; but Fagius and Bucer died, and the work was frustrated. An edition of Coverdale's Bible, said to have been printed at Zurich, was published in 1550. This edition was probably one of the two revisions which Coverdale mentioned in his sermon at Paul's Cross, in which he defended his version, and said "if he might review the book once again, as he had twice before, he doubted not he should amend." During some part of this reign Sir JOHN CHEKE translated the Gospel of Matthew, and perhaps part of Mark, but the translation was not then published. The following is a specimen of Cheke's version—Matt. ii. 1:

When Jesus was born in Bethlem a citi of Juri in King Herood's dais, lo then the Wisard's cam from thert parties.

However, many editions of the Bible were printed, some being reprints of Matthew's Bible, some of Cranmer's, and some of Taverner's Recognition. The total number of impressions of the Bible in the reign of Edward was at least thirteen. There were also several editions of the New Testament, some of Tyndale's translations, some of Coverdale's version, and some according to Cranmer's Bible. The number of these editions of the New Testament amounts to at least twenty-five, so that the whole number of Bibles and Testaments in circulation comprised many thousand copies.

On the accession of Mary the printing and the circulation of the Scriptures in English was hindered, so that her reign only witnessed the printing of one edition of the New Testament, printed at Geneva in 1557. The translator of the Genevan Testament was WILLIAM WHITTINGHAM, a native of Holmsot, six miles from Durham, who was one of the exiles from England. This was a small square volume, printed in Roman letters, with the supplementary words in italics. It was the first English New Testament divided into verses and broken into small sections or paragraphs. The preface was written by John Calvin, whose sister Catharine was married to Whittingham. In the manner of rendering not a few passages the translator followed the judgment of Beza in his theological views. The following is a specimen of this version—Matt. xiii. 19:

When soer a man heareth the worde of the kyngdome, and vnderstandeth it not, then cometh that euyl one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart, and this is the come which was soken by the way syde.

Whittingham and his companions in exile also executed a translation of the whole Bible at Geneva, and it is not unlikely that Coverdale aided in the work. The translators probably had motives which sufficiently influenced them in executing a new version, instead of giving a mere reprint or revision of any which had preceded. The intention of such a work had been entertained in the reign of Edward VI, and it is probable that in this projected revision, from the manner in which the name of Bucer was connected with it, there would have been embodied whatever might be learned from the biblical knowledge possessed by the Reformers on the Continent. This translation differed from all that had preceded it not only in its plan, but also in its execution. The other versions had been generally the work or the revision of an individual, or, at most, a revision in which certain individuals executed certain particular parts; in this translation we find, on the contrary, many acting unitedly in the formation of a version, and thus, in the plan of operation, there was a principle of completeness which had not been acted on previously. The translators, by the use of supplementary words, often aided the sense without seeming to insert what was not found in the original. It was also stored with marginal notes. This version of the whole Bible was printed at Geneva by Rowland Hall in 1560, so that it was not published until after many of the exiles had returned home. In this translation, which was the first complete English Bible divided by verses, it is to be observed that the translation of the New Testament differs in several respects from that which had been separately printed in 1556. The expense of preparing the Genevan Bible was chiefly borne by John Bodley, the father of Sir Thomas, the founder of the noble library at Oxford. On the return of the exiles, Queen Elizabeth granted a patent to Bodley solely, for the term of seven years, to print this edition; yet, on account of the interference of Archbishop Parker, no edition of the Genevan Testament or Bible was published in England till the year 1576. Immediately after Parker's death this version was published; it continued to be frequently reprinted in this country, and was for many years the popular version in England, having been only gradually displaced by King James's translation, which appeared fifty-one years afterward. From the peculiar reading in Gen. iii, 7, the editions of the Geneva version have been commonly known by the name of "Broeches Bibles;" but this reading, as we have already seen, is as old as Wycliffe's time, and occurs in his translation. To some editions of the Geneva Bible is subjoined Beza's translation of the New Testament, Englished by L. Thomson. The following are specimens of the Geneva Bible—Gen. xli, 42, 43, and Matt. xlii, 19:

And Pharaoh toke of his ring from his hand, and put vpon Joseph's hand, and armed him in garments of fine linen and put a golden chaine about his necke. So he set him vpon the best chariot that he had, saue one: & they cryed before hime Abrech, and placed him ouer all the land of Egypt.

Whensour a man heareth the worde of the kingdome, and vnderstandeth it not, the euil one cometh, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart: and this is he which hath receiued the sede by the way side.

The next version of the Bible was superintended by Archbishop PARKER, hence sometimes called "Parker's Bible," and published in 1568. This version was executed with great care by more than fifteen learned men, the initials of whose names occur at the end of the portions executed by them. From the greater part of those who were engaged in its preparation being bishops, this version is also called the "Bishops' Bible." This edition is adorned with one hundred and forty-three engravings, including portraits and maps, which give it quite a pictorial appearance. The passages from the Vulgate, which had been introduced into Cramer's Psalms, are omitted in this edition. This continued to be the version authorized to be read in the parish churches for forty-three years; but in private use it never displaced the Geneva version. Though the Bishops' Bible was the avowed basis of our authorized version, this latter was executed upon wholly different principles, and is very different in its general character. To this Bible was prefixed, among other things, the sum of Scripture, tables of genealogy, and a preface written by Parker. In 1585, under Archbishop Whitgift, the seventeen readings from the Latin Vulgate were re-introduced, so as to harmonize with the Psalms in the Prayer-book. The edition of 1572 contains a double version of the Psalms, that of Cramer's and that of the bishops'. The edition of 1595 has the Psalms according to Cramer's Bible. The following is a specimen of this version—Mal. iii, 17:

And they shal be to me, saith the Lorde of hostes, in that day wherein I shall do iudgment, a floeke: and I wyl spare them as a man spareth his owne sonne which serueth him.

In the year 1582 was published the Anglo-Rhemish version of the New Testament. The circumstances which led to the execution of this version are to be found in the history of the expulsion of Romanism from England in the reign of Elizabeth. The versions of the New Testament previously executed, from that of Tyndale to the Bishops' Bible inclusively—the English text of Coverdale's Diglott New Testament excepted—had been made from the original Greek; but the Rhemish translators took for their basis the Latin Vulgate. One of the principal objects which the Rhemish translators had in view was evidently to circulate their doctrinal and controversial notes, together with the Scriptures translated by them. Though the translators desired anything rather than to give the rendering of the text simply and fairly, few passages show a really dishonest perversion; yet very many passages exhibit a desire of expressing the sense obscurely, or at least in such a way that a common reader may find not a little difficulty in gathering from the words a definite meaning. However, if we take the whole version, we shall find a very large portion well translated, and truly exhibiting the sense of the Latin Vulgate, such as they had it. Though the Council of Trent had defined the Latin Vulgate to be the "authentic" version, as yet, when the Rhemish version was printed, there had been no decision as to what copy was to be regarded as such. The Rhemish translators, as may be supposed, do not exactly agree with either the Sixtine published in 1590, or the Clementine edition published in 1592. Sometimes they have the reading adopted afterward by the one, sometimes that which is found in the other. This may be said to be a matter of comparatively small importance, so long as they used the best readings which were within their reach, in the absence of an authentic edition of the Latin Vulgate. The following is a specimen of this version—Heb. xi, 4:

By faith Abel offered a greater hoste to God then Cain; by which he obtained testimonie that he was iust, God giving testimonie to his guiltes, and by it, he being dead yet speaketh.

The Romish translation of the Old Testament was published at Douay, in two volumes, in the years 1609 and 1610. The editors of this part of the version speak of it as having been executed many years before, but that the poor estate of the English Romanists, in their banishment, hindered its publication. They say that they have revised the version according to the Clementine edition of the Vulgate, that thus it might be fully in accordance with "the authenticated Latin." The following is a specimen of this version—Gen. xlix, 10:

The scepter shal not be taken away from Iudas, and a dyke out of his thigh, til he doe come that is to be sent, and the same shal be the expectation of the gentiles.

In the modern editions of the Douay Bible and the Rhemish Testament, many changes have been introduced, some of which approximate to the authorized version, while others are not improvements.

It is marvellous how editions of the Scriptures were multiplied after the time of Tyndale, notwithstanding the severity of occasional persecutions. Besides about fourteen editions issued in Tyndale's life-time, eight or nine were issued in the year of his death. From the death of Tyndale to the close of Mary's reign, 1558, no fewer than fifty editions of the New Testament and twenty-six of the entire Bible were printed, and from 1558 to 1611 there were issued more than fifty editions of the New Testament, and about one hundred and twenty of the Bible, besides separate books. Of this number, twenty-one editions of the New Testament and sixty-four of the Bible were of the Geneva translation. Still the work of Tyndale forms substantially the basis of every revision, not excepting the translation now in common use.—Bastow.

III. History of the English Translation now in common Use.—The authorized version was undertaken at the command of King James I, in consequence of several objections having been made by the Puritans to the bishops' translation at the second day's sitting of the conference held at the palace of Hampton Court, January 16th, 1603-4. The method proposed by the king for the accomplishment of the new translation was thus: That the version should be made by some of the most learned men in both the universities; that it then should be reviewed by certain of the bishops; that it should then be laid before the privy council; and, last of all, be ratified by royal authority. Accordingly, fifty-four men, pre-eminently distinguished for piety and learning, were appointed to execute this great work. However, the list of persons actually employed in the translation contains only forty-seven names. Though several of the persons thus appointed were made bishops before the work was completed, yet, as none of them were so at the time of the appointment, it would appear that the number needed to make up the deficiency is to be found in the fact of certain bishops having been especially named as having the work in some manner under their control. This view is not improbable when it is known that Bancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, is said to have made some alterations in the version; and Bilson, bis-hop of Winchester, was one of those who gave the work its final revision. The following is a list of the translators' names, with the parts assigned to each company (see Clarke's Comment, Gen. Prof. to O. T.; Maclure, Authors of Engl. Bible, N. Y. 1853):

The following instructions were drawn up for their proceedings:

1. "The ordinary Bible read in the church, commonly called the Bi-hops' Bible, to be followed, and as little altered as the original will permit."
2. "The names of the prophets and the holy writers, with the other names in the text, to be retained as near as may be, according as they are vulgarly used."
3. "The old ecclesiastical words to be kept, as the word church, not to be translated congregation."
4. "When any word hath divers significations, that to be kept which hath been most commonly used by the most eminent fathers, being agreeable to the propriety of the place and the analogy of truth."
5. "The division of the chapters to be altered either not at all, or as little as may be, if necessarily so require."
6. "No marginal notes at all to be affixed, but only for the explanation of the Hebrew or Greek words, which cannot, without some circumlocution, so briefly and fitly be expressed in the text."
7. "Such quotation of places, to be marginally set down as shall serve for the fit reference of one Scripture to another."
8. "Every particular man of each company to take the same chapter or chapters; and having translated or amended them severally by him-self, where he think good, all to meet together, to confer what they have done, and agree for their part what shall stand."

9. "As any one company has despatched any one book in this manner, they shall send it to the rest, to be considered of seriously and judiciously; for his majesty is very careful in this point."

10. "If any company, upon the review of the book so sent, shall doubt or differ upon any places, to send them word thereof to note the places, and therewithal to send their reasons; to which if they consent not, the difference to be compounded at the general meeting, which is to be of the chief persons of each company, at the end of the work."

11. "When any place of special obscurity is doubted of, letters to be directed by authority, to send to any learned in the land for his judgment in such a place."

12. "Letters to be sent from every bi-hop to the rest of his clergy, admonishing them of this translation in hand, and to move and charge as many as, being skilful in the tongues, have taken pains in that kind, to send their particular observations to the company, either at Westminster, Cambridge, or Oxford, according as it was directed before in the king's letter to the archbishop."

13. "The directors in each company to be the deans of Westminster and Chester for Westminster, and the king's professors in Hebrew and Greek in the two Universities."

14. "These translations to be used when they agree better with the text than the Bishops' Bible, viz., Tyndale's, Coverdale's, Matthew's, Whitechurch's, Geneva."

To these the following rule was added:

15. "Besides the said directors before mentioned, three or four of the most ancient and grave divines in either of the Universities, not employed in translating, to be assigned by the vice-chancellor, upon conference with the rest of the heads, to be overseers of the translation, as well Hebrew as Greek, for the better observation of the 4th rule above specified."

According to these regulations, each book passed the scrutiny of all the translators successively. In the first instance, each individual translated every book which was allotted to his division. Secondly, the readings to be adopted were agreed upon by the whole of that company assembled together, at which meeting each translator must have been solely occupied by his own version. The book thus finished was sent to each of the other companies to be again examined; and at these meetings it probably was, as Selden informs us, that "one read the translation, the rest holding in their hands some Bible, either of the learned tongues, or French, Spanish, Italian, etc. If they found any fault, they spoke; if not, he read on." In this way every precaution was taken to secure a faithful translation, as the whole Bible underwent at least six different revisions by the most learned men in the kingdom. The translation was commenced in the spring of 1607, and occupied about three years, and the revision of it occupied about three quarters of a year more. It was printed in Gothic letter, and first published in folio in 1611, with the title, "The Holy Bible Conteyning the Old Testament, and the New; Newly translated out of the originall Tongues: And with the former translations diligently compared and revised by his Majesties speciall Comandement. Appointed to be read in Churches." The expense of this translation appears not to have been borne by the king, nor by any government commission, but chiefly, if not entirely, by Mr. Barker.

IV. Critical Estimate of the Authorized Version.—It has often been affirmed that "King James's Bible is in no part a new translation taken directly from the originals, but that it is merely a revision of the earlier English versions, and compared with various Continental translations." These remarks are not strictly correct. The translators themselves give us a correct view of the nature of their work. In their dedication to King James, they observe, "Your highness, out of deep judgment, apprehended how convenient it was that, out of the original tongues, together with comparing of the labors, both in our own and other foreign languages, of many worthy men who went before us, there should be one more exact translation of the Holy Scriptures into the English tongue." It must be admitted, however, that they closely followed the Septuagint and Vulgate in their emendations of previous English translations to suit the originals. As King James's version has been as extravagantly eulogized by some as it has been unduly derided by others, it will be well calmly and briefly to consider its merits as well as its faults.

The most prominent perhaps among its excellences is its simple, pure, and nervous style. Its words are usually chosen from the old and more expressive Saxon element. It is this feature, no doubt, that has so endeared it to the popular heart, and which gives it a charm to the youngest reader. There are some noticeable exceptions to this remark, however, for it sometimes uses Latin terms when Saxon were at hand, e. g. "cogitation" for thought; "illuminate" for enlightened; "matrix" for womb; "prognosticator" for foreteller; "terrestrial" for earthly; "vocation" for calling, etc. In the Lord's Prayer, at both passages (Matt. vi, 13; Luke xi, 4), our translators employ "temptation" instead of trial. Another marked excellence that has usually been attributed to the Auth. Vers. is its general accuracy and fidelity to the original. In this respect it compares to great advantage with the Septuagint, which not only very often misses or misconstrues the entire drift of a clause, but sometimes interpolates words and whole verses from apocryphal sources; and also with the Vulgate and other ancient versions, which, if they do not, like the Targums, run into paraphrase, yet are very often misled into fanciful and erroneous interpretations. To this commendation, however, there must, in candor and truth, be made very large drawbacks in many individual renderings of the A. V., and even in whole classes of renderings. Not only were the sciences of sacred philology, and especially of Biblical geography and antiquities, in too crude a state to enable the translators to fix the exact meaning of obscure and doubtful terms with precision, but they have totally ignored the diction, style, and arrangement of the poetic portions, especially the laws of parallelism (q. v.), reducing poetry to prose, and transposing the words in the clauses arbitrarily and without reference to the original. They habitually neglect the import of moods and tenses, especially in the Hebrew (constantly rendering the preter or future by the present or indefinite past, or the reverse), and they constantly lose the true force of particles and the nice shades of meaning in the prepositions, the article, and syntactical construction. Occasionally they are very happy in their renderings, but there is scarcely a verse, especially in the more highly-wrought and terse utterances of the O. T., that is not marred or obscured by some loose or incorrect expression. It may safely be said that one half of modern popular commentaries is taken up with the correction of errors and the solution of difficulties, which a close, idiomatic, lucid, and judicious translation would at once have dissipated. It is true, few if any who have tried their hand at improved versions have succeeded any better; but this has usually been either because they were incompetent persons, or by reason of some dogmatic aim they had in view. Scholars who have been otherwise qualified have not themselves sufficiently appreciated the poetic element pervading the Hebrew writings, or they have overdone the task by embellishing rather than following the text.

Among the more obvious blemishes of the A. V. are its obsolete and indelicate phrases, its arbitrary and often absurd, always confusing, subdivision into chapters and verses, and its inexact and defective mode of punctuation. These are so objectionable, that, but for the attachment which long and early association produces for the version, it would often be laid aside for any other which avoided these faults. From these causes alone the Song of Solomon has been practically discarded from both public and private reading, and many parts of the Bible cannot be safely ventured upon in a promiscuous company. The diffidence, it is true, sometimes lies in the passage itself, but there are very few instances where such phraseology might not properly be employed as would obviate all embarrassment. If any other book were as badly edited as our common Bibles, it would have provoked severe literary animadversion. But the inherent interest of the volume, the ineffaceable beauty of its sentiments, and the irrefragable force of its teachings break through every disguise, and command the attention of all minds and hearts.

Among the lesser failings of the Auth. Version may be mentioned its frequent renderings of the same word or phrase in the original by various terms or expressions. This want of uniformity (which those who use this Cyclopædia will continually have occasion to observe) was the result, probably, in part at least, of the execution of the translation by various parties. In proper names and technical terms, the identification not unfrequently becomes impossible to ordinary readers. Other infelicities seem to have been, in part at least, the result of king James's restrictive rules.

We cannot conclude this criticism, which may appear harsh to those who have not minutely investigated the matter, without expressing the hope that the day is not far distant when a thorough revision on liberal principles will be made of the common version by a committee of learned men chosen from all evangelical denominations; or, what would perhaps be still more satisfactory, a new translation be put forth under the auspices of such an authority, and then left to secure its acceptance for critical purposes by its intrinsic merits. However excellent, it could not be expected to supersede the extensively circulated and familiar version for general use. See VERSIONS (of the Bible).

V. Standard English Bibles.—1. The Original Edition.—This, as stated above, was published in the year 1611, the translation having been commenced in 1601. The probability is that the translation was finished in 1608, at the latest, leaving the unnecessarily long time of three years occupied in printing; but the reasons for this delay are not now known.

The volume is a stately folio, each page measuring 14½ inches by 8½, exclusive of margin. Two columns of text are on each page, each having 59 lines when full, and two marginal columns. The text is printed from an uncommonly heavy and noble Old-English type—"great primer" in size, reduced by the shrinking of the paper to nearly "two-line brevier." The head-lines of the pages are in a very large Roman letter, three quarters of an inch deep. Each chapter commences with an engraved initial, about an inch square; and each book with one yet larger, often 2½ inches square. In addition, engraved ornaments are at the beginning of every book, and the title-page consists of a heavy engraved border, having a very little place for letter-press. The effect of this display, however, is somewhat reduced when we learn that none of these embellishments were provided expressly for this Bible, but that they had all appeared in previous editions of other translations. One or two of the large initials, indeed, were engraved for an edition of Ovid. The parts usually printed in italic, as the headings and supplied words, are in Roman.

The volume contains, besides the text and Apocrypha (this latter being printed from the same type as the rest of the book), the Address to the Reader, a very valuable document, which, most unfortunately, is now almost entirely lost sight of; the Dedication "to the most high and mighty Prince James," which is just as worthless as the other is valuable, and is nevertheless printed in all English Bibles to this day; Speed's Genealogies, covering 34 pages, very intricate, profound, ingenious, and dry; and, apparently, a Calendar, though copies containing this last are very rare. The pages are not numbered, but the signatures, or printer's guide-letters, placed at the foot of certain pages, run up in the Apocrypha to Ceccc, which is equal, counting by sixes, to 1368 pages, and in the New Testament to Aa, which counts 300 more. This covers the text only.

The spelling and punctuation are very irregular, as in all books of the time. The following two verses, taken at random, will be a sufficient example—Matt. ix, 1, 2:

And hee entred into a ship, and passed ouer, and came into his owne cite.

2 And behold, they brought to him a man sicke of the palfie, lying on a bed: and letus feeling their faith, fad into the sicke of the palfie, Some, be of good cheere, thy finnes be forgiven thee.

There are also many typographical errors—more, indeed, than would be borne with in any Bible printed now. The most striking is in Exodus xiv, 10, which reads thus, modernizing the spelling:

10 And when Pharaoh drew nigh, the children of Israel lift up their eyes, and behold, the Egyptians marched after them, and they were sore afraid: and the children of Israel lift up their eyes, and behold, the Egyptians marched after them, and they were sore afraid: and the children of Israel cried out unto the Lord.

Other notable errors are in Lev. xiii, 56, "the plaine be somewhat dark," where we must read, "the plague be somewhat dark;" Lev. xvii, 14, "Ye shall not eat the blood," for "Ye shall eat;" Jer. xxii, 3, "deliver the spoiler," instead of "deliver the spoiled;" Ezek. xxiv, 7, "poured it upon the ground," for "not upon;" Hosea vi, 5, "shewed them," for "hewed them;" and many others. These, however, were soon corrected.

Notwithstanding that by the king's command marginal notes were not to be affixed, these were found indispensable. For instance, at Matt. xxii, 2, we have the note, "The Roman penny is the eighth part of an ounce, which, after five shillings the ounce, is sevenpence halfpenny." Others of this class are found. In other places, the translators did not even avoid critical notes. Baruch i, 10, at "prepare ye manna," has "Gr. corruptly for mincha, that is, a meat-offering." Others of these notes might be pointed out; but, as a general thing, these would be quite as well omitted, as they now generally are. The number of marginal references is very small—only 8980, including the Apocrypha. At present the best Bibles, without the Apocrypha, have over seventy thousand. Bagster's Comprehensive Bible claims to have "nearly half a million," which, we opine, is incorrect.

The translators' manuscript has been lost. According to a pamphlet published in 1660, it was, five years previously, in the possession of the king's printers. It has not since been heard of. The manuscript of the Translators' Address to the Reader is said to be preserved in the Bodleian Library, Oxford. Copies of this edition are now pretty scarce. The commonest loss, as with other books, is of title-pages.

Much care is necessary to identify an imperfect copy of this edition, for a second was printed in 1611, and others in 1613, 1617, 1634, and 1640, from the same type, and running page for page. Each edition presents typographical errors peculiar to itself. The only clue we have here space to give is, that the two editions of 1611 are the only ones in which the signatures commence with the New Testament, and the second of that year has the before-mentioned errors corrected. Many bad ones, however, are found in it, not the least of which is the enumeration of "1 Corinthians" and "2 Corinthians" in the list of the books of the Old Testament instead of Chronicles. In 1833 a reprint of this first edition, page for page, but in Roman letter, was made at Oxford, so exact as to follow even the most obvious typographical errors, and showing the ancient spelling throughout. Bagster's English Hexapla also contains the text of the New Testament printed verbatim from this edition; and where the book itself is unattainable, these are perhaps the best substitutes for those who, for any reason, require to go behind the Bibles now in use.

A close scrutiny of the volume reveals indisputably the facts that no member of the original companies of translators took cognizance of the volume as it passed through the press, but that the printer was depended on to secure accuracy; and that, notwithstanding the lapse of three, perhaps four years between the completion of the translation and its publication, it was run through the press with great haste. Add to this the fact that from 1600 to 1670 the British press was at its lowest point in improvement, and it will at once be seen that the chances of obtaining correct Bibles at first, or subsequently, were very small. Upon its publication, editions were very rapidly multiplied. Each new one partly copied and partly corrected the errors of its exemplar; but each, to some extent, created new errors of its own, to be in like manner perpetuated. In 1638, for instance, a Cambridge Bible printed "ye" for "we" in Acts vi, 3, thus throwing the appointment of deacons into the hands of the laity rather than the apostles; and this error continued down to 1691. It has been insinuated that the Independents made this change intentionally; D'Israeli, indeed, goes so far as to charge Field, the king's printer, with receiving a present of £1500 to make it; and only the fact of its being first found in a Cambridge University edition disproves the statement. Many other errata, curious, whimsical, absurd, and shocking by turns, might be brought up from Bibles of the period, such as, for a few instances, "I pray God it may be laid to their charge," 2 Tim. iv, 16, in 1613; "Thou shalt commit adultery," in 1632; "the unrighteous shall inherit the kingdom of God," 1 Cor. vi, 9, in 1653. In each of these cases "not" is omitted; but often words are transposed or changed, and the quarto of 1613 leaves two verses entirely out. The first attempt at correcting these errors seems to have been made by a Dr. Scattergood about 1680. From a collation of various old Bibles, we have come to the conclusion that he did but little. The next notable edition was that of Archbishop Tenison, 1701. This was intended for a standard, but unluckily was so full of typographical errors that a complaint was entered against the printers by Convocation.

2. Blayney's Edition.—Sufficient care not being yet taken, King George I, in 1724, directed that the persons licensed to print the Bible—for in England, for the sake of insuring accuracy as far as possible, the book can only be printed by the universities, the king's printers, and persons by them licensed—should employ such correctors of the press, and pay them such salaries as the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London should approve. Errors, however, most pertinaciously crept in, and at length the University of Oxford employed Dr. Blayney to revise the English Bible and correct it throughout. His work was published in 1769. It was issued in two forms, folio and quarto, the former being claimed to be the most correct. His collation was made by comparing throughout the edition of 1611 (but which one cannot now be known, for it has only recently been settled that two editions were published in that year), that of 1701, which has already been mentioned for its incorrectness, and two recent Cambridge copies. From these somewhat unpromising materials he claims to have reformed the text "to such a standard of purity as, it is presumed, is not to be met with in any other edition hitherto extant." How far this is the case will be seen by-and-by. Besides this, the punctuation was revised throughout "with a view to preserve the true sense;" upon comparison with the Hebrew and Greek originals, many alterations were made in the words printed in italic; "considerable alterations" were made in the "heads or contents prefixed to the chapters;" many proper names were translated in the margin, where the narrative contained an allusion to their meaning (this should have been done fully); the chronology, which was first added in 1680, was rectified; and the marginal references were compared and corrected throughout, besides having 30,495 new ones added.

Dr. Blayney makes an accidental admission, tending to lower confidence in the book, that two proofs were read, "and, generally speaking, the third likewise," which is quite insufficient for a standard edition of any work, or even an ordinary edition of the Bible. Four proofs are the least allowable on such a work. It is no wonder that afterward one hundred and sixteen typographical errors were discovered in it. The most important is in Rev. xviii, 22, which in the quarto copy reads:

22 And the voice of harpers, and musicians, and of pipers, and trumpeters, shall be heard no more in thee; and the sound of a millstone shall be heard no more at all in thee;

Reference to a correct Bible will show that the following words are omitted: "at all in thee; and no craftsman, of whatsoever craft he be, shall be found any more." But, saying nothing of accidental errors like this, there is yet abundant ground for complaint against the text for inaccuracy. In Joshua iii, 12, all previous editions had read "Take ye twelve men;" it appears here, to the confusion of the grammar, "Take you twelve men." In Joshua xi, 19, "unto my place" is changed to "into my place;" and, so far as there is a difference in the sense, the change is incorrect. But these errors, though utterly out of place in a standard Bible, are venial by the side of others. In Judges xi, 7, all editions before, and most after, read "the elders of Gilead;" he has, "the children of Gilead." In Psalm xxiv, 3, instead of "and who shall stand in his holy place?" he introduced "or who shall stand." In Psalm cvii, 16, he, followed only by editions copied from him, reads "for he hath broken the gates of brass, and cut the gates of iron in sunder," the true reading being "bars of iron." In Psalm cxv, 3, he is the first to read "whatsoever he hath pleased," the inserted "hath" being quite superfluous. His is the only edition we have met with which reads, in Isaiah xlvii, 9, "But these two things which shall come in a moment." Most important is the change he introduced into Matt. xvi, 16, where he reads "Thou art the Christ" instead of "Thou art Christ." In this edition we find, for the first time, in 2 Cor. xii, 2, "I knew a man in Christ about fourteen years ago" instead of "above." In 1 John i, 4, the reading "our joy" for "your joy," though often met with now, is only an error first made in this edition. In punctuation, too, Blayney did but little better. There are few places where he for the first time mispointed a verse, but he has perpetuated many errors. In Deut. ix, 3, the original, and all down to his time, are pointed substantially thus: "The Lord thy God is he which goeth over before thee as a consuming fire: he shall destroy them," etc.; but the sense is entirely changed by putting the colon after "thee," and no point at "fire." In Acts xxvii, 18, the translators placed the comma after "day," but he perpetuated the mistake of placing it after "tempest," the effect of which is to make the mariners endure an exceeding storm for twenty-four hours before they lightened the ship. In Heb. x, 12, the sense is entirely lost by placing the comma after "sins" instead of at "forever," according to the translators. Other typographical errors remained uncorrected. For instance, the marginal reading of Jonah iv, 6, is the meaningless "palmerist." In 1 Tim. ii, 9, Blayney reads "shamefacedness" instead of "shamefastness," a word of an entirely different meaning; and this error, unfortunately, has been continued to our day. In the same text he perpetuated the nonsensical corruption "broided;" and in 1 Tim. iv, 16, he continues the error made a century before of "thy doctrine" for "the doctrine." He is faulty in a critical point: the distinction between "LORD" and "Lord." The word seems to be uniformly printed "LORD" with him; certainly in every case we have noticed, including many where the Hebrew is Adonai. On the other hand, Blayney did some good things. He changed the obsolete "sith" into "since" in two places, though he left it unchanged in two others: Ezek. xxxv, 6, and the heading to Rom. v. In a few cases in which "mo" had remained unaltered to his time, he changed it to "more." He changed "fet," taken as a preterite, into "fetched;" as a verb present it had been altered before. He attempted, too, to change "glisten," but, as with "sith," only partially. Had he carried out his plan of translating significant proper names, he would have conferred a great benefit on his readers; but here again he stopped half way.

The quarto edition, the one here referred to, is in three volumes, containing respectively the Old Testament, the Apocrypha, and the New Testament. It contains no special preface, or mention of its peculiarities on the title-page or elsewhere, but is simply dated "Oxford: Printed by T. Wright and W. Gill, printers to the University." It was published at four guineas.

The University of Oxford paid Dr. Blayney £5000 for his labor in revising the Bible. They thereupon concluded that they had an available standard, and incontinently adopted it. The other privileged presses followed. But very soon his errors, one by one, came to light; some were corrected at one press, some at another; just as had been the case before, passages really correct were changed in ignorance, and the upshot of it all was, that in a very few years there was no standard again.

In 1804 the British and Foreign Bible Society was formed, and proceeded to work on the principle of buying the cheapest Bibles it could and trusting to the printers for accuracy. The American Revolution had erected a new Bible-reading nation; an effort made in its first Congress to restrict the printing of the book to licensed houses was cut short by the first amendment to the Constitution, and the book was thrown into the hands of the trade at large, with anything but a beneficial effect on its general integrity. To crown all, the English printers became careless in supplying the foreign market. Charles Knight tells us of a Bible so full of typographical errors that its printers dare not publish it in England, and he was assured "we had to send the whole edition to America!"

The editions of 1806 and 1813, though adopted as standards by the Protestant Episcopal Church, were but careful reprints of Blayney without further editorial care.

3. The American Bible Society's Revision.—This society was formed in 1816, and proceeded to print its own Bibles, thus making itself responsible for their correctness. For the first thirty years it seems to have followed almost any respectable copy that came to hand, disregarding discrepancies. But in so many editions as were now produced in England and here, these differences were constantly increasing in number. They were chiefly in punctuation, the use of capitals and italics, and such minor points. At length, in 1847, these had accumulated to such an extent that the proof-readers of the Society really did not know what to follow. The matter was now referred to the Board of Managers of the Society, and in February, 1848, they resolved to have a thorough collation of the English Bible made, and appointed Rev. J. W. McLane, D. D., of the (New-School) Presbyterian Church of Williamsburg, N. Y., to proceed with it. Accordingly, recent copies from the four "standard" British houses were obtained, an American Bible Society's copy was the fifth, and the edition of 1611 the sixth. Blayney was ignored. These were carefully compared throughout; every variation, no matter how minute, noted; and this comparison furnished the data whence to prepare the text of a future edition. The number of variations found was about twenty-four thousand. The Apocrypha formed no part of the work. The rules governing the formation of this standard text were simple. The reading of a majority of the copies was to be followed; when the three English copies agreed as to the use of the hyphen, their usage was to be accepted. In other matters, where each copy was inconsistent with itself, a system was agreed on. For instance, each copy had in one place "a highway," in another "an highway." So, too, every copy had sometimes "a husband" and "an husband," "a hole" and "an hole," "a hill" and "an hill," "a hammer" and "an hammer," and so on. Here the strict grammatical rule was enforced. The distinction between "O" and "Oh," which had been lost sight of, was brought out, either form being used, as the sense of the passage required. In capital letters the words "Spirit" and "Scripture" were found very irregular; the first was made to be capital when referring to the Spirit of God, not elsewhere; the second, when referring to the whole volume. Some spellings, now obsolete, were reformed, as "spunge," "sope," "cuckow," "plaister," "rasor," "morter," "aswaged," and others; and, what was of more importance, some names of Old-Testament characters given in the New Testament, and there spelled according to the Greek, were changed to the ordinary Old-Testament spelling. Thus "Juda" was changed to "Judah," because it was already spelled so in the Old Testament; "Gedeon" to "Gideon," "Jephthae" to "Jephthah," "Sina," to "Sinai," "Chanaan" to "Canaan," "Core" to "Korah," and so with some—not all—others. In the words of the text the following changes from the modern copies were made. In Josh. xix, 2, "and Sheba" was made "or Sheba." In Ruth iii, 15, "she went" was changed to "he went." In Solomon's Song ii, 7, "be please" was made "she please." In Isa. i, 16, "wash you" was altered to "wash ye." But all of these corrections were according to the original edition, which had been departed from in each case wrongly. Farther, in Matt. xii, 41, "in judgment" was made "in the judgment," because the Greek required it, and very many early English copies had it, though not the first. Also in Solomon's Song iii, 5, and viii, 4, the same change was made as in ii, 7; for, though the original edition here read "he," the probability, all things considered, was that it was but a typographical error in each case. In prosecuting the collation, the headings of the chapters came under notice. These often differed; but, so far as they agreed with the edition of 1611, or that of Blayney, they were frequently faulty. Some were distinctly and positively false, as those to Daniel viii, Isaiah xli, Zech. xii; others were comments on the text, as those to Psa. xlix, Dan. xi, and the whole of Solomon's Song; others were incomprehensibly clumsy, as the few first of Acts; some positively shocking, as "the Lord refuseth to go as he had promised with his people" (Exod. xxxiii); "Samuel sent by God under pretense of a sacrifice" (1 Sam. xvi). These headings had not been prepared by the body of the original forty-seven translators, but by one of their number and one other person; they never were considered as forming part of the version; they had been extensively altered before, both by Blayney and by many anonymous parties, and therefore the committee under whose care the collation was going on resolved to remodel these where necessary. Wherever "Christ" or "the Church" was mentioned in any Old-Testament heading, "Messiah" and "Zion," the equivalent words used in the Old-Testament text, were substituted, in order to avoid comment. The marginal references were again rectified, many errors corrected, and their number, upon the whole, diminished. A very few marginal readings were added, chiefly explanatory of proper names. To Matt. xxiii, 24, where "at" is now generally considered to be a misprint from the first for "out," a note was put, "Or, strain out;" and to "Jesus," in Acts xii, 45, the committee put the note, "That is, Joshua," as the translators themselves had done in Heb. iv, 8. (See, on the whole subject, the Society's pamphlet entitled "Report on the History of the Re-

The standard thus prepared was published in 1851. Though issued in a quiet way, it was received with general approval. For six years it remained the standard of the Society, and during that time not a whisper of disapprobation was heard. But in 1857 a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of Baltimore published a pamphlet aimed at this work, in which, while carefully avoiding specific charges, the most severe spirit was exhibited. The Society was accused of an attempt to "supersede the time-honored version in its integrity;" it was making a "half-way adventure" toward a new translation; it was "debasing the standard;" its Bible was "a vulgarized work," and so on. The committee had found twenty-four thousand variations in the Bibles in common use; their language was converted into a statement that they had made twenty-four thousand changes. The New-York organ of the same church at once joined in the attack, but the amount of its charge was that the standard was different from every copy collated. In the General Assembly of the Old-School Presbyterian Church in the same year, the same subject was brought up by a speaker who stigmatized the standard as being "finkered up" by "an anonymous printer and a New-School preacher!" Asking, "Why discard these captions that have been acquiesced in two hundred years?" he forgot that they had not been so acquiesced in, and that abundant reason had been shown for "discarding" them. In July, 1857, the (Presbyterian) Princeton Review had a most bitter article on the same subject. The only attempt to meet the difficulties of the case was the statement (page 510) that the Society should "give up entirely all idea of producing a standard text," or otherwise should "take the standard editions and collate them." But if this latter course was followed, as it had been, "the Society would have no right to exercise its own discretion in selecting the readings or the punctuation it would adopt." In compliance with these and similar demands from auxiliary bodies, the Board of Managers, in February, 1858, revoked this standard. Their present imperial quarto edition is now their printer's guide. With this action perished the hope of having for the present a generally-accepted standard of King James's translation. One cannot now be got up in England by any one church, because dissent in many branches is so extensive; nor by co-operation, because they have no union; nor by their Bible Society, because it does not print its own books. In this country the American Bible Society is the only body which has any general authority. It is to be regretted that this society has not felt itself authorized by its constitution to retain and prosecute the needed work. See BIBLE SOCIETIES, 3, xii.

VI. Marginal Readings.—These are generally passed over by Bible readers, but a careful student will find them invaluable for ascertaining the precise meaning of any text. They are of two kinds; the first, commonly marked by a dagger (†), giving the literal translation of a peculiar idiom in the originals where it could not be rendered in good English, also the translation of significant proper names; and the other, marked by a parallel (∥), representing a possible different rendering where the original is in doubt from any cause. They are further distinguished by being prefaced by "That is," in the translations of names, or "Heb.," "Chald.," or "Gr.," according to the original language in the first class; and "Or," in the second class. In many modern Bibles they are referred to by consecutive figures or Greek letters; but the system here described is that used by the original translators and by the American Bible Society. The translators regarded these readings as a component part of their work; and to the present day ministers of the Church of England read and use either the marginal rendering or that in the text at pleasure. They were first used by the translators of the Geneva version of the Bible half a century before ours was made.

Since the publication of our translation in the year 1611, the marginal readings have at various times been enlarged and improved. There are now about three hundred of these more than the original number, and a few have been omitted. Of the others, many have been extended by adding the necessary expletives. A few palpable errors have been corrected, as in the note to 1 Sam. v, 4, where the stump of the fish-idol Dagon was ludicrously described as "the filthy part," now correctly printed "the fishy part." In other cases one note has been divided into two, one of each class. In one instance an odd typographical error has been introduced into a note and perpetuated: Jonah's gourd (Jonah iv, 6) is in the first edition described as a "palme-crist," or planta christi (the castor-oil plant), in the margin; but the word has been corrupted into "palmerist," to which no meaning can be attached.

There is no trace of any person or body authorized to make these changes, and except in the correction of palpable typographical errors, as above noticed, it would seem that they should no more be meddled with than should those other readings which form the body of the text. Both came originally from the same translators, and both were intended to be of equal authority. This fact at once places them above the rank of mere commentary, and renders their study most important. Ruth i, 20, for example, is almost meaningless as commonly printed; but when opposite "Naomi" we read "that is, Pleasant," and opposite "Mara," "that is, Bitter," we see at once a beauty in the passage of which otherwise we could form no idea. So, also, with strength of expression. Verse 13 of the same chapter is made much stronger when, instead of "it grieveth me much for your sakes," we read, "I have much bitterness for your sakes." Job xvi, 3, is wonderfully strengthened if we adopt the Hebrew idiom—never mind if the English is not so good—and instead of "vain words," read "words of wind." So when, in Job v, 7, we read "sons of the burning coal" instead of "sparks," we at once see, better than by any commentary ever written, the metaphorical character of Old-Testament poetry, and thenceforth can read the poetical books with vastly-increased appreciation.

VII. Chapter and Verse.—Among the Jews, with whom the only divisions of the Scripture was into books, according to authorship, references were made by citing the subject treated of near where the passage quoted was to be found. In this way Jesus referred the Sadducees to what we call Exodus iii, 6, as we see by Mark xii, 26. The meaning here is not that God spoke to Moses in the bush, for the text says that he spoke to him out of it; but rather, "Have ye not read in the Book of Moses, in The Bush, how God spake unto him?" that is, "in that part of the Book of Moses called The Bush." "I may observe," says Archbishop Trench, "that Romans xi, 2, is a quotation of the same kind. It can never mean 'of Elias,' as in our version, but is rather 'in [the history of] Elias,' in that portion of Scripture which tells of him." The Koran is quoted by this means now. Its chapters are called from their subjects by such names as "The Cow," "Thunder," "Smoke," "The Moon," "Divorce," "The Spider," "The Resurrection," "The Slanderer," and so on.

The division into chapters was made by a cardinal, Hugo de Sancto Caro, about the year 1250. He was employed in compiling a Latin Concordance, the first of which we have any account, and invented this division to facilitate his labor. The Book of Psalms is naturally divided. Paul quotes "the second Psalm" and "another Psalm" in Acts xiii, 33, 35. The chapters having been marked, greater precision was obtained by putting capital A, B, C, and so on, at regular distances down in the margin, so that any passage near the beginning of a chapter would be quoted; as, for example, "John, 10, A;" further down, "Jeremiah, 14, D," and so on. The early English versions all showed this arrangement, and Marbeck's Concordance, the first one in English, makes its references in this manner. These smaller divisions by letters were inconvenient, because they were not made by any system, and in different translations were of different lengths. They generally embraced about six or seven verses under one letter. The divisions into chapters were not uniform; at least they are not so in our early English translations. Wycliffe, for instance, divides Jude into two chapters; and Coverdale makes thirty chapters in 1 Chronicles by dividing the fourth chapter into two. Very frequently in the Pentateuch and Job, and occasionally elsewhere, there is a difference of one to four verses in the beginning of a chapter. Where this is the case, too, our version often makes the division in the worst place.

The divisions into verses were made by several persons. About 1430 Rabbi Mordecai Nathan divided the Hebrew Bible thus, using Cardinal Hugo's chapters. In 1527 a Latin Bible was published at Lyons in which this division of the Old Testament was followed, and the New Testament also divided, but into verses averaging twice as long as ours. But our present arrangement in this part of the Scriptures was made about 1550, by Robert Stephens, a printer of Paris, who executed the work while making a horse-back journey from Lyons to Paris. This was done only as an advertisement for an edition of the Testament he soon after published in Greek, with two Latin versions. The circumstances under which the work was done effectually prevented the exercise of any scholastic or critical care or ability. But, though the Old Testament was divided first, no edition of it in Hebrew was printed thus till 1661. The first English Scripture printed with verses was the Testament printed at Geneva, 1557, and in 1560 the whole Bible at the same place. The Bishops' Bible, next in order, published in 1568, had them, but also had the marginal guide letters, as in the earlier translations, and in its marginal references it uses the letters instead of the verses. In the next Protestant translation, King James's, or our present one, the letters are altogether omitted. It seems never to have been considered that the division into verses superseded chapters; but really a reference to Luke 243 would be much shorter than to Luke xii, 13. The Psalms are, by their structure, naturally divided into verses. But yet our translations are not uniform in this, even here. Psalm xlii, for instance, is in Coverdale's Bible made one paragraph; Matthew's, twelve verses; Cranmer's, fifteen; Geneva and Bishops', eleven; and the Douay, twelve. In Cranmer's Bible each of the alphabetical sections of Psalm cxix is numbered independently, 1 to 8.

From all this it appears that these divisions have no divine warrant whatever, were carelessly made, and should be disregarded in seeking the sense of any part of Scripture. Hence it follows that the best Bibles for common use are those called Paragraph Bibles, in which the matter is reduced to ordinary prose form, except in the poetical books, which are printed in short lines, so as to show their poetic structure. Unfortunately, but few editions are thus published. The Religious Tract Society of London issue a few: one in 12mo, some thirty years ago, was the best. One they have recently got out, in royal 8vo, with notes and maps, has all the parallel passages, and, though very useful, is so encumbered with reference marks in the text as to distract the reader's attention constantly. Rev. T. W. Coit published a very good one in Cambridge, Mass., 1834. Before that, others had been got out at Oxford, chiefly objectionable as not showing the poetic form of some parts. One of the most useful Paragraph Bibles to the English student is that of Bishop Wilson, Bath, 1785, 3 vols. 4to; but it labors under the disadvantage just spoken of.

After all, the best way of making references would have been by a system like the "folios" of the lawyers. Put a special mark at every hundredth word, and a corresponding number in the margin, and you have not only a ready means of reference, but a guard against changes in the text, and are yet at full liberty to print the matter either as prose or poetry, without distracting the eye or breaking the sense in the slightest degree. It is, however, too late to do this with our present version. As the next best thing, more Paragraph Bibles should be printed, in all respects like other books, except that the commencement of each verse may be shown by a very small mark in the body of the line, and its number in the margin opposite.—Christian Advocate (N. Y.). See BIBLE.

Autocephali (αὐτοκεφάλαι), a term applied, in the Greek Church, to bishops not subject to patriarchal jurisdiction. Such were, in the Greek Church, the Archbishop of Bulgaria and some other metropolitans, who claimed to be independent of the see of Constantinople; in the Church of Antioch, the Archbishop of Salamis, in Cyprus; and among the Latins, the Archbishop of Ravenna, who denied all dependence on the popes. Such also was the ancient liberty of the British Church, of which the remaining seven bishops, in the time of St. Augustine, acknowledged no superior but the Archbishop of Caerleon (Spelman, Con. Brit. A. D. 601). Originally all metropolitans were independent of any patriarch or exarch, ordering the affairs of their own province with their provincial bishops, and accountable to no superior but a synod; but in process of time the bishops of the great cities of the empire arrogated to themselves rights over the provinces of their dioceses, such as that of ordaining metropolitans, convoking the synod of the diocese, and of inspection over all the provinces in their obediences. Such were the rights of the Bishop of Rome over the diocese of the vicariate of Rome, or the suburbicarian churches (6th can. of Nicaea), and those of the see of Alexandria over Egypt, Libya, and the Thebaid. Besides these autocephali, those bishops who were subject to no metropolitan, but were immediately dependent on the patriarch, who was to them instead of a metropolitan, were so styled. In the diocese of Constantinople there were thirty-nine, or, as some accounts have it, forty-two such bishops; in that of Antioch, sixteen; in that of Jerusalem, twenty-five. The earliest mention of such bishops is in the Notitia of the Emperor Leo in the ninth century.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. ii, ch. xxix, § 1, 2, 3; Landon, Eccl. Diet. s. v.

Auto da Fé (Spanish, from the Latin ACTUS FIDEI, "act of faith"), a ceremony in the acts of the Spanish Inquisition in which condemned heretics were punished, and those acquitted of heresy were released. The auto da fé generally took place on a Sunday, between Pentecost and Advent, and very often on All-saints'-day. The procession was headed by the Dominican monks, carrying the banner of the Inquisition. Following these, and separated from them by a crucifix, were those whom the Inquisition had pardoned. Next marched those who were condemned to death, attired in a peculiar habit, barefooted, their head covered with a high cap, on which were painted devils and flames. Finally came effigies of such as had avoided condemnation by flight, and the coffins of the victims, painted black, with images of devils and flames on them. The march was closed by priests, who accompanied the procession through the principal streets of the city as far as the church, where a sermon on faith was delivered. The verdict of the Inquisition was then read to the accused, who were obliged to stand in front of a cross, with extinguished tapers in their hands. As soon as the sentence of death was read against any one, an officer of the Inquisition gave the accused a slight tap on the chest to signify his surrendering the culprit to the secular authorities. The condemned were then loaded with chains, taken to prison, and two hours afterward cited before the higher court, where they were asked in what religion they preferred to die. Such as declared their adherence to the Roman Church were strangled, the others burnt alive. A stake was prepared on the place of execution for each victim. Two priests invited each of them to make their peace with the church, and, when all their efforts failed, solemnly consigned them to the devil. The burning then commenced; and the remains of such as were already dead, together with the effigies of such as had fled, were also thrown into the fire. The day after the auto da fé, those whom the Inquisition had pardoned were (after swearing never to reveal what had taken place during their trial) restored to the places from whence they had been taken when arrested. On the occasion of an auto da fé, the Inquisitors were accompanied by the civil and military authorities, the nobility, and even the king and princes, while people of all ranks crowded to see the exhibition. No auto da fé has taken place since the middle of the 18th century; and the sentences after that time, up to the abolition of the Inquisition in 1808 by Joseph Napoleon, were carried into execution privately, in the buildings of the Inquisition. See INQUISITION.

Auvergne, Guillaume d', bishop of Paris, born at Aurillac in the second half of the 12th century, died March 30, 1249. He was one of the most learned theologians and philosophers of his day, and undertook to refute Aristotle on metaphysical questions. He was doctor of the Sorbonne and professor of theology, and subsequently was called to the see of Paris. His sermons and essays on several points of ethics were published by Le Féron in 1674 (2 vols. fol.).—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, iii, 795.

Auvergne, Pierre d', or PETRUS DE CROS, a French theologian and philosopher, died Sept. 25, 1307 (according to others, 1301). He became, under the guidance of Thomas Aquinas, a distinguished theologian and philosopher. He was doctor of the Sorbonne and canon of the chapter of Paris. According to Samaritanus (in Gallia Christiana), he was subsequently bishop of Clermont. He wrote a number of commentaries on Aristotle.—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, iii, 795.

Auxentius. 1. Arian bishop of Milan, A. D. 355-374 (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. vi, 23). He was the leader of the Arians in the Western churches. When the orthodox bishops, at a provincial synod held in 369, under the presidency of Bishop Damasus of Rome, condemned Arianism, they did not dare to pronounce the anathema against Auxentius, because they knew him to be protected by the favor of the Emperor Valentinian I. Although they were at last prevailed upon by Athanasius to mention in their synodal epistle to the Illyrians the condemnation of Auxentius, the latter maintained himself in his see until his death. He was succeeded by Ambrose (q. v.).

2. Abbot, born in Syria, being the son of Abdus, who was compelled by the persecution under King Sapur to leave his country and settle in Syria. In 432 Auxentius came to Constantinople, where he received an appointment in the royal guards, but afterward retired to a solitary mountain in Bithynia, named Oxius, where, clothed only in the skins of animals, he led a life of the most complete austerity. When the Council of Chalcedon was convoked, Auxentius was unwillingly compelled to attend, and subscribed the decrees. After this he retired to a more remote mountain, called Siope, where multitudes of persons flocked to hear him. Of these, many continued to abide near him in cells, and followed the example of his ascetic course of life. He died in 470. His memory is celebrated on the 14th of February.—Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. vii, 21; Butler, Lives of Saints, Feb. 14; Landon, Eccl. Diet. s. v.

A'va (Heb. Avā', אָוָא, ruā', Sept. Αὐά, 2 Kings xvii, 24), also IVAH (Heb. Ivāh', יִבְיָהוּ, same signif.; Sept. Αὐά, 2 Kings xviii, 34; xix, 13; but in Isa. xxxvii, 13, unites with the preceding word, Avay-yoviyā v. r. Avayoviyā), the capital of a small monarchical state conquered by the Assyrians, and from which King Salmanser sent colonies into Samaria. The early Jewish translators (Symmachus and the Targums) understand it as a mere appellation; but it is associated with other proper names as a city. Some take it for the river, or rather the town which gave name to the river Avaya of Ezra viii, 21 (Beller-mann, Handbuch, iii, 374); but this name is quite different in the Heb. (אָוָא). Iken (Dissert., Philol. Theolog. p. 15c) would identify it with the Phœnician town Avatha, mentioned in the Notitia Vet. Dynastiarum Imper. Rom. (but the reading here is rather doubtful, see Reland, Palæst. p. 232 sq.); or with the town of Abje, between Beirut and Sidon, which Paul Lucas mentions as the seat of a Druse prince. Michaelis supposes it to be the land of the Avites between Tripoli and Beirut, because they are described as worshippers of Nibhaz (2 Kings xvii, 31), an idol which he compares with the great stone dog that formerly stood in that quarter, on which account the Lycus obtained its name of Nahr el-Kelb, Dog River (comp. Mannert, VI, i, 380). This, however, rests upon a confusion of the Avim of 2 Kings xvii, 31, with those of Deut. ii, 23; Josh. xiii, 3. See AVITE. Avva or Ivval has doubtless a city of Mesopotamia, in the region indicated by the associated names (Babylon, Cuth, Hamath, Sepharvaim), perhaps somewhere farther east, in the direction of the classical Avia.

Avalonius, ELYAN, an apostle of England, lived in the second century. He preached Christianity to the Britons, and converted king Lucius, with his entire court. This king sent him to bishop Eleutherus at Rome, who made him bishop of London about 181. An "Essay on the Origin of the Church of Great Britain" is attributed to Avalonius.—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, iii, 804.

Av'aran (Avāqār, Josephus Avōār, Ant. xii, 6, 1; Vulg. Avaram and Abaron; prob. of Arabic derivation, see Grimm, in loc.), an epithet of Eleazar, the brother of Judas Maccabæus (1 Macc. ii, 5).

Avarice (from Lat. avarus, from aveo, crave, strive after), an undue love of money. Avarice consists not merely in seeking after worldly wealth too eagerly, or by unjust means, but in loving it excessively, even though it be our own. Avarice is in its nature sin, and, according to St. Paul, a kind of idolatry. Gregory the Great enumerates seven particular sins which spring from avarice, or, as he calls them, "daughters of avarice," viz. treasors, frauds, lies, perjuries, restlessness, violence, hardness of hearts (Mor. in Jobum, lib. xxxi, cap. 17). The cause of this vice is really unbelief. It "is because men believe not Providence, therefore do they so greedily scrape and hoard" (Barrow On the Creed, Sermon 1). It grows by indulgence, and is strongest in the aged, as if, by a penal irony, they who can least enjoy riches should most desire them (Wesley, Sermons, serm. cxxx).

Avāris (Αἰῶρις), the name of a city on the borders of Egypt and Syria, which the shepherd-kings (Hyksos) again occupied after their expulsion from it, according to Manetho, as recited by Josephus (Apion, i, 26). Rawlinson (Historical Er. p. 74) thinks it is a corruption of the name Hebreans, who are referred to as being settled in Goshen. See ABEARIM.

Avatar or Avatara, a term in Hindoo mythology for the incarnation of the Deity. The number of the Avatāras mentioned in the Puranas, or legendary poems of the Hindoos, is very great. Those of Vishnu alone, who is distinguished by the character of "Preserver" in the Trimūrti, or triad of the principal Hindoo deities, are stated to be endless. They are variously enumerated; but all accounts seem to agree in selecting the following ten as the most conspicuous:

1. Matsya, the Fish, under whose form Vishnu preserved Manu, the ancestor of the present human race, during a universal deluge.

2. Kūrma, the Tortoise, which incarnation Vishnu underwent in order to support Mount Mandara, or rather the entire earth, when the celestial gods and their opponents the Asuras, or Daityas, were churning the sea for the beverage of immortality (amrita).

3. Varaha, the Boar. Vishnu, with the head of a monstrous boar, is represented as slaying Hiranyāksha, the chief of the Asuras, who had taken possession of the celestial regions, and as uplifting the earth, which had been sunk to the bottom of the sea.

4. In his incarnation as Narasimha, a being half man and half lion, Vishnu killed Hiranyakasipu, the brother of Hiranyāksha.

5. The form of Vāmana, the Dwarf, was assumed by Vishnu to humble the pride of King Bali. He went to a sacrifice which the king was performing, and supplicated for as much ground as he could measure with three steps, which request being granted, the dwarf suddenly grew to an immense size, and with his steps comprised earth, mid-air, and heaven.

6. Vishnu appeared in a human form, as Parasurama, the son of Jamadagni and Kōmūki, in order to preserve mankind, and especially the Brahmins, from the tyranny of the military tribe of the Kshatriyas.

7. Vishnu was born as the son of King Dasaratha, and under the name of Rāma, in order to destroy Ravana, the Daitya sovereign of Ceylon, and other demons who were then infesting the earth. The actions of Rāma form the subject of a celebrated epic poem in Sanscrit, called the Rāmāyana, and attributed to the ancient sage Vālmiki.

8. The most celebrated of the Avatāras of Vishnu is his appearance in the human form of Krishna, in which he is supposed to have been wholly and completely incarnate, whereas the other Avatāras are only considered as emanations from his being. Krishna assisted the family of the Pandavas in their war with the Kurus, and through them relieved the earth from the wicked men who oppressed it. The history of this conflict is told at length in the Mahābhārata, another great epic poem in Sanscrit.

9. Buddha, is, by the followers of the Brahminical religion, considered as a delusive incarnation of Vishnu, assumed by him in order to induce the Asuras to abandon the sacred ordinances of the Vedas, by which they lost their strength and supremacy.

10. Kalki is the name of an Avatāra in which Vishnu will appear at the end of the Kalyuga, or present age of the world, to destroy all vice and wickedness, and to restore the world to virtue and purity.—Penny Cyclopædia. See BUDDHISM; HINDUISM.

Ave Maria or Ave Mary (Hail, Mary?), the angel Gabriel's salutation of the Virgin Mary when he brought her the tidings of the incarnation (Luke i, 28). It is now a prayer or form of devotion in the Romish Church, called the Angelic Salutation (q. v.), and used to invoke the aid of Mary. The chaplets and rosaries are divided into so many Ave-Marys and so many Pater-nosters. The papists ascribe a wonderful efficacy to the Ave Mary. The following is the prayer: "Hail, Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb, Jesus. Holy Mary, mother of God, pray for us sinners, now, and in the hour of death. Amen." The practice of using this prayer at all is not older than the eleventh century, and its use before sermon is to be traced to the fifteenth century, when Vincentius Ferrerius, a Spanish Dominican, began to use it before his sermons, from whose example it gained such authority as not only to be prefixed to sermons, but to be joined to the Lord's Prayer in the Roman breviary.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xiv, ch. iv; Farrar, Ecl. Dict. s. v.; Wetzler u. Welte, Kirchen Lexikon, s. v. See ROSARY.

A'ven (Heb. id., אָבֵן, nothingness, hence iniquity, as often, especially idolatry, and so concretely an idol itself, as in Isa. lxxvi, 3), a contemptuous name given to three places on account of the idolatry practised there. See also BEN-ONI.

1. (Sept. אָבֵן) A plain (אָבֵן, Ukhal', valley), "the plain of the sun," of Damascene Syria, mentioned by Amos (i, 5) in his denunciation of Aram (Syria) and the country to the north of Palestine. It is usually supposed to be the same as the plain of Baalbek, or valley of Baal, where there was a magnificent temple dedicated to the sun. See BAALBEK. Being between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, it is supposed by Rosenmüller and others (in loc.) to be the same plain or valley that is mentioned as "the valley of Lebanon" in Josh. xi, 17 (comp. Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 52). Some, however, would rather seek Aven in the plain four leagues from Damascus toward the desert, where Michaelis (Notes on Amos) heard from a native of Damascus of a valley near that city called Un, and he quotes a Damascene proverb referring thereto; but this locality lacks confirmation (see Henderson, in loc.); for the information was at best suspicious, and has not been confirmed, although the neighborhood of Damascus has been tolerably well explored by Burckhardt (Trav. iv) and by Porter. The prophet, however, would seem to be alluding to some principal district of the country of equal importance with Damascus itself; and so the Sept. have understood it, taking the letters as if pointed, אָבֵן, On, and expressing it in their version as "the plain" of On, by which they doubtless intend the great plain of Lebanon, Cele-Syria, in which the renowned idol-temple of Baalbek or Heliopolis was situated, and which still retains the very same name by which Amos and Joshua designated it, el-Bek'at. The application of Aven as a term of reproach or contempt to a flourishing idol-sanctuary, and the play or paronomasia therein contained, is quite in keeping with the manner of Amos and of Hosea. The latter frequently applies the very same word to Bethel. See BETHAVEN.

2. (Sept. Αἰθίοπιαις, Eng. marg. "Heliopolis.") Another name for On (q. v.) in Egypt (Ezek. xxx, 17). The intention of the prophet is doubtless to play upon the name in the same manner as Amos and Hosea. See No. 1, above.

3. (Sept. Ἄνω.) A shorter form (Amos x, 8) of BETHAVEN (q. v.) or BETHEL.

Avenarius, John, a Protestant theologian, born at Eger in 1520, died at Zeitz, Dec. 5, 1590. After having been in succession pastor at Plauen, Gessnitz, Schoenefels, he was appointed professor of theology at Jena, and in 1575 became superintendent at Zeitz. He is the author of a celebrated Prayer-book, which went through a great number of editions (Strasbourg, 1578, etc.), and was translated by Zader into Latin. He also published a Hebrew Grammar and Dictionary, and several other works.—Hoefer, Biographie Générale, iii, 826.

Avenger of Blood (אָנֵף, gofl, fully אָנֵף אָנֵף), a term applied to the nearest relative of a murdered person, inasmuch as he had the right, and on him devolved the obligation of killing the murderer (2 Sam. xiv, 7, 11) wherever he met him (outside any of the cities of refuge). Respecting this custom, universal among the Hebrews from the earliest times (Gen. x, 14; xxvii, 45), as among other nations of antiquity (e. g. the Greeks; see Welker, p. 361 sq.; Wachsmuth, Hellen. Alterth. iii, 241, 284; the inhabitants of Tra-chonitis; see Josephus, Ant. xvi, 9, 1), and in the East to this day among the Arabians, Persians, Abyssinians, Druses, Circassians, etc. (see Chardin, iii, 417 sq.; Niebuhr, Beschr. p. 33 sq.; Reisen, ii, 430; East Ind. Mission. Her. iii, 491; Burekhardt, Trav. ii, 872, 1011; Lobo, Relation d' Abyss. p. 123 sq.), the Jewish law-giver, in order to restrain its abuse, appointed (Exod. xxi, 13; Numb. xxxv, 9 sq.; Dent. xix, 1 sq.; comp. Joseph. Ant. iv, 7, 4) six cities of refuge (אָנֵף אָנֵף אָנֵף) in different parts of the country, to which the man-slayer might have recourse, and where, if his offence had not been premeditated, he might remain in safety till the death of the high-priest at that time acting should release him from the danger of retribution, while, on the other hand, the wilful murderer was to be in any case surrendered to the pursuer for vengeance. If however, the man-slayer quitted the city (Dent. xix, 6), or even went beyond the prescribed limits of its environs (Numb. xxxv, 25 sq.), the avenger might kill him with impunity. See ASYLUM. A similar provision prevailed among the Athenians (see Wachsmuth, Hellen. Alterth. II, i, 263; Hefter, Athen. Gerichtsverf. p. 136) for the rescue of the accidental man-slayer. (See generally Michaelis, Mos. Recht. ii, 401 sq.; vi, 32 sq.; Hoffmann, in the Hall. Encycl. xi, 89 sq.; Jahn, Archäol. II, ii, 372 sq.)—Winer, i, 189. See BLOOD-REVENGE.

Avera. See AARA.

Avesta. See ZEND-AVESTA.

Avignon (Avenion), an episcopal see of France, on the Rhone, capital of the department of Vaucluse, 20 miles N.E. of Nismes. In 1348 it passed into the possession of Pop. Clement VI and his successors, and was the see of the pontiffs from Clement X to Gregory XI, i. e. for sixty years. Baluze's Vies des Papes d'Avignon (1693, 2 vols. 4to) is an admirable refutation of the ultramontane pretensions. It maintains that the holy see is not necessarily fixed at Rome. By the Concordat of 1801 Avignon ceased to be a metropolis, but by that of 1821 it was re-established. See PAPA-CY.

Several CONCILS were held in Avignon. The most important were 1, in 1209, in which 29 canons were adopted, some concerning discipline, and the others against heretics; the inhabitants of Toulouse were excommunicated for not having expelled the Albigenses; 2, in 1327, against the antipope Pierre de Corbière.—London, Manual of Councils, Smith, Tables of Church Hist.

Avila, JUAN DE, a famous Spanish preacher, surnamed the "Apostle of Andalusia," because he spent 40 years of his life in preaching to the towns and villages of Andalusia, was born in 1500 at Almodovar del Campo, in New Castle, and died May 10, 1569. He is the author of a number of religious works, which are still held in great esteem by Roman Catholics. A complete edition of his works, together with a biography, was published by Martin Ruiz under the title Vida y Obras de Juan de Avila, predicador apostolico de l'Andaluzia (Madrid, 1618, 2 vols. 4to, reprinted in 1757). A French translation of his works was published by Arnaud d'Andilly (Paris, 1673, fol.), and a German by Schermer (Ratisbon, 3 vols. 1861).

Avim (Heb. Ar'im, with the article, אָוִימִי, the ruins, or the Arim's tower, Sept. Avim v. r. Ar'im), a city in the tribe of Benjamin, mentioned between Bethel and Parah (Josh. xviii, 23). It may have been so named as having been settled by the Avites (q. v.) when expelled from Philistia, although it is uncertain whether they penetrated so far into the interior of the country (Keil, Comment. in loc.). The associated names afford a conjectural location eastward of Bethel, and it is possibly the same with A1 (q. v.). See AVITE.

Avis or Aviz, knights of a military order of Portugal (order of S. Bento de Aviz), instituted by Alphonso I, in 1147 or 1162, in commemoration of the capture of Evora from the Moors, whence the knights of this order were at first called knights of Santa Maria d'Evora. They were afterward styled the Knights of Avis, from a place of that name where they built a fortress. These knights followed the rule of Cîteaux, with some variations, and their duty was to defend the true faith by force of arms, to keep chastity, and to wear a religious dress, consisting of a scapulary and hood, so made that it did not hinder their fighting. Their dress of ceremony is a white cloak, having on the left side a cross fleur-de-lis, at the foot of which are two birds. In their armorial bearings they also have two birds and a tower. They possessed in Portugal about forty commanderies, and since 1550 the grand mastership of the order has been in the crown.—Helyot, Ordes Relig. i, 350; Landon, Ecl. Dict. i, 674.

Avite (Heb. Ar'i, only in the plur. אָוִי, gentile from Ar), the name of two tribes of people.

1. (Sept. Avaiot, Auth. Vers. "Avims," in Deut.; Eraiot, "Avites" in Josh.) A people who originally occupied the southernmost portion of that territory in Palestine along the Mediterranean coast which the Caphtorim or Philistines afterward possessed (Deut. ii, 23). They are usually considered a branch of the Hivites, a people descended from Canaan (Gen. x, 17). See HIVITE. As the territory of the Avites is mentioned in Josh. xiii, 3, in addition to the five Philistine states, it would appear that it was not included in theirs, and that the expulsion of the Avites was by a Philistine invasion prior to that by which the five principalities were founded. Their territory began at Gaza, and extended southward to "the river of Egypt" (Deut. ii, 23), forming what was the Philistine kingdom of Gerar in the time of Abraham, when we do not hear of any other Philistine states. There were then Avites, or Hivites, at Shechem (Gen. xxxiv, 2), and we afterward find them also at Gibeon (Josh. ix, 7), and beyond the Jordan, at the foot of Mount Hermon (Josh. xi, 5); but we have no means of knowing whether these were original settlements of the Avites, or were formed out of the fragments of the nation which the Philistines expelled from southern Palestine. See GILGAI; PHILISTINE. According to Ewald (Geschichte, i, 310) and Bertheau, the Avvim were the aborigines of Palestine Proper. They may have been so, but there is nothing to prove it, while the mode of their dwellings points rather to a nomadic origin. Thus they may have made their way northward from the Desert (Stanley, Sinai and Pal. App., § 83). In Dent, ii, 23, we see them "dwelling in 'the villages'" (or nomadic encampments—Chut-roim) in the south part of the "plain," or great western lowland, "as far as Gaza." In these rich possessions they were attacked by the invading Philistines, "the Caphtorim which came forth out of Caphtor," and who, after "destroying" them and "dwelling in their stead," appear to have pushed them farther north. This must be inferred from the terms of the passage in Josh. xiii, 2, 3, the enumeration of the rest of the land still remaining to be conquered. (The punctuation of this passage in our Bibles is not in accordance with the Hebrew text, which has a full stop at Geshuri [ver. 2], thus: "This is the land that yet remaineth, all the borders of the Philistines and all the Geshurite. From Sihor even to the border of Ekron northward, is counted to the Canaanite," etc.) Beginning from "Sihor, which is before Egypt," probably the Wady el-Arish, the list proceeds northward along the lowland plains of the sea-coast, through the five lordships of the Philistines—all apparently taken in their order from south to north—till we reach the Avvim, as if they had been driven up out of the more southerly position which they occupied at the date of the earlier record into the plains of Sharon. It is perhaps worth notice, where every syllable has some significance, that while "the Gazathite the Ekronite," are all in the singular, "the Avvim" is plural. So with the other aboriginal names. Nothing more is told us of this ancient people, whose very name is said to signify "ruin." Possibly a trace of their existence is to be found in the town "Avim" (accurately, as in the other cases, "the Avvim"), which occurs among the cities of Benjamin (Josh. xviii, 25), and which may have preserved the memory of some family of the extinct people driven up out of their fertile plains to take refuge in the wild hills of Bethel; just as in the "Zemaraim" of the preceding verse we have probably a reminiscence of the otherwise forgotten Zemarites. But, on the other hand, it is possible that the word in this place is but a variation or corruption of the name of Ai. See AVIM. The inhabitants of the north-central districts of Palestine (Galileans) were in later times distinguished by a habit of confounding the gutturals, as, for instance, א with ר (see Lightfoot, Chor. Cant., ch. 87; Buxtorf, Lex Talm., col. 434). It is possible that אִיִּית, Hivite, is a variation, arising from this cause, of אִיִּית, Arite, and that this people were known to the Israelites at the date of the conquest by the name of Hivites. At any rate, it is a curious fact that both the Sept. and Vulg. identified the two names, and also that the town of ha-Avvim was in the actual district of the Hivites, in the immediate neighborhood of Gibeon, Chephirah, and their other chief cities (Josh. ix, 7, 17, compared with xviii, 22-27). The name of the Avvim has been derived from AVVA (AVA), or IVALAH (IVALAH), as if they had migrated thence into Palestine; but there is no argument for this beyond the mere similarity of the names. See AVA.

2. (Sept. Ἐβῆαιμ, Auth. Vers., "Avites.") The original designation of the colonists transported from AVA into Samaria by Shalmaneser (2 Kings xvii, 31). They were idolaters, worshipping gods called Nibhaz and Tartak. See AVA.

A'vith (Heb. Ἀβὶθ, אֲבִיִּית, vivius; Sept. Ἐβῆαιμ, Vulg. Avith), a city of the Edomites, and the native place (capital) of one of their kings, Hadad ben-Bedad, before there were kings in Israel (Gen. xxxvi, 35; 1 Chron. i, 46, where the Heb. text has אֲבִיִּית, Ayoth', Sept. Ἐβῆαιμ, v. r. Ἐβῆαιμ, Ἐβῆθ, Vulg. Avith). It would seem to have been situated at the north-eastern extremity of the range of Mount Seir, as the king is stated to have thence made a hostile incursion into the territory of his Moabish neighbors who were leagued with the Midianites. The name may be compared with el-Ghoceithich, a "chain of low hills" mentioned by Burckhardt (p. 375) as lying to the east of the district of Kerek in Moab (Knobel, Genesis, p. 257).

Avitus (properly Sextus Albinus Avitus, or Edictus, Avitus), bishop of Vienne, was born at Vienne about the middle of the fifth century. At a religious disputation between the orthodox and Arian theologians in 499, he was the leading spokesman of the orthodox, and gained the confidence of king Gondobaud of Burgundy, whose son and successor, Sigismund, he converted from Arianism (after Gondobaud's death). He vigorously attacked the Arian heresy, both by writing and speaking, and presided at the council of Epaoine in 517. He died, according to the commonly received opinion, February 5th, 525, although other accounts assign an earlier date. He was a man of great learning, and there are still extant a number of his letters, homilies, and poems, which may be found in Bib. Max. Patr., ix, 560; and in Bib. Patr. Galland, t. x.—Dupin, Hist. Eccl. Writers, v, 4.

Avoidance, in the Church of England, takes place where a benefice becomes void of an incumbent. This happens either by the death of the incumbent, or by his being appointed to a preferment of such a kind as necessarily makes the living vacant; as when a clergyman is made a bishop all the preferments he holds fall to the crown, who is the patron for that time, unless there be some special dispensation; or, finally, by cession, deprivation, or resignation. In the first-named instance, which is avoidance by fact, the patron must take notice of the avoidance at his peril; in the last case, which is avoidance by law, the ordinary must give notice to the patron to prevent a lapse.

Avrillon, JOHN BAPTISTE ELIAS, a Franciscan (Minim), born at Paris, 1652; he made profession, January 3d, 1671, in the convent of the Minims (called Bons-hommes) at Nigeon. He began his career as a preacher in 1676, and continued until 1728, i. e. for fifty-three years, and died at Paris, May 16th, 1729, aged seventy-eight. He was much sought after as a preacher, and left many devotional works, which are highly esteemed in the Roman Church. The following have been translated by the Romanizing party of the Church of England: "Conduite pour passer saintement le temps de l'Avent," Guide for passing Advent holily, with preface by Dr. Pusey (Lond. 1814, 12mo); "Conduite pour passer saintement le Carême," Guide for passing Lent holily, ed. by Pusey (Lond. 1814, 12mo); "L'Année Affective," The Year of Affections, ed. by Pusey (Lond. 1845, 12mo); Eucharistic Meditations, ed. by Shipley (Lond. 1862, 12mo).

Awakening, (1) is used with regard to individuals, and designates the first work of the Spirit in conversion, i. e. conviction; (2) it is also applied to revivals of religion, in which multitudes of sinners are awakened. The state of sin is in the New Testament represented as a sort of sleep or death; Eph. 5, 14, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." When man, then, is brought to a consciousness of his sins, and to feel sorrow and contrition on account of them, and these are followed by a desire for the forgiving and renewing grace of God, and partly for improvement, the process is called awakening. The expression is not found in the New Testament, although the thing itself is largely explained therein. The prodigal son was awakened by his self-inflicted poverty, Peter by the correcting look of the Lord, Paul by the miraculous apparition of Christ, Judas by the consequences of his betrayal, and many by the preaching of Jesus or by his miracles. Awakening takes place when the sinner, who before did either not know the truth, or else treated it lightly, becomes strongly impressed with it, and gives up his heart and mind to it. Comp. Acts ii, 36, 37: "Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified both Lord and Christ. Now when they heard this they were pricked in their heart, and said unto Peter and to the rest of the apostles, Men and brethren, what shall we do?" (Comp. also ii, 43; iv, 4; v, 11; xi, 23, 24.) One of the principal aims of the preacher in presenting the word of God and of the church in the exercises of divine worship is to produce the awakening of sinners.

As, according to the doctrine of the New Testament, all possible agencies of deliverance and of moral improvement in humanity are to be ascribed to the Holy Spirit, the church holds, and rightly, that the operation of the Holy Spirit is united with the word of Christian truth, and also with visible religious exercises, in the awakening of sinners. It is also right in considering the word as the messenger or the medium of the Holy Spirit. Awakening may also result from external changes and events in life, by which truth, previously received into the heart and mind of the sinner, after lying apparently dead, is rendered active, as if awakened from slumber, so that the sinner himself awakes from the sleep or death of sin. Among the outward causes often producing awakening are sickness, either our own or others, particularly such as is the result of sin; the death of those we love, or sometimes of those who have fallen victims to their sins or to those of others, or perhaps have ended their life by suicide; or the death of such as were associated with us in our sinful career, also shame and contumely or a fall into gross sin, either by ourselves or others, which discloses to us the bottomless nature of sin; deliverance out of danger, or, on the other hand, undesired blessings. Intercourse with pious and good persons, or sometimes of the bad, may lead to awakening. Sometimes the Spirit uses the memories of youth and of its inexplicable feelings and of confused impulses, sometimes solitary meditation; sometimes the contemplation of nature; the reading of biographies, the study of works of art, as means of awakening. Both good and evil can be made awakening in the life of man, thus Rom. ii, 4: "Or despisest thou the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and long-suffering; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?" xi, 22: "Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness; otherwise thou also shalt be cut off;" 1 Cor. x, 6, 11: "Now these things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things, as they also lusted. Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come."

The effects produced by an awakening cause differ widely, both for objective and subjective reasons. In more quiet and tranquil natures, its effect may be slow and gentle; in the more vigorous ones it is more forcible, and often sudden. But the weaker natures are, on the other hand, more easily awakened than stronger ones, while the latter, though requiring a stronger impulse, are more likely to be lastingly impressed. Where moral self-consciousness, or conscience, is yet awake, the feeblest awakening can act effectually; but where conscience has become benumbed and dormant, a more powerful impression is required. It is evident, besides, that the result will be influenced by a variety of other causes, such as the more or less enlightened state of the subject, the energy of the impulses, the relations of life, either favorable or unfavorable to the development of moral sense, etc. Of course, to produce saving effects, the impression must be lasting, i. e. it must not merely lead to a resolve to amendment, but must work it out also. This, however, is not the work of a moment, but of a whole lifetime, through which the awakening must steadfastly and unceasingly act. The sinner must do all in his power to apply the preventer grace, which is the source of the awakening, to the redemption of his soul; for without the sinner's own co-operation, the work of sanctification will not be accomplished. In order, then, to render the effect of awakening persistent, it is necessary to keep the memory of it continually in the soul, and to connect with it all that follows. We see, therefore, how great an obstacle is frivolity, which never looks back, but only considers the present or the future; and for that reason the sanguine temperament, while more readily awakened for a moment, is more difficult to impress lastingly, choleric natures are touched easily and deeply, the melancholy lastingly, and the phlegmatic with difficulty. The strength of the awakening is measured by the inward pains of penitence, but cannot be estimated by the outward tears or demonstrations, partly on account of difference in temperaments. Sanguine and choleric subjects will be more demonstrative than phlegmatic or melancholic while under the same force of awakening. —Krehl, N. T. Handwörterbuch, s. v. See also CONVICTION; REVIVAL.

Awl (𐎠𐎡𐎢𐎣, perforator, Sept. ἐπιήριον), an instrument for boring a small hole (Exod. xxi, 6; Deut. xv, 17). Considering that the Israelites had recently withdrawn from their long sojourn in Egypt, there can be no doubt that the instruments were the same as those of that country, used by the sandal-makers and other workers in leather (Wilkinson, ii, 105). In the above passages the word is employed in reference to piercing the ear as a sign of perpetual servitude, which it seems was a custom among other Oriental nations (Petronius, Satyr. 102), and it was the practice in Lydia, India, and Persia to perforate the ears of boys dedicated to the service of the gods (Xen. Anab. iii, 1, 31; Plutarch, Sympos. ii, 1, 9). See SERVANT.

Ancient Egyptian Awls.

Axe. Several instruments of this description are so discriminated in Scripture as to show that the Hebrews had them of different forms and for various uses. (1.) 𐎠𐎡𐎢𐎣, garzal (so called from chopping), which occurs in Deut. xix, 5; xx, 19; 1 Kings vi, 7; Isa. x, 15; āzīq. Matt. iii, 10; Luke iii, 9; corresponding to the Lat. scuris). From these passages it appears that this kind was employed in felling trees (comp. Isa. x, 31), and in hewing large timber for building. The conjecture of Gesenius, that in 1 Kings v, 7, it denotes the axe of a stone-mason, is by no means conclusive. The first text supposes a case of the head slipping from the helve in felling a tree (comp. 2 Kings vi, 5). This would suggest that it was shaped like fig. 3, which is just the same instrument as our common hatchet, and appears to have been applied by the ancient Egyptians to the same general use as with us. The reader will observe the contrivance in all the others (wanting in this) of fastening the head to the haft by thongs. (2.) 𐎠𐎡𐎢𐎣, maṣṣal (a hewing instrument), which occurs only in Isa. xlv, 12 (where it is rendered "tongs") and Jer. x, 3. From the latter of these passages it appears to have been a lighter instrument than the preceding, or a kind of adze, used for fashioning or carving wood into shape; it was probably, therefore, like figs. 4 to 7, which the Egyptians employed for this purpose. Other texts of Scripture represent such implements as being employed in carving images, the use to which the prophets refer. The differences of form and size, as indicated in the figures, appear to have been determined with reference to light or heavy work. The passage in Isaiah, however, as it refers to the blacksmith's operations at the forge, may possibly designate some kind of chisel. (3.) כַּרְדֹּם, kir-dom' (from its sharpness); this is the commonest name for an axe or hatchet. It is of this which we read in Judg. ix, 48; Psa. lxxiv, 5; 1 Sam. xiii, 20, 21; Jer. xlv, 22. It appears to have been more exclusively employed than the qarzen for felling trees, and had therefore probably a heavier head. In one of the Egyptian sculptures the inhabitants of Lebanon are represented as felling pine-trees with axes like fig. 1. See LEBANON. As the one used by the Egyptians for the same purpose was also of this shape, there is little doubt that it was also in use among the Hebrews. (4.) The term חֶרֶב, che'rob (destroyer), usually "a sword," is used of other cutting instruments, as a "knife" (Josh. v, 2), or razor (Ezek. vi, 1), or a tool for hewing or dressing stones (Exod. xx, 25), and is once rendered "axe" (Ezek. xxvi, 9), and there may probably mean a heavy cutlass, like fig. 2, or perhaps battle-axe, or possibly even pick-axe, as it is there used to denote a weapon for destroying buildings. (5.) A similar instrument, קֶשֶׁתֵּי, kesh-shil' (fell-er), is once spoken of (Psa. lxxiv, 6) as a battle-axe. It also occurs in the Targum (Jer. xlv, 22) in the sense of broad-axe. (6.) Iron implements of severe labor, מַגְרָה, mag-rah' ("axe," 2 Sam. xii, 31), and מַגְרָה, mag-rah' ("axe," 2 Chron. xx, 3; also in the same verse more properly "saw," and in 2 Sam. xii, 31; 1 Kings vii, 9), were used by David in the massacre of the inhabitants of Rabbah, but their form cannot be made out. See SAW. (7.) The word בַּרְזֵל, barzel, rendered "axe-head" in 2 Kings vi, 5, is literally "iron;" but, as an axe is certainly intended, the passage is valuable as showing that the axe-heads among the Hebrews were of iron. Those which have been found in Egypt are of bronze, which was very anciently and generally used for the purpose. But this does not prove that they had none of iron; it seems rather to suggest that those of iron have been consumed by the corrosion of three thousand years, while those of bronze have been preserved. See HELVE. (8.) The "battle-axe," מַפְּטֵי, mappets' (Jer. li, 20), was probably, as its root indicates, a heavy mace or maul, like that which gave his surname to Charles Martel. See BATTLE-AXE.

Ancient Assyrian Axe-head. From the British Museum.

The most common use of the axe, as is well known, is to cut down trees; hence the expression in Matt. iii, 10, and Luke iii, 9, "the axe is laid at the root of the trees" (comp. Silius Italicus, 10; also Virgil, En. vi, 180; Isa. x, 33). That trees are a general symbol of men is well known. See FOREST; TREE. (See also Ezek. xxxi, 3; Dan. iv, 7, 8; Matt. vii, 19; xii, 33; Psa. i, 3; Zech. xi, 1, 2). What John Baptist therefore refers to is probably the excision of the Jewish nation. But there is a force in the preposition used here which escapes the ordinary reader: the expression πρὸς τὴν βίζαν τῶν ἑβραίων κείτων, denotes that it had already been struck into the tree preparatory to felling it, and now only awaited the signal for the utter vengeance of Heaven. The axe was also used as the instrument of decollation, to which there is allusion in Rev. xx, 4, "The souls of them that were beheaded for the testimony of Jesus," literally, "cut with an axe." Hence the axe becomes a symbol of the divine judgments. Sometimes it is applied to a human instrument, as in Isa. x, 15, "Shall the axe boast itself against him that heweth therewith?" i. e. Shall the proud king of Assyria boast himself against God, whose instrument he is to execute his purpose? In Jer. li, 20, the army of the Medes and Persians is most probably intended, as elsewhere the instrument of God's vengeance is called a sword, a rod, a scourge (see also Jer. xlv, 22). By axes, which were a part of the insignia of the Roman magistracy, was denoted the power of life and death and of supreme judgment. Axes were also used in war (Sidonius, Carm. El. v, 247; Horace, Ode iv, 4; Carm. Secul. 54; Virgil, En. ii, 480). Axes were used in sacrifice; hence called the axe of the Hierophant. These are seen on various coins (Smith's Hist. of Class. Ant. s. v. Securis).

Axtell, HENRY, D.D., was born at Mendham, N. J., June 9, 1773, and graduated at Princeton in 1796. After teaching several years in New Jersey, he removed in 1804 to Geneva, N. Y., where he kept a classical school. In 1810 he was licensed, and in 1812 called to the Presbyterian Church in Geneva. At the time of his ordination in 1812, his church consisted of 70 members; at the time of his death of about 400. In two revivals his labors had been particularly blessed. He died Feb. 11, 1829. His eldest daughter died a few days after him, and was placed in the same grave.—Sprague, Annals, iv, 454.

Ayliffe, JOHN, D.D., fellow of New College, Oxford; degraded and expelled for the publication of a work said to contain scandalous aspersions, entitled "The Ancient and Present State of the University of Oxford" (2 vols. 8vo, 1714), taken, in fact, chiefly from Wood's Athenæ. He also published Parergon Juris Canonici Anglicani, 1726, and a "New Pandect of the Roman Civil Law" (Lond. 1734, fol.), one of the most elaborate works in English on the civil law.—*New Gen. Aylmer, JOHN, bishop of London, born in 1521, of a good family, in Norfolk. He studied at Oxford and Cambridge, but chiefly at the latter; and after leaving the universities was appointed tutor to the celebrated Lady Jane Grey. In 1553 he was made archdeacon of Stow, but on the accession of Queen Mary was obliged to leave England, and retired to Zurich. In 1562 he became archdeacon of Lincoln, and in 1576 succeeded Sandys in the see of London. He seems to have been as vigorously opposed to the Puritans as to the Romanists; and unhappily, amid many excellencies of character, he had a persecuting spirit. On more than one occasion his severity was rebuked by the privy council. In the case of a clergyman named Benison, who was imprisoned by Aylmer for a supposed irregularity in regard to his marriage, the bishop was desired by the privy council to make him compensation, lest in an action for false imprisonment he should recover damages "which would touch his lordship's credit." By the Puritans Aylmer was ridiculed in pamphlets, scandalous reports were actively circulated to his injury, and frequent complaints of his conduct were made to the privy council. Aylmer would gladly have exchanged into a more retired diocese, but none of his plans for this purpose succeeded; and he was still bishop of London when he died on June 3d, 1591. See Maitland, Essays on the Reformation; Neal, Hist. of Puritans, i, 224, 365, etc.

Aylworth, JAMES P., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and one of the fathers of the Oneida Conference, was born in 1783. He entered the ministry in 1822, serving chiefly in Central New York, until his superannuation in 1847. He died in 1848.—Minutes of Conferences.

Aymon, JOHN, a French writer, lived at the close of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th century. He was at first a Catholic priest, then left the Roman Catholic Church at Geneva, and married at the Hague. He again returned to the Church of Rome, and in 1706 was put by the Cardinal de Noailles in the Seminary of Foreign Missions. In 1707 he fled to Holland with a manuscript (the original of the Acts of the Council held at Jerusalem in 1672 and 1673), and had it printed at the Hague under the title Monuments Authentiques de l'Eglise Grecque (1708, 4to), reproduced under the title Lettres Anecdotes de Cyril Lucar (Amsterdam, 1708). Aymon was judiciously pursued by Clement, the librarian of the French king, and in 1709 the States-General ordered the restoration of the manuscript. Aymon wrote also Actes Ecclesiastiques et civils de tous les Synodes Nationaux des Eglises Réformées de la France (Rotterdam, 1710, 4to), and several works on the Roman Catholic Church.—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, iii, 900.

A'zaël (אַזַּאֵל), the father of Jonathan, which latter was one of those who superintended the repudiation of the Gentile wives after the return from Babylon (1 Esdr. ix, 14); evidently the ASAHEL (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra x, 15).

Azaë'lus (Ἀζαῖλος), one of the Israelites, "sons of Maani," who is said to have divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (1 Esdr. ix, 34); but the name is apparently an erroneous repetition for the Esrl just preceding it (Azarel of Ezra x, 41). See AZAËL.

A'zal (Heb. Azal', אָזַל, prob. the same as Azal, in pause; Sept. Ἀσαιλ v. r. Ἰασόσ), apparently a place near Jerusalem on the east, mentioned only in Zech. xiv, 5, as the limit to which the "ravine" or cleft (אֶרֶץ) of the Mount of Olives will extend when "Jehovah shall go forth to fight." Henderson (Comment. in loc.) regards it as the proper name of a place close to one of the gates on the east side of Jerusalem, to which the cleft or valley was to extend westward, so as at once to admit those who should flee from the enemy; but this seems too strict a literalism for so figurative a prophecy. Fürst (Heb. Wörterb. s. v.) inclines to identify it with the Beth-zel of Mic. i, 11. Perhaps the conjecture of Gesenius (Thes. Heb. p. 144) is the most easy of adoption, that the term is simply an appellative for בֵּית, q. d. at the side, i. e. foot of the mountain, sc. Olivet. The supposition of Schwarz (Palest. p. 135) that it is the present village Azoria, or Bethany (according to him, the Huzal of the Talmud, Megillah, v, 6), evidently proceeds from his Jewish prejudices against the account respecting Lazarus in the Gospels. See ERGOL.

Azali'ah (Heb. in the prolonged form אַזַּלְיָהוּ, reversed by Jehorah; Sept. Ἐσάλια v. r. Ἐζάλια; in Chron. Ἐσλία v. r. Σελία), the son of Meshullam (2 Kings xxii, 3), and father of the scribe Shaphan, which last was sent with others by Josiah to repair the Temple (2 Chron. xxxiv, 8). B. C. ante 623.

Azani'ah (Heb. אַזַּנְיָהוּ, heard by Jehorah; Sept. Ἀζανία), the father of Joshua, which latter was one of the Levites that subscribed the sacred covenant after the exile (Neh. x, 9). B. C. ante 410.

Azaphion (Ἀσαπιων), given in 1 Esdr. v, 33, as the first named of the family heads of the "sons of Solomon's servants" that returned from Babylon; apparently meaning the SOPHERETH (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra ii, 55), where the Heb has the article, סֹפֶרֶת, has-Sophereth.

Az'ara (אַזָּרָא), one of the heads of the "temple servants," said to have returned from the exile (1 Esdr. v, 31); but the genuine text (Ezra ii, 49) has no such name at all.

Azar'ael (Neh. xii, 26). See AZAREL.

Aza'reël (Heb. Azarel', אַזְרַעֵל, helped by God), the name of five men.

1. (Sept. Οζαρίλ v. r. ΕΑρίλ.) One of the Benjamite slingers and archers that repaired to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii, 6). B.C. 1054.

2. (Sept. Εζαρίλ v. r. Ασραρίλ.) The head of the eleventh division of the musicians in the Temple, consisting of himself and eleven others of his family (1 Chron. xxv, 18; called UZZIAH in ver. 4). B.C. 1014.

3. (Sept. Εζαρίλ v. r. Αζαρίλ.) Son of Jeroham, and viceroy over the tribe of Dan under David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii, 22). B.C. 1014.

4. (Sept. Εζαρίλ.) An Israelite, one of the descendants of Bani, who renounced the Gentile wife whom he had married on the return from Babylon (Ezra x, 41). B.C. 459.

5. (Sept. Εσραήλ v. r. Εσραήλ, Οζαρίλ.) Son of Alasai and father of Amashai, which last was one of the chiefs of the 128 mighty men of the priests who served at the Temple under the supervision of Zabdai, on the restoration from Babylon (Neh. xi, 13). B.C. cir. 440. He is probably the same with one of the first company of priests who were appointed with Ezra to make the circuit of the newly completed walls with trumpets in their hands (Neh. xii, 36, where the name is Anglicized "Azarael"). B.C. 446.

Azari'ah (Heb. Azaryah', אַזְרַיָּה, helped by Jehovah, answering to the German name Gothelf), also in the prolonged form Azaryahu, אַזְרַיָּהוּ, 1 Kings iv, 2, 5; 2 Kings xv, 6, 8; 2 Chron. xv, 1; xxi, 2; xxii, 6; xxiii, 1; xxvi, 17, 20; xxviii, 12; xxix, 12; xxxi, 10, 13; Sept. Αζαρία and Αζαρία, a very common name among the Hebrews, and hence borne by a considerable number of persons mentioned in Scripture, especially in the families of the priests of the line of Ehazar, whose name has precisely the same meaning as Azari'ah. It is nearly identical and is often confounded with Ezra, as well as with Zerariah and Seraiah. See also AZARIAS.

1. Apparently the only son of Ethan, the grandson of Judah (1 Chron. ii, 8). B.C. 1856.

2. A son of Jehu and father of Helez, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii, 38, 39). B.C. post 1046.

3. A person named as son of the high-priest Zadok, and an officer in the cabinet of Solomon (1 Kings iv, 2). B.C. cir. 1000. He is perhaps the same, however, with No 6 below.

4. A son of Nathan and captain of King Solomon's guards (1 Kings iv, 5). B.C. cir. 1000.

5. A prophet who met King Asa on his return from a great victory over the Cushite king Zerah (2 Chron xv, 1, where he is called the son of Oded, but Oded simply in ver. 8). See ASA. B.C. 939. He powerfully stirred up the spirit of Asa, and of the people of Judah and Benjamin, in a brief but pithy prophecy, which has been preserved, to put away all idolatrous worship, and to restore the altar of the one true God before the porch of the Temple. Great numbers of Israelites from Ephraim, and Manasseh, and Simeon, and all Israel, joined in the national reformation, to the great strengthening of the kingdom; and a season of rest and great prosperity ensued.—Smith, s. v.

6. A high-priest, son of Ahimaz and father (grandfather) of Johanan (1 Chron. vi, 9), perhaps the father of Amariah, who lived under Jehoshaphat, king of Judah (2 Chron. xix, 11). B.C. ante 912. See HIGH-PRIEST.

7. One of the sons of king Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xxi, 2, where the name is repeated, as if he had two sons of this name). B.C. post 912.

8. Otherwise called AMAZIAH (q. v.), king of Judah (2 Chron. xxii, 6).

9. A son of Jeroham, who joined Jehoiada in his pious efforts to restore the worship of the Temple, and put down the usurpation of Athaliah (2 Chron. xxiii, 1). B.C. 877.

10. A son of Obed, another "captain of a hundred," who joined Jehoiada in the same enterprise (2 Chron. xxiii, 1). B.C. 877.

11. A person named as son of Johanan and father of another Amariah, a high-priest (1 Chron. vi, 10, 11), whom some suppose the same as ZEPHANIAH, son of Jehoiada, who was killed in the reign of Joash of Judah (2 Chron. xxiv, 20-22). In Ezra vii, 3, either his or a former person's father is called Mesaroth. B.C. cir. 809. See HIGH-PRIEST. From the date he appears to be the same with the high-priest who opposed King Uziah (q. v.) in offering incense to Jehovah (2 Chron. xxvi, 17, 20). B.C. 781.

12. Otherwise called UZZIAH (q. v.), king of Judah, (2 Kings xiv, 21; xv, 1, 6, 7, 8, 17, 23, 27; 1 Chron. iii, 12, etc.).

13. A son of Johanan and chief of the tribe of Ephraim, one of those that protested against enslaving their captive brethren of Jerusalem during the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii, 12). B.C. 739.

14. A Levite, son of Zephaniah and father of Joel (1 Chron. vi, 36). In ver. 24 he is called UZZIAH, the son of Uriel and father of Shaul. It appears from 2 Chron. xxix, 12, that his son Joel lived under Hezekiah. B.C. ante 726.

15. A high-priest in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi, 10, 13). B.C. 726. He seems to be the same incorrectly called AMITH in 1 Chron. vi, 11, 12. He appears to have co-operated zealously with the king in that thorough purification of the Temple and restoration of the Temple services which was so conspicuous an event in Hezekiah's reign. He especially interested himself in providing chambers in the house of the Lord in which to stow the tithes, and offerings, and consecrated things for the use of the priests and Levites, and in appointing overseers to have the charge of them. As the attendance of priests and Levites and the maintenance of the Temple services depended entirely upon the supply of such offerings, whenever the people neglected them the priests and Levites were forced to disperse themselves to their villages, and so the house of God was deserted (comp. Neh. x, 35-39; xii, 27-30, 44-47).—Smith, s. v.

16. The son of Hilkiah and father of Seraiah, which latter was the last high-priest before the captivity (1 Chron. vi, 13, 14; ix, 11; Ezra vii, 1, 3). B.C. cir. 600.

17. One of the "proud men" who rebuked Jeremiah for advising the people that remained in Palestine after the expatriation to Babylon not to retire into Egypt, and who took the prophet himself and Baruch along with them to that country (Jer. xliii, 2-7). B.C. 587.

18. The Hebrew name of ABEDNEGO (q. v.), one of Daniel's three friends who were cast into the fiery furnace (Dan. i, 7; iii, 9). He appears to have been of the royal lineage of Judah, and for this reason selected, with Daniel and his two other companions, for Nebuchadnezzar's especial service. The three children, as they were called, were remarkable for their beauty, and wisdom, and knowledge, and intelligence. They were no less remarkable for their piety, their strict adherence to the law of Moses, and the steadfastness of their faith, even in the face of death, and their wonderful deliverance. B.C. 603. See DANIEL.

19. One of the nobles who returned from Babylon (Neh. vii, 7; xii, 33), and joined in the oath of fidelity to the law (x, 2), and assisted in interpreting it to the people (viii, 7). His father's name was Maaseiah, and he repaired that part of the wall of Jerusalem opposite his house (iii, 23, 24). In Ezra ii, 2, he is called SERAJAH. B.C. 446-410.

Azari'as (Αζαρία, the Greek form of Azari'ah), the name of several men in the Apocrypha.

1. The last named of the "sons" of Emmen (rather Harim) among the priests who promised to renounce their Gentile wives after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 21); evidently the UZZIAH (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra x, 21).

2. One of the nobles stated to have supported Ezra on the right while reading the law to the people (1 Esdr. ix, 43) but the genuine list (Neh. viii, 4) does not contain this name.

3. One of the priests who expounded the law on the same occasion (1 Esdr. ix, 48); the AZARIAH (q. v.) of the Heb. text (Neh. viii, 7).

4. The son of Helchias and father of Seraias in the genealogy of Ezra (2 [Vulg. 4] Esdr. i, 1); the AZARIAH (q. v.) of the Heb. lineage (Ezra vii, 1).

5. A name assumed by the angel Raphael (Tobit vi, 12; vi, 6, 13; vii, 8; ix, 2).

6. The name (Song of 3 Children, ver. 2, 26, 66) of Abednego, Daniel's companion in trial, i. e. AZARIAH (q. v.) of Dan. i, 7. He is mentioned by this Greek appellation also in 1 Macc. ii, 59, and by Josephus (Ant. x, 10, 1). See DANIEL, ADDITIONS TO.

7. One of the generals under Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc. v, 18); he was defeated by Gorgias near Jammia (1 Macc. v, 56, 60; Josephus, Ant. xii, 8, 2 and 6).

Δ'ζαζ (Heb. Azaz, אַזַּז, strong; Sept. Ἀζαζ v. r. Ὀζοῦζ), the son of Shema and father of Bela, a Reubenite (1 Chron. v, 8). B. C. apparently ante 747.

AZAZEL [so Milton] (Heb. Azazel, אַזַּזֶּל, a word of doubtful interpretation, occurring only in the ordinance of the festival of expiation (Lev. xvi, 8, 10, 26).

1. Some contend that it is the name itself of the goat sent into the desert. So Symmachus τὸ γῶς ἀποσφόμενος, Aquila τὸ γῶς ἀπολελυμένον, Vulgate hircus emissarius; but not the Septuagint (for τὸ ἄποσπομαίον, in ver. 8, is by no means to be explained, with Theodoret and Cyril, by τὸ ἀποσπομαίον), nor the Mishna (for the expression אַזַּזֶּל הָיָה לְעֹזֵז, hircus emissus, of Yoma, iv, 2; vi, 1, 2, is only added as a gloss on account of the occurrence of אַזַּזֶּל in the Heb. text). It should also be observed that in the latter clause of Lev. xvi, 10, the Sept. renders the Hebrew term as if it was an abstract noun, translating אַזַּזֶּלֶת by εἰς τὴν ἀποσπομήν. Buxtorf (Heb. Lex.) and Egius (Critici Sacri in loc.), in accordance with this view of its meaning, derived the word from אַזַּז, a goat, and אַזַּל, to depart. To this derivation it has been objected by Bochart, Winer, and others, that אַזַּז denotes a she-goat. It is, however, alleged that the word appears to be epichene in Gen. xxx, 33, Lev. iii, 12, etc.

But the application of אַזַּזֶּלֶת to the goat itself involves the Hebrew text in insuperable difficulties. In ver. 10, 26, the azazel clearly seems to be distinguished as that for or to which the goat is let loose. It can hardly be supposed that the prefix which is common to the designation of the two lots should be used in two different meanings, if both objects were beings.

2. Some have taken Azazel for the name of the place to which the goat was sent. (1) Aben-Ezra quotes the words of an anonymous writer referring it to a hill near Mount Sinai. Vatablus adopts this opinion (Critici Sacri, in Lev. xvi). (2) Some of the Jewish writers, with Le Clerc, consider that it denotes the cliff to which the goat was taken to be thrown down. So Pseudo-Jonathan, Saadiah, Arabs Erenii and Jarchi, interpret a hard or difficult place (comp. Mishna, Yoma, vi, 6). (3) Bochart (Hieroz. i, 749 sq.) regarded the word as a "pluralis fractus" signifying desert places, and understood it as a general name for any fit place to which the goat might be sent. This has the approbation of Hackmann (Procid. Sacr. i, 232-275). But Gesenius remarks that the "pluralis fractus," which exists in Arabic, is not found in Hebrew. Moreover, on this interpretation the context (ver. 10) would contain a palpable tautology, for the goat was to be sent to Azazel in the wilderness. Moreover, no such place as Azazel is elsewhere mentioned; and had it been a mountain, אַזַּז would not have been omitted.

3. Many of those who have studied the subject very closely take Azazel for a personal being to whom the goat was sent. (1) Gesenius gives to אַזַּזֶּלֶת the same meaning as the Sept. has assigned to it, if ἀποσπομαίον is to be taken in its usual sense; but the being so designated he supposes to be some false deity who was to be appeased by such a sacrifice as that of the goat. He derives the word from a root unused in Hebrew, but found in Arabic, אַזַּז, to remove or take away (Heb. Lex. s. v.). Ewald agrees with Gesenius, and speaks of Azazel as a demon belonging to the pre-Mosaic religion. (2) But others, with scarcely less superstition, have regarded him as an evil spirit, or the devil himself. So, among the rabbins, Menhem, who mentions the four arch-demons Samael, Azazel, Azazel, and Haclazel. In Pirke Etesar, c. 46, it is stated that Azazel, for the propitiation of which the goat was let loose, is the same demon with Samael (compare Eisenmenger, Entd. Judenth. ii, 157; Zohar, ad Gen. ii, in Castell, Opp. Posth. p. 309). In the apocryphal book of Enoch, Azazel (not Azazel) is among the chief of the spirits by whose doctrine and influence the earth was corrupted (viii, 1; x, 12; xiii, 1 sq.; xv, 9); and among the Greek writers the same name (Azazel, Ἀζαζήλ) occurs (Fabric. Cod. pseudepigr. i, 18, 183; sometimes Azöl, Ἀζαίλ), but this by confusion for another demon, Asael; and in Syrian authors (Cod. Nasar. i, 240) it is the name of an evil spirit otherwise called Barbut. The same title (Ἀζαζήλ) among the Gnostics signified either Satan or some other demon (Epiph. Herz. 34); on which account Origen (contra Cel. vi, p. 305, ed. Spenc.) did not hesitate, in the passage of Leviticus in question, to understand the devil as meant. From the Jews and Christians, the word passed over to the Arabians (see Roland, De Rel. Mohammed. p. 189); and so, in later magical treatises, Azazel and Azael are reckoned among the genii that preside over the elements. Among moderns this view has been copiously illustrated by Spencer (De Legibus Hebraeorum ritualibus, iii, diss. 8, p. 1039-1085), and has been assented to by Rosenmüller (ad Lev. in loc.), Ammon (Bibl. Theol. i, 360), Von Cohn (Bibl. Theol. i, 199), Hengstenberg (Christol. i, i, 36). The following are the arguments used in its support: (a) The contrast of terms ("to the Lord," "to Azazel") in the text naturally presumes a person to be intended, in opposition to and contradistinction from Jehovah. (b) The desert, whither the consecrated goat of Azazel was sent away, was accounted the peculiar abode of demons (see Isa. xiii, 21; xxxiv, 13, 14; Baruch iv, 35; Tobit viii, 3; Matt. xii, 43; Rev. xviii, 2; Maimonid, Neveh. iii, 59). (c) This interpretation may be confirmed by the early derivation of the word, i. e. אַזַּזֶּלֶת, signifying either strength of God (comp. Gabriel), if referred to a once good but now fallen angel, or powerful against God, as applied to a malignant demon. Spencer derives the word from אַזַּז, fortis, and אַזַּל, explaining it as cito recedens, which he affirms to be a most suitable name for the evil spirit. He supposes that the goat was given up to the devil, and committed to his disposal. Hengstenberg affirms with great confidence that Azazel cannot possibly be any thing but another name for Satan. He repudiates the conclusion that the goat was in any sense a sacrifice to Satan, and does not doubt that it was sent away laden with the sins of God's people, now forgiven, in order to mock their spiritual enemy in the desert, his proper abode, and to symbolize by its free gambols their exulting triumph. He considers that the origin of the rite was Egyptian, and that the Jews substituted Satan for Typhon, whose dwelling was the desert.

On the other hand, this explanation is forbidden by the total absence in the O. Test. of any reference to evil geni; and it would be especially abhorrent to the spirit of the Mosaic economy to suppose a solemn offering of this kind to have been made out of deference to any of those demons the propitiation of which the law so explicitly condemns (Lev. xvii, 7; Deut. xxii, 17; comp. 2 Chron. xi, 15; Psa. cvi, 37). The obvious objection to Spencer's view is that the goat formed part of a sin-offering to the Lord. Few, perhaps, will be satisfied with Hengstenberg's mode of meeting this difficulty.

4. A better explanation of the word renders the designation of the lot זִזְיָאֵל , "for complete sending away" = solitude, desert, by reduplication from זִיז (the root adopted by Gesenius), being the Pealpal form, which indicates intensity (see Ewald, Kr. Gr. p. 242; comp. Lehgeb. p. 869), so as to signify total separation (Tholuck, Hebr. p. 80; Bähr, Symbolik d. Mos. Cultus, ii, 668), i. e. from sin, q. d. a bearer ab of guilt; a sense agreeable to the rendering of the Sept. ($\alpha\pi\omicron\tau\omicron\mu\alpha\tau\iota\varsigma$), as explained by Suidas, and as used by Polux, v, 26), the solution of Josephus (Ant. iii, 10, 3), and the explanation of other ancient writers (Cyrill, contra Julian. ix; comp. Suicer, Theaur. Eccles. i, 468). The only objection that has been offered to this interpretation is that it destroys the exact antithesis between Jehovah and Azazel, by making the latter a thing and not a person, like the former. But this assumes that it was the design of Moses, in expressing himself thus, to preserve an exact antithesis, which is by no means evident. If we render "the one for Jehovah and the other for an utter removal," a meaning sufficiently clear and good is obtained. See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

Azaz'ah (Heb. in the prolonged form Azazya'hu , זְזַזְיָאֵל , strengthened by Jehovah; Sept. $\text{O}^{\prime}\text{Zazac}$, but v. r. in 2 Chron. $\text{O}^{\prime}\text{Zazac}$), the name of three men.

1. One of the Levitical harpers in the Temple under David (1 Chron. xv, 21). B.C. cir. 1043.

2. The father of Hoshua, which latter was the victory over the Ephraimites under David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii, 20). B.C. ante 1014.

3. One of the inferior overseers of the Temple offerings under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi, 13). B.C. 726.

Azbaz'areth (Azbazareth v. r. Azbazareth , Vulg. Azbazareth), given (1 Esdr. v, 63) as the name of the Assyrian king who planted the Samaritan colonies in Palestine; evidently a corruption for ESARHADDOX (q. v.) in the true text (Ezra iv, 2).

Az'buk (Heb. Azbuk , זְזַזְיָאֵל , strong devastation; Sept. Azboak v. r. Azboak), the father of Nehemiah, which latter was ruler of the half of Beth-zur, and repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. iii, 16). B.C. ante 446.

Aze'lah (Heb. Azalah , זְזַזְיָאֵל , dug over; Sept. in Josh. xv, 35, Azala ; Jer. xxxiv, 7, Azala ; elsewhere Azala), a town in the plain of Judah (Josh. xv, 35; 1 Sam. xvii, 11). It had suburban villages (Neh. xi, 30), and was a place of considerable strength (Jer. xxxiv, 7). The confederated Amoritic kings of Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon, were here defeated and slain by Joshua, and their army totally destroyed by an extraordinary shower of hailstones from heaven (Josh. x, 10, 11). It is named with Adullam, Shaaraim, and other places known to have been in that locality (Josh. xv, 35; 2 Chron. xi, 9; Neh. xi, 30), but is most clearly defined as being near Shochoh (that is, the northern one) [see SNOCHON] (1 Sam. xvii, 1). Joshua's pursuit of the Canaanites after the battle of Beth-horon extended to Azekah (Josh. x, 10, 11). Between Azekah and Shochoh, an easy step out of their own territory, the Philistines encamped before the battle in which Goliath was killed (1 Sam. xvii, 1). It was among the cities fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi, 9), was still standing at the time of the invasion of the kings of Babylon (Jer. xxxiv, 7), and is mentioned as one of the places re-occupied by the Jews after their return from captivity (Neh. xi, 30). Eusebius and Jerome state (Onomast. s. v.) that there was in their time a town in this quarter called Ezeca, situated between Jerusalem and Eleutheropolis, which was probably the same as that mentioned by Joshua (see Iceland, Palæst. p. 603). According to Schwarz (Palæst. p. 102), it is represented by the modern village Tell Ezakariv, three miles east of Saphia or Alba Specula; but this appears rather to be from the name Zechariah (Tell Zachariya, Robinson's Researches, ii, 343). The notices would correspond better to the present Zaokka, marked on Zimmermann's Map a little to the north-east of Beit-Jibrin (Eleutheropolis); but that is in the hill country, beyond the Jerusalem road, which was the boundary of the group in Josh. xv, 35. See TRIBE. Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 291) seems to have fixed its site as that of a village on a high hill-top called Abek, about 1½ miles N. of Daman, and between 4 and 5 miles E.N.E. of Shuweikh (Robinson, Researches, ii, 342 note).

A'zel (Heb. Atsel , זְזַזְיָאֵל , noble; Sept. $\text{E}^{\prime}\text{asil}$), the son of Eleasah, of the descendants of king Saul, and father of six sons (1 Chron. viii, 37, 38; ix, 43, 44). B.C. considerably post 1037. See AZAL.

A'zem (Heb. E'zsem , זְזַזְיָאֵל , a bone, in pause A'zsem , זְזַזְיָאֵל ; Sept. $\text{A}^{\prime}\text{zim}$ v. r. $\text{A}^{\prime}\text{sim}$, $\text{I}^{\prime}\text{asim}$), a city in the tribe of Simeon, originally included within the southern territory of Judah, in the neighborhood of Balah (or Billah) and Etlolad (or Tolad) (Josh. xv, 29; xix, 3; 1 Chron. iv, 29, in which last passage it is Anglicized "Ezem," Sept. Boasim v. r. $\text{A}^{\prime}\text{sim}$). These notices afford only a slight ground for a conjectural location, perhaps in the great plain at the south-west extremity of the tribe, possibly at the ruins on Tell Akhmar (Van de Velde, Map).

Azephu'rith (Azephurith , Vulg. omits), given (1 Esdr. v, 16) as the name of a man whose descendants (or a place whose inhabitants), to the number of 102, returned from the captivity; but the original lists have the name JORAH (Ezra ii, 18) or HANANI (Neh. vii, 24), and the number 112.

Aze'tas (Azetas v. r. Azetas), given (1 Esdr. v, 15), in connection with Ceilan, as the name of another man whose descendants (or place whose inhabitants), to the number of 67, returned from the captivity; but the genuine lists (Ezra ii, 16; Neh. vii, 21) have no corresponding names.

Az'gad (Heb. Azgad , זְזַזְיָאֵל , strong in fortune; Sept. Azgad , Azgad), the head of one of the families of the Israelites whose descendants, to the number of 1222 persons, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 12; Neh. vii, 17), and 111 males afterward with Ezra (Ezra viii, 12; Neh. x, 15). B.C. ante 536.

Azi'a (Azai), one of the "temple servants" whose sons returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 31); evidently the UZZA (q. v.) of the genuine texts (Ezra ii, 49; Neh. vii, 51).

Azi'e'i (Lat. id., for the Greek text is lost), the son of Marimoth and father of Amarias, in the genealogy of Ezra (2 [Vulg. 4] Esdr. i, 1); evidently the AZARI-AU (q. v.) of the Heb. list (Ezra vii, 3).

A'ziel (Heb. Az'el , זְזַזְיָאֵל , Sept. $\text{O}^{\prime}\text{Zail}$), prob. a contracted form (1 Chron. xv, 20) of the name JAAZIEL (q. v.) in the same chapter (ver. 18).

Azi'za (Heb. Aziz'z, אֲזִיזָא, strong; Sept. Ὀζίζά), an Israelite, one of the descendants of Zattu, who divorced the foreign wife that he had married on the return from Babylon (Ezra x, 27). B.C. 459.

Azizus (Ἀζίζος), a king of Emesa, who embraced Judaism in order to marry Drusilla; but she afterwards deserted him for Felix (Josephus, Ant. xx, 7, 1, 2). He died in the first year of Nero (A.D. 54), and was succeeded by his brother Soemus (Joseph. ib. 8, 4).

Az'maveth (Heb. Azma'veth, אֲזַמָּוֶת, perhaps strong as death; Sept. Ἀζμῶθ and Ἀζμῶθ), the name of three men, and also of a place.

1. A Barhumite (or Baharumite), one of David's thirty warriors (2 Sam. xxiii, 31; 1 Chron. xi, 33), and father of two of his famous slingers (1 Chron. xii, 8), B.C. 1061.

2. The second named of the three sons of Jehoahab (1 Chron. viii, 36) or Jarah (ix, 42), a descendant of Jonathan. B.C. post 1037.

3. A son of Adiel, and overseer of the royal treasury under David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii, 15), B.C. 1014.

4. A village of Judah or Benjamin, and mentioned in connection with Geba (Neh. xii, 29). Forty-two persons residents of this place were enrolled in the list of those that returned from the captivity at Babylon (Ezra ii, 24; Neh. vii, 28; in which latter passage the place is called ΒΕΤΗ-ΑΖΜΑΒΕΤΗ). The corresponding Arabic name Azmūt is still found in Palestine, but not in a location corresponding to the one in question (Robinson's Researches, iii, 102; De Sauley's Narrative, i, 91). Schwarz (Paläst. p. 129) conjectures that the name of this place may have been derived from that of the Benjamite preceding; but he confounds it with Alemeth, Almon, and even Bahurim. The notices seem to point to some locality in the northern environs of Jerusalem; hence Ritter (Erkl. xvi, 519) identifies it with Hizmek, a village north of the site of Anathoth (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 291).

Az'mon (Heb. Atsmou', אֲזַמֹּן, strong; Sept. Ἀεμμωνά, Ἀεμμωνά), a place on the southern border of Palestine, between Hazer-adar (beyond a bend at Karkia) and "the river of Egypt" (Num. xxxiv, 4, 5; Josh. xv, 4). The site is perhaps marked by the ruins on a hill near Wady es-Shutín (Robinson, Researches, i, 296), near the junction of Wady Futeis with Wady Rubaiheb [see TRIBE], about half way between Elusa and Rehoboth (Van de Velde's Map). See HESHMON.

Az'noth-ta'bor (Heb. Aznoth' Tabor', אֲזַנֹּתַיִם, ears [i. e. summits] of Tabor [comp. Uzzen-Sherah, "Chisloth-Tabor"]; Sept. Ἀζωνῶζεταβόρ), a town on the western border of Naphtali, between the Jordan and Hukkok (Josh. xix, 34). It is placed by Eusebius (Onomast. s. v. Ἀρανωῶζε) in a plain not far from Diocæsarea. Neither of these notices, however, would allow a position near Tabor, as the name implies; for the territory of Zebulon, at least, intervened. See TRIBE. They may, however, be somewhat combined in a conjectural locality at the eastern edge of the plain el-Buttanf, in the vicinity of Kurn Hattin.

A'zor (Ἀζόρ, from אֲזַר, to help), one of the paternal ancestors of Christ (Matt. i, 13, 14); perhaps the same with AZRIKAM (1 Chron. iii, 23). See AZZUR.

Azor, or Azorius, JOHN, a Spanish theologian, born in 1533 at Zamora, in Spain, died in 1603. Having entered the order of the Jesuits, he became professor of theology, first at Aleala, and subsequently in the Jesuit College at Rome. He published his lectures on moral theology under the title Institutiones Morales. Some of the opinions advanced in this work produced a considerable sensation. He, for instance, finds it "probable" that it is allowable for a man who is threatened by another with a box on the ear to kill the aggressor. The Dominicans violently attacked this proposition, but Pope Clement VIII authorized a new edition of the work. Subsequently Pascal resumed the attack in his Lettres Provinciales, in which the "probabilism," or the doctrine of probable opinions, of which Azorius is one of the authors, is severely censured. Notwithstanding these attacks, the work of Azorius had a large circulation in Italy, in Spain, and even in France, and was recommended by Bossuet to his priests. The Institutiones have frequently been published at Venice, Cologne, Rome, Lyons, and other places.—Hofer, Biographie Générale, iii, 935.

Azo'tus (Ἀζωτός), the Grecized form (Acts viii, 40; so 1 Macc. iv, 15; v, 68; x, 77, 78, 83; xi, 4; xiii, 34; xvi, 10) of the name of the city ΑΣΗΘΟΝ (q. v.).

AZO'TUS, MOUNT (Ἀζωτόρων ὄρος, or Ἀζωτός ὄρος; Vulg. mons Azot), a spot to which, in the battle in which Judas Maccabæus fell, he pursued the broken right wing of Bacchides' army (1 Macc. ix, 15). Josephus (Ant. xii, 11, 1) calls it Aza (Ἀζά, or Azara, Ἀζαρά, according to many MSS.), which Ewald finds in a mountain west of Birzeit, under the form Atara, the Philistine Ashdod being, in his opinion, out of the question. But it is possible that the last-named encampment, Eleasa, was at some distance.

Az'riël (Heb. Azriel', אֲזַרְיֵל, help of God), the name of three men.

1. (Sept. Ὀζιήλ.) The father of Jerimoth, which latter was phylarch of the tribe of Naphtali under David (1 Chron. xxvii, 19). B.C. 1014.

2. (Sept. Ἰεζαήλ.) One of the valiant heads of families of the tribe of Manassah east who were taken into captivity by the Assyrians as a punishment of their national idolatry (1 Chron. v, 24). B.C. cir. 741.

3. (Sept. Ἰεραήλ.) The father of Seraiah, which latter was one of the persons ordered by King Jehoiakim to seize Baruch and Jeremiah, and imprison them for sending him the roll of threatening prophecy (Jer. xxxvi, 26). B.C. 605.

Az'rikam (Heb. Azrikam', אֲזַרְקָאם, help against the enemy; Sept. Ἐζαράμ or Ἐζαίκαμ, once [2 Chron. xxviii, 7] Ἐζακάμ), the name of four men.

1. The first of the six sons of Azel, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 38; ix, 44). B.C. post 1037.

2. (Josephus, Εἰρκάρ, Ant. ix, 12, 1.) The governor of the king's house in the time of Ahaz, slain by Ziechri an Ephraimite (2 Chron. xxvii, 7). B.C. cir. 738.

3. A Levite, son of Hashabiah and father of Haslub (1 Chron. ix, 14; Neh. xi, 15). B.C. ante 536.

4. The last named of the three sons of Neariah, a descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii, 23). B.C. cir. 404. He is perhaps the same as Azor (q. v.), the son of Eliakim and father of Sadoe in Matt. i, 13, 14 (see Strong's Harmon. and Expos. of Gospels, p. 16, 17).

Azu'bah (Heb. Azabah', אֲזַבָּה, deserted), the name of two women.

1. (Sept. Ἀζοβιά v. r. Γαζοβιά.) The first wife of Caleb, Judah's grandson, by whom he had three sons (1 Chron. ii, 18, 19). B.C. ante 1658.

2. (Sept. Ἀζοβιά.) The daughter of Shilhi and mother of King Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxii, 42; 2 Chron. xx, 31). B.C. 947-913.

A'zur, a less correct mode of Anglicizing (Jer. xxviii, 1; Ezek. xi, 1) the name AZZUR (q. v.).

Az'uran (Ἀζυράς v. r. Ἀζυράδος), the name of a man whose descendants (or a place whose inhabitants), to the number of 422, are stated (1 Esdr. v, 15) to have returned from the captivity; but the true lists (Ezra ii, 16; Neh. vii, 21) have no corresponding name.

Azymites (from a negative and ζύμη, leaven), a title applied by the Greeks to the Western Church, because it uses unleavened bread in the Eucharist. The Greek Church has always maintained the use of leavened bread (Conf. Ecc. Orient. c. 9). The practice in the Latin Church of consecrating with unleavened bread was one of the charges brought against that Church by the Greeks in the middle of the eleventh century, and there does not appear to have been any dispute on the subject between the two churches much before that period. Indeed Sirmoundus maintains that the use of unleavened bread in the holy Eucharist was unknown to the Latin Church before the tenth century, and his opinion has the support of Cardinal Bona (Ler. Liber. i, 23), Schelstrat, and Pagi.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. 1k. xv, ch. ii, § 5.

Az'zah, an unusual (but more correct) mode of Anglicizing (Deut. ii, 23; 1 Kings iv, 24; Jer. xxx, 26) the name GAZA (q. v.).

Az'zan (Heb. Azzur', אָזְזָר, perhaps a thorn; Sept. Ὀζζῶρ v. r. Ὀζζῶ), the father of Paltiel, which latter was the commissioner from the tribe of Issachar for dividing the land of Canaan (Num. xxxiv, 26). B.C. ante 1618.

Az'zur (Heb. Azzur', אָזְזֹר and אָזְזָר, helper), the name of three men. See also AZOR.

1. (Sept. Ἀζόρο.) The father of Hananiah of Gibcon, which latter was the prophet who falsely encouraged King Zedekiah against the Babylonians (Jer. xxviii, 1, where the name is Anglicized "Azur"). B.C. ante 595.

2. (Sept. Ἰάζζορ v. r. Ἐζζορ.) The father of Jaazani-ah, which latter was one of the leaders of the people whom the prophet in vision saw devising false schemes of safety for Jerusalem against the Babylonians (Ezek. xi, 1, where the name is Anglicized "Azur"). B.C. ante 593.

3. (Sept. Ἀζοίρο.) One of the chief Israelites who signed the covenant of faith with Jehovah on the return from Babylon (Neh. x, 17). B.C. cir. 410.

Baader, FRANCIS XAVIER, a Roman Catholic philosopher of Germany, was born at Munich in 1765, and died in the same city in 1841. In early life he devoted himself especially to the study of medicine and natural science, and was rewarded for his services in the mining interests of his country by the title of nobility. He established a greater reputation by his lectures and works on philosophy and theology. Though a layman, he was appointed, in 1827, Professor of Speculative Dogmatics at the University of Munich, which chair he retained until 1838, when a ministerial decree excluded laymen from the delivery of lectures on the philosophy of religion. From early youth he had a great aversion to Rationalism, and a great longing for a deeper understanding of the mysteries of the Christian revelation. He studied with particular interest the mystic and theosophic writers, among whom he took especially Jacob Boehme (q. v.) for his guide. After his example, he built up a system of theology and philosophy, which, as all admit, is full of profound and original ideas, though, on the whole, visionary and paradoxical in the extreme. Baader never separated from the Roman Church, but published several works against the primacy of the Pope. His system of philosophy has still (1860) a number of followers, both among Romanists and Protestants. Among his principal works are: Vorlesungen über speculative Dogmatik (Stuttg. 5 vols. 1828-38); Revision der Philosophie der Hegelschen Schule (Stuttg. 1839); Die morgenländische und der abendländische Katholicismus (Stuttg. 1841). His complete works have been edited, with explicit introductions, by six of his followers, Fr. Hoffmann, Hamberger, Lutterbeck, Osten-Sacken, Schaden, and Schlüter (Baader's Sämmtliche Werke, Leipz. 1850-60, 16 vols.). The sixteenth volume contains a copious general index, and an introduction on the system and the history of the philosophy of Baader, by Dr. Lutterbeck. See also Hoffmann, Vorhalle zur speculative Lehr Franz Baaders (Aschaffenburg, 1836).

Ba'al (Heb. id. בָּאָל, lord or master), a generic term for god in many of the Syro-Arabian languages. As the idolatrous nations of that race had several gods, this word, by means of some accessory distinction, became applicable as a name to many different deities. See BAAL-BERITH, BAAL-PEOR; BAAL-ZEUB. There is no evidence, however, that the Israelites ever called Jehovah by the name of Baal; for the passage in Hos. ii, 16, which has been cited as such, only contains the word baal as the sterner, less affectionate representative of husband. It is spoken of the master and owner of a house (Exod. xxii, 7; Judg. xix, 22); of a landholder (Job xxxi, 39); of an owner of cattle (Exod. xxi, 28; Isa. i, 3); of a lender of money, i. e. creditor (Deut. xv, 2); also of the head of a family (Lev. xxi, 4); and even of the Assyrians (or the princes) as conquerors of nations (Isa. xvi, 8). See BAALIM. It also occurs very frequently as the first part of the names of towns and men, e. g. BAAL-GAD, BAAL-HAMON, BAAL-HANAN, etc., all which see in their alphabetical order, and compare BAAL-. As a strictly proper name, and in its simple form, Baal stands in the Bible for a deity, and also for two men and one village. See also GUR-BAAL; KURJATH-BAAL; MERIB-BAAL.

Ancient Medals with the Head of Baal.

1. This name (with the article, בְּאֵל, hab-Ba'al, Judg. ii, 13; Sept. ὁ Βάαλ, but also ἡ Βάαλ, Jer. xix, 5; xxxix, 35; Rom. xi, 4) is appropriated to the chief male divinity of the Phœnicians, the principal seat of whose worship was at Tyre, and thus corresponds with ASHTORETH, their supreme female divinity. Both names have the peculiarity of being used in the plural, and it seems that these plurals designate either (as Gesenius, Theos. s. v. maintains) statues of the divinities, or different modifications of the divinities themselves. That there were many such modifications of Baal is certain from the fact that his name occurs with numerous adjuncts, both in the O. T. and elsewhere, as we have seen above. The plural BAALIM is found frequently also (e. g. Judg. ii, 11; x, 10; 1 Kings xviii, 18; Jer. ix, 14; Hos. ii, 17), as well as in connection with Ashtoreth (Judg. x, 6; 1 Sam. vii, 4), and with Asherah, or, as our version renders it, "the groves" (Judg. iii, 7; 2 Chron. xxxiii, 5). There is no difficulty in determining the meaning of the name, since the word is in Hebrew a common noun of frequent occurrence, having the meaning lord, not so much, however, in the sense of ruler as of master, owner, possessor. The name of the god, whether singular or plural, is always distinguished from the common noun by the presence of the article (בְּאֵל, בְּאֵלִים), except when it stands in connection with some other word which designates a peculiar modifica-cation of Baal. In the Chaldaic form the word becomes shortened into בַּל, and thence, dropping the guttural, בֵּל, BEL, which is the Babylonian name of this god (Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. et Talm.; so Gesenius, First, Movers; the identity of the two words is, however, doubted by Rawlinson, Herod. i, 247).

There can be no doubt of the very high antiquity of the worship of Baal. We find his cultus established among the Moabites and their allies the Midianites in the time of Moses (Num. xxii, 41), and through these nations the Israelites were seduced to the worship of this god under the particular form of Baal-peor (Num. xxv, 3 sq.; Deut. iv, 3). Notwithstanding the fearful punishment which their idolatry brought upon them in this instance, the succeeding generation returned to the worship of Baal (Judg. ii, 10-13), and with the exception of the period during which Gideon was judge (Judg. vi, 26 sq.; viii, 33) this form of idolatry seems to have prevailed among them up to the time of Samuel (Judg. x, 10; 1 Sam. vii, 4), at whose rebuke the people renounced the worship of Baalim. Two centuries pass over before we hear again of Baal in connection with the people of Israel, though we can scarcely conclude from this silence that his worship was altogether abandoned. We know that in the time of Solomon the service of many gods of the surrounding nations was introduced, and particularly that of Ashtoreth, with which Baal is so frequently connected. However this may be, the worship of Baal spread greatly, and, together with that of Asherah, became the religion of the court and people of the ten tribes under Ahab, king of Israel, who, partly through the influence of his wife Jezebel (q. v.), the daughter of the Sidonian king Ethbaal, appears to have made a systematic attempt to suppress the worship of God altogether, and to substitute that of Baal in its stead (1 Kings xvi, 31-33; xviii, 19, 22). And though this idolatry was occasionally put down (2 Kings iii, 2; x, 28), it appears never to have been permanently or effectually abolished in that kingdom (2 Kings xvii, 16). In the kingdom of Judah also Baal-worship extensively prevailed. During the short reign of Ahaziah and the subsequent usurpation of his mother Athaliah, the sister of Ahab, it appears to have been the religion of the court (2 Kings viii, 27; comp. xi, 18), as it was subsequently under Ahaz (2 Kings xv, 3; 2 Chron. xxviii, 2), and Manasseh (2 Kings xxi, 3).—Smith.

The worship of Baal among the Jews appears to have been appointed with much pomp and ceremonial. Temples were erected to him (1 Kings xvi, 32; 2 Kings xi, 18); his images were set up (2 Kings x, 26); his altars were very numerous (Jer. xi, 13), being erected particularly on lofty eminences [see HIGH-PLACE] (1 Kings xviii, 20), and on the roofs of houses (Jer. xxxii, 29); there were priests in great numbers (1 Kings xviii, 19), and of various classes (2 Kings x, 19); the worshippers appear to have been arrayed in appropriate robes (2 Kings x, 22; comp. Lucian, De Deo Syria, 59). His priesthood (the proper term for which seems to be כַּהֲנָנִים, kenanim', so called from their black garments) were a very numerous body (1 Kings xviii, 19), and were divided into the two classes of prophets and of priests (unless the term "servants," which comes between those words, may denote a third order—a kind of Levites, 2 Kings x, 19). As to the rites by which he was worshipped, there is most frequent mention of incense being offered to him (2 Kings xxiii, 5), but also of bullocks being sacrificed (1 Kings xviii, 26), and even of children, as to Moloch (Jer. xix, 5). According to the description in 1 Kings xviii, the priests during the sacrifice danced (or, in the sarcastic expression of the original, limped) about the altar, and, when their prayers were not answered, cut themselves with knives until the blood flowed, like the priests of Bonna (Lucan, Pharsal. i, 565; Tertull. Apologet. ix; Lactant. Div. Inst. i, 21). We also read of homage paid to him by bowing the knee, and by kissing his image (1 Kings xix, 18; comp. Cicero, in Verrem, iv, 43), and that his worshippers used to swear by his name (Jer. xii, 16).—Kitto; Smith. See CHEMARIM.

Throughout all the Phœnician colonies we continually find traces of the worship of this god, partly in the names of men, such as Adher-bal, Astru-bal, Han-ni-bal, and still more distinctly in Phœnician inscriptions yet remaining (Gesenius, Mon. Phœn. passim). Nor need we hesitate to regard the Babylonian Bal (Isa. xlvi, 1) or Belus (Herod. i, 181) as essentially identical with Baal, though perhaps under some modified form. Rawlinson distinguishes between the second god of the first triad of the Assyrian pantheon, whom he names provisionally Bel-Nimrod, and the Babylonian Bel, whom he considers identical with Merodach (Herod. i, 510 sq.; 521 sq.). Traces of the idolatry symbolized under it are even found in the British Isles, Baal, Bal, or Beal being, according to many, the name of the principal deity of the ancient Irish; and on the tops of many hills in Scotland there are heaps of stones called by the common people "Bel's cairns," where it is supposed that sacrifices were offered in early times (Statistical Account of Scotland, iii, 105; xi, 621). See ETHBAAL.

The same perplexity occurs respecting the connection of this god with the heavenly bodies as we have already noticed in regard to Ashtoreth. Creuzer (Symb. ii, 413) and Movers (Phœn. i, 180) declare Baal to be the Sun-god; on the other hand, the Babylonian god is identified with Zeus by Herodotus, and there seems to be no doubt that Bel-Merodach is the planet Jupiter (Rawlinson, Herod. i, 512). On the whole, Baal probably represents properly the sun, and, in connection with Astarte, or the moon, was very generally worshipped by the idolatrous nations of Western Asia, as representing the great generative powers of nature, the former as a symbol of the active, and the latter of the passive principle. Traces of this tendency to worship the principal luminaries of heaven appear frequently in the history of the Israelites at a very early period, before Sabianism as such was distinctly developed (Exod. xx, 4; Deut. iv, 19; xvii, 3; 2 Kings xxiii, 11). Gesenius, however (in his Thes. ar. Heb.), contends that Baal was not the sun, but the planet Jupiter, as the guardian and giver of good fortune; but the view of Münster (in his Religion der Babylonier) seems most tenable, who, while he does not deny the astrological character of this worship, still maintains that, together with and besides that, there existed in very early times a cosmological idea of the primitive power of nature, as seen in the two functions of generation and conception or parturition, and that the sun and moon were the fittest representatives of these two powers. It is quite likely that in the case of Baal, as well as of Ashtoreth, the symbol of the god varied at different times and in different localities. Indeed, the great number of adjuncts with which the name of Baal is found is a sufficient proof of the diversity of characters in which he was regarded, and there must no doubt have existed a corresponding diversity in the worship. It may even be a question whether in the original notion of Baal there was reference to any of the heavenly bodies, since the derivation of the name does not in this instance, as it does in the case of Ashtoreth, point directly to them. If we separate the name Baal from idolatry, we seem, according to its meaning, to obtain simply the notion of lord and proprietor of all. With this the idea of productive power is naturally associated, and that power is as naturally symbolized by the sun; while, on the other hand, the ideas of providential arrangement and rule, and so of prosperity, are as naturally suggested by the word, and in the astral mythology these ideas are associated with the planet Jupiter. In point of fact, we find adjuncts to the name of Baal answering to all these notions, e. g. Βασιλεύς, Balsamen (Plaut. Pun. v, 2, 67) = בַּלְשָׁמִים , "Lord of the heavens;" בַּלְשָׁמִים , Baal-Hamon (Gesenius, Mon. Phœn. p. 349), the Sun-Baal (comp. the similar name of a city in Cant. viii, 11); בַּלְגָּד , Baal-Gad, the name of a city (Josh. xi, 17), q. d. Baal the Fortune-bringer, which god may be regarded as identical with the planet Jupiter. Many more compounds of Baal in the O. T. occur, and among them a large number of cities, which are given below. There has recently been discovered among the ruins of a temple on Mount Lebanon an inscription containing the name Bal-marcos, the first part of which is evidently identical with the Phœnician Baal, who appears to have been worshipped then under the title of "the god of dancing" (Biblioth. Sacra, 1843, p. 559 sq.). Dr. Wilson, when at Damascus, obtained the impression of an ancient scarabeus, on which was carved an inscription, in the old Phœnician alphabet, containing the title בַּלְבַּב , "to Baal" (Laws of Bible, ii, 769). See BAALIM.

Antoine G. M. of Baal.

2. (Sept. Baal.) A Benjamite, fourth son of Jehiel, the progenitor of the Gibeonites, by his wife Maachah (1 Chron. viii, 30; ix, 36). B. C. post 1618.

3. (Sept. Baal v. r. Beil) and even Beil.) A Reubenite, son of Reia and father of Beerah, which last was among the captives transported to Assyria by Tiglath-Pileser (1 Chron. v, 5). B. C. ante 758.

4. (Sept. Baal.) A place in the vicinity of Ain and Ashan, inhabited by the Simconites (1 Chron. iv, 53); probably the same elsewhere (Josh. xix, 8) called BAALATH-BEER (q. v.). See BAAL.

Baal- or baäl- (Heb. בַּל or בַּלְ , i. e. Baal), a geographical word occurring as the prefix or suffix to the names of several places in Palestine (see those following, also GUN-BAAL, etc.). Gesenius has expressed his opinion (Theol. Heb. p. 225, col. a) that in these cases it has no reference to any worship of the god Baal at the particular spot, but merely expresses that the place "possesses" or contains something special denoted by the other part of the name, the word Baal bearing in that case a force synonymous with that of BETH (q. v.). See BAAL-TAMAR, etc. Without contradicting this conclusion, some reasons may be mentioned for reconsidering it. See BAALIM.

1. Though employed in the Hebrew Scriptures to a certain extent metaphorically, and there certainly with the force of "possession" or "ownership," as a "lord of hair" (2 Kings i, 8), "lord of dreams" (Gen. xxxvii, 19), etc., Baal never seems to have become a naturalized Hebrew word, but frequently occurs so as to betray its Canaanite origin and relationship. Thus it is several times employed to designate the inhabitants of towns either certainly or probably heathen, but rarely, if ever, those of one undoubtedly Hebrew. It is applied to the men of Jericho before the conquest (Josh. xxiv, 11); to the men of Shechem, the ancient city of Hamor the Hivite, who rose to recover the rights of Hamor's descendants long after the conquest of the land (Judg. ix, 2-51, with Ewald's commentary, Gesch. ii, 115-147), and in the account of which struggle the distinction between the "lords" (בַּלְ) of Shechem and the "men" (אֲנָשִׁים —Hebrew relations) of Abimelech is carefully maintained. It is used for the men of Keilah, a place on the western confines of Judah, exposed to all the attacks and the influences of the surrounding heathen (1 Samuel xxiii, 11, 12), for Uriah the Hittite (2 Sam. xi, 26), and for others (Isa. xvi, 8, etc.). Add to this the consideration that if Baal forms part of the name of a person, we are sure to find the name mentioned with some Hebrew alteration, as Jerubesheth for Jerub-baal; Meshobeth for Merib-baal; Ishbosheth for Esh-baal, and others. In Hos. ii, 16, a remarkable instance is preserved of the distinction, noticed above in connection with the record of the revolt at Shechem, between the heathen Baal and the Hebrew Ish: "At that day, saith Jehovah, men shall call me 'Ishi,' and shall call me no more 'Baali,'" both words having the sense of "my husband."

2. Such places called by this name, or its compounds, as can be identified, and several of which existed at the time of the conquest, were either near Phœnicia, as Baal-gad, Baal-hermon, Belmarkos (of later times), or in proximity to some other acknowledged seat of heathen worship, as Baal-meon and Bamoth-Baal, near Baal-peor; or Kirjath-Baal and Baal-tamar, connected with Gibeon and Bethel (see Dems, "Der Baal in d. Hebr. Eigennamen," in the Zeitschr. d. deutsch. nordgerm. Gesellsch. 1862, iv, 728).

3. On more than one occasion Baal forms part of the names of places which we elsewhere discover to have been elevated spots, spots in which the worship of the Canaanites delighted. Thus Baal-hermon is elsewhere called "Mount Baal," and Baal-Perazim is (very probably) "Mount Perazim." Baalath-beer, too, is called in the parallel lists Ramath (i. e. "height") Compare the Vulgate rendering of Baalah in 1 Chron. xiii, 6, "ad collem Cariathiarim;" also Mount Baalah (Josh. xv, 11).

4. There is the consideration of the very deep significance with which the name of Baal must always have been invested, both for the Israelites and for their predecessors in the country—for those who venerated and those who were commanded to hate him. Surely this significance must have been sufficient to prevent that portentous name from becoming a mere alternative for a term which, like BETH (q. v.), was in the commonest daily use.—Smith, s. v.

5. The most significant form in which this compound word occurs is its use as an element (in a manner common to all the Shemitic languages) in proper names, like el- (בַּל) and Jah (בַּל) of the Hebrew; sometimes at the end, e. g. Eth-baal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), Merib-baal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), Esh-baal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), Jerub-baal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), etc. (which see severally); at other times at the beginning, e. g. Baal-hamon (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), Laili-yah (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), and in some instances the heathenish "Baal" has supplanted the corresponding Jewish sacred name, e. g. El-baba (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי , 2 Sam. v, 16) = Dei-baba (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי , 1 Chron. xiv, 7). This was a frequent method of formation in Phœnician proper names, as appears from those occurring in classical and Biblical history, and still more clearly in inscriptions on coins, e. g. Ittabaal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), "with Baal," Gerb. i, 2), Eathbaal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), "daughter of Baal," Carth. 8), Hilkembaal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), "sage of Baal," Numid. i, 2), Hilkbaal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), the same by assimilation of the בַּל , ib. ii, 3), Hilkemshbaal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), the same with the insertion of the relative prefix בַּל , ib. ii, 2), Jenbaal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), "desire of Baal," (Cit. 26), Jaasherbaal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), "enriched by Baal," Numid. vii, 1), Malkbaal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), "ruled by Baal," Malt. iii, 1), Mezethbaal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), "kindled by Baal," Numid. i, 4), Mesibaal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי for בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), "made by Baal," ib. i, 3), Mettenbaal (בַּלְבַּבְתִּי), "given by Baal," ib. vi, 1), etc. (see Gesenius, Theol. Heb. p. 224, b).—First, s. v. See NAME.

Ba'alah (Heb. Ba'alah, בַּאֲלָה , mistress, civitas), the name of two cities and of one mountain. See also BAALATH.

1. (Sept. Baalâ v. r. Balâ.) A city in the southern part of Judah, mentioned in connection with Beersheba and Iim (Josh. xv, 29), apparently the same elsewhere called BALAH (Josh. xix, 3), also BELIAH, and assigned to Simeon (1 Chron. iv, 29). In the first-named passage it forms part of the preceding name = Bizjathjah-Baalah. See BIZJATHJAH.

2. (Sept. Βααλίθ v. r. Βαάλ, but omits in 1 Chron.) A city on the northern border of Judah (Josh. xv, 10), better known as KIRJATH-JEARIM (q. v.) (Josh. xv, 9; 1 Chron. xiii, 6), otherwise called BAALÉ OF JUDAH (2 Sam. vi, 2). In Josh. xv, 60, and xviii, 14, it is called KIRJATH-BAAL. From the expression "Baalath, which is Kirjath-jearim" (comp. "Jebusi, which is Jerusalem," xviii, 28), it would seem as if Baalath were the earlier or Canaanite appellation of the place.

3. (Sept. γῆ Βααλάθ v. r. ἔπι Νίβα, etc.) A mountain (Ⲅⲓ) on the N.W. boundary of Judah, between Shicron and Jabneel (Josh. xv, 11), usually regarded as the same with Mount Jearim (ver. 10), from the neighboring Kirjath-baal; but erroneously (see Keil, Comment. in loc.), for the direction in the text requires a location more westerly, apparently at the modern Tell Hermon (Van de Velde, Map). See TRIBE.

Ba'älath (Heb. Baalath', בַּאֲלָתַי, another form of the name Baalath; Sept. Βααλίθ [v. r. Γεβελάν in Josh.], but Βααλίθ v. r. Βααλάθ in 2 Chron.), a town in the tribe of Dan, named with Gibbethon, Gath-rimmon, and other Philistine places (Josh. xix, 44), apparently the same that was afterward rebuilt by Solomon (1 Kings ix, 18; 2 Chron. viii, 6). Many have conjectured this Baalath to be the same as Baalbek (so Schwarz, Palest. p. 62); but in that case it must have lain in northernmost Dan, whereas the possession of it is ascribed to that tribe when its territory was wholly in the south near Judah, and many years before the migration (recorded in Judg. xviii) which gave Dan a northern territory. Correspondingly, Josephus places the Baalath of Solomon (which he calls Baleth, Βαλίθ) in the southern part of Palestine, near GAZARA or Gezer (Ant. viii, 6, 1), within the territory which would have belonged to Dan had it acquired possession of the lands originally assigned to it. The Jerusalem Talmud (Sabbath. 1) affirms that Baalath lay so near the line of separation between Dan and Judah that the fields only were in the former tribe, the buildings being in the latter. Schwarz, however (Palest. p. 138 note), disputes this position; the statement seems to have reference to the post-exilic distribution of Palestine, by which Judah gave name (Judea) to the entire neighborhood, including Benjamin as well as Dan and Simeon, an arrangement evidently growing out of the earlier division into the two rival kingdoms of Judah and Israel. Van de Velde is probably correct in identifying the site with that of D'ir Babul, on the high southern brow of Wady Kerama, about half way between Jaffa and Nablous; but he distinguishes this from the Baalath of Solomon, assigning only the insufficient reason that this locality is not situated near a highway where a fortified place would be required (Memoir, p. 291).

Ba'älath-be'er (Heb. Baalath' Beer', בַּאֲלָתֵי בְּעֵר, Baalath of [or having] a well; Sept. Βααλίθ v. r. Βαάθ, probably the same as the BAAL of 1 Chron. iv, 33, a city of Simeon; mentioned in connection with RAMATH-Negeb, or Southern Ramath (Josh. xix, 8; comp. 1 Sam. xxx, 27), in such a manner as to make them identical (so the Sept. B. πρωτογενέων Βυβραμώθ; Vulg. Baalath-Beeremoth). See RAMATH. It is also the same with the BEALOTH (q. v.) of Judah (Josh. xv, 24). Other sacred wells in this parched region were the Beer-lahai-roi, the "well of the vision of God;" and Beer-sheba, the "well of the oath." See BEER.

Baalbek, a city of Cæle-Syria, celebrated for its superb ruins yet extant of an ancient temple of the sun, and supposed by many to be the site designated by Solomon's famous "House of the Forest of Lebanon" (1 Kings vii, 2; x, 17; 2 Chron. ix, 16). We are also informed that among those parts of Palestine which were unsubdued by the Hebrews at the death of Joshua was "all Lebanon toward the sun-rising, from Baal-gad, under Mount Hermon, unto the entering into Hamath" (Josh. xiii, 5). This position of Baal-gad is not unfavorable to the conclusion which some have reached, that it is no other than the place which, from a temple consecrated to the sun that stood there, was called by the Greeks Heliopolis, i. e. city of the sun; and which the natives called and still call Baalbek, a word apparently of the same meaning. The honor of being identified with Baalbek has also been claimed for the Baalath which Solomon built or fortified; but this claim has already been disposed of [see BAALATH]; and no weight is to be attached to the local traditions which claim Solomon as the founder of Baalbek, seeing that it is the practice of the natives to ascribe to that great king every grand ancient work of unknown date which the country contains. It is also to be observed that those who contend for Baalath admit its possible identity with Baal-gad, and hence there are no conflicting claims to adjust. Even those who suppose the Baal-hamou of the Canticles (viii, 11) to be Baalbek, conceive that to be a later name for Baal-gad, and hence the only question that remains is whether Baal-gad be not the more ancient name of the place afterward known as Heliopolis and Baalbek. Baalbek, in the Syrian language, signifies the city of Baal, or of the sun; and, as the Syrians never borrowed names from the Greeks, or translated Greek names, it is certain that when the Greeks came into Syria they found the place bearing this name, or some other signifying "city of the sun," since they termed it Heliopolis, which is doubtless a translation of the native designation. Now the question is whether this word has the same meaning as Baal-gad, and, if not, whether any circumstances can be pointed out as likely to occasion the change of name. If we take Baal for the name of the idol, then, as in the case of Baalbek, the last member of the word must be taken as a modifying appellation, not as in itself a proper name; and as Gad means a troop, a multitude, or a press of people, Baal-gad will mean Baal's crowd, whether applied to the inhabitants, or to the place as a resort of pilgrims. The syllable bek has precisely the same meaning in the Arabic. If this should not seem satisfactory, we may conclude that Baal was so common an element in the composition of proper names that it is not sufficiently distinctive to bear the stress of such an interpretation, and may rather take it to signify (as Gesenius says it always does in geographical combinations) the place where a thing is found. See BAAL-. According to this view, Baal-gad would mean the place of Gad. Now Gad was an idol (Isa. lxxv, 11), supposed to have been the god or goddess of good fortune (comp. Sept. Τύχη; Vulg. Fortuna), and identified by the Jewish commentators with the planet Jupiter. See GAD. But it is well known that Baal was identified with Jupiter as well as with the sun; and it is not difficult to connect Baalbek with the worship of Jupiter. John of Antioch affirms that the great temple at Baalbek was dedicated to Jupiter; and in the celebrated passage of Macrobius (Saturn. i, 23), in which he reports that the worship of the sun was brought by Egyptian priests to Heliopolis in Syria, he expressly states that they introduced it under the name of Jupiter (sub nomine Joris). This implies that the worship of Jupiter was already established and popular at the place, and that heliolatry previously was not; and therefore we should rather expect the town to have borne some name referring to Jupiter than to the sun, and may be sure that a name indicative of heliolatry must have been posterior to the introduction of that worship by the Egyptians; and, as we have no ground for supposing that this took place before or till long after the age of Joshua, it could not then be called by any name corresponding to Heliopolis. But see BAAL-GAD.

Baalbek is pleasantly situated on the lowest declivity of Anti-Libanus, at the opening of a small valley into the plain El-Bekaa. Through this valley runs a small stream, divided into numberless rills for irrigation. The place, according to the determination of Maj. Rennell (Geogr. of W. Asia, i. 75), is in N. lat. $34^{\circ} 1' 36''$, and E. long. $36^{\circ} 11'$, distant 109 geog. miles from Palmyra, and $38\frac{1}{2}$ from Tripoli. Its origin appears to be lost in the most remote antiquity, and the historical notices of it are very scanty; the silence of the classical writers respecting it would alone seem to imply that it had previously existed under another name. In the absence of more positive information, we can only conjecture that its situation on the high-road of commerce between Tyre, Palmyra, and the farther East, must have contributed largely to the wealth and magnificence which it manifestly attained. It is mentioned under the name of Heliopolis by Josephus (Ant. xiv. 3, 4), and also by Pliny (Hist. Nat. v. 22). Two Roman inscriptions of the time of Antoninus Pius give sanction to the statement of John of Antioch, who alleges that this emperor built a great temple to Jupiter at Heliopolis, which was one of the wonders of the world (Hist. Chron. lib. xi). From the reverses of Roman coins we learn that Heliopolis was constituted a colony by Julius Cæsar; that it was the seat of a Roman garrison in the time of Augustus, and obtained the Jus Italicum from Severus (Ulpian, De Censibus, 9). Some of the coins of later date contain curious representations of the temple (Ackermann, Rom. Coins, i. 339). After the age of Constantine the splendid temples of Baalbek were probably considered to neglect and decay, unless, indeed, as some appearances indicate, they were then consecrated to Christian worship (see Chron. Pasch. p. 303, ed. Bohm; comp. Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. v. 10; Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. iii. 7; iv. 22). From the accounts of Oriental writers Baalbek seems to have continued a place of importance down to the time of the Moslem invasion of Syria (see Ammian. Marcell. xiv. 8). They describe it as one of the most splendid of Syrian cities, enriched with stately palaces, adorned with monuments of ancient times, and abounding with trees, fountains, and whatever contributes to luxurious enjoyment (D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Or. s. v.). On the advance of the Moslems, it was reported to the Emperor Heraclius as protected by a citadel of great strength, and well able to sustain a siege. After the capture of Damascus it was regularly invested by the Moslems, and, continuing an overflowing population, amply supplied with provisions and military stores, it made a courageous defence, but at length capitulated. Its importance at that period is attested by the ransom exacted by the conquerors, consisting of 2000 ounces of gold, 3000 ounces of silver, 2000 silk vests, and 1000 swords, together with the arms of the garrison. It afterward became the mart for the rich pillage of Syria; but its prosperity soon received a fatal blow from the caliph of Damascus, by whom it was sacked and dismantled, and the principal inhabitants put to the sword (A.D. 748). During the Crusades, being incapable of making any resistance, it seems to have quietly submitted to the strongest. In the year 1400 it was pillaged by Timour Beg, in his progress to Damascus, after he had taken Aleppo. Afterward it fell into the hands of the Metawli—a barbarous predatory tribe, who were nearly exterminated when Djezzar Pasha permanently subjected the whole district to Turkish supremacy. In 1759 an earthquake completed the devastation already begun by Mohammedan vandalism.

The ruins of Heliopolis lie on an eastern branch of the mountain, and are called, by way of eminence, the Castle. The most prominent objects visible from the plain are a lofty portico of six columns, part of the great temple, and the walls and columns of another smaller temple a little below, surrounded by green trees. There is also a singular temple of nearly circular form. These, with a curious column on the highest point within the walls (which may possibly have been a clepsydra, or water-dial), form the only erect portions of the ruins. These ruins have been so often and so minutely described by scores of travelers, as well as in many works of general reference, that, since their identification as a Scriptural site is uncertain, a few additional observations only may suffice. The ruins of Baalbek in the mass are apparently of three successive eras: first, the gigantic hewn stones, in the face of the platform or basement on which the temple stands, and which appear to be remains of older buildings, perhaps of the more ancient temple which occupied the site. Among these are at least twenty standing upon a basement of rough stones, which would be called enormous anywhere but here. These celebrated blocks, which in fact form the great wonder of the place, vary from 30 to 40 feet in length; but there are three, forming an upper course 20 feet from the ground, which together measure 190 feet, being severally of the enormous dimensions of 63 and 61 feet in length, by 12 in breadth and thickness (Addison's Damascus and Palmyra, ii, 55). "They are," says Richter (Walfahrten, p. 281), "the largest stones I have ever seen, and might of themselves have easily given rise to the popular opinion that Baalbek was built by angels at the command of Solomon. The whole wall, indeed, is composed of immense stones, and its resemblance to the remains of the Temple of Solomon, which are still shown in the foundations of the mosque Es-Sakkara on Mount Moriah, cannot fail to be observed." This was also pointed out by Dr. Richardson. In the neighboring quarries (q. v.) from which they were cut, one stone, hewn out but not carried away, is of much larger dimensions than any of those which have been mentioned. To the second and third eras belong the Roman temples, which, being of and about the time of Antoninus Pius, present some of the finest specimens of Corinthian architecture in existence, and possess a wonderful grandeur and majesty from their lofty and imposing situation (Addison, ii, 57). Among the ornaments of these buildings Richter finds confirmation of the following statement of Macrobius: "Isis and Horus often unequivocally appear. The winged globes surrounded with serpents show that the priests of Baalbek received their ideas of divinity from On, the Heliopolis of Egypt." Speaking generally of these remains, Burckhardt says, "The entire view of the ruins of Palmyra, when seen at a certain distance, is infinitely more striking than those of Baalbek, but there is not any one spot in the ruins of Tadmor so imposing as the interior view of the temple of Baalbek" (Syria, p. 13). He adds that the architecture of Baalbek is richer than that of Tadmor. Mr. Addison remarks that "the ruins, though so striking and magnificent, are, nevertheless, quite second-rate when compared with the Athenian ruins, and display in their decoration none of the bold conceptions and the genius which characterize the Athenian architecture." The present Baalbek is a small village to the east of the ruins, in a sad state of wretchedness and decay. It is little more than a heap of rubbish, the houses being built of mud and sun-dried bricks. The population of 5000 which the place is said to have contained in 1751 is now reduced to barely 2000 persons; the two handsome mosques and fine serai of the emir, mentioned by Burckhardt, are no longer distinguishable; and travellers may now inquire in vain for the grapes, the pomegranates, and the fruits which were formerly so abundant (Iken, Dissert. de Baal-Hamon et Baal-Gad, in Dissert. Philologico-Theolog. i, 136; Wood and Dawkins, Ruins of Baalbec, Lond. 1757; Pococke, Description of the East, ii, 105-113; Maundrell, Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 134, 139; Volney, Voyage en Syrie, ii, 215-230; Thevet, Cosmographie, bk. vi, ch. xiv; Schubert, Reise in das Morgenland, Erlangen, 1841; see also Rosenmüller, Biblical Geography, ii, 252-257; Thomson, Land and Book, i, 350-361; Kelly's Syria, p. 256-266; Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v. Heliopolis Syriae).—Kitto, s. v. BAAL-GAD.

Ba'al-be'ryth (Heb. Ba'a' Berith, בְּרִית בַּעַל, covenent-lord; Sept. Baalβεθ v. r. Βααλ βεαθηκυ; Judg. ix, 4) is the name of a god worshipped by the people of Shechem (Judg. viii, 33), who, on account of the signification of the name, has been compared to the Ζεὺς Ὀπίσιος of the Greeks, and the Latin Deus Fidius. Bochart and Kreuzer think that this name means "God of Berytus;" but, whether or not the name of that town is to be recognized in the Berothah of Ezek. xlvii, 16, there is hardly any ground for their opinion. Movers (Phönizier, i, 169) considers the name equivalent to "Baal in covenant with the idolaters of Israel." The meaning, however, does not seem to be the god who presides over covenants, but the god who comes into covenant with the worshippers. In Judg. ix, 46, he is called simply "the god Berith" (בְּרִית). We know nothing of the particular form of worship paid to this god. See BAALIM.

Ba'alê of Judah (Heb. Ba'alêf' Yehudâ, בְּרִיתֵי יְהוּדָה, lords or cities of Judah; Sept. and Vulg. translate ἀρχαῖοις 'Ioudâ, viri Judæ), a city in the tribe of Judah, from which David brought the ark into Jerusalem (2 Sam. vi, 2). It is elsewhere called BAALAH (q. v.), and was still better known as KIRJATH-JEARIM (1 Chron. xiii, 6).

v. r. Βαλαγῖν, once [Josh. xiii, 5] Γαλαγῖν, a city of the Canaanites, perhaps in the valley of Lebanon, at the source of the Jordan and foot of Mount Hermon, whose kings were taken and put to death by Joshua, but the city itself remained unsubdued in his day (Josh. xi, 17; xii, 7; xiii, 5). It was a place evidently well known at the time of the conquest of Palestine, and, as such, used to denote the most northern (Josh. xi, 17, xii, 7), or perhaps north-western (xiii, 5, Hamath being to the extreme north-east) point to which Joshua's victories extended. It was in all probability a Phœnician or Canaanite sanctuary of Baal under the aspect of Gad or Fortune [see GAD], from whose worship it appears to have derived its name. See BAALIM. The words "the plain (גַּלְגַּלִּים) of Lebanon" would lead to the supposition that it lay between the two ranges of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, which is still known by the same name el-Bûkâ'a, and it has accordingly been identified by Iken and others (including Thomson, Land and Book, i, 353) with Baalbek (Ritter, Erdenkunde, xvii, 230). See BAALBEK. But against this are the too great distance of Baalbek to the north, and the precise expression of the text—"under Mount Hermon." The conjecture of Schwarz (Palest. p. 60), supported by Robinson (Researches, new ed. iii, 519), is, that the modern representative of Baal-gad is Baniyas, a place which long maintained a great reputation as the sanctuary of Pan. See CESAREA PHILIPPI. From its association with Mount Hermon, it would seem to be the same with BAAL-HERMON (Judg. iii, 3; 1 Chron. v, 23).—Smith.

Baal-gur. See GER-BAAL.

Ba'al-ha'mon (Heb. Ba'al Hamon', בַּאֲלֵי הַחַמּוֹן, place of multitude; Sept. Βαλαμών), a place where Solomon is said to have had an extensive vineyard (Cant. viii, 11). Rosenmüller (Alterth. I, ii, 281) conceives that if this Baal-hamon was the name of a place that actually existed, it may be reasonably supposed identical with Baal-gur or Heliopolis; for Hamon was a chief Phœnician god (Davis, Carthage, p. 256, 262), perhaps the Ammon of the Egyptians (see Nah. iii, 8), whom the Greeks identified with Jupiter (Bib. Geog. ii, 253). We are not inclined to lay much stress on this conjecture (see Iken, Dissert. philol. in loc.), which, however, is adopted by Schwarz (Palest. p. 61). See BAAL-GAD. There was a place called Hamon, in the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix, 28), which Ewald (Comment. in loc.) thinks was the same as Baal-hamon; but there is little probability in this conjecture. The book of Judith (viii, 3) places a Balamon (Βαλαμών) or Belamon (Βελαμών) in central Palestine, near Dothaim, and therefore in the mountains of Ephraim, not far north of Samaria. See BALAMO. If it be the same place (see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 225), this vineyard may have been in one of the "fat valleys" of the "drunkards of Ephraim, who are overcome with wine," to which allusion is made in Isa. xxviii, 1. It appears to have been situated among the eminences south-east of Jenin. — Kitto; Smith. See BETH-BAGGAN; BAALIM.

Ba'al-ha'man (Heb. Ba'al Chaman', בַּאֲלֵי חַמָּן, lord of grace, or Baal is gracious), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Βαλαμών and Βαλαμών v. r. Βαλλων and Βαλαμών.) An early king of Edom, son of Achor, successor of Saul, and succeeded by Hadar (Gen. xxxvi, 38, 39; 1 Chron. i, 49, 50). B.C. prob. ante 1619.

2. (Sept. Βαλαμών v. r. Βαλλανά.) A Gederite, royal overseer of "the olive-trees and sycamore-trees in the low plains" under David (1 Chron. xxvii, 28). B.C. 1044. From his name we may conjecture that he was of Canaanitish extraction.

Ba'al-ha'zor (Heb. Ba'al Chazor', בַּאֲלֵי חָצוֹר, king of a village; Sept. Βααλαζώρ v. r. Βελαζώρ), the place where Absalom kept his flocks, and held his sheep-shearing feast at which Amnon was assassinated (2 Sam. xiii, 23). The Targum makes it "the plain of Hazor," and so Ewald (Isr. Gesch. ii, 639); but this locality would be far from that of the above passage, where it is said to have been "beside (בְּ) Ephraim:" not in the tribe of that name, but near the city called Ephraim, which was in the tribe of Benjamin, and is mentioned in 2 Chr. xiii, 19; John xi, 54. This Ephraim is placed by Eusebius eight miles from Jerusalem on the road to Jericho, and is supposed by Ireland to have been between Bethel and Jericho (Palestina, i, 377). Perhaps Baal-hazor is the same with HAZOR (q. v.) in the tribe of Benjamin (Neh. xi, 33), now Azur in the vicinity indicated (see Schwarz, Palest. p. 133).

Ba'al-her'mon (Heb. Ba'al Hermon', בַּאֲלֵי הַרְמוֹן, lord of Hermon), the name of a city and a hill adjoining.

1. (Sept. makes two names, Βαῶλ Ἐρμών.) A town not far from Mount Hermon, mentioned as inhabited by the Ephraimites in connection with Bashan and Senir (1 Chron. v, 23). It was probably the same with HAZOR (q. v.) of Josh. xi, 17 (Robinson, Researches, new ed. iii, 409).

2. (Sept. translates ὄρος τοῦ ἱερμόν, Mount Hermon.) A mountain (ⲉⲓⲛ) east of Lebanon, from which the Israelites were unable to expel the Hivites (Judg. iii, 3). This is usually considered as a distinct place from Mount Hermon; but the only apparent ground for doing so is the statement in 1 Chron. v, 23, "unto Baal-hermon, and Senir, and [unto] Mount Hermon;" but it is quite possible that the conjunction "and" may be here, as elsewhere, used as an expletive.—L⁴ unto Baal-hermon, even Senir, even Mount Hermon." Perhaps this derives some color from the fact, which we know, that this mountain had at least three names (Deut. iii, 9). May not Baal-hermon have been a fourth, in use among the Phœnician worshippers of Baal, one of whose sanctuaries, Baal-gad, was at the foot of this very mountain?—Smith. See BAALIM.

Ba'ali (Heb. Baâl', בַּאֲלִי, my lord; Sept. Βααλιμ), a colder and more distant title for husband, which the prophet reproaches the Jewish Church for hitherto applying to Jehovah, instead of the more endearing term Ishi (my man, i. e. husband), which he predicts she would be emboldened to employ when freed from her idolatries (Hos. ii, 16). Some have supposed from this that the Jews had even borrowed the term Baal from the surrounding nations as expressive of sovereign deity, and so applied it to Jehovah; but this is not likely. See BAAL.

Ba'alim (Heb. hab-be'ilim, הַבְּעִילִים, plural of Baal, with the def. article prefixed; Sept. Βααλιμ), according to most, images of the god Baal set up in temples and worshipped, usually in connection with those of Astarte (Judg. ii, 11; 1 Sam. vii, 4, etc.); according to others, various forms of Baal (Ort, Diebst der B. in Israel, Leyden, 1864). See ASHORETH.

Baal seems to have been the general name for the deity among the Phœnicians and Carthaginians (Servius, ad Æn. i, 729; "lingua Punica Deus Bal dicitur," Isidor. Orig. viii, 11), but with the article (בַּאֲלִים, hab-Baal, "the Baal") BAAL distinctively, the chief male divinity (on the fem. הַבַּאָּל, fem. xi, 4, and often in the Sept., see Winer, New Test. Gr. § 205) of the Phœnician (i. e. proper Sidonian, Syrian, Carthaginian, and colonial Punic) race (hence the syllable -βαλος or -bal so often found at the end of their proper names, e. g. Ἰσάβαλος or Ethibaal (q. v.), Ἀγβαλος [Hered. vii, 78], Ἐκίββαλος and Μίθβαλος [Joseph. Ap. i, 21]; also Hannibal, Abibal, Adherbal, Hasdrubal, Maharbal, etc. [comp. Fromann, De cultu Æv. ex ἀνομαστειῶν illustri, Altdorf, 1744 45, p. 17 sq.]; yet that the suffix in these names is not expressive of deity in general, but only of Baal specifically, appears from a similar use of the titles Melkart, Astarte, etc., in other personal appellations [see generally Münter, Reise d. Karthager, 2d ed. Kopenh. 1821], like Bel among the Babylonians (for the contraction בַּל, Bal, for בַּלְבַּל, Baal, see Gesenius, Monum. Phœn. p. 452), and the tutelary Belus of Cyprus ("Citium of Bel," Steph. Byz. p. 510). The apostate Israelites worshipped him (in connection with Astarte) in the period of the judges (Judg. ii, 11, 13; iii, 7; vi, 25 sq.), and the later kings, especially Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii, 2) and Manasseh (2 Kings xxi, 3) of Judah, and Ahab and Hoshea of Israel (1 Kings xvi, 31 sq.; xviii, 19 sq.; 2 Kings xvii, 16 sq.; comp. also Jer. ii, 8; vii, 9; xxxii, 29, etc.), with but little interruption (2 Kings iii, 2; x, 28; xi, 18). They had temples to him (1 Kings xvi, 32; 2 Kings x, 21 sq.), and altars (Jer. xi, 13) erected especially on eminences and roofs (Jer. xix, 5; xxxii, 29), as well as images set up in his honor (2 Kings iii, 2). Respecting the form of his worship we have very few distinct notices. His priests and prophets were very numerous (1 Kings xvii, 22; 2 Kings x, 19 sq.), and divided into various classes (2 Kings x, 19). They offered incense to this god (Jer. vii, 9; xi, 13; xxxii, 29, etc.), and, clothed in a peculiar costume (2 Kings x, 22), presented to him bloody offerings, including children (Jer. xix, 5). In connection with these, the priests danced (derisively, "leaped," 1 Kings xviii, 26) around the altar, and gashed themselves with knives (1 Kings xviii, 28) when they did not speedily gain their suit (Propert. ii, 18, 15; Tibull. i, 6, 47 sq.; Lucan. i, 563; Lucian, De Syria, 50 [Ling. 1723]; Movers, Phœniz. i, 682). On the adoration (q. v.) by kissing (1 Kings xix, 18), see KISS. That this Baal worshipped by the Israelites was the same as the widely famed Tyrin Baal, whom the Greeks called Hercules, admits of scarcely a doubt (Movers, i, 178 sq.), and thus Baal is identified with Melkart also. The ancients in general compare Baal with the Greek Zeus or Jove (Sanchoniathon, p. 14, ed. Orelli; Augustine, Quest. in Jud. 16; Dio Cass. lxxviii, 8), as they still more frequently do the Belus of the Babylonians [see BEL], but sometimes identify him with Chronus or Saturn (Ctes. ap. Phot. p. 343). Most investigators recognise in him the sun as the fructifying principle of nature (Creuzer, Symbol. ii, 266 sq.; comp. Vatke, Bibl. Theol. p. 366 sq.); while Gesenius (Comment. in Jes. ii, 335, and Thesaur. p. 224) interprets the Babylonian Bel and the Phœnician Baal as the principal lucky star of the Asiatic astrology, i. e. the planet Jupiter. The latter view has the following considerations in its favor: (1.) In the sacred writings of the Sabæans, the usual title of this planet (in Syriae) is Bel; (2.) A star of good fortune, GAD, was evidently esteemed a deity in Western Asia (comp. Isa. lxxv, 11), and from this the city BAAL-GAD doubtless had its name; (3.) In 2 Kings xxiii, 5, Baal (בַּלְבַּל) would seem to be distinguished from the sun as an object of worship; (4.) On Phœnician coins likewise the sun-god is constantly named distinctively "Lord of Heaven" (בַּלְבַּל הַשָּׁמַיִם), "Lord of Heat" (בַּלְבַּל הַחֵם), "Lord of the Sun" (בַּלְבַּל הַשֶּׁלֶשׁ). But that Baal originally represented the sun, which with its light and warmth controls and vitalizes all nature, is clearly indicated by Sanchoniathon (ut sup.) in the statement that the Phœnicians had designated the sun as the "sole lord of heaven, Beelsamin" (ὄλιον ὀλοῦαν ἄλιον, Βεελσαμίν, i. e. בַּלְבַּל שָׁמַיִם; comp. also Augustine, in Jud. 16). The same name (Balsamin) occurs in Plautus (Pœn. v, 2, 67). For other reasons for the identification of the Babylonian, Syrian, and Phœnician Baal with the solar deity, see Movers, Phœn. p. 180 sq., who has extensively investigated (p. 185 sq.) the relations of this divinity to the other ancient Asiatic deification of the powers of nature, some of which appear in the names Tammuz, Moloch, and Chium (q. v. severally). Without tracing these out minutely, it is appropriate in this connection to specify some of the functions and spheres of activity which Baal, like Zeus among the Greeks, appears to have fulfilled among the Phœnicians, especially inasmuch as the plural form Baalim is thought by many to be expressive of this multiform development. The following are referred to in the Bible.

1. BAAL-BERITH (בַּלְבַּל בְּרִית, Covenant-Baal), corresponding to the Ζεὺς ὄρκιος, Deus Fideus, of the Greek and Roman mythology. He was worshipped in this capacity in a special temple by the Shechemites (Judg. viii, 33; ix, 4, 46), among whom Canaanites were also resident (Judg. ix, 28). Bochart (Canaan, xvii, p. 859), whom Creuzer (Symbol. ii, 87) follows, renders the name "Baal of Berytus" (comp. also Steph. Byz. s. v. Βίρυτρος), like the titles Baal of Syrus (בַּלְבַּל סִיר, Baal of Tarsus (בַּלְבַּל תַּרְסִיס), found in inscriptions. As the Heb. name of Berytus (q. v.) accords with this title (בַּרְיִית or בַּרְיִית), and a deity of alliance or contracts might well be requisite to the polity of the Phœnicians (in whose territory this city was included), q. d. a guardian of c'ompacts; the interpretation of Movers (p. 171), with which Bertheau (on Judg. ix, 4) accords, namely "Baal with whom the league is formed" (comp. Gen. xiv, 3; Exod. xxiii, 32; xxxiv, 12 sq.), gives a signification not altogether inapposite. See BAAL-BERITH.

2. BAAL-ZEBUB (בַּלְבַּל זְבֻב, Fly-Baal): the Sept. construes the latter part of the name differently, ἰπποζυγρεὺν τῆς Βάαλ μύααν ζῆλον Ἀκακῶν; but Josephus has the usual interpretation, Ant. ix, 2, 1), an oracular deity of the Philistines at Ekron (2 Kings i, 2, 3, 16), corresponding to the Ζεὺς ἀπόμυος or μυιάγορος (Pausan. v, 14, 2; viii, 26, 4) and Deus Myiagrus or Myiobles (Plin. x, 40; xxix, 24) of the Greeks and Romans (Salmas. Exerc. p. 9 sq.; Creuzer, Symbol. ii, 487; iv, 392; Hitzig, Philist. p. 313), and to the Hercules Myiagrus (μυιάγορος) of other notices (Solin. c. 2; Clem. Alex. Protrept. p. 11, ed. Syllb.). Flies (and gnats) are in the East a much greater annoyance than with us (comp. Bochart, Hieroz. iii, 346 sq.). See FLY. From this explanation of Baal-Zebub only Hug has of late dissented (Freiburg. Zeitschr. vii, 104 sq.); his assertion, however, that this Philistine divinity is the dung-beetle (scarabæus pillularius), worshipped also in Egypt (as a symbol of the world-god), rests on many uncertain assumptions, and is therefore improbable. (For other interpretations, see the Exec. Handb. d. A. T. ix, 2 sq.) See BEE-ZEBUB.

3. BAAL-PEOR (בַּלְבַּל פְּעֹר, Priapism-Baal), or simply PEOR (פְּעֹר), was the name of a god of the Moabites (Num. xxv, 1 sq.; xxxi, 16; Josh. xxii, 17), apparently worshipped by the prostitution (perhaps proceeds of the hire) of young girls (whence, according to the rabbins, the name, פְּעֹר, pa'ur', to fracture, i. q. to deprive of virginity, comp. Jonathan, Targ. on Num. xxv, 1), probably corresponding to the Roman Priapus (see Jerome, ad Hos. iv, 14) and Mutunus (Creuzer, Symbol. ii, 976). If the above rabbinical significance of the title be correct, he would seem to have given name to Mt. Peor [see BETH-PEOR], where was the seat of his worship; but it is more likely that the title was borrowed from the hill (i. q. d. "ravine") as a distinctive epithet (Movers, p. 667) for his form of worship in that locality (see Creuzer, Symbol. ii, 85). Jerome (in Jovin. i, 12) considers this deity to be Chemosh (q. v.).—Winer, i, 118. See BAAL-PEOR.

4. The deity styled emphatically THE BAAL (בַּלְבַּל הַגָּדֹל, q. d. "the great lord"), whose worship was introduced into Israel by Jezebel (1 Kings xvi, 32 sq.), was apparently the god with whom the Greeks compared their Hercules (2 Mace. iv, 18, 20). His Phœnician appellation was Melkart ("king of the city," i. e.

Tyre), or Harokel ("merchant," he being supposed to be a great navigator), which the Greeks corrupted into a resemblance to their own Ἡράκλεις, and under the name of the "Tyrian Hercules" he was much celebrated (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxvi, 5; Arrian, Expd. Alex. ii, 16). When Herodotus was in Egypt he learned that Hercules was there regarded as one of the primeval gods of that country, and being anxious to obtain more explicit information on the subject, he undertook a voyage to Tyre. The priests there informed him that the foundation of the temple was coeval with that of the city, which they said was founded 2300 years before that time. It was in honor of this god that the Carthaginians for a long time annually sent the tenth of their income to Tyre (Herod. ii, 44). The account of the Baal of Jezebel and Athaliah agrees with this Hercules, since the representation of Scripture (1 Kings xix, 18) is the same with that of Diodorus Siculus (ii, 10), that the fire was always burning on his altar, the priests officiated barefooted, and kissing was among the acts of worship (Cicero, in Verrem, iv, 43). Many representations of the Tyrian Hercules are extant on coins, of which there are two specimens in the British Museum. The first was found in the island of Cossyra (now Pantellaria), which belonged to the Tyrians; the other is a Tyrian coin of silver, weighing 21½ grains, and exhibits a very striking head of the same idol in a more modern and perfect style of art. One of the figures of the date is obliterated, but it is thought that the complete date may have given 84 B.C. See HERCULES.

5. In addition to the above, Fürst (H. h. H. n. Wörterbuch, s. v.) enumerates the following as local or special attributes of Baal. (a) BAAL-GAD (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤂𐤁𐤔), q. d. Luck-Baal), the epithet of Baal as bringing good fortune, like the luck-dispensing star Jupiter; and thence given as the name of a city (Josh. xi, 17; xii, 7; xiii, 5) at the foot of Mount Hermon (Jebel esh-Sheik), in which neighborhood was also situated the city Baal-Hermon (1 Chron. v, 23). See BAAL-GAD. (b) BAAL-HAMON (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤁𐤇𐤌𐤍), q. d. Hot-Baal), the title of the Phœnician Baal, as representing the vivifying warmth of nature, like the Egyptian Ammon (Sun-god) [see AMON]; and thence given to a city in Samaria (2 Cant. viii, 11), where his worship may have been practised. See BAAL-HAMON. (c) BAAL-CHATSOR (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤇𐤕𐤓𐤕), q. d. village-protecting Baal), the epithet of Baal as the tutelary deity of Hazor (q. v.); then the name of a city in the vicinity of Ephraim or Ephron (2 Sam. xiii, 23; 2 Chron. xiii, 19). See BAAL-HAZOR. Baal is repeatedly named among the Phœnicians as the guardian divinity of towns, e. g. "Baal-Tyre" (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤕𐤏𐤕), Malt. i, 1), "Baal-Tarsus" (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤕𐤏𐤕, on coins of that city), "Baal-Lybia" (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤋𐤏𐤁𐤁, Zeb. Aegypt. Numid. iv, 1), etc. See BAAL-. (d) BAAL-HERMON (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤁𐤇𐤌𐤍), q. d. Hill-Baal), i. e. Baal as the protector of Mount Hermon, in a city near which his worship was instituted; thence applied to the city itself (1 Chron. v, 23), near Baal-gad (q. v.). That part of Hermon (q. v.) on which this town lay is called (Judg. iii, 3) Mount Baal-Hermon (q. v.). See BAAL-HERMON. (e) BAAL-MEON (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤌𐤏𐤍), q. d. heaven-dwelling Baal), i. e. Baal as associated with the hill of Baal or Tarn, supposed to be in the seventh heaven, as the term divine "habitation" (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤌𐤏𐤍) often signifies (Deut. xxvi, 15; Psa. lxxviii, 6), and thus equivalent to the later Baal-Zebul (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤆𐤁𐤏, lord of the celestial dwelling, i. e. "prince of the power of the air"), and the Phœnician Beelshamen (Βεελσαμν, i. e. 𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤌𐤏𐤍, lord of heaven, as interpreted by Sanchoniathon [p. 14, Κήρυκος οὐρανίου] and Augustine [in loc. Judg., dominus cali]); whence the name of the place Beth-Baal-Meon (q. v.), in Josh. xiii, 17, or simply Baal-Meon (Num. xxxii, 58; 1 Chron. v, 8), or even abridged into Beon (Num. xxxii, 3). See BAAL-MEON; BEEZELZEBU. (f) BAAL-PERATSIM (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤑𐤏𐤌𐤍, q. d. vine-Baal), so called apparently as the presiding deity of the mountain Perazim (q. v.), an eminence famous for an ancient victory (Isa. xxviii, 21), and probably a seat of his worship; and hence applied in this form to the place itself (2 Sam. v, 20; 1 Chron. xiv, 11), in the same way as Hermon and Peor above, and at length Lebanon itself, as mountains representing great natural features. See BAAL-PERAZIM. (g) BAAL-TSEPHON (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤕𐤑𐤕𐤍, i. e. Typhon-Baal), the name of Baal as the opposing genius of cosmical order (comp. 𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤕𐤏𐤕, the north, i. e. the dark, cold quarter), or the ruling spirit of winter. This was an Egyptian phasis of the divinity, and the name was transferred to the city or locality of Baal-Zephon, or the route of the Israelites to Canaan (Exod. xiv, 2). See BAAL-ZEPHON. (h) BAAL-SHALISHA (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤕𐤔𐤏𐤕, q. d. Baal of the third or triad district), the tutelary deity of the region Shalisha (q. v.), to a city of which (1 Sam. ix, 4) his name was thus transferred (1 Kings iv, 20), situated (according to the Onomasticon) 15 Roman miles north of Diospolis, and called by the Sept. and Eusebius Beth-Shalish (by a frequent interchange of prefixes). See BAAL-SHALISHA. (i) BAAL-TAMAR (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤕𐤁𐤌𐤓, q. d. palm-stick-Baal, comp. Jer. x, 5), is Baal the phallus of Bacchus, or the scarecrow Priapus in the melon-patches (see the apocryphal explanation in Baruch vi, 70), and thence assigned to a city in the fertile meadow near Gibeah (Judg. xx, 33), called in the Onomast. Beth-Tamar. See BAAL-TAMAR.

On the subject generally, see (in addition to the works above referred to) Selden, De Diis Syris; Perizonius, Origines Babyl.; Bullmann, Ueb. Kronos, in the Abhandl. d. Berl. Akad. 1814, 1815; Buttman, Mythol.; Gesenius, in Ersch's Encycl. viii; Stuhr, Relig. d. heidn. Völker d. Orients; Metzger, in Pauli's Real-enc. d. Musisch. Wissenschaft. s. v. Ba'älis (Heb. Ba'älis, 𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤌𐤏𐤍, prob. for 𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤌𐤏𐤍, son of exultation; Sept. Βελισά v. r. Βελισσαά, and even Βασιλισσα; Vulg. Baulis), king of the Ammonites about the time of the Babylonian captivity, whom Johanan and his fellow-generals reported to Gedaliah, the viceroy, as having sent Ishmael to assassinate him (Jer. xl, 14). B.C. 587. Some MSS. have Baalim (𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤌𐤏𐤍), and so Josephus (Baalim, Ant. x, 9, 3).
Ba'äl-me'en (Heb. Ba'äl Meon, 𐤁𐤀𐤋 𐤌𐤏𐤍, lord of dwelling; Sept. ἡ Βελαμείων, but in Chron. Βελαμείων v. r. Βελαμασίων, and in Ezek. omits; otherwise BETH-MEON, Jer. xlvi, 23, and BETH-BAAL-MEON, Josh. xiii, 17), a town in the tribe of Reuben beyond the Jordan, or at least one of the towns which were "built" by the Reubenites (Num. xxxii, 38), and to which they "gave other names." Possibly the "Beth-" (q. v.), which is added to the name in its mention elsewhere, and which sometimes superseded the "Baal-" (q. v.) of the original name, is one of the changes referred to. See BAALIM. It is also named in 1 Chron. v, 8, and on each occasion with Nebo.

In the time of Ezekiel it was in the possession of the Moabites, and under that prosperous dominion had evidently become a place of distinction, being noticed as one of the cities which are the "glory of the country" (Ezek. xxv, 9). In the days of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Βεθλαομή, Bethlamo), Baalmen is still a very large village called Balmeno, 9 miles distant from Heshbon (Βεθλόμε, Eshus), near the "mountain of the hot springs," and reputed to be the native place of Elisha. At the distance of two miles south-east of Heshbon, Burckhardt (ii, 624) found the ruins of a place called Mypn, or (as Dr. Robinson [Researches, iii, Append. p. 170] corrects it) Māin, which is doubtless the same; so Schwartz, Māin (Pal. s., p. 227). In Num. xxxii, 3, apparently the same place is called BEON, perhaps by an error of the copyists or by contraction.—Kitto; Smith.

Ba'al-pe'or (Heb. Ba'al Pe'or, בַּעַל פְּעוֹר, lord of Peor, or sometimes only פְּעוֹר, Peor, respectively represented in the Sept. by Βαελπεριώρ and Φογιώρ) appears to have been properly the idol of the Moabites (Num. xxv, 1-9; Deut. iv, 3; Josh. xxii, 17; Psa. cvi, 28; Hos. ix, 10); but also of the Midianites (Num. xxxi, 15, 16). It is the common opinion that this god was worshipped by obscene rites, and from the time of Jerome downward it has been usual to compare him to Priapus (see Siekler, in Augusti's Theol. Blatt. i, 193 sq.). Selden and J. Owen (De Diis Syris, i, 5; Theologoumena, v, 4) seem to be the only persons who have disputed whether any of the passages in which this god is named really warrant such a conclusion. The narrative (Num. xxv) seems clearly to show that this form of Baal-worship was connected with licentious rites. The least that the above passages express is the fact that the Israelites received this idolatry from the women of Moab, and were led away to eat of their sacrifices (comp. Psa. cvi, 28); and it is possible for that sex to have been the means of seducing them into the adoption of their worship, without the idolatry itself being of an obscene kind. It is also remarkable that so few authors are agreed even as to the general character of these rites. Most Jewish authorities (except the Targum of Jonathan on Num. xxv) represent his worship to have consisted of rites which are filthy in the extreme, but not lascivious (see Braunius, D. Vest. Sacrd. i, 7, for one of the fullest collections of Jewish testimonies on this subject). Without laying too much stress on the rabbinical derivation of the word פְּעוֹר, hæstus, i. e. "aperire hymenam virginum," we seem to have reason to conclude that this was the nature of the worship. This is, moreover, the view of Creuzer (ii, 411), Winer, Gesenius, Fürst, and almost all critics. The reader is referred for more detailed information particularly to Creuzer's Symbolik and Meyers' Phönizier. The identification of Baal with the sun [see BAAI.] as the generative power of nature confirms the opinion of the lascivious character of this worship. Peor is properly the name of a mountain [see PEOR], and Baal-Peor was the name of the god worshipped there. Some identify this god with CHEMOSH (q. v.).—Kitto. See BAAIIM.

Ba'al-per'azim (Heb. Ba'al Perazim, בַּעַל פְּרָצִים, having rents; Sept. [at the first occurrence in Sam.] Βαίλ Φαραζιμ [v. r. Φρααζιμ]), the scene of a victory of David over the Philistines, and of a great destruction of their images, and so named by him in a characteristic passage of exulting poetry—"Jehovah hath burst (פָּרַץ) upon mine enemies before me as a burst (פָּרַץ) of waters." Therefore he called the name of that place 'Baal-perazim,' i. e. bursts or destructions (2 Sam. v, 20; 1 Chron. xiv, 11). The place and the circumstance appear to be again alluded to in Isa. xxviii, 21, where it is called Mount Perazim. Perhaps this may indicate the previous existence of a high-place or sanctuary of Baal at this spot, which would lend more point to David's exclamation (see Gesenius, Jes. in loc.). The Sept. render the name in its two occurrences respectively Ἐπίνω ἑτακοπών and Διακοπή φαφασίρ, the latter an instance of retention of the original word and its explanation side by side; the former uncertain. See PERAZIM. It is important as being the only one with the prefix Baal [see BAAI.] of which we know the circumstances under which it was imposed; and yet even here it was rather an opprobrious application of a term already in use than a new name.—Smith, s. v. The locality appears to have been near the valley of Rephaim, west of Jerusalem; perhaps identical with the modern Jebel My (Van de Velde, Map). See PERAZIM.

Ba'al-shal'isha (Heb. Ba'al Shalishah, בַּעַל שְׁלִישִׁי, lord of Shalishah, or having a third; Sept. Βααλσαλίσια v. r. Βαυσαλίσια and Βαυσαλίσια), a place named only in 2 Kings iv, 42, as that from which the man came with provisions for Elisha, apparently not far from (the Ephraimite) Gilgal (comp. v, 38). It was doubtless in the district of Shalisha (q. v.) which is mentioned in 1 Sam. ix, 4; but whether it took its name thence, or from some modification of the worship of Baal (q. v.), of which it was the seat, is uncertain. See BAAIIM. Eusebius and Jerome describe it (Onomast. Βαυσαλίσια, Bethsalisa, where the frequent interchange of 'Baal' and 'Beth' is observable) as a city 15 R. miles N. of Diospolis, near Mt. Ephraim. These indications correspond to the site of the present ruins Kharbet Hattat, about midway between Yafa and Sebastieh (Van de Velde, Map).

Ba'al-ta'mar (Heb. Ba'al Tamar, בַּעַל תְּמָר, place of palm-trees; Sept. Βαάλ Ταμάρ), a place near Gibeah, in the tribe of Benjamin, where the other tribes fought with the Benjamites (Judg. xx, 35). It was doubtless so called as being one of the sanctuaries or groves of Baal. See BAAIIM. The palm-tree (תְּמָר) of Deborah (Judg. iv, 5) was situated somewhere in the locality, and is possibly alluded to (Stanley, Pales. p. 145). Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Βααλταμάρ, Baalthamar) call it Bethamar (Βησαμάρ, Bethamari), thus affording another instance of that interchange of Beth and Baal which is also exemplified in Baal-shal'isha and Baal-Meon. The notices seem to correspond to the present ruined site Erlath, about three miles N.E. of Jerusalem (Van de Velde, Map), on a ravine running toward Anathoth (Robinson, Researches, ii, 315 note).

Baal'tis (Βααλτίς, prob. fem. of Baal), another name apparently for the Syrian Venus, the chief female deity of the Phœnicians, the ASHTORETH of the O. T. See ASTARTE.

Ba'al-zeb'ub (Heb. Ba'al Zebub, בַּעַל זְבֻב, fly-god; Sept. ὁ [v. r. ἡ] Βαάλ ζεβούβ) occurs in 2 Kings i, 2, 3, 16, as the god of the Philistines at Ekron, whose oracle Ahaziah sent to consult. Though such a designation of the god appears to us a kind of mockery, and has consequently been regarded as a term of derision (Selden, De Diis Syris, p. 373), yet there seems no reason to doubt that this was the name given to the god by his worshippers, and the plague of flies in hot climates furnishes a sufficient reason for the designation. See FLY. Similarly the Greeks gave the epithet ἀπόμυμος to Zeus (Clem. Alex. Protrept. ii, 38) as worshipped at Elis (Pausan. v, 14, 2), the Mylæus ævis of the Romans (Solin. Polyhist. 1), and Pliny (xxix, 6, 34, init.) speaks of a Fly-god Mylotes. As this name is the one used by Ahaziah himself, it is difficult to suppose that it was not the proper and reverential title of the god; and the more so, as Baalzebub (Βααλζεβούβ) in Matt. x, 25, seems to be the contemptuous corruption of it. See BELZEBUB. Any explanation, however, of the symbolical sense in which flies may have been regarded in ancient religions, and by which we could conceive how his worshippers could honor him as the god of flies, would appear to us much more compatible with his name than the only sense which can be derived from the Greek parallel. This receives some confirmation, perhaps, from the words of Josephus (Ant. ix. 2, 1), who says, "Azariah sent to the Fly (τῆρ Μελῶν), for that is the name of the god" (τῆρ θεῶν). The analogy of classical idolatry would lead us to conclude that all these Baals are only the same god under various modifications of attributes and emblems, but the scanty notices to which we owe all our knowledge of Syro-Arabian idolatry do not furnish data for any decided opinion on this phasis of Baal.—KITTO; SMITH. See BAALIM.

Ba'al-ze'phon (Heb. Ba'al Zephon', בַּאֲלֵצֶפּוֹן, place of Typhon; Sept. Βελαεπιφών or Βελαεπιών, Josephus Βαλεφών, Ant. ii. 15, 1), a town belonging to Egypt, on the border of the Red Sea (Exod. xiv. 2; Num. xxxiii. 7). Forster (Epist. ad J. D. Michælem, p. 28) believes it to have been the same place as Hieropolis (Ἱερωπόλις), on the western gulf of the Red Sea (Pliny, Nat. Hist. v. 12; Strabo, vii. p. 836; Ptolem. iv. 5), where Typhon (which Forster makes in Coptic ΔΩΦΩΝ; but, contra, see Rosemüller, Alterthum. iii. 261), the evil genius of the Egyptians, was worshipped. See BAALIM. But, according to Manetho (Josephus contra Apion. i. 26), the name of Typhon's city was Avaris (Ἀραίς), which some, as Champollion (who writes ΟΥΑΡΙ, and renders "causing malediction;" L'Égypte sans les Pharaons, ii. 87 sq.), consider, wrongly, to be the same place, the stronghold of the Hyksos, both which places were connected with Typhon (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἡρώ). Avaris cannot be Hieropolis, for geographical reasons. (Compare, as to the site of Avaris, Bruzsch, Geographische Inschriften, i. 86 sq.; as to that of Hieropolis, Lepsius, Chron. d'Égypt. i. 344 sq., and 342, against the two places being the same.) In fact, nothing is known of the situation of Baal-zephon except what is connected with a consideration of the route taken by the Israelites in leaving Egypt, for it was "over against Baal-zephon" that they were encamped before they passed the Red Sea. The supposition that identifies its site with Jebel Deraj or Kalabak, the southern barrier of the mouth of the valley leading from Cairo to the Red Sea, is as likely as any other. See EXODE. From the position of Goshen, and the indications afforded by the narrative of the route of the Israelites, Baal-zephon must have been on the western shore of the Gulf of Suez, a little below its head, which at that time, however, has been located by some many miles northward of the present head. See GOSHEN; RED SEA, PASSAGE OF. Its position with respect to the other places mentioned with it is clearly indicated. The Israelites encamped before or at Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, before Baal-zephon, according to Exodus (xiv. 2, 9), while in Numbers Pi-hahiroth is described as being before Baal-zephon; and it is said that when the people came to the former place they pitched before Migdol (xxxiii. 7); and again, that afterward they departed from before Pi-hahiroth, here in Heb. Hahiroth (v. 8). Migdol and Baal-zephon must therefore have been opposite to one another, and the latter behind Pi-hahiroth, with reference to the Israelites. Baal-zephon was perhaps a well-known place, if, as seems likely, it is always mentioned to indicate the position of Pi-hahiroth, which we take to be a natural locality. See PI-HAHIROTH. The name has been supposed to mean "sanctuary of Typhon," or "sacred to Typhon," an etymology approved by Gesenius (Thes. Heb. p. 225), but not by Fürst (Heb. Handb. s. v.). Zephon would well enough correspond in sound to Typhon, had we any ground for considering the latter name to be either Egyptian or Semitic; and even then Zephon in Baal-zephon might not be its Hebrew transcription, inasmuch as it is joined with the Hebrew form בַּאֲלֵצֶפּוֹן. Hence many connect Baal-zephon, as a Hebrew compound, with the root צֶפֶן, to spy, as if it were named from a watchtower on the frontier like the neighboring בְּרֵזֶרֶת, "the tower." It is noticeable that the name of the son of Gad, called Ziphon (זִיפּוֹן) in Gen. xlv. 16, is written Zephon (זֶפּוֹן) in Num. xxvi. 15.—KITTO; SMITH.

Ba'ana (Heb. Ba'ana', בַּאנָא, prob. for בַּאנָאִים, son of affliction), the name of three or four men.

1. (Sept. Ba'á.) Son of Ahilud, one of Solomon's twelve purveyors; his district comprised Taanach, Megiddo, and all Bethshan, with the adjacent region (1 Kings iv. 12). B.C. 1012.

2. (Sept. Baavá.) Son of Hushai, another of Solomon's purveyors, having Asher and Bealoth (1 Kings iv. 16, where, however, the name is incorrectly Anglicized "Baamah"). B.C. 1012.

3. (Sept. Baavá.) Father of Zadok, which latter repaired a portion of the walls of Jerusalem on the return from Babylon, between the fish-gate and the old-gate (Neh. iii. 4). B.C. 446.

4. (Baavá.) One of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Esdr. v. 8); the BAANAH (q. v.) of the Heb. text (Ezra ii. 2).

Ba'anah (Heb. Baanah', בַּאנָה, another form of the name Baan (q. v.); Sept. Baavá), the name of four men.

1. One of the two sons of Rimmon the Beerothite, captains of bands in Saul's army, who assassinated Ishbosheth (2 Sam. iv. 2); for which murder they were slain by David, and their mutilated bodies hung up over the pool at Hebron (ver. 5, 6, 19). B.C. 1046. Josephus represents him (Baava'za, Ant. vii. 2, 1) as a person of noble family, and instigated by personal ambition. See DAVID.

2. A Netophathite, father of Heleb or Heled, which latter was one of David's thirty heroes (2 Sam. xxiii. 29; 1 Chron. xi. 30). B.C. ante 1061. The Sept. utterly confounds the list of names at this part, but some copies retain the Baavá.

3. (1 Kings iv. 16.) See BAANA, 2.

4. One of the chief Jews who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, B.C. 536 (Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7); possibly the same with one of those who long afterward (B.C. 410) united in the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 27).

Baäni'as (rather Baanias [q. v.], Bava'ias), one of the Israelites, sons of Phoros, who divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (1 Esdr. v. 26); evidently the BENAIAM (q. v.) of the correct text (Ezra ii. 25).

Baanites, a sect of Paulicians, called by the name of their leader, Baanes, in the ninth century.—Neander, Ch. Hist. iii. 250, 266. See PAULICIANS.

Ba'ara (Heb. Eavrá', בַּאֲרָא, brutish; Sept. Baavá v. r. Baavá), one of the wives of Shoharaim, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 8, where, however, there is some confusion as to his prior children), by whom she had several children (ver. 9, where by some error she is called HODESH, compare ver. 11). B.C. ante 1012. See SHOHARAIM.

Baáras (Baárac), the name (according to Josephus, War. vii. 6, 3) of a valley including the city of Herodium on the north, and so called from an extraordinary species of plant (but whether the same with the gigantic rue, πύργον, mentioned in the same connection, does not appear), to the root of which the credulous Jewish historian ascribes magical properties of a most marvellous character. See HERODIUM. For other faint notices of a locality by names similar to Baaris, in the vicinity of Macharus, see Reiland, Palest. p. 881.

Baäse'ah (Heb. Baäseyah', בַּאֲסַיָּה, for בַּאֲסַיָּהוּ, son of Asaiah, or work of Jehorah; Sept. Baacia), a Gershonite Levite, son of Malchia, and father of Michael, in the lineage of Asaph (1 Chron. vi, 40 [25]). B. C. cir. 1310.

Ba'asha (Heb. Basha', בָּאָשָׁא, from an obsolete root, בָּשָׂא, signifying, according to Fürst [Heb. Handb. s. v.], to be bold, but according to Gesenius [Thes. Heb. s. v.] = בָּשָׂה, to be offensive, hence wicked; Sept. Baasa, Josephus Βασάριος, Ant. viii, 11, 4, etc.), third sovereign of the separate kingdom of Israel, and the founder of its second dynasty (1 Kings xv; xvi; 2 Chron. xvi; Jer. xli, 9). He reigned B.C. 950-927. Baasha was son of Ahijah, of the tribe of Issachar, and commander of the royal forces of the northern kingdom; he conspired against King Nadab, son of Jeroboam, when he was besieging the Philistine town of Gibbethon, and, having killed him, proceeded to extirpate his entire circle of relatives. He appears to have been of humble origin, as the Prophet Jehu speaks of him as having been "exalted out of the dust" (1 Kings xvi, 2). In matters of religion his reign was no improvement on that of Jeroboam; he equally forgot his position as king of the nation of God's election, and was chiefly remarkable for his persevering hostility to Judah. It was probably in the twenty-third year of his reign [see ASA] that he made war on its king, Asa, and began to fortify Ramah as a barrier against it. He was compelled to desist, however, being defeated by the unexpected alliance of Asa with Benhadad I of Damascus, who had previously been friendly to Baasha. Benhadad took several towns in the north of Israel, and conquered lands belonging to it near the sources of Jordan (1 Kings xv, 18 sq.). Baasha died in the twenty-fourth year of his reign, and was honorably buried in the beautiful city of Tirzah (Cant. vi, 4), which he had made his capital (1 Kings xv, 33).—Smith, s. v. For his idolatries, the Prophet Jehu declared to him the determination of God to exterminate his family likewise, which was accomplished in the days of his son Elah (q. v.) by Zimri (1 Kings xvi, 10-13). Babas (Βάβας or Βάβα, since the latter only appears as a genitive), a person mentioned by Josephus as the last descendant of the Asmoneans, but simply to relate that his sons were preserved by Costabarus from the general massacre of the adherents of Antigonus ordered by Herod the Great on obtaining possession of Jerusalem, until their concealment was disclosed by Salome the tyrant, who immediately made sure of their death (Ant. xv, 7, 10).

Babe (בֵּיבֵי, olel', or בֵּיבֵי, olal', so called from its petulance, Psa. viii, 2; xvii, 14, elsewhere "child" or "infant;" תַּבְּלִימִן, tablimin', from the same root, Isa. iii, 4; once בָּבִי, na'ar, Exod. ii, 6, usually a "lul;" Gr. βρέφος, prop. an unborn fetus, Luke i, 41, 44, but also a very young child, Luke ii, 12, 16; 1 Pet. ii, 2; νηπιον, strictly an infant [i. e. as yet unable to talk], but likewise used of children generally, Matt. xi, 25; xxi, 16; Luke x, 21; Rom. ii, 10; 1 Cor. iii, 1; Heb. v, 13). This term is used figuratively in Isa. iii, 4, to represent the succession of weak and wicked princes who reigned over the kingdom of Judah from the death of Josiah to the destruction of the city and Temple. In the New Testament, the term refers to those who are weak in the Christian faith and knowledge, being ignorant and inconstant: or being but just born again, begotten from above, they require that heavenly nourishment which is suited to their nature—"the sincere milk of the word" (1 Cor. iii, 1; Heb. v, 13; 1 Pet. ii, 2). See CHILD.

Ba'bel (Heb. Babel', בָּבֶל, confusion; and so the Sept. Σύγχυσις, Gen. xi, 9), the name applied to the Tower of Babel (Gen. xi, 9), but afterward extended (in the Heb.) to the city of Babylon (Gen. x, 10), which appears to have grown up around it, and finally to the whole province of Babylonia (Ezek. xxiii, 17, margin), of which this was the capital. For these latter, see BABYLON; BABYLONIA.

1. Origin of the Tower.—From the account in Gen. xi, 1-9, it appears that the primitive fathers of mankind having, from the time of the Deluge, wandered without fixed abode, settled at length in the land of Shinar, where they took up a permanent residence. As yet they had remained together without experiencing those vicissitudes and changes in their outward lot which encourage the formation of different modes of speech, and were therefore of one language. Arrived, however, in the land of Shinar, and finding materials suitable for the construction of edifices, they proceeded to make and burn bricks, and using the bitumen, in which parts of the country abound, for cement, they built a city and a tower of great elevation. A divine interference, however, is related to have taken place. In consequence, the language of the builders was confounded, so that they were no longer able to understand each other. They therefore "left off to build the city," and were scattered "abroad upon the face of all the earth." The narrative adds that the place took its name of Babel (confusion) from this confusion of dialect. See CONFUSION OF TONGUES.

2. Its Design.—The sacred narrative (Gen. xi, 4) assigns as the reason which prompted men to the undertaking simply a desire to possess a building so large and high as might be a mark and rallying-point in the vast plains where they had settled, in order to prevent their being scattered abroad, and thus the ties of kindred be rudely sundered, individuals be involved in peril, and their numbers be prematurely thinned at a time when population was weak and insufficient. The idea of preventing their being scattered abroad by building a lofty tower is applicable in the most remarkable manner to the wide and level plains of Babylonia, where scarcely one object exists different from another to guide the traveller in his journeying, and which, in those early days, as at present, were a sea of land, the compass being then unknown. Such an attempt agrees with the circumstances in which the sons of Noah were placed, and is in itself of a commendable nature. But that some ambitious and unworthy motives were blended with these feelings is clearly implied in the sacred record, which, however, is evidently conceived and set forth in a dramatic manner (ver. 6, 7), and may wear around a historical substance somewhat of a poetical dress (Bauer, Mythol. i, 223). The apostate Julian has attempted to turn the narrative into ridicule; but even if viewed only as an attempt to account for the origin of diversity of languages, and of the dispersion of the human family, it challenges consideration and respect. The opinion of Heeren (Asiatic Nations, ii, 146) is far different and more correct: "There is," says he, "perhaps nowhere else to be found a narrative so venerable for its antiquity, or so important in the history of civilization, in which we have at once preserved the traces of primeval international commerce, the first political associations, and the first erection of secure and permanent dwellings." A comparison of this narrative with the absurd or visionary pictures which the Greeks and Romans give of the primitive condition of mankind, will gratify the student of the Bible and confirm the faith of the Christian by showing the marked difference there is between the history contained in Genesis and the fictions of the poet, or the traditions of the mythologist. (See Eichhorn, Diversitatis linguarum ex traditione Semitica origine, Goett. 1788; also in the Biblioth. d. bibl. Lit. iii, 981 sq.)

3. Traditions concerning it.—Versions more or less substantially correct of this account are found among other nations. The Chaldaeans themselves relate (Abydenus, quoted by Eusebius, Prepar. Evang. i, 14; comp. Chron. Armen. i, 38 and 59) that "the first men, relying on their size and strength, raised a tower reaching toward heaven in the place where Babylon afterward stood, but that the winds, assisting the gods, brought the building down on the heads of the builders, out of the ruins of which Babylon itself was built. Before this event men had spoken the same tongue, but afterward, by the act of the gods, they were made to differ in their speech." Plato also reports (Polit. p. 272) a tradition that in the Golden Age men and animals made use of one common language, but, too ambitiously aspiring to immortality, were, as a punishment, confounded in their speech by Jupiter. In the details of the story of the war of the Titans against the gods may also be traced some traditional resemblance to the narrative of the Bible (see Pliny, vii, 1, 11 and 112; Ilygin, Fab. 143). "The sibyl," says Josephus (Ant. i, 4, 5), "also makes mention of this town, and of the confusion of language, when she says thus: 'When all men were of one language, some of them built a high tower, as if they would thereby ascend up to heaven; but the gods sent storms of wind and overthrew the tower, and gave every one his peculiar language; and for this reason it was that the city was called Babylon'" (comp. Philo, Cyp. i, 406). The same writer (ib. 2) assigns as the reason of this overthrow and confusion the displeasure of God at seeing them act so madly under the influence of Nimrod, "a bold bad man," who, in order to alienate the minds of the people from God, and to take revenge for the Deluge which had destroyed their forefathers, induced them to build a tower too high for the waters to be able to reach. Aben Ezra (in loc. Gen.) has given a more probable explanation. "Those," he says, "who built the Tower of Babel were not so insensate as to imagine they could by any such means reach to heaven; nor did they fear another Deluge, since they had the promise of God to the contrary; but they wished for a city which should be a common residence and a general rendezvous, serving in the wide and open plains of Babylonia to prevent the traveller from losing his way; in order that while they took measures for their own convenience and advantage, they might also gain a name with future ages."—Kitto, s. v. See NIMROD.

4. Its subsequent History.—The "Tower of Babel" is only mentioned once in Scripture (Gen. xi, 4-5), and then as incomplete. No reference to it appears in the prophetic denunciations of the punishments which were to fall on Babylon for her pride. It is therefore quite uncertain whether the building ever advanced beyond its foundations. As, however, the classical writers universally, in their descriptions of Babylon, gave a prominent place to a certain tower-like building, which they called the temple (Herod., ut inf.; Diod. Sic. ii, 9; Arrian, Expedit. Alex. vii, 17, etc.), or the tomb (Strabo, xvi, p. 738) of Belus, it has generally been supposed that the tower was in course of time finished, and became the principal temple of the Chaldean metropolis, S. B. L. Certainly this may have been the case; but, while there is presumption in favor of it, there is some evidence against it. A Jewish tradition, recorded by Bechart (Philo. i, 9), declared that fire fell from heaven, and split the tower through to its foundation; while Alexander Polyhistor (Frag. 10), and the other profane writers who noticed the tower (as Abydenus, Frs. 5 and 6), said that it had been blown down by the winds. Such authorities, therefore, as we possess, represent the building as destroyed soon after its erection. When the Jews, however, were carried captive into Babylonia, struck with the vast magnitude and peculiar character of certain of the Babylonian temples, they imagined that they saw in them not merely buildings similar in type and mode of construction to the "tower" (בְּבֵל) of their scriptures, but in this or that temple they thought to recognise the very tower itself.—Smith, s. v. See BABYLON.

5. The "Tower of Belus," presumed to occupy its site.

—Herodotus describes the temple in his own simple but graphic manner (i, 181). "In the other division of the city is the temple of the god Belus, with brazen gates, remaining till my own time, quadrangular, and in all of two stadia. In the middle of the sacred enclosure there stands a solid tower of a stadium both in depth and width; upon this tower another is raised, and another upon that, to the number of eight towers. An ascent to them has been made on the outside, in a circle extending round all the towers. When you reach about half way you find resting-places. In the last tower is a large temple, and in the temple lies a large bed well furnished, and near it stands a golden table; but there is no image within; nor does any one remain there by night, only a native female, one whom the god has chosen in preference to all others, as say the Chaldeans who are priests of that god. And these persons also say, asserting what I do not believe, that the god himself frequents the temple and reposes on the couch. And there belongs to the temple in Babylon another shrine lower down, where there stands a large golden image of the god, and near it is placed a large golden table, and the pedestal and throne are gold, and, as the Chaldeans say, these things were made for eight hundred talents of gold. And out of the shrine is a golden altar; and there is another great altar where sheep-offerings are sacrificed, for it is not permitted to sacrifice upon the golden altar, except sucklings only; but upon the greater altar the Chaldeans offer every year a thousand talents' worth of frankincense at the time when they celebrate the festival of the god. And there was at that time in the temple a statue of twelve cubits of solid gold; but I did not see it, and relate merely what was told me by the Chaldeans. Darius Hystaspis wished to have this statue, but did not dare to take it; but Xerxes, his son, took it, and slew the priest who forbade him to move the statue. Thus is this sacred place adorned; and there are also in it many private offerings." These offerings, made by individuals, consisting of statues, censers, cups, and sacred vessels of massive gold, constituted a property of immense value. On the top Semiramis placed three golden statues of Jupiter, Juno, and Rhea. The first was 40 feet high, and weighed 1000 Babylonish talents. The statue of Rhea was of the same weight; the goddess was seated on a golden throne with lions at each knee, and two serpents of silver. The statue of Juno was erect like that of Jupiter, weighing 800 talents; she grasped a serpent by the head with her right hand, and held in her left a sceptre enriched with gems. A table of beaten gold was common to these three divinities, weighing 500 talents. On the table were two goblets of 10 talents, and two censers of 500 talents each, and three vases of prodigious magnitude. The total value of the precious articles and treasures contained in this proud achievement of idolatry has been computed to exceed six hundred millions of dollars.

From the Holy Scriptures it appears that when Nebuchadnezzar conquered Jerusalem and levelled most of the city with the ground, "he brought away the treasures of the temple, and the treasures of the king's house, and put them all into the temple of Bel at Babylon" (2 Chron. xxxvii, 7). The brazen and other vessels which Solomon had caused to be made for the service of Jehovah are said to have been broken up by order of the Assyrian monarch, and formed into the famous gates of brass which so long adorned the superb entrances into the great area of the temple of Belus (comp. Heateus ap. Joseph, Ant. i, 4, 3).

The purposes to which this splendid edifice was appropriated may be partly gathered from the preceding statements. These purposes varied in some degree with the changes in opinions and manners which successive ages brought. The signal disappointment inflicted on its original founders show that even in its origin there was connected with it something greatly displeasing to God. It seems, indeed, always to have existed in derogation of the divine glory. Consecrated at the first, as it probably was, to the immoderate ambition of the monotheistic children of the Deluge, it passed to the Sabian religion, and thus, falling one degree from purity of worship, became a temple of the sun and the rest of the host of heaven, till, in the natural progress of corruption, it sank into gross idolatry, and, as the passage from Herodotus shows, was polluted by the vices which generally accompanied the observances of heathen superstition. In one purpose it undoubtedly proved of service to mankind. The Babylonians were given to the study of astronomy. This ennobling pursuit was one of the peculiar functions of the learned men denominated by Herodotus Chaldeans, the priests of Belus; and the temple was crowned by an astronomical observatory, from the elevation of which the starry heavens could be most advantageously studied over plains so open and wide, and in an atmosphere so clear and bright as those of Babylonia.

To Nimrod the first foundations of the tower are ascribed; Semiramis enlarged and beautified it (Ctesias ap. Diod. Sic. ii, 7); but it appears that the temple of Bel, in its most renowned state, was not completed till the time of Nebuchadnezzar, who, after the accomplishment of his many conquests, consecrated this superb edifice to the idolatrous object to whom he ascribed his victories. That the observatory on the tower was erected in remote times there is good reason to believe. Prideaux mentions (Connection, i, 123) the circumstance that when Alexander made himself master of Babylon, Callisthenes, the philosopher, who attended him thither, found astronomical observations ascending upward 1900 years.—Kitto. See ASTROLOGY.

6. Evidence as to its present Remains.—After the lapse of so many centuries, and the occurrence in "the land of Shinar" of so many revolutions, it is not to be expected that the identification of the Tower of Babel with any actual ruin should be easy, or lead to any very certain result. The majority of opinions, however, among the learned, make it the same as the above-described temple of Belus; and as to its modern locality, the predominant opinion has been in favor of the great temple of Nebo at Borsippa, the modern Birs Nimrud, although the distance of that place from Babylon is a great difficulty in the way of the identification. When Christian travellers first began to visit the Mesopotamian ruins, they generally attached the name of "the Tower of Babel" to whatever mass, among those beheld by them, was the loftiest and most imposing. Rawulf, in the 16th century, found the "Tower of Babel" at Febuqyah; Pietro della Valle, in the 18th, identified it with the ruin Babil near Hillah; while early in the present century Rich and Ker Porter revived the Jewish notion, and argued for its identity with the Birs. There are, in reality, no positive grounds either for identifying the tower with the temple of Belus, or for supposing that any remains of it long survived the check which the builders received when they were "scattered abroad upon the face of the earth," and "left off to build the city" (Gen. xi, 8); yet the striking general similarity of its form and construction to those structures, taken in connection with its evidently great antiquity, create a presumption in favor of the identification that it is difficult to resist. See SHINAR. Nor, indeed, does the Birs Nimrud lie much, if any, farther distant from Hillah (the modern representative of Babylon) than do (in an opposite direction) some other ruins (e. g. especially the mound called Babil, the only other rival to the honor of representing the ancient Tower of Babel and temple of Belus in the vicinity), which were yet undoubtedly included within the ample circuit of the ancient walls; in fact, the Birs itself will fall within the line of the outer walls of Babylon, if laid down of the extent described by Herodotus. See BABYLON. Its pyramidal structure, also, with the numerous contractions of its successive stages, still traceable in the ruins, favors the identification (see below).—Smith; Kitto.

7. Description of "Birs Nimrud," its supposed modern Relic.—The appearance of this massive ruin is deeply impressive, rising suddenly as it does out of a wide desert plain, with its rent, fragmentary, and fire-blasted pile, masses of vitrified matter lying around, and the whole hill itself on which it stands caked and hardened out of the materials with which the temple had been built. Its dreary aspect seems to justify the name which the remnant of the captivity, still abiding among the waters of Babylon, give to the place, namely, "Nebuchadnezzar's Prison;" an appellation which may have been assigned from the circumstance of that monarch's being confined there, under the care of the priesthood, during the period of his madness, or from the King of Israel's having been incarcerated within its precincts by Nebuchadnezzar after his last conquest of Jerusalem (2 Kings xxv). A very considerable space round the tower, forming a vast court or area, is covered with ruins, affording abundant vestiges of former buildings, exhibiting uneven heaps of various sizes, covered with masses of broken brick, tiles, and vitrified fragments—all bespeaking some signal overthrow in former days. The tower-like ruin on the summit is a solid mass 28 feet broad, constructed of the most beautiful brick masonry. It is rent from the top nearly half way to the bottom. It is perforated in ranges of square openings. At its base lie several immense unshapen masses of fine brickwork, some changed to a state of the hardest vitrification, affording evidence of the action of fire which seems to have been the lightning of heaven. The base of the tower at present measures 2082 feet in circumference. Hardly half of its former altitude remains. Of the original pyramidal form, the erections of Semiramis and Nebuchadnezzar appear to have begun at the stage of the former overthrow. From its summit, the view in the distance presents to the south an arid desert plain; to the west the same trackless waste; toward the north-east marks of buried ruins are visible to a vast distance. The bricks which compose the tower are mostly stamped with several lines of inscription, in the cuneiform or Babylonian character. Some extend to four, or even seven lines, but the dimensions of all are the same. The bricks of Babylon are of two kinds, sun-dried and fire-burnt. The former are larger and of a coarser make than the latter. Their solidity is equal to that of many kinds of stone. They are composed of clay mixed with chopped straw or broken reeds, in order to increase their compactness. This is the sort of brick which the children of Israel made while in Egyptian bondage. The unburnt bricks commonly form the interior or mass of a building. This is the case with the great tower, while it was faced with the more beautiful fabric made in the furnace or kiln. See full particulars in Rich's Memoir of Babylon and Persepolis; Ker Porter's Travels in Persia; comp. Ritter, Erdb. xi, 876 sq.—Kitto.

8. Type and Character of the Building.—It must be allowed that the Birs Nimrud, though it may not be the Tower of Babel itself, which was at Babylon (Gen. xi, 9), yet, as the most perfect representative of an ancient Babylonian temple-tower, may well be taken to show, better than any other ruin, the probable shape and style of the edifice. This building appears, by the careful examinations recently made of it, to have been a kind of retreating pyramid built in seven receding stages. "Upon a platform of crude brick, raised a few feet above the level of the alluvial plain, was built of burnt brick the first or basement stage—an exact square, 272 feet each way, and 26 feet in perpendicular height. Upon this stage was erected a second, 230 feet each way, and likewise 26 feet high; which, however, was not placed exactly in the middle of the first, but considerably nearer to the south-western end, which constituted the back of the building. The other stages were arranged similarly, the third being 188 feet, and again 26 feet high; the fourth 146 feet square, and 15 feet high; the fifth 104 feet square, and the same height as the fourth; the sixth 62 feet square, and again the same height; and the seventh 20 feet square, and once more the same height. On the seventh stage there was probably placed the ark, or tabernacle, which seems to have been again 15 feet high, and must have nearly, if not entirely, covered the top of the seventh story. The entire original height, allowing three feet for the platform, would thus have been 156 feet, or, without the platform, 153 feet. The whole formed a sort of oblique pyramid, the gentler slope facing the N.E., and the steeper inclining to the S.W. On the N.E. side was the grand entrance, and here stood the vestibule, a separate building, the debris from which, having joined those from the temple itself, fill up the intermediate space, and very remarkably prolong the mound in this direction" (Rawlinson's Herodotus, ii, 480-3). The Birs temple, if the same called the "Temple of the Seven Spheres," was ornamented with the planetary colors (see the plan), but this was most likely a peculiarity. The other chief features of it seem to have been common to most, if not all of the Babylonian temple-towers. The feature of stages is found in the temples at Warka and Mugheir (Loftus's Chaldea, p. 129 and 168), which belong to very primitive times (B.C. 2230); that of the emplacement, so that the four angles face the four cardinal points, is likewise common to those ancient structures; while the square form is universal. On the other hand, it may be doubted whether so large a number of stages was common. The Mugheir and Warka temples have no more than two, and probably never had more than three, or at most four stages. The great temple of Belus at Babylon (if Babil) shows only one stage; though, according to the best authorities, it too was a sort of pyramid (Herod., Strab.). The height of the Birs is 153½ feet, that of Babil 140 (?), that of the Warka temple 100, that of the temple at Mugheir 50 feet. Strabo's statement that the tomb of Belus was a stade (606 feet in height) would thus seem to be a gross exaggeration. Probably no Babylonian tower ever equalled the Great Pyramid, the original height of which was 480 feet. See PYRAMIDS.

9. Its Materials and Manner of Construction.—On these points more light is to be obtained from the Warka and Mugheir buildings than from the Birs. The Birs was rebuilt from top to bottom by Nebuchadnezzar, and shows the mode of construction prevalent in Babylon at the best period; the temples at Warka and Mugheir remain to a certain extent in their primitive condition, the upper stories alone having been renovated. The Warka temple is composed entirely of sun-dried bricks, which are of various shapes and sizes; the cement used is mud; and reeds are largely employed in the construction. It is a building of the most primitive type, and exhibits a ruder style of art than that which we perceive from Scripture to have obtained at the date of the tower. Burnt bricks were employed in the composition of the tower (Gen. xi, 3); and though perhaps it is somewhat doubtful what the chemar (𐤠𐤍𐤏𐤍, "slime") used for mortar may have been (see Fresnel in Journ. Asiat. que for June, 1853, p. 9), yet, on the whole, it is most probable that bitumen (which abounds in Babylonia) is the substance intended. See BITUMEN. Now the lower basement of the Mugheir temple exhibits this combination in a decidedly primitive form. The burnt bricks are of small size and of an inferior quality; they are laid in bitumen; and they face a mass of sun-dried brick, forming a solid wall outside it ten feet in thickness. No reeds are used in the building. Writing appears on it, but of an antique cast. The supposed date is B. C. 2300, but little later than the era commonly assigned to the building of Babel. Probably the erection of the two buildings was not separated by a very long interval, though it is reasonable to suppose that of the two the tower was the earlier. If we mark its date, as perhaps we are entitled to do, by the time of Peleg, the son of Eber, and father of Ieu (see Gen. x, 25), we may perhaps place it about B. C. 2400. See DISPERSION OF NATIONS.

10. Advantages of this form.—It is not necessary to suppose that any real idea of "scaling heaven" was present to the minds of those who raised either the Tower of Babel, or any other of the Babylonian temple-towers. The expression used in Genesis (xi, 4) is a mere hyperbole for great height (comp. Dent. i, 28; Dan. iv, 11, etc.), and should not be taken literally. Military defence was probably the primary object of such edifices in early times; but with the wish for this may have been combined further secondary motives, which remained when such defence was otherwise provided for. Diodorus states that the great tower of the temple of Belus was used by the Chaldeans as an observatory (ii, 9), and the careful placement of the Babylonian temples with the angles facing the four cardinal points would be a natural consequence, and may be regarded as a strong confirmation of the reality of this application. M. Fresnel has recently conjectured that they were also used as sleeping-places for the chief priests in the summer time (Journ. Asiat. que, June, 1853, p. 529-31). The upper air is cooler, and is free from the insects, especially mosquitoes, which abound below; and the description which Herodotus gives of the chamber at the top of the Belus tower (i, 181) goes far to confirm this ingenious view.—Smith, s. v.

11. Confirmation from other Pyramidal Temples.—Mr. Taylor (Fragments to Calmet's Diet.) has given views of several similar structures now extant, of which we copy two. The first, rising in several steps or stages, is at Tanjore, in the East Indies; and affords, it is presumed, a just idea of the Tower of Babel. It is, indeed, wholly constructed of stone, in which it differs from that more ancient edifice, which, being situated in a country destitute of stone, was, of necessity, constructed of brick. On the top of this pyramid is a chapel or temple, affording a specimen of the general nature of this kind of sacred edifices in India. These amazing structures are commonly erected on or near the banks of great rivers, for the advantage of ablution. In the courts that surround them innumerable multitudes assemble at the rising of the sun, after having bathed in the stream below. The gate of the pagoda uniformly fronts the east. The internal chamber commonly receives light only from the door. An external pathway, for the purpose of visiting the chapel at the top, merits observation.

The next is an ancient pyramid built by the Mexicans in America; it agrees in figure with the former, and has on the outside an ascent of stairs leading up one side to the upper story, proceeding to the chapels on its summit. This ascent implies that the chapels were used from time to time, and no doubt it marks the shortest track for that purpose, as it occupies one side only.

Babi, or Babists, a Persian sect of Mohammedans, whose founder, according to one account, was Moollah Sadik; according to others, a certain Bab, who, coming forth in 1835 as a prophet, was shot by order of the shah of Persia. It is probable that both names refer to the same person, and that Sadik assumed the name of Bab, i. e. Papa, Father; or, according to another version, the Gate, through which alone truth and eternal bliss can be reached. A more recent account is given by Gobineau, Les Religions et les Philosophes d'Asie Centrale (cited in The Nation, June 22, 1866, from which this account is taken). About 1843 a youth of Shiraz, named Mirza Ali Mohammed, after reading the Christian Scriptures, as well as the Oriental Sacred Books, came out as a prophet, to reform or destroy Islamism. He is said to have been endowed with many graces of person and manner, and to have soon made many proselytes. Inspired by success, he now declared that, instead of the Gate, he was the Point; that is, the very creator of truth; no longer a simple prophet, but a living manifestation of divinity. The title of the Bab was now conferred upon a priest of the Khorassan, Moollah Houssein Boushrhewich, who became the active chief and soon the warrior-apostle of Babism. Houssein was sent on a missionary tour into Irak and Khorassan, taking with him the writings of his master. He made a great sensation by his preaching. Another missionary was a woman, possessed of extraordinary beauty and eloquence. About 1848, Houssein and the Babists generally gathered at a place called Sheik Tebersi, and built a huge tower, providing it for a siege. They now gave out political predictions, in which the advent of the Bab as universal sovereign was announced. All who died fighting for the new faith were to rise again, to become princes of some of the countries over which the Bab would extend his sway. Two large armies sent against the Babists were surprised and routed. A third expedition, though it succeeded in withstanding the sortie of the Babists, and in mortally wounding the Babist chief, Moollah Houssein, retired. The next campaign was more successful. For four months the Babists held out, in spite of tremendous odds, but at last, worn out by famine, they tried to force their way through the enemy's lines, but were overpowered, and when they surrendered only 214 were living. The survivors, and multitudes of others, even those who professed to renounce the heresy, were cruelly put to death. A similar Babist insurrection in Khamsch was also put down. Meanwhile Ali Mohammed had been living in semi-concealment at Shiraz. After the insurrection of Mezendaran he was brought before a court of royal commissioners and Mohammedan priests. In the examination which took place, the Bab, as he was still popularly called, gained the advantage. Seeing this, the discussion was abruptly broken off, and the Bab, with two of his disciples, was condemned to death, which was inflicted the next day. Everything now seemed to be finished; but the new Bab, Mirza Isha, whom a divine mark had pointed out at the age of fifteen as the successor to the office, established himself at Bagdad, where he kept up communication with his followers through the pilgrims to the shrines there. The Babists were now forbidden from making any more attempts at insurrection until the Bab should decide that the hour had come and should give them the signal. In 1852 an attempt was made to assassinate the king, but failed. The attempted assassins were recognized as Babists. Forty others were arrested, among them the feminine apostle, Gourret-Oul-Ayn, the Consolation of Eyes. The next day she publicly confessed her Babism, was burnt at the stake with insult and indignity, and her ashes were scattered to the wind. The rest of the prisoners were distributed each to a courtier as his especial victim. Then was seen at Teheran a sight never to be forgotten. Through the streets, between the lines of executioners, marched men, women, and children, with burning splinters flaming in their wounds. The victims sing: "In truth we come from God, and we return to him." A sufferer falls in the road; he is raised by lashes and bayonet thrusts. But no apostate was found among the sufferers.

Babism, like Mohammedanism, asserts the absolute unity of God; but the eternal unity, far from shutting himself up in himself, is, on the contrary, an ever-expanding principle of life. It is ceaselessly moving, acting, creating. God has created the world by means of seven words—Force, Power, Will, Action, Condescension, Glory, and Revelation—which words embrace the active plenitude of the virtues which they respectively represent. God possesses other virtues, even to infinity, but he manifests only these. The creature who emanates from God is distinguished from him by the privation of all emanatory action, but he is not altogether separated from him, and at the last day of judgment he will be confounded anew with him in the eternal unity. The Babist doctrine of revelation does not claim that the Bab has revealed the complete truth, but only as his predecessors, the prophets before him, have done—that portion of truth necessary for the age. The Bab is declared superior to Mohammed as Mohammed was to Jesus; and another revelation, which will complete the Bab's, is announced as coming in the future. Nineteen is a sacred number, which the Bab declares ought to preside over everything. Originally, he says, the Unity was composed of nineteen persons, among whom the highest rank belongs to the Bab. All the prophets who have appeared are, like the world, manifestations of God; divine words; not God, but beings who come from God more really than common men. At the death of a prophet or a saint, his soul does not quit the earth, but joins itself to some soul still in the flesh, who then completes his work. Babism enjoins few prayers, and only upon fixed occasions, and neither prescribes nor defends ablutions, so common in the religious rites of Mohammedanism. All the faithful wear amulets. Mendicancy, so much in honor among the Mussulman people, is forbidden. Women are ordered to discard veils, and to share in the intercourse of social life, from which Persian usage excludes them.

What will be the future of Babism it is difficult to tell. Since 1852 it has changed its character to a secret doctrine, which recruits its disciples in silence. The same Babists who before suffered martyrdom so courageously rather than deny their religion, now, obedient to the new order of their chief, conceal their faith with Oriental dissimulation. Babism is much more in harmony with the subtle and imaginative genius of the Persian people than the Shiite Mohammedanism. The growing spirit of nationality makes their present religion and the present dynasty, both of which were established among them by foreign conquest, less and less acceptable every year. The hour when the Bab shall send word from Bagdad that the time has come for the Babists to take up arms again will be a very critical one for the present dynasty of Persia and for Shiite Mohammedanism.

The first thorough work on the origin and the history of the Babis is the one above referred to by Count Gobineau (formerly French minister in Teheran). Little had previously been published in Europe concerning the sect. (See Zeitschrift der deutschen Morgenländ. Gesellschaft, vol. v; Petermann, Reisen im Orient, vol. ii.) The history of the Babis in Gobineau's work is followed by treatises on their doctrines, and, as a concluding appendix, he gives the sacred book of the Babis, "The Book of Precepts." See also Polak (a German, court-physician of the shah, and director of a medical school at Teheran), Persien, Das Land und seine Bewohner (Leipzig, 1865, 2 vols., vol. i, p. 350-354).—Pierer, Universal Lexikon, ii, 117; The Nation, June 22, 1866; American Ann. Cyclopadia, 1865, p. 698.

Babington, GERVAISE, an eminent English prelate, was born at Nottingham in the year 1551. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became master of arts in 1578. He applied himself closely to theology, and became one of the most impressive and useful preachers of his day. In 1588 he was installed into the prebend of Wellington, in the cathedral of Hereford, and through the interest of the Earl of Pembroke was advanced to the bishopric of Llandaff in 1591. In 1594 he was translated to the see of Exeter, from whence, in 1597, he was translated to Worcester. Bishop Babington was a man of eminent Christian character as well as scholarship. Fuller testifies that he "was not tainted with pride, illeness, or covetousness." He died 17th May, 1610. His works are collected under the title "The Works of the Right Reverend Father in God, Gersease Babington, late Bishop of Worcester" (Lond. 1622, fol.). They contain Notes on the Pentateuch, Exposition of the Creed, the Commandments, and the Lord's Prayer, with a Conference between Man's Frailty and Faith, and three sermons.—Jones, Christian Biography, p. 16; Hook, Ecl. Biog. i, 446.

Babylas, St., became bishop of Antioch about the year 230. When the Emperor Phillip, who, in ascending the throne, had murdered the young Emperor Gordian, came to Antioch on his way to Rome, about Easter, 244, Babylas repulsed him from the church door, and refused to permit him to join in worship. Phillip, according to the legend, humbly confessed his sins, and appeared among the public penitents. After a time Decius robbed Phillip of his empire and life, and stirred up a virulent persecution against the Christians. Babylas, conspicuous from his lofty station, did not escape this storm, and about the end of the year 250 he was arrested and thrown into prison, where, in the following year, he died. The Latins commemorate him on the 24th of January, the Greeks on the 4th of September. Chrysostom has a homily in honor of Babylas (t. ii, 573, ed. Montf.). See Eusebius, Ch. Hist. vi, 39; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, ch. xxiii.

Babylon (Heb. and Chald. Babel', בָּבֶל, Gr. Βαβυλών), the name of more than one city in the Scriptures and other ancient writings. See also BABEL.

1. Originally the capital of the country called in Genesis Shinar (שִׁנְאָר), and in the later Scriptures Chaldea, or the land of the Chaldeans (כַּלְדָּאָיָא). See those articles severally.

1. The Name.—The word Babel seems to be connected in its first occurrence with the Hebrew root בָּלַל, balal', "to confound" (as if by contraction from the reduplicated form בָּלְבַל, Balbel'), "because the Lord did there confound the language of all the earth" (Gen. xi, 9); but the native etymology (see the Koran, ii, 66) is Bab-il, "the gate of the god Il," or perhaps more simply "the gate of God;" and this no doubt was the original intention of the appellation as given by Nimrod, though the other sense came to be attached to it after the confusion of tongues (see Eichhorn, Biblioth. d. bibl. Lit. iii, 1001). Another derivation deduces the word from בֵּל בְּלָא, "the court or city of Belus" (see Abulfeda in Rosenmüller, Alberth, ii, 60), or בֵּל-בְּלָא (= בֵּל), Bel's Hill (Vurst, Heb. II. med. s. v.). A still different etymology is proposed by Tuch (Gen. p. 276), from בֵּת בֵּל, "the house of Bel." Whichever of these etymologies may be regarded as the preferable one, the name was doubtless understood or accommodated by the sacred writer in Genesis so as to be expressive of the disaster that soon befell the founders of the place. In the Bible at a later date the place is appropriately termed "Babylon the Great" (בְּבֵלְתַרְסִיס, Jer. li, 58; אֶרֶץ בְּבֵלְתַרְסִיס, Dun. iv, 27), and by Josephus also (Ant. viii, 6, 1, ἡ μεγάλη Βαβυλών). The name Babylon is likewise that by which it is constantly denominated in the Sept. and later versions, as well as by the Apocrypha (1 Macc. vi, 4; Susann. i, 5) and New Test. (Acts vii, 43), and finally by the ancient Greek and Roman writers (see Smith, Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v.). On the outlandish name Sheshak (שֶׁשַׁק), applied to it in Jer. xxv, 26; li, 41, see the various conjectures in Rosenmüller, Alberth, i, ii, 59 sq. The Jews believe it is a cabalistic mode of writing by the method known as "Athbash" (q. v.). See SURSHAK.

The word "Babel," besides its original application to the tower (Gen. xi, 9), and its usual one (in the original) to the city of Babylon, is also occasionally applied to the whole district of Chaldea, coincident with the plain of Shinar (Isa. xiv, 2), as well as to Babylonia, the province of the Assyrian empire of which it was the metropolis (2 Chron. xxxii, 31; xxxiii, 11), and eventually to Persia itself (Ezra v, 13; Neh. xiii, 6). See NINEVEH.

2. Origin and Growth of the City.—This famous city was the metropolis of the province of Babylon and of the Babylonio-Chaldaeian empire. It was situated in a wide plain on the Euphrates, which divided it into two nearly equal parts. According to the book of Genesis, its foundations were laid at the same time with those of the Tower of Babel. In the revolutions of centuries it underwent many changes, and received successive reparations and additions. The ancients were not agreed as to the authors or times of these, and any attempt to determine them now with strict accuracy must be fruitless. Semiramis and Nebuchadnezzar are those to whom the city was indebted for its greatest augmentations and its chief splendor. Probably a temple was the first building raised by the primitive nomades, and in the gate of this temple justice would be administered in early times (comp. 2 Sam. xix, 8), after which houses would grow up about the gate, and in this way the name would readily pass from the actual portal of the temple to the settlement. According to the traditions which the Greeks derived from the Babylonians in Alexander's age, the city was originally built about the year B.C. 2230. The architectural remains discovered in southern Babylonia, taken in conjunction with the monumental records, seem to indicate that it was not at first the capital, nor, indeed, a town of very great importance. It probably owed its position at the head of Nimrod's cities (Gen. x, 10) to the power and pre-eminence to which it afterward attained rather than to any original superiority that it could boast over the places coupled with it. Erech, Ur, and Ellasar appear to have been all more ancient than Babylon, and were capital cities when Babil was a provincial village. The first rise of the Chaldaeian power was in the region close upon the Persian Gulf, as Berosus indicated by his fish-god Oannes, who brought the Babylonians civilization and the arts out of the sea (ap. Syncell, p. 28, B). Thence the nation spread northward up the course of the rivers, and the seat of government moved in the same direction, being finally fixed at Babylon, perhaps not earlier than B.C. 1700.—Kitto; Smith. See ASSYRIA.

3. Its Fall and subsequent Condition.—Under Nabonadus, the last king, B.C. 538, Babylon was taken by Cyrus, after a siege of two years, in the dead of the night. Having first, by means of its canals, turned the river into the great dry lake west of Babylon, and then marched through the emptied channel, he made his way to the outer walls of the fortified place on its banks, when, finding the brazen gates incautiously left open by the royal guards while engaged in carousals, he entered with all his train; "the Lord of Hosts was his leader," and Babylon, as an empire, was no more. An insurrection, under Darius Hystaspis (B.C. 500), the object of which was to gain emancipation from Persian bondage, led that prince to punish the Babylonians by throwing down the walls and gates which had been left by Cyrus, and by expelling them from their homes. Xerxes plundered and destroyed the temple of Belus, which Alexander the Great would probably, but for his death, have restored. Under Seleucus Nicator the city began to sink speedily, after that monarch built Seleucia on the Tigris, and made it his place of abode. In the time of Strabo and Diodorus Siculus the place lay in ruins. Jerome, in the fourth century of the Christian era, learned that the site of Babylon had been converted into a park or hunting-ground for the recreation of the Persian monarchs, and that, in order to preserve the game, the walls had been from time to time repaired. If the following extract from Rich (p. 30) is compared with these historical facts, the prophecy of Isaiah (xiii, 19) will appear to have been strikingly fulfilled to the letter: "I had always imagined the belief of the existence of satyrs was confined to the mythology of the West; but a choadur who was with me when I examined this ruin (the Mujelibeh) mentioned that in this desert an animal is found resembling a man from the head to the waist, but having the thighs and legs of a sheep or goat; he also said that the Arabs hunt it with dogs, and eat the lower parts, abstaining from the upper, on account of their resemblance to those of the human species." More thorough destruction than that which has overtaken Babylon cannot well be conceived. Rich was unable to discover any traces of its vast walls, and even its site has been a subject of dispute. "On its ruins," says he, "there is not a single tree growing, except an old one," which only serves to make the desolation more apparent. Ruins like those of Babylon, composed of rubbish impregnated with nitre, cannot be cultivated. For a more detailed account of the history of Babylon, see the article BABYLONIA.—KITTO.

4. Ancient Descriptions.—The statements respecting the topography and appearance of Babylon which have come down to us in classical writers are derived chiefly from two sources, the works of Herodotus and of Ctesias. These authors were both of them eye-witnesses of the glories of Babylon—not, indeed, at their highest point, but before they had greatly declined—and left accounts of the city and its chief buildings, which the historians and geographers of later times were, for the most part, content to copy. To these accounts are to be added various other details by Quintus Curtius, and Pliny, and a few notices by other ancient visitors.

According to the account of Herodotus (i. 178-186) the walls of Babylon were double, the outer line being 56 miles in circumference, built of large bricks cemented together with bitumen, and raised round the city in the form of an exact square; hence they measured 14 miles along each face. They were 87 feet thick and 350 feet high (Quintus Curtius says four horse-chariots could pass each other on them without danger), protected on the outside by a vast ditch lined with the same material, and proportioned in depth and width to the elevation of the walls. The city was entered by twenty-five gates on each side, made of solid brass, and additionally strengthened by 250 towers, so placed that between every two gates were four towers, and four additional ones at the four corners. From all the gates proceeded streets running in straight lines, each street being nearly fifteen miles in length, fifty in number, and crossing each other at right angles. Other minor divisions occurred, and the whole city contained 676 squares, each about two miles and a quarter in circumference. Herodotus appears to imply that this whole space was covered with houses, which, he observes, were frequently three or four stories high. The river ran through the city from north to south, and on each side was a quay of the same thickness as the walls of the city, and 100 stadia in length. In these quays were gates of brass, and from each of them steps descending into the river. A bridge was thrown across the river, of great beauty and admirable contrivance, a furlong in length and 30 feet in breadth. As the Euphrates overflows during the summer months, through the melting of the snows on the mountains of Armenia, two canals were cut to turn the course of the waters into the Tigris, and vast artificial embankments were raised on each side of the river. On the western side of the city an immense lake, forty miles square, was excavated to the depth, according to Herodotus, of 35 feet, and into this lake the river was turned till the work was completed. At each end of the bridge was a palace, and these had a subterraneous communication. In each division of the town, Herodotus says, there was a fortress or stronghold, consisting in the one case of the royal palace, in the other of the great temple of Belus. This last was a species of pyramid, composed of eight square towers placed one above the other, the dimensions of the basement tower being a stade—or above 200 yards—each way. The height of the temple is not mentioned by Herodotus. A winding ascent, which passed round all the towers, led to the summit, on which was placed a spacious ark or chapel, containing no statue, but regarded by the natives as the habitation of the god. The temple stood in a sacred precinct, two stades (or 400 yards) square, which contained two altars for burnt-offerings and a sacred ark or chapel, wherein was the golden image of Bel.—KITTO & SMITH.

According to Ctesias (ap. Diod. Sic. ii, 7 sq.), the circuit of the city was a little under 42 miles. It lay, he says, on both sides of the Euphrates, and the two parts were connected together by a stone bridge above 1000 yards long, and 30 feet broad, of the kind described by Herodotus. At either extremity of the bridge was a royal palace, that in the eastern city being the most magnificent of the two. It was defended by a triple enceinte, the outermost 7 miles round; the second, which was circular, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and the third 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles. The height of the second or middle wall was 300 feet, and its towers were 420 feet. The elevation of the innermost circuit was even greater than this. The walls of both the second and the third enclosure were made of colored brick, and represented hunting scenes—the chase of the leopard and the lion—with figures, male and female, regarded by Ctesias as those of Ninus and Semiramis. The other palace was inferior both in size and magnificence. It was enclosed within a single enceinte $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles in circumference, and contained representations of hunting and battle scenes, as well as statues in bronze, said to be those of Ninus, Semiramis, and Jupiter Belus. The two palaces were joined, not only by the bridge, but by a tunnel under the river. Ctesias' account of the temple of Belus has not come down to us. We may gather, however, that he represented its general character in much the same way as Herodotus, but spoke of it as surmounted by three statues, one of Bel, 40 feet high, another of Rhea, and a third of Juno or Beltis.—SMITH.

The account given by Quintus Curtius (v, 1) of the entrance of Alexander into Babylon may serve to enliven the narrative, and, at the same time, make the impression on the reader's mind more distinct. "A great part of the inhabitants of Babylon stood on the walls, eager to catch a sight of their new monarch. Many went forth to meet him. Among these, Bagophanes, keeper of the citadel and of the royal treasure, strewed the entire way before the king with flowers and crowns; silver altars were also placed on both sides of the road, which were loaded not merely with frankincense, but all kinds of odoriferous herbs. He brought with him for Alexander gifts of various kinds—flocks of sheep and horses; lions also and panthers were carried before him in their dens. The magi came next, singing, in their usual manner, their ancient hymns. After them came the Chaldeans, with their musical instruments, who are not only the prophets of the Babylonians, but their artists. The first are wont to sing the praises of the kings; the Chaldeans teach the motions of the stars and the periodic vicissitudes of the times and seasons. Then followed, last of all, the Babylonian knights, whose equipment, as well as that of their horses, seemed designed more for luxury than magnificence. The king, Alexander, attended by armed men, having ordered the crowd of the towns-people to proceed in the rear of his infantry, entered the city in a chariot and repaired to the palace. The next day he carefully surveyed the household treasure of Darius, and all his money. For the rest, the beauty of the city and its age turned the eyes not only of the king, but of every one, on itself, and that with good reason." Within a brief period after this Alexander lay a corpse in the palace.

One or two additional facts may aid in conveying a full idea of this great and magnificent city. When Cyrus took Babylon by turning the Euphrates into a neighboring lake, the dwellers in the middle of the place were not for some time aware that their fellow-townsmen who were near the walls had been captured. This, says Herodotus (i, 191), was owing to the magnitude of the city, and to the circumstance that at the time the inhabitants were engaged in carousals, it being a festive occasion. Nor, according to Xenophon, did the citizens of the opposite quarter learn the event till three hours after sunrise, the city having been taken in the night. Alexander had to employ 10,000 men during two months to remove the accumulated ruins precipitated by order of Xerxes nearly 200 years before. From the fallen towers of Babylon have arisen not only all the present cities in its vicinity, but others which, like itself, have long since gone down into the dust. Since the days of Alexander, four capitals, at least, have been built out of its remains: Seleucia, by the Greeks; Ctesiphon, by the Parthians; Al Moidan, by the Persians; and Kufa, by the caliphs; with towns, villages, and caravansaries without number. The necessary fragments and materials were transported along the rivers and the canals.

The antiquity of the canals of Babylonia dates from the most remote periods of the Chaldaeo-Babylonian monarchy. The ancient kings of Assyria and Babylonia well understood the value of canals, and their empire arose upon alluvial plains, amid a system of irrigation and draining which spread like a net-work over the land. It may be sufficient to specify the Nahr Malikah, or Royal Canal, the origin of which has been referred both to Nimrod and Cush. Abydenus, however, attributes it to Nebuchadnezzar. From the account of Herodotus, it appears to have been of sufficient breadth and depth to be navigable for merchant vessels. It is not, therefore, surprising that some writers have considered it as the ancient bed of the Euphrates. The soil around Babylon is of a light, yielding nature, easily wrought for canals and other purposes, whether of art or war. Cyrus, therefore, would find no great difficulty in digging a trench about the city sufficient to contain the waters of the river (Cyrop. vii). Alexander (Strabo, xvi, p. 510), in enlarging one of the canals and forming basins for his fleet, laid open the graves of many buried kings and princes, which shows how readily the soil yields and gives way before the labors of man.

The new palace built by Nebuchadnezzar was prodigious in size and superb in embellishments. Its outer wall embraced six miles; within that circumference were two other embattled walls, besides a great tower. Three brazen gates led into the grand area, and every gate of consequence throughout the city was of brass. In accordance with this fact are the terms which Isaiah (xlv, 1, 2) employs when, in the name of Jehovah, he promises Cyrus that the city should fall before him: "I will open before him the two-leaved gates; I will break in pieces the gates of brass;" a prophecy which was fulfilled to the letter when Cyrus made himself master of the place. The palace was splendidly decorated with statues of men and animals, with vessels of gold and silver, and furnished with luxuries of all kinds brought thither from conquests in Egypt, Palestine, and Tyre. Its greatest boast were the hanging gardens, which acquired even from Grecian writers the appellation of one of the wonders of the world. They are attributed to the gallantry of Nebuchadnezzar, who constructed them in compliance with a wish of his queen Amytis to possess elevated groves such as she had enjoyed on the hills around her native Ecbatana. Babylon was all flat; and to accomplish so extravagant a desire, an artificial mountain was reared, 400 feet on each side, while terraces one above another rose to a height that overtopped the walls of the city, that is, above 300 feet in elevation. The ascent from terrace to terrace was made by corresponding flights of steps, while the terraces themselves were reared to their various stages on ranges of regular piers, which, forming a kind of vaulting, rose in succession one over the other to the required height of each terrace, the whole being bound together by a wall of 22 feet in thickness. The level of each terrace or garden was then formed in the following manner: the top of the piers was first laid over with flat stones, 16 feet in length and 4 feet in width; on these stones were spread beds of matting, then a thick layer of bitumen; after which came two courses of bricks, which were covered with sheets of solid lead. The earth was heaped on this platform; and in order to admit the roots of large trees, prodigious hollow piers were built and filled with mould. From the Euphrates, which flowed close to the foundation, water was drawn up by machinery. The whole, says Q. Curtius (v, 5), had, to those who saw it from a distance, the appearance of woods overhanging mountains. Such was the completion of Nebuchadnezzar's work, when he found himself at rest in his house, and flourished in his palace. The king spoke and said, "Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power and the honor of my majesty" (Dan. iv), a picture which is amply justified by the descriptions of heathen writers. Nowhere could the king have taken so comprehensive a view of the city he had so magnificently constructed and adorned as when walking on the highest terrace of the gardens of his palace.

Babylon, as the centre of a great kingdom, was the seat of boundless luxury, and its inhabitants were notorious for their addiction to self-indulgence and effeminacy. Q. Curtius (v, 1) asserts that "nothing could be more corrupt than its morals, nothing more fitted to excite and allure to immoderate pleasures. The rites of hospitality were polluted by the grossest and most shameless lusts. Money dissolved every tie, whether of kindred, respect, or esteem. The Babylonians were very greatly given to wine and the enjoyments which accompany inebriety. Women were present at their convivialities, first with some degree of propriety, but, growing worse and worse by degrees, they ended by throwing off at once their modesty and their clothing." Once in her life, according to Herodotus (i, 199), every native female was obliged to visit the temple of Mylitta, the Babylonian Astarte (q. v.) or Venus, and there receive the embraces of the first stranger who threw a piece of money into her lap; an abominable custom, that is alluded to in the Apocrypha (Baruch vi, 43) and by Strabo (vi, 1058). On the ground of their awful wickedness, the Babylonians were threatened with condign punishment, through the mouths of the prophets; and the tyranny with which the rulers of the city exercised their sway was not without a decided effect in bringing on them the terrific consequences of the Divine vengeance. Nor in the whole range of literature is there any thing to be found approaching to the sublimity, force, and terror with which Isaiah and others speak on this painful subject (Isa. xiv. 11; xlvii, 1; Jer. li, 39; Dan. v, 1). Babylon even stands, therefore, in the New Test. (Rev. xvii, 5) as the type of the most shameless profligacy and idolatry.—Kitto.

5. Investigation of the ancient Topography.—In ex-examining the truth of these descriptions, we shall most conveniently commence from the outer circuit of the town. All the ancient writers appear to agree in the fact of a district of vast size, more or less inhabited, having been enclosed within lofty walls, and included under the name of Babylon. With respect to the exact extent of the circuit they differ. The estimate of Herodotus and of Pliny (H. N. vi, 26) is 480 stades, of Strabo (xvi, i, 5) 383, of Q. Curtius (v, i, 26) 368, of Clitarchus (ap. Diod. Sic. ii, 7) 365, and of Ctesias (ap. eund.) 360 stades. It is evident that here we have merely the moderate variations to be expected in independent measurements, except in the first of the numbers. Setting this aside, the difference between the greatest and the least of the estimates is little more than one half per cent. With this near agreement on the part of so many authors, it is the more surprising that in the remaining case we should find the great difference of one third more, or 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. Perhaps the true explanation is that Herodotus spoke of the outer wall, which could be traced in his time, while the later writers, who never speak of an inner and an outer barrier, give the measurement of Herodotus's inner wall, which may have alone remained in their day. This is the opinion of M. Oppert, who even believes that he has found traces of both enclosures, showing them to have been really of the size ascribed to them. This conclusion is at present disputed, and it is the more general belief of those who have examined the ruins with attention that no vestiges of the ancient walls are to be found, or, at least, that none have as yet been discovered. Still it is impossible to doubt that a line of wall inclosing an enormous area originally existed. The testimony to this effect is too strong to be set aside, and the disappearance of the wall is easily accounted for, either by the constant quarrying, which would naturally have commenced with it (Rich, First Mem. p. 41), or by the subsidence of the bulwark into the moat from which it was raised. Taking the lowest estimate of the extent of the circuit, we shall have for the space within the rampart an area of above 100 square miles—nearly five times the size of London. It is evident that this vast space cannot have been entirely covered with houses. Diodorus confesses (ii, 9, ed. fin.) that but a small part of the enclosure was inhabited in his own day, and Q. Curtius (v, i, 27) says that as much as nine tenths consisted, even in the most flourishing times, of gardens, parks, paradises, fields, and orchards.

With regard to the height and breadth of the walls there is nearly as much difference of statement as with regard to their extent. Herodotus makes the height 200 royal cubits, or 337 $\frac{1}{2}$ feet; Ctesias, 50 fathoms, or 300 feet; Pliny and Solinus, 200 royal feet; Strabo, 50 cubits, or 75 feet. Here there is less appearance of independent measurements than in the estimates of length. The two original statements seem to be those of Herodotus and Ctesias, which only differ accidentally, the latter having omitted to notice that the royal scale was used. The later writers do not possess fresh data; they merely soften down what seems to them an exaggeration—Pliny and Solinus changing the cubits of Herodotus into feet, and Strabo the fathoms of Ctesias into cubits. We are forced, then, to fall back on the earlier authorities, who are also the only eye-witnesses; and, surprising as it seems, perhaps we must believe the statement that the vast enclosed space above mentioned was surrounded by walls which have well been termed "artificial mountains," being nearly the height of the dome of St. Paul's (see Grote's Greece, iii, 397; and, on the other side, Mure's Lit. of Greece, iv, 516). The ruined wall of Nineveh was, it must be remembered, in Xenophon's time, 150 feet high (Anab. iii, 4, 10), and another wall which he passed in Mesopotamia was 100 feet (ib. ii, 4, 12).

The estimates for the thickness of the wall are the following: Herodotus, 50 royal cubits, or nearly 85 feet; Pliny and Solinus, 50 royal, or about 60 common feet; and Strabo, 32 feet. Here again Pliny and Solinus have merely softened down Herodotus; Strabo, however, has a new number. This may belong properly to the inner wall, which, Herodotus remarks (i, 181), was of less thickness than the outer.

According to Ctesias, the wall was strengthened with 250 towers, irregularly disposed, to guard the weakest parts (Diod. Sic. ii, 7); and, according to Herodotus, it was pierced with a hundred gates, which were made of brass, with brazen lintels and side-posts (i, 179). The gates and walls are alike mentioned in Scripture, the height of the one and the breadth of the other being specially noticed (Jer. li, 58; comp. i, 15, and li, 53).

Herodotus and Ctesias both relate that the banks of the river, as it flowed through the city, were on each side ornamented with quays. The stream has probably often changed its course since the time of Babylonian greatness, but some remains of a quay or embankment on the eastern side of the stream still exist, upon the bricks of which is read the name of the last king. The two writers also agree as to the existence of a bridge, and describe it very similarly. Perhaps a remarkable mound which interrupts the long flat valley—evidently the ancient course of the river—closing in the principal ruins on the west, may be a trace of this structure.

6. Present Character and Extent of the Ruins of Babylon.—The locality and principal structures of this once famous city are now almost universally admitted to be indicated by the remarkable remains near the modern village of Hillah, which lies on the W. bank of the Euphrates, about 50 miles directly S. of Bagdad.

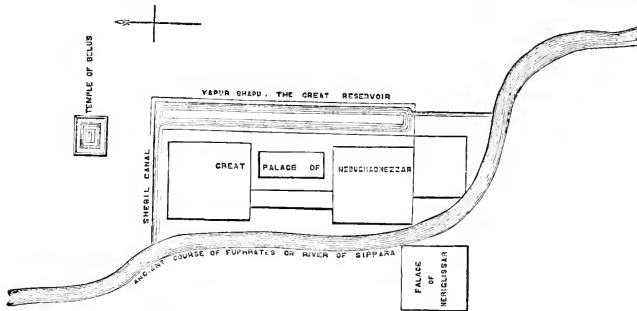

Plan of part of the Ruins of Babylon, on the eastern bank of the Euphrates.

About five miles above Hillah, on the opposite bank of the Euphrates, occur a series of artificial mounds of enormous size, which have been recognised in all ages as probably indicating the site of the capital of southern Mesopotamia. They consist chiefly of three great masses of building—the high pile of unbaked brick-work called by Rich "Myzelle," but which is known to the Arabs as "Eabil"; the building denominated the "Kasr" or palace; and a lofty mound upon which stands the modern tomb of Amran ĩn-Ab (Leftus's Chaldea, p. 17). Besides these principal masses the most remarkable features are two parallel lines of rampart bounding the chief ruins on the east, some similar but inferior remains on the north and west, an embankment along the river side, a remarkable isolated heap in the middle of a long valley, which seems to have been the ancient bed of the stream, and two long lines of rampart, meeting at a right angle, and with the river forming an irregular triangle, within which all the ruins on this side (except Babil) are enclosed. On the west, or right bank, the remains are very slight and scanty. There is the appearance of an enclosure, and of a building of moderate size within it, nearly opposite the great mound of Amran, but otherwise, unless at a long distance from the stream, this side of the Euphrates is absolutely bare of ruins. (See Rawlinson's Herodotus, ii, 473).

Scattered over the country on both sides of the Euphrates, and reducible to no regular plan, are a number of remarkable mounds, usually standing single, which are plainly of the same date with the great mass of ruins upon the river bank. Of these by far the most striking is the vast ruin called the Birs Nimrud, which many regard as the Tower of Babel, situated about six miles to the S.W. of Hillah, and almost that distance from the Euphrates at the nearest point. This is a pyramidal mound, crowned apparently by the ruins of a tower, rising to the height of 153½ feet above the level of the plain, and in circumference somewhat more than 2000 feet. See BABEL (TOWER OF). There is considerable reason to believe from the inscriptions discovered on the spot, and from other documents of the time of Nebuchadnezzar, that it marks the site of Borsippa, and may thus have been beyond the limits of Babylon (Beros. Fr. 14).

Portions of ancient Babylon distinguishable in the present Ruins.

7. Identification of Sites.—On comparing the existing ruins with the accounts of the ancient writers, the great difficulty which meets us is the position of the remains almost exclusively on the left bank of the river. All the old accounts agree in representing the Euphrates as running through the town, and the principal buildings as placed on the opposite sides of the stream. In explanation of this difficulty, it has been urged, on the one hand, that the Euphrates, having a tendency to run off to the right, has obliterated all trace of the buildings in this direction (Layard's Nin. and Bab. p. 420); on the other, that, by a due extension of the area of Babylon, it may be made to include the Birs Nimrud, and that thus the chief existing remains will really lie on the opposite banks of the river (Rich, Second Memoir, p. 32; Ker Porter, Travels, ii, 383). But the identification of the Birs with Borsippa seems to interfere with this latter theory; while the former is unsatisfactory, since we can scarcely suppose the abrasion of the river to have entirely removed all trace of such gigantic buildings as those which the ancient writers describe. Perhaps the most probable solution is to be found in the fact that a large canal (called Shebil) intervened in ancient times between the Kasr mound and the ruin now called Babil, which may easily have been confounded by Herodotus with the main stream. This would have had the two principal buildings upon opposite sides; while the real river, which ran down the long valley to the west of the Kasr and Amran mounds, would also have separated (as Ctesias related) between the greater and the lesser palace. If this explanation be accepted as probable, we may identify the principal ruins as follows: 1. The great mound of Babil will be the ancient temple of Belus. It is an oblong the old palace platform (which resembles those at Nineveh, Susa, and elsewhere), upon which are still standing certain portions of the ancient residences to which the name of "Kasr" or "palace" especially attaches. The walls are composed of burnt bricks, of a pale yellow color, and of excellent quality, bound together by a fine lime cement, and stamped with the name and titles of Nebuchadnezzar. They contain traces of architectural ornament—piers, buttresses, pilasters, etc.; and in the rubbish at their base have been found slabs inscribed by Nebuchadnezzar, and containing an account of the building of the edifice, as well as a few sculptured fragments, and many pieces of enamelled brick of brilliant hues. On these last portions of figures are traceable, recalling the statements of Ctesias (ap-mass, composed chiefly of unbaked brick, rising from the plain to the height of 140 feet, flattish at the top, in length about 200, and in breadth about 140 yards. This oblong shape is common to the temples, or rather temple-towers of Lower Babylonia, which seem to have had nearly the same proportions. It was originally coated with fine burnt brick laid in an excellent mortar, as was proved by Mr. Layard (Nin. and Bab. p. 452); and was, no doubt, built in stages, most of which have crumbled down, but which may still be in part concealed under the rubbish. The statement of Berossus (Fragm. 14), that it was rebuilt by Nebuchadnezzar, is confirmed by the fact that all the inscribed bricks which have been found in it bear the name of that king. It formed the tower of the temple, and was surmounted by a chapel; but the main shrine, the altars, and no doubt the residences of the priests, were at the foot, in a sacred precinct. 2. The mound of the Kasr will mark the site of the great palace of Nebuchadnezzar. It is an irregular square of about 700 yards each way, and may be regarded as chiefly formed of count of the building of the edifice, as well as a few sculptured fragments, and many pieces of enamelled brick of brilliant hues. On these last portions of figures are traceable, recalling the statements of Ctesias (ap-

Diodor. Sicul.) that the brick walls of the palace were colored, and represented hunting-scenes. No plan of the palace is to be made out from the existing remains, which are tossed in apparent confusion on the highest point of the mound. 3. The mound of Amran is thought by M. Oppert to represent the "hanging gardens" of Nebuchadnezzar; but this conjecture does not seem to be a very happy one. The mound is composed of poorer materials than the edifices of that prince, and has furnished no bricks containing his name. Again, it is far too large for the hanging gardens, which are said to have been only 400 feet each way. The Amran mound is described by Rich as an irregular parallelogram, 1100 yards long by 800 broad, and by Ker Porter as a triangle, the sides of which are respectively 1400, 1100, and 850 feet. Its dimensions therefore, very greatly exceed those of the curious structure with which it has been identified. Most probably it represents the ancient palace, coeval with Babylon itself, of which Nebuchadnezzar speaks in his inscriptions as adjoining his own more magnificent residence. It is the only part of the ruins from which bricks have been derived containing the names of kings earlier than Nebuchadnezzar, and is therefore entitled to be considered the most ancient of the existing remains. 4. The ruins near each side of the Euphrates, together with all the other remains on the west bank, may be considered to represent the lesser palace of Ctesias, which is said to have been connected with the greater by a bridge across the river, as well as by a tunnel under the channel of the stream (?). The old course of the Euphrates seems to have been a little east of the present one, passing between the two parallel ridges near it at the bend in the middle, and then closely skirting the mound of Amran, so as to have both the ruins just named upon its right bank. These ruins are of the same date and style. The bricks of that on the east bank bear the name of Neriglissar; and there can be little doubt that this ruin, together with those on the opposite side of the stream, are the remains of a palace built by him. Perhaps (as already remarked) the little mound immediately south of this point, near the east bank, may be a remnant of the ancient bridge. 5. The two long parallel lines of embankment on the east, which form so striking a feature in the remains as represented by Porter and Rich, but which are ignored by M. Oppert, may either be the lines of an outer and inner enclosure, of which Nebuchadnezzar speaks as defences of his palace, or they may represent the embankments of an enormous reservoir, which is often mentioned by that monarch as adjoining his palace toward the east. 6. The southernmost embankment, near the east bank of the river, is composed of bricks marked with the name of Labynetos or Nabunēt, and is undoubtedly a portion of the work which Berosus ascribes to the last king (Fragm. 14).—Smith.

It must be admitted, however, that the foregoing scheme of identification (which is that proposed by Rawlinson, Herodotus, ii, Essay iv) involves the improbable supposition of a mistake on the part of the ancient authorities concerning the course of the Euphrates through the middle of the city; it seems also unduly to restrict the ancient limits, and thus excludes the Birs Nimrud; and it affords no explanation of the remarkable line of mounds meeting in a right angle on the east of the ruins, and most naturally thought by nearly all topographers (Rich, Ker Porter, Flaudin, Layard, and Fergusson) to have been one of the corners of the city wall. Nor does it altogether agree with the recent conjectural restoration of the royal residence at Babylon on the bold plan of M. Oppert (in the Atlas accompanying his Expédition en Mésopotamie, Par. 1858), who supposes the extant remains opposite Hillah to be those alone of the palace, with its accompanying structures, and gardens, and enclosing walls, the double line of city walls being of much larger extent. He appears, however, to have disregarded many details of the modern as well as ancient indication in his identification (see Rawlinson, ut sup. p. 487 sq.). Perhaps it will yet appear that, while Rawlinson's locations (as above) are correct so far as concerns the royal buildings themselves, the chart of Oppert (given above) truly represents the entire circuit of the city; and that the palace, with its appendages, was enclosed in an interior quadrangle, which the river likewise divided diagonally, its eastern half corresponding to the triangle embracing the modern ruins here described.

The most remarkable fact connected with the magnificence of Babylon is the poorness of the material with which such wonderful results were produced. The whole country, being alluvial, was entirely destitute of stone, and even wood was scarce and of bad quality, being only yielded by the palm-groves which fringed the courses of the canals and rivers. In default of these, the ordinary materials for building, recourse was had to the soil of the country—in many parts an excellent clay—and with bricks made from this, either sun-dried or baked, the vast structures were raised which, when they stood in their integrity, provoked comparison with the pyramids of Egypt, and which, even in their decay, excite the astonishment of the traveller. A modern writer has noticed, as the true secret of the extraordinary results produced, "the unbounded command of naked human strength" which the Babylonian monarchs had at their disposal (Grote's Hist. of Greece, ii, 401); but this alone will not account for the phenomena; and we must give the Babylonians credit for a genius and a grandeur of conception rarely surpassed, which led them to employ the labor whereof they had the command in works of so imposing a character. With only "brick for stone," and at first only "slime (𐤠𐤭𐤠) for mortar" (Gen. xi, 3), they constructed edifices of so vast a size that they still remain at the present day among the most enormous ruins in the world, impressing the beholder at once with awe and admiration.—Smith.

2. Another Babylon lay in Egypt, south of Heliopolis, on the east bank of the Nile (Strabo, xvii, 807); it was founded by Babylonians, who had emigrated to Egypt during the civil commotions of the two empires (Diod. Sic. i, 56; Josephus, Ant. ii, 15, 1). Its ruins are described by Hartmann (Erdbesch. u. Africa, 1926), Prokesch (Erinnerung u. i, 59 sq.), and Champollion (L'Égypte, ii, 33). It is now called Babul (Smith's Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v.).

3. The Babylon in 1 Pet. v, 13, is thought by some to be Rome, but by others (in accordance with a tradition of the Coptic Christians) to be the above place in Egypt. Baronius contradicts this last assertion by saying there is no mention of a Bishop of Babylon till 500 years after Peter's time, under Justin the Younger (see also Bertholdt, Eth. vi, 3063; Steiger, Br. Pet. p. 21 sq.). There is no good reason for supposing any other than ancient Babylon to be here meant, since it is known that this continued to be inhabited by Jews down to the Christian era (Gesen. Jes. i, 470. Compare Neander, Ch. Hist. i, 79, 80; Davidson, Introd. t. K. T. iii, 366. See PETER (EPISTLES OF).

4. In the Apocalypse (xiv, 8; xvi, 19; xvii, 5; xviii, 2) Babylon stands for Rome, symbolizing heathenism: "Babylon is fallen, that great city, because she made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication." This reference appears to have been derived from the practice of the Jews, who were accustomed to designate Rome, which they hated, by the opprobrious and not inappropriate name of Babylon (Schöttgen, Hor. Heb. i, 1125). The literal Babylon was the beginner and supporter of tyranny and idolatry; first by Nimrod or Ninus, and afterward by Nebuchadnezzar; and therefore, in Isa. xvii, 12, she is accused of magical enchantments from her youth or infancy, i. e. from her very first origin as a city or nation. This city and its whole empire were taken by the Persians under Cyrus; the Persians were subdued by the Macedonians, and the Macedonians by the Romans; so that Rome succeeded to the power of Old Babylon. And it was her method to adopt the worship of the false deities she had conquered; so that by her own acts she became the heir and successor of all the Babylonian idolatry, and of all that was introduced into it by the intermediate successors of Babylon, and consequently of all the idolatry of the earth. See REVELATION.

Further, that Babylon is Rome is evident from the explanation given by the angel in Rev. xvii, 18, where it is expressly said to be "that great city which ruleth over the kings of the earth;" no other city but Rome being in the exercise of such power at the time when the vision was seen. That Constantinople is not meant by Babylon is plain also from what Mede has stated (Works, p. 922): "The seven heads of the beast (says he) are by the angel made a double type, both of the seven hills where the woman sitteth, and of the seven sovereignties with which in a successive order the beast should reign. This is a pair of fetters to tie both beast and whore to Western Rome." Rome or Mystic Babylon (says the same author, p. 481) is called the "Great City," not from any reference to its extent, but because it was the queen of other cities. See Rome.

Babylonia (Βαβυλωνία), a name for the southern portion of Mesopotamia, constituting the region of which Babylon was the chief city. The latter name alone is occasionally used in Scripture for the entire region; but its most usual designation is CHALDEEA (q. v.). The Chaldeans proper, or Chaldæi, however, were probably originally from the mountainous region farther north, now occupied by the Kurds (with which name, indeed, many find an etymological connection; see Golinus, ad Alfeg. p. 17; Kölliger, in the Zeitschr. f. d. Kunde d. Mongol. iii, 8), a portion of whom under the Assyrian sway may have migrated into Mesopotamia (see Isa. xxiii, 13), and thus eventually became masters of the rich plain of Shinar (see Vitringa, ad Jes. i, 412 sq.; Gesenius, art. Chaldæer, in Ersch and Gruber's Encycl.). The original inhabitants nevertheless appear to have been of the Shemitic family (see Adelung, Mittheil. i, 314 sq.; Olshausen, Emend. zu A. T. p. 41 sq.); and their language belonged to the class of tongues spoken by that race, particularly to the Aramaic branch, and was indeed a dialect similar to that which is now called the Chaldee. See ARAMEAN LANGUAGE; CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS. The two words, Babylonia and Chaldaea, were, however, sometimes used in another signification; Babylonia, as containing in an extended sense Assyria also and Mesopotamia, nearly all the countries which Assyria in its widest meaning embraced; while Chaldaea indicated, in a narrower signification, the south-western part of Babylonia between the Euphrates and Babylon (Strabo, xvii; Ptol.). In Hebrew, Babylonia bore the name of SHINAR (q. v.), or "the land of Shinar;" while "Babylon" (Psa. cxxxvii, 1) and "the land of the Chaldeans" (Jer. xxiv, 5; Ezek. xii, 13) seem to signify the empire of Babylon. It is in the latter sense that we shall here treat it. See CHALDEANS.

1. Geography and general Description.—This province of Middle Asia was bordered on the north by Mesopotamia, on the east by the Tigris, on the south by the Persian Gulf, and on the west by the Arabian Desert. On the north it began at the point where the Euphrates and Tigris approach each other, and extended to their common outlet in the Persian Gulf, pretty nearly comprising the country now designated Irak Arabi. The climate is temperate and salubrious. The country in ancient times was very prolific, especially in corn and palms. Timber-trees it did not produce. Many parts have springs of naphtha. As rain is infrequent, even in the winter months, the country owes its fruitfulness to the annual overflow of the Euphrates and the Tigris, whose waters are conveyed over the land by means of canals. Quintus Curtius (i, 5) declares that the country between the Euphrates and the Tigris was covered with so rich a soil that the cattle were driven from their pastures lest they should be destroyed by satiety and fatness. During the three great empires of the East, no tract of the whole appears to have been so reputed for fertility and riches as the district of Babylonia, which arose in the main from the proper management of the mighty river which flowed through it. Herodotus mentions that, when reduced to the rank of a province, it yielded a revenue to the kings of Persia which comprised half their income. The terms in which the Scriptures describe its natural as well as its acquired supremacy when it was the imperial city, evidence the same facts. They call it "Babylon, the glory of kingdoms; the beauty of the Chaldee excellency; the lady of kingdoms, given to pleasure; that dwelleth carelessly, and saith in her heart I am, and there is none else beside me." But now, in the expressive and imitative language of the same book, may it be said, "She sits as a widow on the ground. There is no more a throne for thee, O daughter of the Chaldeans!" As for the abundance of the country, it has vanished as clean away as if "the beam of desolation" had swept it from north to south, the whole land, from the outskirts of Bagdad to the furthest reach of sight, lying a melancholy waste.

In order to defend the country against hostile attacks from its neighbors, northward from Babylonia, between the two rivers, a wall was built, which is known under the name of the Median Wall (Xen. Anab. ii, 4, 12).—The Babylonians were famous for the manufacture of cloth and carpets; they also excelled in making perfumes, in carving in wood, and in working in precious stones. They were a commercial as well as manufacturing people, and carried on a very extensive trade alike by land and by sea. Babylon was indeed a commercial depot between the Eastern and the Western worlds (Ezek. xvii, 4; Isa. xliii, 14). See COMMERCE. Thus favored by nature and aided by art, Babylonia became the first abode of social order and the cradle of civilization. Here first arose a powerful empire—here astronomy was first cultivated—here measures and weights were first employed. The rodutus has noticed the Chaldeans as a tribe of priests (i, 28); Diodorus (i, 28) as a separate caste under Belus, an Egyptian priest; while the book of Daniel refers to them as astrologers, magicians, and soothsayers; but there can be little doubt, as laid down by Gesenius (Jes. xxiii, 13), that it was the name of a distinct nation, if not, as Heeren (Manual of Anc. Hist. p. 28) has maintained, the name of the northern nomades in general. In connection with Babylonia, the Chaldeans are to be regarded as a conquering nation as well as a learned people; they introduced a correct method of reckoning time, and began their reign with Nabonassar, B.C. 747. There is a scriptural reference to the proud period in the history of the Chaldees when learned men filled the streets and the temples of Nineveh and Babel: "Behold the land of the Chaldeans; this people was not, till the Assyrian founded it for them that dwell in the wilderness; they set up the towers thereof, they raised up the palaces thereof; and he brought it to ruin" (Isa. xliii, 13). Babylonia, during this period, was "the land of the Chaldeans," the same as that into which the children of Judah were carried away captive (Jer. xxiv, 5).—KITTO, s. v. See CAPTIVITY.

II. History of the Babylonian Empire.—The history of Babylon itself mounts up to a time not very much later than the Flood. See BABEL. The native historian seems to have possessed authentic records of his country for above 2000 years before the conquest by Alexander (Berosus, Fragm. 11); and Scripture represents the "beginning of the kingdom" as belonging to the time of Nimrod, the grandson of Ham, and the great-grandson of Noah (Gen. x, 6-10). Of Nimrod no trace has been found in the Babylonian remains, unless he is identical with the god Bel of the Babylonian Pantheon, and so with the Greek Belus, the hero-founder of the city. This identity is possible, and at any rate the most ancient inscriptions appear to show that the primitive inhabitants of the country were really Cushite, i. e. identical in race with the early inhabitants of Southern Arabia and of Ethiopia. The seat of government at this early time was, as has been stated, in lower Babylonia, Erech (Warka) and Ur (Mugheir) being the capitals, and Babylon (if built) being a place of no consequence. The country was called Shinar (שִׁנָּר), and the people the Alkadim (comp. Accad of Gen. x, 10). Of the art of this period we have specimens in the ruins of Mugheir and Warka, the remains of which date from at least the 20th century before our era. We find the use of kiln-baked as well as of sun-dried bricks already begun; we find writing practised, for the bricks are stamped with the names and titles of the kings; we find buttresses employed to support buildings, and we have probable indications of the system of erecting lofty buildings in stages. On the other hand, mortar is unknown, and the bricks are laid either in clay or in bitumen (comp. Gen. xi, 3); they are rudely moulded, and of various shapes and sizes; sun-dried bricks predominate, and some large buildings are composed entirely of them; in these reed-matting occurs at intervals, apparently used to protect the mass from disintegration. There is no trace of ornament in the erections of this date, which were imposing merely by their size and solidity.

The first important change which we are able to trace in the external condition of Babylon is its subjection, at a time anterior to Abraham, by the neighboring kingdom of Elam or Susiana. Berosus spoke of a first Chaldean dynasty consisting of eleven kings, whom he probably represented as reigning from B.C. 2231 to B.C. 1976. At the last mentioned date he said there was a change, and a new dynasty succeeded, consisting of 49 kings, who reigned 458 years (from B.C. 1976 to B.C. 1518). It is thought that this transition may mark the invasion of Babylonia from the East, and the establishment of Elamitic influence in the country, under Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv), whose representative appears as a conqueror in the inscriptions. Amraphel, king of Shinar, and Arioch, king of Ellasar (Larsa), would be tributary princes whom Chedorlaomer had subjected, while he himself may have become the founder of the new dynasty, which, according to Berosus, continued on the throne for above 450 years. From this point the history of Babylon is almost a blank for above twelve centuries. Except in the mention of the plundering of Job by the Chaldeans (Job i, 17), and of the "goodly Babylonish garment" which Achan coveted (Josh. vii, 21), Scripture is silent with regard to the Babylonians from the time of Abraham to that of Hezekiah. Berosus covered this space with three dynasties; one (which has been already mentioned) of 49 Chaldean kings, who reigned 458 years; another of 9 Arab kings, who reigned 245 years; and a third of 49 Assyrian monarchs, who held dominion for 5-6 generations; but nothing beyond this bare outline has come down to us on his authority concerning the period in question. The monumental records of the country furnish a series of names, the reading of which is very uncertain, which may be arranged with a good deal of probability in chronological order, apparently belonging to the first of these three dynasties. Of the second no traces have been hitherto discovered. The third would seem to be identical with the Upper Dynasty of Assyria, of which some account has been given in the article ASSYRIA. It would appear, then, as if Babylon, after having a native Chaldean dynasty which ruled for 224 years (Brandis, p. 17), and a second dynasty of Elamitic Chaldeans who ruled for a further period of 158 years, fell wholly under Semitic influence, becoming subject first to Arabia for two centuries and a half, and then to Assyria for above five centuries, and not regaining even a qualified independence till the time marked by the close of the Upper and the formation of the Lower Assyrian empire. This is the conclusion which seems naturally to follow from the abstract which is all that we possess of Berosus; and doubtless it is to a certain extent true. But the statement is too broad to be exact; and the monuments show that Babylon was at no time absorbed into Assyria, or even for very many years together a submissive vassal. Assyria, which she had colonized during the time of the second or great Chaldean dynasty, to which she had given letters and the arts, and which she had held in subjection for many hundred years, became in her turn (about B.C. 1270) the predominant Mesopotamian power, and the glory of Babylon in consequence suffered eclipse. But she had her native kings during the whole of the Assyrian period, and she frequently contended with her great neighbor, being sometimes even the aggressor. Though much sunk from her former greatness, she continued to be the second power in Asia, and retained a vitality which at a later date enabled her to become once more the head of an empire.

The line of Babylonian kings becomes exactly known to us from the year B.C. 747. An astronomical work of the geographer Ptolemy has preserved to us a document, the importance of which for comparative chronology it is scarcely possible to exaggerate. The Canon of Ptolemy, as it is called, gives us the succession of Babylonian monarchs, with the exact length of the reign of each, from the year B.C. 747, when Nabonassar mounted the throne, to B.C. 331, when the last Persian king was dethroned by Alexander. This document, which, from its close accordance with the statements of Scripture, always vindicated to itself a high authority in the eyes of Christian chronologists, has recently been confirmed in so many points by the inscriptions that its authentic character is established beyond all possibility of cavil or dispute. As the basis of all accurate calculation for Oriental dates previous to Cyrus, it seems proper to transcribe the earlier portion of it in this place. [The accessions are given ac-

Of Nabonassar, the first king in Ptolemy's list, nothing can be said to be known except the fact, reported by Berossus, that he destroyed all the annals of his predecessors for the purpose of compelling the Babylonians to date from himself (Fragm. 11 a). It has been conjectured that he was the husband or son of Semiramis, and owed to her his possession of the throne. But of this theory there is at present no proof. It rests mainly upon a synchronism obtained from Herodotus, who makes Semiramis a Babylonian queen, and places her five generations (167 years) before Nitocris, the mother of the last king. The Assyrian discoveries have shown that there was a Semiramis about this time, but they furnish no evidence of her connection with Babylon, which still continues uncertain. The immediate successors of Nabonassar are still more obscure than himself. Absolutely nothing beyond the brief notation of the canon has reached us concerning Nadius (or Nalbus), Chinzinus (or Chinzirus), and Porus, or Elubus, who certainly cannot be the Tyrian king of that name mentioned by Menander (ap. Joseph. Ant. ix, 14, 2). Mardocempalus, on the contrary, is a monarch to whom great interest attaches. He is undoubtedly the Merodach-Baladan, or Berodach-Baladan (q. v.) of Scripture, and was a personage of great consequence, reigning himself twice, the first time for 12 years, contemporaneously with the Assyrian king Sargon, and the second time for six months only, during the first year of Sennacherib; and leaving a sort of hereditary claim to his sons and grandsons, who are found to have been engaged in hostilities with Esarhaddon and his successor. His dealings with Hezekiah sufficiently indicate the independent position of Babylon at this period, while the interest which he felt in an astronomical phenomenon (2 Chron. xxxii, 31) harmonizes with the character of a native Chaldean king which appears to belong to him. The Assyrian inscriptions show that after reigning 12 years Merodach-Baladan was deprived of his crown and driven into banishment by Sargon, who appears to have placed Arcanus (his son?) upon the throne as viceroy, a position which he maintained for five years. A time of trouble then ensued, estimated in the canon at two years, during which various pretenders assumed the crown, among them a certain Hazisa, or Acses, who reigned for about a month, and Merodach-Baladan, who held the throne for half a year (Polyhist. ap. Euseb.). Sennacherib, bent on re-establishing the influence of Assyria over Babylon, proceeded against Merodach-Baladan (as he informs us) in his first year, and having de-throned him, placed an Assyrian named Belib, or Belibus, upon the throne, who ruled as his viceroy for three years. At the end of this time, the party of Merodach-Baladan still giving trouble, Sennacherib descended again into Babylonia, once more overran it, removed Belib, and placed his eldest son—who appears in the canon as Aparanadius—upon the throne. Aparanadius reigned for six years, when he was succeeded by a certain Regibus, who reigned for one year; after which Mesessimordacus held the throne for four years. Nothing more is known of these kings, and it is uncertain whether they were viceroys or independent native monarchs. They were contemporary with Sennacherib, to whose reign belongs also the second interregnum, extending to eight years, which the canon interposes between the reigns of Mesessimordacus and Asaridanus. In Asaridanus critical eyes long ago detected Esarhaddon, Sennacherib's son and successor; and it may be regarded as certain from the inscriptions that this king ruled in person over both Babylonia and Assyria, holding his court alternately at their respective capitals. Hence we may understand how Manasseh, his contemporary, came to be "carried by the captains of the king of Assyria to Babylon" instead of to Nineveh, as would have been done in any other reign. See ESARHADDON. Saoudachinus and Cinneladanus (or Cinneladanus), his brother (Polyhist.), the successors of Asaridanus, are kings of whose history we know nothing. Probably they were viceroys under the later Assyrian monarchs, who are represented by Alydenus (ap. Euseb.) as retaining their authority over Babylon up to the time of the last siege of Nineveh.

With Nabopolassar, the successor of Cinneladanus, and the father of Nebuchadnezzar, a new era in the history of Babylon commences. According to Alydenus, who probably drew his information from Berossus, he was appointed to the government of Babylon by the last Assyrian king, at the moment when the Medes were about to make their final attack; whereupon, betraying the trust reposed in him, he went over to the enemy, arranged a marriage between his son Nebuchadnezzar and the daughter of the Median leader, and joined in the last siege of the city. See NINEVEH. On the success of the confederates (B.C. 625) Babylon became not only an independent kingdom, but an empire; the southern and western portions of the Assyrian territory were assigned to Nabopolassar in the partition of the spoils which followed on the conquest, and thereby the Babylonian dominion became extended over the whole valley of the Euphrates as far as the Taurus range, over Syria, Phœnicia, Palestine, Idumea, and (perhaps) a portion of Egypt. Thus, among others, the Jews passed quietly and almost without remark from one feudal head to another, exchanging dependency on Assyria for dependency on Babylon, and continuing to pay to Nabopolassar the same tribute and service which they had previously rendered to the Assyrians. Friendly relations seem to have been maintained with Media throughout the reign of Nabopolassar, who led or sent a contingent to help Cyaxares in his Lydian war, and acted as mediator in the negotiations by which that war was concluded (Herod. i, 74). At a later date hostilities broke out with Egypt. Necho, the son of Psamatik I, about the year B.C. 608 invaded the Babylonian dominions on the south-west, and made himself master of the entire tract between his own country and the Euphrates (2 Kings xxiii, 29, and xxiv, 7). Nabopolassar was now advanced in life, and not able to take the field in person (Beross. Frag. 14). He therefore sent his son, Nebuchadnezzar, at the head of a large army, against the Egyptians, and the battle of Carchemish, which soon followed, restored to Babylon the former limits of her territory (comp. 2 Kings xxiv, 7 with Jer. xlvi, 2-12). Nebuchadnezzar pressed forward and had reached Egypt, when news of his father's death recalled him, and hastily returning to Babylon, he was fortunate enough to find himself, without any struggle, acknowledged king (B.C. 604).

A complete account of the works and exploits of this great monarch—by far the most remarkable of all the Babylonian kings—will be given in the article NEBUCHADNEZZAR. It is enough to note in this place that he was great both in peace and in war, but greater in the former. Besides recovering the possession of Syria and Palestine, and carrying off the Jews after repeated rebellions into captivity, he reduced Phœnicia, besieged and took Tyre, and ravaged, if he did not actually conquer, Egypt. But it was as the adorer and beautifier of his native land—as the builder and restorer of almost all her cities and temples—that this monarch obtained that great reputation which has handed down his name traditionally in the East on a par with those of Nimrod, Solomon, and Alexander, and made it still a familiar term in the mouths of the people. Probably no single man ever left behind him as his memorial upon the earth one half the amount of building that was erected by this king. The ancient ruins and the modern towns of Babylonia are alike built almost exclusively of his bricks. Babylon itself, the capital, was peculiarly the object of his attention. It was here that, besides repairing the walls and restoring the temples, he constructed that magnificent palace, which, with its triple enclosure, its hanging gardens, its plated pillars, and its rich ornamentation of enamelled brick, was regarded in ancient times as one of the seven wonders of the world (Strab. xvi. 1, § 5).

Nebuchadnezzar died B.C. 561, having reigned 43 years, and was succeeded by Evil-Merodach, his son, who is called in the Canon Bhoarudamus. This prince, who, "in the year that he began to reign, did lift up the head of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, out of prison" (2 Kings xxv, 27), was murdered, after having held the crown for two years only, by Neriglissar, his brother-in-law. See EVIL-MERODACH. Neriglissar—the Nerigassassar of the Canon—is (apparently) identical with the "Nergal-sar-ezer, Rab-Mag" of Jeremiah (xxxix, 3, 13, 14). He bears this title, which has been translated "chief of the Magi" (Gesenius), or "chief priest" (Col. Rawlinson), in the inscriptions, and calls himself the son of a "king of Babylon." Some writers have considered him identical with "Darius the Mede" (Larcher, Conringius, Bouhier); but this is improbable [see DARIUS THE MEDE], and he must rather be regarded as a Babylonian of high rank, who, having married a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, raised his thoughts to the crown, and finding Evil-Merodach unpopular with his subjects, murdered him, and became his successor. Neriglissar built the palace at Babylon, which seems to have been placed originally on the west bank of the river. He was probably advanced in life at his accession, and thus reigned but four years, though he died a natural death, and left the crown to his son Laborsorachod. This prince, though a mere lad at the time of his father's decease, was allowed to ascend the throne without difficulty; but when he had reigned nine months he became the victim of a conspiracy among his friends and connections, who, professing to detect in him symptoms of a bad disposition, seized him, and tortured him to death. Nabonidus (or Labynetus), one of the conspirators, succeeded; he is called by Berossus "a certain Nabonidus, a Babylonian" (ap. Joseph. Ap. i, 21), by which it would appear that he was not a member of the royal family; and this is likewise evident from his inscriptions, in which he only claims for his father the rank of "Rab-Mag." Herodotus seems to have been mistaken in supposing him (i, 188) the son of a great queen, Nitocris, and (apparently) of a former king, Labynetus (Nebuchadnezzar?). Indeed, it may be doubted whether the Babylonian Nitocris of Herodotus is really a historical personage. His authority is the sole argument for her existence, which it is difficult to credit against the silence of Scripture, Berossus, the Canon, and the Babylonian monuments. She may perhaps have been the wife of Nebuchadnezzar, but in that case she must have been wholly unconnected with Nabonidus, who certainly bore no relation to that monarch.

Nabonidus, or Labynetus (as he was called by the Greeks), mounted the throne in the year B.C. 555, very shortly before the war broke out between Cyrus and Croesus. He entered into alliance with the latter of these monarchs against the former, and, had the struggle been prolonged, would have sent a contingent into Asia Minor. Events proceeded too rapidly to allow of this; but Nabonidus had provoked the hostility of Cyrus by the mere fact of the alliance, and felt at once that sooner or later he would have to resist the attack of an avenging army. He probably employed his long and peaceful reign of 17 years in preparations against the dreaded foe, executing the defensive works which Herodotus ascribes to his mother (i, 185), and accumulating in the town abundant stores of provisions (ib. c. 190). In the year B.C. 539 the attack came. Cyrus advanced at the head of his irresistible hordes, but wintered upon the Diyaleh or Gyndes, making his final approaches in the ensuing spring. Nabonidus appears by the inscriptions to have shortly before this associated with him in the government of the kingdom his son, Bel-shar-ezer or Belshazzar; on the approach of Cyrus, therefore, he took the field himself at the head of his army, leaving his son to command in the city. In this way, by help of a recent discovery, the accounts of Berossus and the book of Daniel—hitherto regarded as hopelessly conflicting—may be reconciled. See BELSHAZZAR. Nabonidus engaged the army of Cyrus, but was defeated and forced to shut himself up in the neighboring town of Borsippa (marked now by the Birs-Nimrud), where he continued till after the fall of Babylon (Beross. ap. Joseph. Ap. i, 21). Belshazzar guarded the city, but, over-confident in its strength, kept insufficient watch, and recklessly indulging in untimely and impious festivities (Dan. v), allowed the enemy to enter the town by the channel of the river (Herod. i, 191; Xen. Cyrop. vii, 7). Babylon was thus taken by a surprise, as Jeremiah had prophesied (li, 31)—by an army of Medes and Persians, as intimated 170 years earlier by Isaiah (xxi, 1-9), and, as Jeremiah had also forewarned (li, 39), during a festival. In the carnage which ensued upon the taking of the town, Belshazzar was slain (Dan. v, 30). Nabonidus, on receiving the intelligence, submitted, and was treated kindly by the conqueror, who not only spared his life, but gave him estates in Carmania (Beross. ut sup.; comp. Abyd. Fragn. 9).

Such is the general outline of the siege and capture of Babylon by Cyrus, as derivable from the fragments of Berossus, illustrated by the account in Daniel, and reduced to harmony by aid of the important fact, obtained recently from the monuments, of the relationship between Belshazzar and Nabonidus. It is scarcely necessary to remark that it differs in many points from the accounts of Herodotus and Xenophon; but the latter of these two writers is in his Cyropædia a mere romancer, and the former is very imperfectly acquainted with the history of the Babylonians. The native writer, whose information was drawn from authentic and contemporary documents, is far better authority than either of the Greek authors, the earlier of whom visited Babylon nearly a century after its capture by Cyrus, when the tradition had doubtless become in many respects corrupted.

According to the book of Daniel, it would seem as if Babylon was taken on this occasion, not by Cyrus, king of Persia, but by a Median king named Darius (v, 31). The question of the identity of this personage with any Median or Babylonian king known to us from profane sources will be discussed under DARIUS THE MEDE. It need only be remarked here that Scripture does not really conflict on this point with profane authorities, since there is sufficient indication, from the terms used by the sacred writer, that "Darius the Mede," whoever he may have been, was not the real conqueror, nor a king who ruled in his own right, but a monarch intrusted by another with a certain delegated authority (see Dan. v, 31, and ix, 1).

With the conquest by Cyrus commenced the decay and ruin of Babylon. The "broad walls" were then to some extent "broken down" (Beros. Fr. 14), and the "high gates" probably "burnt with fire" (Jer. li, 58). The defences, that is to say, were ruined; though it is not to be supposed that the laborious and useless task of entirely demolishing the gigantic fortifications of the place was attempted or even contemplated by the conqueror. Babylon was weakened, but it continued a royal residence not only during the lifetime of Darius the Mede, but through the entire period of the Persian empire. The Persian kings held their court at Babylon during the larger portion of the year, and at the time of Alexander's conquests it was still the second, if not the first city of the empire. It had, however, suffered considerably on more than one occasion subsequent to the time of Cyrus. Twice in the reign of Darius (Behist. Ins.), and once in that of Xerxes (Ctes. Pers. § 22), it had risen against the Persians, and made an effort to regain its independence. After each rebellion its defences were weakened, and during the long period of profound peace which the Persian empire enjoyed from the reign of Xerxes to that of Darius Codomannus they were allowed to go completely to decay. The public buildings also suffered grievously from neglect. Alexander found the great temple of Belus in so ruined a condition that it would have required the labor of 10,000 men for two months even to clear away the rubbish with which it was encumbered (Strabo, xvi, 1, 5). His designs for the restoration of the temple and the general embellishment of the city were frustrated by his untimely death, and the removal of the seat of empire to Antioch under the Seleucidae gave the finishing blow to the prosperity of the place. The great city of Selucia, which soon after arose in its neighborhood, not only drew away its population, but was actually constructed of materials derived from its buildings (Plin. II. N. vi, 30). Since then Babylon has been a quarry from which all the tribes in the vicinity have perpetually derived the bricks with which they have built their cities, and (besides Selucia) Ctesiphon, Al-Modain, Bagdad, Kufa, Kerbelah, Hillah, and numerous other towns, have risen from its ruins. The "great city," "the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency," has thus emphatically "become heaps" (Jer. li, 37)—she is truly "an astonishment and a hissing, without an inhabitant." Her walls have altogether disappeared—they have "fallen" (Jer. li, 44), been "thrown down" (I, 15), been "broken utterly" (li, 58). "A drought is upon her waters" (I, 39); for the system of irrigation, on which, in Babylonia, fertility altogether depends, has long been laid aside; "her cities" are everywhere "a desolation" (li, 43), her "land a wilderness;" "wild beasts of the desert" (jackals) "lie there;" and "owls dwell there" (comp. Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 484, with Isa. xiii, 21, 22, and Jer. i, 39); the natives regard the whole site as haunted, and neither will the "Arab pitch tent nor the shepherd fold sheep there."—Smith.

After the exile many of the Jews continued settled in Babylonia; the capital even contained an entire quarter of them (comp. Sussan. i, 5 sq.; 1 Pet. v, 13; Josephus, Ant. xx, 2, 2; xv, 3, 1; xviii, 9, 1; Philo, Opp. ii, 578, 587); and after the destruction of Jerusalem these Babylonian Jews established schools of considerable repute, although the natives were stigmatized as "Babylonians" by the bigoted Jewish population (Talm. Babyl. Joma, fol. 65). Traces of their learning exist not only in much rabbinical literature that emanated from these now extinct schools, but M. Layard has recently discovered several earthen bowls covered with their Hebrew inscriptions in an early character, copies and translations of which are given in his Bab. and Nin. p. 4: 6 sq.

Ba'ca, VALLEY OF (Heb. E' mck hab-Baka', עֵמֶק נָצַח, vale of [the] weeping; Sept. κείλις τῶν κλαυθμῶν, Vulg. Vallis lacrymarum), a valley apparently somewhere in Palestine, through which the exiled Psalmist sees in vision the pilgrims passing in their march toward the sanctuary of Jehovah at Zion (Psa. lxxxiv, 6). The passage seems to contain a play, in the manner of Hebrew poetry, on the name of the trees (עֵצֵי נָצַח, elcain'; see MULBERRY) from which the valley probably derived its name, and the "tears" (נָצַח, beli') shed by the pilgrims in their joy at their approach to Zion. These tears are conceived to be so abundant as to turn the dry valley in which the baka-trees delighted (so Lengerke, Kewna, p. 135) into a springy or marshy place (נָצַח). That a real locality was in the mind of the Psalmist is most probable, from the use of the definite article before the name (Gesen. Thes. p. 265). A valley of the same name (Bekaa) still exists in the Sinaitic district (Burckhardt, p. 619); but this, as well as the valley near Mecca (Niebuhr, Beschr. p. 339), is entirely out of the region demanded by the context. Some regard this as a valley (el-Bekaa) or plain in which Baalbeck is situated. But this spot is far from possessing the dreariness and drought on which the point of the Psalmist's allusion depends. The rendering of the Targum is Gehenna, i. e. the Ge-Hinnom or ravine below Mount Zion. This locality agrees well with the mention of bakaim-trees in 2 Sam. v, 23. To the majority of interpreters, however, it does not appear necessary to understand that there is any reference to a valley actually called by this name. The Psalmist in exile, or at least at a distance from Jerusalem, is speaking of the privileges and happiness of those who are permitted to make the usual pilgrimages to that city in order to worship Jehovah in the Temple; "They knew the ways that lead thither; yea, though they must pass through rough and dreary paths, even a vale of tears; yet such are their hope and joy of heart, that all this is to them as a well-watered country, a land crowned with blessings of the early rain." Dr. Robinson (Add. to Calmet's Diet.) concludes that something like this is the sense of the passage; and it seems, on the whole, the most intelligible and forcible explanation of the passage to suppose that the sacred writer thus poetically describes some one of the many desolate valleys which the stated worshippers at Jerusalem were obliged to traverse in their yearly visits to the solemn festivals.—Smith, s. v.; Kitto, s. v.

Baccalaureus (i. e. BACHELOR), one who takes a first degree in divinity, arts, medicine, or civil law. This degree was first introduced in the thirteenth century by Pope Gregory IX. Rhenanus maintains that the title is taken from the Baculus placed in the hand of the new graduate. The usual derivation is that given by Alcimus, viz. bacca laurea, a laurel berry; "but the Spanish bacillor, which means at once a babbler and a master of arts, taken in conjunction with the Portuguese bacharel and bacillo, a shoot or twig of the vine (from the Latin baculus or baculum, a stick or shoot), and the French bachelette, a damsel, seem to point to its original and generic meaning, which probably was a person shooting or protruding from one stage of his career into another more advanced. With this general signification, all the special meanings of the word given by Ducange (Glossarium, s. v.) seem to have some analogy. 1. It was used, he says, to indicate a person who cultivated certain portions of church lands called baccalaria—which he supposed to have been a corruption of vassalaria—a fief belonging to an inferior vassal, or to one who had not attained to a full feudal recognition. 2. It indicated ecclesiastics of a lower dignity than the other members of a religious brotherhood, i. e. monks who were still in the first stage of monkhood. 3. It was used by later writers to indicate persons in the first or probationary stage of knighthood; i. e. not esquires simply, but knights who, from poverty and the insufficient number of their retainers, from their possessing, perhaps, only the baccalaria above referred to, or from homage, had not yet raised their banners in the field (levé banrière). 4. It was adopted to indicate the first grade or step in the career of university life. As an academical title, it was first introduced by Pope Gregory IX in the thirteenth century into the University of Paris to denote a candidate who had undergone his first academical trials, and was authorized to give lectures, but was not yet admitted to the rank of an independent master or doctor. At a later period it was introduced into the other faculties as the lowest academical honor, and adopted by the other universities of Europe." In the Middle Ages two kinds of bachelors were recognized in theological studies, viz. Baccalauri cursores and Baccalauri formati. The former were those who, after six years of study, were admitted to perform their courses. There were two courses, one in explaining the Bible for three years, and the other in explaining for one year the Master of the Sentences; consequently, those who performed the biblical course were called Baccalauri biblici; the others, Baccalauri sententiarum; while those who had finished both courses were known as Baccalauri formati.—Chambers, Encyclopædia, s. v.; Herzog, Real-Encyclopædie, Suppl. i, 424; Hilscher, de nomine Baccalauri (Lips. 1733); Göttsched, de dignitate Bacc. Lipsiensis (Lips. 1739); Landon, Eccles. Dictionary, s. v. See DEGREES; UNIVERSITIES.

Baccanarists, a society in the Church of Rome, founded in Italy by one Baccanari after the suppression of the Jesuits in 1773. Its object was to restore the order under a new name and form. Pius VI favored the organization, and it spread into Austria, Holland, and England. In 1814 its members were united with the re-established order of Jesuits. See JESUITS.

Bacchidês (Βακχίδης, son of Bacchus), a friend of Antiochus Epiphanes (Josephus, Ant. xii, 10, 2) and governor of Mesopotamia (ἐν τῇ πῆραν τοῦ ποταμοῦ, 1 Macc. vii, 8), who was commissioned by Demetrius Soter to investigate the charges which Alcimus (q. v.) preferred against Judas Maccabæus. He confirmed Alcimus in the high-priesthood; and, having inflicted signal vengeance on the extreme party of the Assidarians (q. v.), he returned to Antioch. After the expulsion of Alcimus and the defeat and death of Nicanor, he led a second expedition into Judea. Judas Maccabæus fell in the battle which ensued at Laisa (B.C. 161), and Bacchides re-established the supremacy of the Syrian faction (1 Macc. ix, 25, οἱ ἀσείβητες ἀνέστη; Joseph. Ant. xiii, 1, 1). He next attempted to surprise Jonathan, who had assumed the leadership of the national party after the death of Judas; but Jonathan escaped across the Jordan. Bacchides then placed garrisons in several important positions, and took hostages for the security of the present government. Having completed the pacification of the country (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 1, 5), he returned to Demetrius (B.C. 160). After two years he came back at the request of the Syrian faction, in the hope of overpowering Jonathan and Simon, who still maintained a small force in the desert; but, meeting with ill success, he turned against those who had induced him to undertake the expedition, and sought an honorable retreat. When this was known by Jonathan he sent envoys to Bacchides and concluded a peace (B.C. 158) with him, acknowledging him as governor under the Syrian king, while Bacchides pledged himself not to enter the land again, a condition which he faithfully observed (1 Macc. ix, 70 sq.; Joseph. Ant. xii, 1, 6; xiii, 1; comp. 2 Macc. viii, 30).

He must have been a different person from the Bacchides, the general of Antiochus Epiphanes in charge of the fortresses of Judea, whom the Asmonean priest Matthias, with his sons, slew with their jaggars (Joseph. Ant. i, 1, 2).—Smith, s. v.

Bacchûrus (Βακχούρος; Vulg. Zaccarus), given as one of the "holy singers" (τῶν ἱερουδαίων) who had taken a foreign wife (1 Esdr. ix, 24); but no name corresponding with this is added in the genuine list (Esra, x, 24).

Bacchus, the Latinized form (in the Auth. Vers. at 2 Macc. vi, 7; xiv, 33) of the heathen deity called by the Greeks Dionysus (q. v.). The latter occurs also in (the so-called) 3 Macc. ii, 29. In all these instances this mythic deity is named in connection with circumstances which would indicate that he was an object of special abhorrence to the Jews; for in the first it is stated that the Jews were compelled to go in procession to Bacchus; in the second, the erection of a temple to him is threatened in order to compel the priests to deliver up Judas to Nicanor; and in the third, the branding with the ivy leaf, sacred to him, is reported as inflicted on them by way of punishment. This falls in with what Tacitus says, that it was a mistake to imagine that, because the priests of the Jews accompanied their singing with flute and cymbals, and had garlands of ivy, and a golden vine was found in the Temple, they worshipped Bacchus, for that this was not at all in accordance with their institutes (nequam congruentibus institutis, Hist. v, 5). As Bacchus was the god of wine, and in general of earthly festivity and jollity, and as his rites sanctioned the most frantic excesses of revelry and tumultuous excitement, he would necessarily be an object of abhorrence to all who believed in and worshipped Jehovah. Probably also the very fact that some things connected with the Jewish worship had, as mentioned by Tacitus, and still more fully by Plutarch (Symposiac. iv, qu. 6), led to the supposition that they revered Bacchus, may have produced in their minds a more determined recoil from and hatred of all pertaining to his name. In the pagan system Bacchus is the god of wine, and is represented as the son of Jupiter and Semele, the daughter of Cadmus. His mother perished in the burning embraces of the god, whom she persuaded to visit her with his attribute of royalty, the thunderbolt; the embryo child was sewn up in Jupiter's thigh, whence, in due time, he was produced to light. Mythology abounds with the adventures of Bacchus, the most noted of which are the transformation of the Tyrrhenian pirates, who carried him off to sell for a slave, into dolphins; his revenge on the seoffing Pentheus, and his invasion and conquest of India. Bacchus was generally figured as a young man of effeminate appearance (ἑπλερωμένος, Eurip. Bacch. 353; Enseb. Chron. p. 29), with a garland of ivy binding his long hair (Strabo, xv, p. 1038); in his hand he bore a thyrsus, or rod wreathed with ivy, and at his feet lay his attendant panther. His companions were the Bacchantes, the Lenæ, the Naiads and Nymphs, etc., and especially Silenus. His worship seems to have arisen from that "striving after objectivity" (Wachsmuth, Hellen. Alterthumsk. ii, 2, p. 113), which is the characteristic of a primitive people. The southern coast of Thraee appears to have been the original seat of this religion, and it was introduced thence into Greece shortly after the colonization by the Æolians of the Asiatic coast of the Hellespont. The admission of the identity of Osiris and Dionysus by Plutarch and other mythological theorists, as well as Herodotus's simple statement of the assertions of the Egyptian priests to that effect, is no proof of the common origin of the worship of this divinity in Egypt and Greece; but there is no doubt that certain modifications of the Dionysiac rites took place after the commencement of the intercourse between the Ionians and the Egyptians (Penny Cyclop. s. v.). The worship of Bacchus was intimately connected with that of Demeter, and under the name of Iacchus he was adored along with that goddess at Eleusis. Virgil invokes them together (Georg. i, 5) as the lights of the universe. According to the Egyptians, they were the joint rulers of the world below (Herod. ii, 123). In a cameo he is represented as sitting with her in a chariot drawn by male and female centaurs. (For a fuller account of the mythological history and attributes of Bacchus, see Creuzer, Symbolik und Mythologie, pt. iii, bk. 3, ch. 2 of Moser's Abridgment.)

Bace'nor (Bacsi'noo; Vulg. Baceonor), apparently a captain of horse in the army of Judas Maccabeus, to whose detachment Dositheus belonged (2 Mace. xii, 35); or possibly it may have been only the title of one of the Jewish companies or squadrons.

Bachelor. See BACCALAUREUS.

Each'rite (Heb. with the article hab-Bakri', עֲכָרִיתִי; Sept. omits, but some copies have ὁ Βακρίτης; Vulg. familia Becheritarum; Anth. Vers. "the Bacherites"), the family name of the descendants of BECHER (q. v.), the son of Ephraim (Num. xxvi, 35). See BERIAH.

Bachuth. See ALLON-BACHUTH.

Backbite (in Psa. xv. 3, בִּקְרָה, ragal', to run about tattling; in Prov. xxv, 23, סֵתֶר, se'ther, secrecy in tale-bearing; in Rom. i, 30, κατάλαλος, an evil speaker; in 2 Cor. xii, 20, κατάλαλος, evil-speaking), maliciously to defame an absent person. See SLANDER.

Backslide (in Prov. xiv, 14, שָׁבַע, sug, to go back; in Hos. iv, 16, שָׁבַע, sarav', to be refractory; elsewhere in the O. T. שָׁבַע, shub, to return; in Heb. x, 29, ἑπιστράλλω, to "draw back"). See APOSTASY.

1. This term popularly denotes a falling off or defection in matters of religion; an apostasy, Acts xxi, 21; 2 Thess. ii, 3; 1 Tim. iv, 1. This may be either partial or complete; partial, when it is in the heart, as Prov. xiv, 14; complete, as that described in Heb. vi, 4, etc.; x, 6, etc. On the latter passage Chrysostom observes: "When a house has a strong foundation, suppose an arch fall, some of the beams break, or a wall decline, while the foundation is good, these breaches may be repaired; so in religion, while a person maintains the true doctrines, and remains on the firm rock, though he fall, true repentance may restore him to the favor and image of God; but as in a house, when the foundation is bad, nothing can save the building from ruin; so, when heretical doctrines are admitted for a foundation, nothing can save the professor from destruction." It is important, in interpreting these passages, to keep it steadfastly in mind that the apostasy they speak of is not only moral, but doctrinal. See FALLING AWAY.

2. It is also used less accurately of a loss of fervor in religious feeling and of zeal in religious duty. In this sense it should be called partial backsliding, which must be distinguished from hypocrisy, as the former may exist where there are good intentions on the whole; but the latter is a studied profession of appearing to be what we are not. The causes of backsliding are—the cares of the world; improper connections; inattention to secret or closet duties; self-conceit and dependence; indulgence; listening to and parleying with temptations. A backslidden state is manifested by indifference to prayer and self-examination; trifling or unprofitable conversation; neglect of public ordinances; shunning the people of God; associating with the world; thinking lightly of sin; neglect of the Bible; and often by gross immorality. The consequences of this awful state are—loss of character; loss of comfort; loss of usefulness; and loss of a well-grounded hope of future happiness. To avoid this state, or recover from it, we should beware of the first appearance of sin; be much in prayer; attend the ordinances; and unite with the people of God. We should consider the awful instances of apostasy, as Saul, Judas, Demas, etc.; the many warnings we have of it, Matt. xxiv, 13; Heb. x, 38; Luke ix, 62; how it grieves the Holy Spirit; and how wretched it makes us; above all things, our dependence should be on God, that we may always be directed by his Spirit, and kept by his power.—Watson, Theol. Dictionary, s. v.; Buck, Theol. Dictionary, s. v.; Clarke, Theology (by Dunn), p. 369. On the possibility of "falling from grace," see PERSISTENCE.

Backus, Azel, D. D., president of Hamilton College, was born at Norwich, Conn., Oct. 13th, 1765. While yet a boy he imbibed infidel principles, but was reclaimed by the instructions of his uncle, the Rev. Charles Backus. He graduated A. B. at Yale in 1787. He was licensed in 1789, and succeeded Dr. Bellamy as pastor at Bethlem in 1791. Here he labored faithfully, both as pastor and as principal of a classical school, till 1812, when he was elected president of Hamilton College. After five years of successful administration, he died of typhus fever, Dec. 9, 1817. He was a man of good endowments and great industry.—Sprague, Annals, ii, 287.

Backus, Charles, D. D., an eminent Congregational minister, was born in Norwich, Conn., Nov. 5, 1749. He lost his parents in his childhood, but, as he early discovered a love of learning, his friends assisted him to obtain a liberal education. He graduated A. B. at Yale in 1769, and, after studying theology under Dr. Hart, of Preston, he was licensed in 1773. In 1774 he was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Somers, where he remained until his death, December 30, 1803. During the course of his ministry nearly fifty young men studied theology under his roof, and among them were Dr. Woods, of Andover, President Moore, of Amherst, and others. His reputation brought him invitations to the chair of theology at Dartmouth, and also at Yale, but he declined both calls. He published a number of occasional sermons.—Sprague, Annals, ii, 61.

Backus, Isaac, A. M., a distinguished Baptist minister, was born at Norwich, Conn., Jan. 9, 1724. In 1748 he was ordained pastor of a Congregational church in Titicut, Middleborough, Mass. In 1749 a number of the members of Mr. Backus's church altered their sentiments with regard to baptism, and he at length united with them in opinion. He was immersed in 1751. For some years he held to open communion, but afterward abandoned it. A Baptist church was duly constituted in 1756, and he was installed its pastor. He faithfully discharged his pastoral duties for more than half a century. To his labors during this long period the Baptists of America owe much of their success. He was a voluminous writer, and published, among other works, a History of the Baptists (3 vols.), and also an Abridgment of the same (1 vol.). A list of his writings may be seen in Sprague, Annals, vi, 56. See also Hovey, Life and Times of Backus (Bost. 1858, 12mo); Christian Review, xiv, 197.

Bacon, Francis, Viscount St. Albans and Baron Verulam, one of the most celebrated philosophers of modern times, was born in London, Jan. 22, 1560. His father, Sir Nicholas Bacon, was keeper of the seal under Elizabeth, and a distinguished lawyer and statesman; his mother was a learned and pious woman, who had translated several ascetic works from Italian, and had taken part in the theological controversies of her time. Early in life he gave signs of extraordinary talent, and Queen Elizabeth used to call him playfully her young lord keeper. In his twelfth year he is said to have speculated on the laws of imagination, and in the next year he was matriculated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he remained for three years and a half. After the termination of his studies in 1577, his father sent him to France, under the care of Sir Amyas Paulet, English ambassador at the French court. There he came in contact with a number of distinguished men, and laid out a plan for a reconstruction of the philosophical sciences. The death of his father recalled him to England in 1580, and, failing to get an office for which he applied, he devoted himself to the study of law. In 1582 he was called to the bar, in 1586 he was made a bench, and in 1589, at the age of 28, counsel extraordinary to the queen. Still he could not rise under Elizabeth, who rejected his claims for preferment on the ground that he was "not very deep." As some compensation for his disappointment, Court Essex made him a present of Twickenham Court, worth about £1800, and so beautiful that Bacon called it the Garden of Paradise. Bacon, some years later, was charged with rewarding this disinterested kindness with ingratitude on the trial of Essex; but probably unjustly (see the Penny Cyclopædia, s. v.). In 1595 he was returned to Parliament as member for Middlesex, and greatly distinguished himself for parliamentary eloquence. After the accession to the throne of James I, he rapidly rose in dignities and influence. In 1603 he received the honor of knighthood, in 1604 he was appointed king's counsel, in 1607 solicitor general, in 1613 attorney general, in 1617 keeper of the great seal. In January of 1618 he was appointed lord high chancellor, and in the same year raised to the peerage as Baron of Verulam. Three years later the title of Viscount of St. Albans was conferred on him. From the same year, 1621, dates his fall. A committee of the House of Commons reported two cases of corruption against him, and before the close of the proceedings similar cases to the number of 24 were presented. When his case was referred to the House of Peers he abandoned all defence, confessed his guilt, and was sentenced, on May 3d, to a fine of £40,000, and to imprisonment in the Tower during the king's pleasure. The sentence proved to be little more than a form. He was released from imprisonment after two days, and the fine was subsequently remitted, but he never recovered his standing. Only once he was afterward summoned to attend Parliament, and the remainder of his life was spent in humble circumstances and among the few friends whom adversity left him. He died at Highgate, April 9, 1626.

Bacon was the author of a philosophical system which is called after him the Baconian philosophy, and which has had a marked influence on the subsequent development of philosophy and of literature in general. "The sciences," he says, "have hitherto been in a most sad condition. Philosophy, wasted in empty and fruitless logomachies, has failed during so many centuries to bring out a single work or experiment of actual benefit to human life. Logic hitherto has served more to the establishment of error than to the investigation of truth. Whence all this? Why this penury of science? Simply because they have broken away from their root in nature and experience. The blame of this is chargeable to many sources: first, the old and rooted prejudice that the human mind loses somewhat of its dignity when it busies itself much and continuously with experiments and material things; next, superstition and a blind religious zeal, which has been the most irreconcilable opposer to natural philosophy; again, the exclusive attention paid to morals and politics by the Romans, and since the Christian era to theology by every acute mind; still farther, the great authority which certain philosophers have exercised, and the great reverence given to antiquity; and, in fine, a want of courage, and a despair of overcoming the many and great difficulties which lie in the way of the investigation of nature. All these causes have contributed to keep down the sciences. Hence they must now be renewed, and regenerated, and reformed in their most fundamental principles; there must now be found a new basis of knowledge and new principles of science. Thus radical reformation of the sciences depends upon two conditions—objectively, upon the referring of science to experience and the philosophy of nature; and subjectively, upon the purifying of the sense and the intellect from all abstract theories and traditional prejudices. Both conditions furnish the correct method of natural science, which is nothing other than the method of induction. Upon a true induction depends all the soundness of the sciences." In these propositions the Baconian philosophy is contained. The historical significance of its founder is, therefore, in general this: that he directed the attention and reflection of his contemporaries again upon the given actuality, upon nature; that he affirmed the necessity of experience, which had been formerly only a matter of accident, and made it as in and for itself an object of thought. His merit consists in having brought up the principle of scientific empiricism, and only in this (Schwegler, History of Philosophy, transl. by Seelye, p. 166). The principles of his method are to be found in many writers before him, even in Aristotle; but it was Bacon's glory that he so set forth those principles as to bring mankind to act upon them. His plagiarisms, especially from his great namesake, Roger Bacon, are unquestionable (see De Maistre, Noirées de St. Petersburg; Methodist Quarterly, Jan. and April, 1858; and BACON, ROGER).

So far as Bacon's own mind was concerned, he was a firm believer in divine revelation (see his Confession of Faith; Prayers; Character of a Christian; Works, ed. Montague, vol. vii). Theology, as science, he held to rest on data given by inspiration, just as metaphysics must rest on postulates. On this last point the following passage is pregnant: "Wherefore, whatever primitive matter is, together with its influence and action, it is sui generis, and admits of no definition drawn from perception, and is to be taken just as it is found, and not to be judged of from any preconceived idea. For the mode of it, if it is given to us to know it, cannot be judged of by means of its cause, seeing that it is, next to God, the cause of causes, itself without cause. For there is a certain real limit of causes in nature, and it would argue levity and inexperience in a philosopher to require or imagine a cause for the last and positive power and law of nature, as much as it would not to demand a cause in those that are subordinate" (Fable of Cupid, Works, ed. Montague, xv, 45). As to theology, his language is: "Omnis enim scientia duplicem sortitur informationem. Una inspiratur divinitus; alter oritur a sen-

sn. Partimur, igitur, scientiam in theologiam et philosophiam. Theologiam hic intelligimus inspiratam, non naturalem" (De Augustinis, iii, 1). In book ix of the same work he expressly sets religion in opposition, so far as its source is concerned, to the inductive sciences, inasmuch as in religion the first principles are independent and self-subsistent (per se subsistentes). "Let us conclude," he says, "that sacred theology ought to be drawn from the word and oracles of God, not from the light of nature or the dictates of reason. For it is written, the heavens declare the glory of God, but not the heavens declare the will of God." See also his striking prayer in the preface to the Instauratio Magna. Bacon's own position, then, is clearly defined, although De Maistre, in his Soirées de St. Pétersbourg, seeks to deprive him not only of all merit with regard to the science of induction, but also almost of the name of Christian. It is another question how far the influence of the Baconian system, confined as it is to the material sciences, has tended to generate a materialist and rationalist way of thinking. On this point, see RATIONALISM; PHILOSOPHY.

The greatest of the philosophical works of Bacon is the Novum Organum (Lond. 1620, translated in Bohn's Scientific Library, Lond.). The most important among the other works of Bacon are: (1) Essays, or Counsels Civil and Moral (Lond. 1597, augment. edit. 1612 and 1624), the best known and most popular of his works. A new edition, with an introduction and many valuable notes, has been published by archbishop Whately (Lond. 1857; Boston, 1860):—(2) A treatise On the Advancement of Learning (Lond. 1605). This work, revised and enlarged, was afterward translated by Ben Jonson, George Herbert, and other friends of Bacon, into Latin, and published under the title De Augustinis Scientiarum (Lond. 1623). The works De Sapientia Veterum, Sylogra Sylvarum, Nova Atlantis, are likewise highly valued. Complete editions were published by Rawley (Amst.-rd. 1663, 6 vols.); Mallet (Lond. 1740); Stephens, Locker, and Birch (Lond. 1765, 5 vols. 4to); Basil Montagu (Lond. 1825-34, 17 vols. 8vo); Spedding, Ellis, and Heath (Lond. 1857 sq.); American ed., Boston, 1863-65. A biography of Bacon may be found at the head of every complete edition of his works; that by Montagu is especially valued (reprinted in Bacon's Works, Phila. 3 vols. 8vo). Bacon, John, an English writer of the fourteenth century; born at Baconthorp, in Norfolk, and styled "the Resolute Doctor" (Doctor Resolutus). He took the degrees of doctor of canon and civil law and of divinity at Paris, and became so strongly attached to the opinions of the Averroists that he was looked upon as their head. In 1329 he was elected provincial of the Carmelite order, which he had entered in his youth, and died at London in 1346. He wrote Commentaria super quatuor libros sententiarum (Paris, 1481, fol., often reprinted), and many other works. See Dupin, Hist. Eccl. Writers, 14th cent.; Landon, Eccl. Diet., i, 192.

Bacon, Roger, the greatest of English philosophers before the time of his namesake, Lord Bacon, was born near Ilchester, in Somersetshire, about 1214.

He was educated at Oxford, and, according to the custom of his day, proceeded to the university of Paris to study philosophy and theology. Here he received his doctor's degree. About 1240 (?) he returned to Oxford, and there (perhaps on the advice of Grossetete q. v.) he took the vows as a Franciscan, and applied himself closely in his convent to the study of languages, as well as to experimental philosophy. It was the mistake of his life that he joined the Franciscans; his brethren soon began to manifest a spirit of enmity, a prohibition being issued against Bacon's lectures in the university, as well as against the publication of any of his writings. He was charged with magic and diabolism, as was commonly the case at that time with those who studied the sciences, and particularly chemistry. Bacon was a true thinker, and, as such, was necessarily regarded as an innovator in such an age, although it was the age of Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura. He complained of the absolute submission to authority. "I would burn all the books of Aristotle if I had them in hand" (Comp. Theol., pt. i, ch. 2). He was very severe upon the scholastic theology, even upon Alexander de Hales, Albert the Great, and Thomas Aquinas, whom he styles vir erroneus et famosus. It was not unnatural that the monks should suspect so plainspoken a man, especially one who kept cauldrons and crucibles at work, studied the stars, and made strange experiments of all sorts. Wadding, the historian of the Franciscans, says that Bacon was condemned propter vocetatis quatuor suspectus. From 1257 until 1267 he was continually persecuted; most of the time kept in prison, his studies hindered, and all intercourse with the outer world prohibited. In 1265 Clement IV (Guy Foulques, a Frenchman) became pope. He had been Bacon's friend when cardinal legate in England, had taken great interest in his studies, and had sought to get hold of his writings, but the strict watch kept on Bacon prevented him from sending them. Bacon managed to get letters conveyed to the new pope, stating his sad case, and asking help in the name of religion and good learning. Clement's answer required him to send his writings with haste, any command of his superiors or constitution of his order notwithstanding. Bacon at once prepared his Opus Majus from his materials on hand, with an account of his troubles and persecutions in the preface. The book was sent in the year 1267, but the pope did not venture to release him from prison till several months had elapsed, so great was the power of the Franciscan order. Clement died in November, 1268, and Bacon was thus again at the mercy of his enemies; but he still pursued his studies, and was allowed to remain free from open persecution up to 1278; but in that year Jerome of Ascoli, general of the Franciscan order, afterward pope under the title of Nicholas IV, was appointed legate to the court of France. Bacon, then sixty-four years old, was summoned to Paris, where a council of Franciscans, with Jerome at their head, condemned his writings, and committed him to close confinement. A confirmation of the proceeding was immediately obtained from the court of Rome. During ten years every effort made by him to procure his enlargement was without success; but, on the accession of Jerome (Nicholas IV), that which was not to be obtained from the justice of the pope was conceded to private interest, and Bacon was at last restored to liberty by the intercession of some powerful nobles. Some say he died in prison; but the best authorities unite in stating that he returned to Oxford, where he wrote his Compendium Theologie, and died some months, or perhaps a year and a half, after Nicholas IV (who died April, 1292). The suspicion and fear of the monks followed the great man's books after his death; "the books were nailed to boards, so that they could not be read, and were left to rot amid dirt and damp."

Of the grandeur of Bacon's scientific intellect, and of the marvellous discoveries made by him, this is not the place to speak at length. Humboldt calls him the greatest apparition of the Middle Ages. In the depths of an age of tradition, he saw what science was, and devoted his life to its pursuit. In languages, he mastered Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic. He held, with Plato, that Mathematics is the mistress and key of all the sciences (Opus Majus, pt. iv). In twenty years he spent 2000 livres (a vast sum for that age) in books, apparatus, and experiments. As early as 1264 he sent the pope a proposal to rectify the Julian calendar—three centuries before the thing was done. "Roger Bacon, the vastest intellect that England has produced, studied nature as a natural philosopher rather than as a chemist, and the extraordinary discoveries he made in those branches of science are familiarly known: the rectification of the errors committed in the Julian calendar with regard to the solar year; the physical analysis of the action of lenses and convex glasses; the invention of spectacles for the aged; that of achromatic lenses; the theory and perhaps the first construction of the telescope. From the principles and laws laid down or partially apprehended by him, a system of unanticipated facts was sure to spring, as he himself remarked; nevertheless, his inquiries into chemical phenomena have not been without fruit for us. He carefully studied the properties of saltpetre, and if, in opposition to the ordinary opinion, he did not discover gunpowder, which had been explicitly described by Marcus Græcicus fifty years before, he improved its preparation by teaching the mode of purifying saltpetre by first dissolving the salt in water and then crystallizing it. He also called attention to the chemical action of air in combustion" (Figuier, L'Alchimie et les Alchimistes, part i, ch. iv, p. 80, 81).

The history of Bacon's writings is among the curiosities of literature. A number of his smaller works were printed before the 18th century, but his greatest writings waited until that date. Among the former are his Perspectiva (Frank, 1614); De Speculis and Specula Mathematica (Frank, 1614, reprinted in 1671); De Mirabili Potestate Artis et Naturæ (Paris, 1542); Girard, De l'admirable Pouvoir, etc., ou est traité de la Pierre Philosophale (translation of the preceding) (Paris, 1557, reprinted in 1629); Scripta quedam de Arte Chemicæ (Frank, 1603 and 1620); Speculum Alchemiæ and De Secretis Operibus Artis et Naturæ, et de Nullitate Magiæ (in vols. ii and v of Zetner's Theatrum Chemicum, Strasb., 1659, transl. by Girard, under the title Miroir d'Alchimie, Lyon, 1557; Paris, 1612 and 1627); De retardandis Senectutis Accidentibus (Oxf. 1590, translated by Dr. R. Browne, Lond. 1682). The greatest of his works were not published until 1733. A number of Bacon's MSS. were known to exist in the libraries of the Continent and of England, especially in the Cottonian Library and in that of Dublin, and Dr. Samuel Jebb, at the request of Richard Mead (court physician), edited and printed the Opus Majus (Lond. 1733, fol.). It is carefully done, but yet omits ch. vii (the Ethicæ), and inserts other things not belonging to this book. Professor Ingram, of the University of Dublin, has discovered some of the missing part of the work, and a complete edition of his works is promised, as the British government intrusted the task to Professor Brewer, of King's College, who published vol. i in 1859, including the Opus Minus, Opus Tertium, Compendium philosophiæ, and de Nullitate Magiæ (large 8vo). The Opus Minus is an epitome and complement of the Opus Majus; the Opus Tertium is an enlargement of it. Cousin discovered a MS. of this last work in the library of Douai, and published an enthusiastic account of it and of Bacon in the Journal des Savants, 1848. Pursuing his researches, he found in the Amiens library a manuscript commenting on Aristotle. Cousin now appealed to England to vindicate the name of one of her greatest sons, and the result is seen in the edition announced above. A French scholar, M. Emile Charles, also devoted years of study and travel to Roger Bacon, and published Roger Bacon, sa vie, ses œuvres, ses doctrines, d'après des textes inédits (1862, 8vo).

Roger Bacon was the forerunner, in philosophy, of Lord Bacon, who borrowed largely from him, not only in method, but also even in details. The monk possessed, what the chancellor had not, the power of penetrating the secrets of nature. Lord Bacon promoted science by his method, but in actual application of the method he was a child. Roger Bacon anticipated him in the method, and was, at the same time, himself a great experimenter and successful inventor. On the relations between these two great men, see Professor Holmes's excellent articles in the Methodist Quarterly, January and April, 1858, where the subject is more ably and thoroughly treated than by any other writer. Professor Holmes sums up as follows: "That Lord Bacon was anticipated by Roger Bacon in nearly everything that was most distinctive in the double forms of the same identical philosophy cannot be doubted after the copious illustrations given in this essay. That he borrowed directly and consciously from him is our own private conclusion; and that the forced loan amounted to plagiarism, and was levied, like one of James I's voluntary gifts from his people, forcibly and without acknowledgment, is also our conviction, though we will not demand from the public an absolute verdict to this effect. But we do claim that the highest honors which have been assigned to Francis Bacon are due to Roger Bacon and his contemporaries, and we do assert that the friar has been as harshly and unjustly dealt with by the lord chancellor of nature as Aubrey, and Egerton, and the other suitors in the court of equity were handled by the lord high chancellor of England."

"Throughout the whole of his writings Bacon is a strict Roman Catholic; that is, he expressly submits matters of opinion to the authority of the church, saying (Cott. MSS. cited by Jebb) that if the respect due to the vicar of the Savior (vicarius Salvatoris) alone, and the benefit of the world, could be consulted in any other way than by the progress of philosophy, he would not, under such experiments as lay in his way, proceed with his undertaking for the whole Church of God, however much it might entreat or insist. His zeal for Christianity, in its Latin or Western form, breaks out in every page; and all science is considered with direct reference to theology, and not otherwise. But, at the same time, to the credit of his principles, considering the book-burning, heretic-hunting age in which he lived, there is not a word of any other force except that of persuasion. He takes care to have both authority and reason for every proposition that he advances; perhaps, indeed, he might have experienced forbearance at the hand of those who were his persecutors, had he not so clearly made out prophets, apostles, and fathers to have been partakers of his opinions. 'But let not your serenity imagine,' he says, 'that I intend to excite the elenchy of your holiness, in order that the papal majesty should employ force against weak authors and the multitude, or that my unworthy self should raise any stumbling-block to study' (Penny Cyclopædia, s. v.). Indeed, the whole scope of the first part of the work is to prove, from authority and from reason, that philosophy and Christianity cannot disagree—a sentiment altogether of his own revival, in an age in which all philosophers, and mathematicians in particular, were considered as at best of dubious orthodoxy. The effect of his writings on theology was to introduce a freer spirit, and to prepare the way for Wickliffe, Huss, and the later reformers. He combated the one-sided supremacy of Aristotle, and even the authority of the fathers; he pointed out errors in their writings, and appealed to the original sources of theological knowledge. He was distinguished for his knowledge of languages, and made himself familiar with the original Scriptures. In a treatise on the advantages of grammar, he endeavored to prove the necessity of linguistic studies, in order better to understand the Bible, which, he said, every layman ought to study in the original. He disputed the authority of the Vulgate, in which he detected mistakes. The Bible, according to his view, ought to be the supreme law, to which every department of life and knowledge must be subjected. A reformatory germ lay in this exaltation of the Bible above the authority of the church and tradition. Theology he placed at the head of all the sciences: revelation is the completion and perfecting of human reason; in all knowledge, including philosophical and theological, harmony necessarily reigns. Theology develops immediately the contents of Scripture; speculation is the link between Scripture and natural reason. It receives what is true in earlier speculation, and connects with it those truths which reason might indeed know of itself, but which it would never have found without the impulse which revelation gives it. Christian philosophy can therefore be reconciled with faith, since it asserts rational truths which every wise man admits, although if left to himself he would not have known them. This corresponds not only to Christian philosophy, but also to the Christian consciousness, which must bring all truth to divine truth, to be subordinate to it and serve it. *Precept conscientiam Christianam, que valet omnem veritatem docere ad divinam, ut ei subjicitur et funditur. Bacon, Thomas, one of the early Episcopal ministers of America, was born in the Isle of Man about 1700, and was ordained deacon and priest 1744. He had previously been engaged in civil pursuits, and in 1757 published, by order of the chief commissioners and governors of the revenue of the kingdom, a volume entitled a "Complete System of Revenue in England." In 1745 he came to Maryland, and became pastor of the English church at Oxford, Talbot county. Here he labored faithfully both for whites and colored, and published in 1750 Four Sermons on the Duties of Masters (London, 12mo). They were republished in 1817 by the Rev. Dr. Meade (late bishop of Virginia), who, however, left out the title-page, the very valuable preface, and some other portions, in one place to the amount of six pages, and this, too, without a hint of any such omissions. In 1758 he was transferred to All Saints', Frederick county, a parish worth about 41000 per annum. In 1765 he published a Collection of the Laws of Maryland (1000 pp. fol.). He died May 24, 1768.—Sprague, Annals, v, 129, Am. Quart. Church Review, Oct. 1865.

Bacon, William, a Presbyterian (N. S.) minister, was born in Cherry Valley, N. Y., August, 1789, and graduated at Union College in 1815. He studied theology with Drs. Nott and Yates, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Buffalo in 1817. He served as pastor at Waterloo, Cayuga, Cortland, and Saratoga Springs, and as missionary in Troy, N. Y., and Philadelphia, Pa., and New Orleans, La. His later years were spent in retirement and affliction, but not in idleness; his time was taken up in writing for the press, Besides numerous contributions to periodicals, he published Tracts on Episcopacy, Old and New School Presbyterianism, Salvation made Sure, Salvation in Earnest, etc. He died April 2, 1863.—Wilson, Presbyterian Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 283.

Bacularii, a sect of Anabaptists which sprung up in 1528, and was so called because its members believed that it was a sin to carry any other arms than a stick (baculus); and that it was forbidden to Christians to resist violence by violence, because our Lord orders him who is smitten on one cheek to offer the other; they also held it to be contrary to the spirit of Christianity to bring any one to justice. They are also called Steblevians.—Landon, Ecol. Dict., i, 693.

Bad. See LINEN.

Badby, JOHN, an English mechanic, born in the 14th century, and who fell a martyr in the persecution against the Lollards, whose principles he had adopted. He replied to Arundel, the archbishop of Canterbury, who was disputing with him on transubstantiation, that, were the Host the body of God, there would be some 20,000 gods in England, while he believed but in one. He was burnt at Smithfield in 1409, and remained steadfast to the end.

Badcock, SAMUEL, an English theologian, born at South Molton, Devonshire, in 1747, died at London in 1788. He was first a dissenting minister, but in 1787 took orders in the Church of England. He was a contributor to the London Review, Monthly Review, and several other periodicals. His review of Priestley's History of the Corruptions of Christianity (in Monthly Review, June and August, 1783) was generally regarded as the best refutation of Priestley's views. Priestley answered immediately ("A Reply to the Animadversions, etc., in the Monthly Review for June, 1783,"), and Badcock again replied by another article in the Monthly Review (Sept. 1783). He also published in the Gentleman's Magazine, 1785, some memoirs of the Wesleys, charging them with Jacobitism, which John Wesley refuted.—Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 38; Jones, Christ. Biography, s. v.; Wesley, Works, N. Y. ed. vii, 256, 414.

Baden, GRAND-DUCHY OF, one of the minor German states. See GERMANY.

I. Church History.—We have no precise information as to the first introduction of Christianity into the country now forming the grand-duchy of Baden. The reports of the missionary labors of Fridolin (q. v.) in the 6th or 7th century, Trudprat in the Breisgau about 640, and Pirmins on the island of Reichenau, are largely mixed up with legends. Toward the beginning of the 8th century the majority of the population was converted, principally through the efforts of the bishops of Strasburg and Constance, which sees had been erected in the 7th century. The University of Heidelberg, in the Palatinate, was founded in 1386; that of Freiburg (then under Austrian rule) in 1456, both of which fostered a spirit of opposition to the corruptions in the Church. Under the influence of Tauler (q. v.) when preacher at Strasburg, and of the writings of Suso (q. v.), an association of pious mystics, the Friends of God (q. v.), labored zealously for evangelizing the lower classes of the people. Among other illustrious men who prepared, in this region, the way for the Reformation of the 16th century, we mention Jerome of Prague, John Wessel, Reuchlin, Agricola, and, later (1511), Wolfgang Capito. Of great influence was the visit of Luther and his disputation in April, 1518, and two years later he received assurances of the approbation of his writings from John von Botzheim in Constance, and Caspar Hedio (Heyd). Among the pioneers of evangelical preaching were Urban Regius, John Eberlin, Jacob Otter, Erhard Schnepf, etc.; among the first noblemen who embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, the Count von Wertheim and Goetz von Berlichingen. The bishops of Meitz, Würzburg, and Spire, however, opposed the Reformation, especially after the promulgation of the Edict of Worms. In Freiburg some 2000 evangelical books were burnt in the presence of the minister, and many Protestants, both ministers and laymen, had to flee. In Constance, however, the citizens protected the works of Luther against the imperial edict, and John Wanner, a follower of Luther, became cathedral preacher. In the Austrian part of Baden, where Anabaptist and revolutionary movements mixed themselves up with the progress of the Reformation, the Austrian government succeeded in crushing out Protestantism altogether (Dec. 1525). After the Diet of Spire (1526) the Reformation made rapid progress in Wertheim, the Lowlands of Baden, Pforzheim, Durlach, and even in the Palatinate under the ministry of John Gailing. Yet the opposition continued in the upper countries, and in Freiburg Peter Speyler, preacher at Schlatt, was drowned in the Ill. In Constance, on the other hand, the Reformation was firmly established; clerical celibacy was abolished in 1525, and the bishops and chapter were compelled to leave. In 1530 Constance adopted the Tetrapolitan Confession, and joined the Schmalcaldian confederacy. After Margrave Philip's death, 1535, the northern half became altogether Protestant, while the southern remained Romish. In August, 1548, Constance was put under the ban of the empire for not accepting the Interim (q. v.), and the Romish worship was re-established, and persecutions commenced afresh, which did not end even at the peace of Augsburg (1555). Yet after that event, Margraves Charles II of Baden-Durlach, Philibert of Baden-Baden, and Duke Christopher of Würtemberg aided the progress of Protestantism. Under the Elector Frederick III Calvinism was more particularly favored. In 1561 the elector introduced the Heidelberg Catechism, which he himself had composed with the aid of Olevianus and Ursinus, in the place of the catechisms of Luther and Brentz. In his possessions Calvinism was established, but in the other districts of Baden Lutheranism maintained the ascendancy. The Romish worship was for a time re-established in Baden-Baden by Duke Albrecht of Bavaria and Margrave Philip, successor of Philibert, who joined the Romish Church in his fifteenth year. The contest between the two evangelical confessions was renewed by the Formula Concordiæ (q. v.), till a union was effected in 1821 at a synod of the clergy and laity of both the churches. Since 1831, when the General Synod met again for the first time, this union has been confirmed by the introduction of a new catechism, a new agenda (q. v.), and a new hymn-book. In 1843 a supreme ecclesiastical council was created for the administration of ecclesiastical affairs. The greater portion of the clergy and people were pleased with the union; only a small body of Lutherans demanded the maintenance of the pure doctrines and practices of their church; and when they saw that their wishes could not be gratified in the State Church, they seceded. Several years of persecution, however, passed before they succeeded in obtaining legal recognition as a Lutheran Church. Within the State Church, in which, at the conclusion of this union, Rationalism prevailed, and was taught by men like Paulus (q. v.), a hot contest arose between the Rationalistic and evangelical parties. The General Synod of 1857 resolved to introduce after 1859 a new agenda, in which the liturgical part of divine service is considerably enlarged and the forms of prayer greatly changed (see Bähr, Das Badische Kirchenbuch, Karlsruhe, 1859). About the beginning of the 19th century, the more cultivated of the Roman clergy of Baden, under the guidance of such men as Wessenberg (q. v.), proposed many liberal reforms. Indeed a large portion of the priesthood demanded the abolition of celibacy, the introduction of the German language at divine service, the convocation of diocesan synods with lay delegations, and other reforms. The government desired to make Wessenberg the first archbishop of the newly-erected see of Freiburg, but could not obtain the papal confirmation. A reaction in favor of ultramontane views commenced under the Archbishop Vicari (1844), and in 1853 a violent contest began between State and Church. The priests received one class of directions from the archbishop, and another from the supreme ecclesiastical council of the state. Some priests were arrested for siding with the archbishop, others were suspended ecclesiastically for obeying the government. The archbishop excommunicated the members of the Catholic supreme ecclesiastical council, and was himself arrested in 1854. The Legislature unwaveringly supported the government, which, however, showed itself anxious to conclude a compromise with the archbishop. Negotiations with Rome concerning a convention (concordat) were eagerly pursued in 1855, but were not concluded before 1859. The convention with Rome created a great deal of dissatisfaction among the people; the Chambers in 1860 decidedly refused to ratify it, and it was at length abandoned by the government also. See CONCORDAT.

II. Ecclesiastical Statistics.—The number of Roman Catholics was, in 1864, 933,476; of members of the Evangelical Church, 472,258; of Mennonites and other dissidents, 2554; of Israelites, 25,263. The Evangelical Church is divided into 28 dioceses (deaneries) and 330 parishes. All the pastors of a diocese, with half the number of lay deputies of the local church councils, meet every third year in a synod. In the year after the meeting of a synod, all the clergymen of a diocese meet under the presidency of the dean for the discussion of moral questions; and in the third year a school convention is held in a similar manner for discussing the affairs of the primary schools, which in Baden, as in every German state, have a denominational character, and are subject to the control of the clergy. The General Synod meets regularly every seventh year, but may at any time be convoked by order of the grand-duke. Every two dioceses elect a clerical delegate, and every four dioceses a lay delegate. The grand-duke adds to this number of delegates two clerical and two lay members of the supreme ecclesiastical council, one professor of the theological faculty of Heidelberg, and a commissary who presides. A theological faculty is connected with the University of Heidelberg; it has counted among its members some of the most distinguished theologians of Germany, such as Rothe, Schenkel, Umbreit, and Ullmann. The two latter are known in the literary world as the founders of the best German theological quarterly, the Studien und Kritiken. Connected with the theological faculty is also an evangelical Preachers' Seminary, at which every native candidate for the ministry must spend one year. For the training of teachers there is a Protestant Normal School. The Roman Catholic Church, under the Archbishop of Freiburg, has 35 deaneries, with 747 parishes, 2 normal schools, and a theological faculty connected with the University of Freiburg. The liberal school among the Roman clergy is dying out. A theological quarterly was for some years published by the theological faculty of Freiburg, but is discontinued. The most celebrated Roman theologians in the present century have been Hug and Hirscher; a Romanist writer of great influence among the people is Alban Stolz. Some convents of nuns have been established since 1848. The Lutheran seceders from the State Church (old Lutheran Church) had, in 1859, three parishes with about 900 members. The principal work on the history of Protestantism in Baden is Vierordt, Geschichte der Evangelischen Kirche in Baden. See also Wiggers, Kirchl. Statistik, ii, 203, 207; Schem, Eccles. Year-book for 1859, p. 115 sq., and p. 203.

Bader, JOHANNES, one of the German reformers of the 16th century, was born about 1490. He was the tutor of Duke Ludwig II of Zweibrücken, and subsequently (after 1518) pastor of Landau, a town in the Bavarian Palatinate. He adhered to the Reformation in 1521, and worked for its introduction into Landau with such zeal and success, that at the time of his death only a few canons and monks of the Augustine convent remained in connection with the Roman Catholic Church. Bader was one of the first reformers who published an outline of the doctrines held by the reformed churches (Ein Gespräch-Büchlein vom Anfange des christlichen Lebens, Strasburg, 1526) several years before the appearance of Luther's catechisms. In 1527 he wrote a pamphlet against the Anabaptists, and especially against the learned Denck. His views on the Lord's Supper were nearly the same as those of Zuinglius and Bucer, and a tabular summary of them (Summarium und Rechenenschaft vom Abendmahl unseres Herren J. C.) was printed in 1533 at Strasburg on one side of a folio sheet. He was, in general, like his friend Bucer, for a reconciliation of the reformatory parties. In later years Bader was on friendly terms with Schwenkfeld, who visited him at Landau, and most of his friends at Strasburg and Zweibrücken were on this account greatly displeased with him. Bader died in August, 1545.—Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, suppl. i, 160.

Badger is the interpretation in the Auth. Vers. of the word בַּדְגָּר , tach'ash (Ezek. xvi, 10; Sept. $\text{\u0394\u03c0\u03c0\u03b1\u03c1\u03b1}$ bakar\u03b8\u03b1\u03c1a; Ald. ed. \u03b9\u03b1\u03b8\u03b8\u03b1\u03c1a; Compl. \u03b9\u03b1\u03b8\u03b8\u03b1\u03c1a, al. $\text{\u03c0\u03b5\u03c1\u03c1\u03c9\u03c0\u03b8\u03b1}$ in Exod. xxv, 5; Alex. $\text{\u0394\u03c0\u03c0\u03b1\u03c1\u03b1}$ \u03b1\u03c1\u03b8\u03b1 in Exod. xxxv, 7; bakar\u03b8or, Aq. and Sym. \u03b9\u03b1\u03b8\u03b8\u03b1\u03c1a in Ezek. xvi, 10; Vulg. pelles ianth\u03b8\u03b8\u03b1\u03c1e, ianth\u03b8\u03b8\u03b1\u03c1is); but many doubt its correctness, since the badger is not found in Southern Asia, and has not as yet been noticed out of Europe. The word occurs in the plural form in Exod. xxv, 5; xxvi, 14; xxxv, 7, 23; xxxvi, 19; xxxix, 34; Num. iv, 6, 8, 10, 11, 12, 14, 25; and, in connection with $\text{\u03c0\u03b5\u03c1\u03c1\u03c9\u03c0\u03b8}$, oroth, "skins," is used to denote the covering of the Tabernacle, of the Ark of the Covenant, and of other sacred vessels. In Ezek. xvi, 10, it indicates the material of which the shoes of women were made. Possibly the Latin turus or turo, the original of the Spanish turxon, Ital. tusso, Fr. tuisson, Germ. dachs, is the same word as tachash; and these designate the badger. This, however, appears to be the only support for the rendering "badger" (ardes turus) besides that of the Chaldee paraphrast ($\text{\u0394\u03c0\u03c0\u03b1\u03c1\u03b1}$, "turus, sic dictus quia gandet et superbit in coloribus multis," Buxtorf, Lez. Rab. s. v.). See ZOOLOGY.

The Badger.

The ancient interpreters understand by it a color given to leather, e. g. Sept. bakar\u03b8\u03b1\u03c1a; so Aquila, Symmachus, and the Syriac, which are followed by Bochart (Hebr. t. ii, 287), Rosenm\u00fcller (Schol. ad V. T., Exod. xxv, 5; Ezek. xvi, 10), Pymeus (de Calceis Iherosol., lib. i, ch. 3), Scheuchzer (Phys. Sacr., in Exod. xxv, 5), and others. Parkhurst (Heb. Lex. s. v.), observes that "an outermost covering for the tabernacle of azure or sky-blue was very proper to represent the sky or azure boundary of the system." But this is mere conjecture. The Talmudists say that it is an animal like a wasel. Others, as Gesner and Harenberg (in Musro Brem. ii, 312), have thought that some kind of wolf, known by the Greek name \u03b2\u03c9\u03b3, and the Arabic Shaghal is intended. Hasa\u00e9s (in Dissert. Philolog. Syllage, diss. ix, § 17) and B\u00fcsching, in his preface to the Epitome of Scheuchzer's Physica Sacra, are of opinion that tachash denotes a cetacean animal, the Trichechus manatus of Linnaeus, which, however, is only found in America and the West Indies. Others, with Sebald Rau (Comment. de iis qu\u00e6 ex Arab. in usum Tabernac. fuerunt repetita, Traj. ad Rhen. 1753, ch. ii), are in favor of tachash representing some kind of seal (Phoca vitulina, Lin.). Dr. Geddes (Crit. Rem. Exod. xxv, 5) is of the same opinion. Gesenius understands (Heb. Lex. s. v.) some "kind of seal or badger, or other similar (!) creature." Of modern writers Dr. Kitto (Pict. Bibl. on Exod. xxv, 5) thinks that tachash denotes some clean animal, as in all probability the skin of an unclean animal would not have been used for the sacred coverings. The corresponding Arabic word is not only a dolphin, but also a seal, and seals (?) were numerous on the shores of the peninsula of Sinai (Strab. xvi, 776). The etymology of the word in Heb. is favorable to this view, from the root $\text{\u03c7\u03b8\u03c7}$, chashah, 'to rest'; and seals no less than badgers are somnolent animals. (See Simonis Exercitatio de \u03c7\u03b8\u03c7, Hal. 1735.) Maurer, however (Comment. in Ezecl.), derives it from the root $\text{\u03c7\u03b8\u03c7}$, tachush, 'to penetrate,' a notion which suits the burrowing of the badger as well as the plunging of the seal. Pliny (ii, 56) mentions the use of the skins of seals as a covering for tents, and as a protection from lightning. (Comp. Plut. Symp. v, 9; Sueton. Oct. tr. 90; Faber, Arch\u00e6ol. Hebr. i, 115.) The tachash has also been identified with the Trichechus murinus of Linnaeus, and with the sea-cow called hamantin or dugong. Others find it in an animal of the hyena kind, which is called by the Arabs tahesh (Botta's Voyage in Yemee, 1841). Robinson (Researches, i, 171) mentions sandals made of the thick skin of a fish which is caught in the Red Sea. It is a species of halibut, named by Ehrenberg (Symb. Phys. ii) Halicore Henrichii. The skin is clumsy and coarse, and might answer very well for the external covering of the Tabernacle. According to Ehrenberg, the Arabs on the coast call this animal Naku and Lottum. Arabian naturalists applied the term ensan alma, "man of the sea," to this creature. Thevenot speaks of a kind of sea-man, which is taken near the port of Tor. "It is a great strong fish, and hath two hands, which are like the hands of a man, saving that the fingers are joined together with a skin, like the foot of a goose; but the skin of the fish is like the skin of a wild goat or chamois. When they spy that fish, they strike him on the back with harping irons, as they do whales, and so kill him. They use the skin of it for making bucklers, which are musket-proof." Niebuhr adds the information that "a merchant of Abushahr called dahash that fish which the captains of English ships call porpoise." The same traveler reports that he saw prodigious schools of these animals swimming. Professor R\u00fcppe (Atlas. Senek. i, 113, t. 6), who saw the creature on the coral banks of the Abyssinian coast, ascertained by personal examination that the creature in question was a sort of dugong, a genus of marine Pachydermata, to which he gave the name of Halicore tabernaculi, from a conviction that it was the tachash of Moses. It grows to eighteen feet in length. See VITALE.

In the present state of zoological knowledge, however, it is not necessary to refute the notions that tachash was the name of a mermaid or homo-marinus, Halicore Tabernaemuli, with enlarged drawing of the head.

or of the walrus, a Polar animal, or of the dagong or seal, for neither of these is known in the Indian, Red, or Persian Seas, and there is little probability that in remote ages they frequented the south-east extremity of the Mediterranean, where the current sweeps all things northward; still less that they nestled in the lakes of the Delta, where crocodiles then abounded. But Niebuhr's hint respecting the name tachash, given, with some reference to colors, to a species of dolphin or porpoise, by the Arabs near Cape Mussendam, may deserve consideration, since the same people still make small rounded bucklers and soles of sandals of the hout's skin, which is a cetaceous animal, perhaps identical with Niebuhr's. This material might have been obtained from the caravan-traders of Yemen, or from the Ismaelites of Edom, but does not appear to have been fitted for other purposes than pack-saddles and sandal-soles. Considering tachash, therefore, not to indicate a color, but the skin of an animal, which may have derived its name from its color, probably deep gray, ash, or slaty (lysipinus), we must look for the object in question to the zoology of the region around, or to places accessible by means of the traders and tribute importations of raw materials in Egypt, where we actually observe leopard or panther skins, and others of a smaller animal with a long fox-tail, represented in the triumphal procession of Thothmes III at Thebes (Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, i, pl. 4). These may have been of a canine genus, such as the agriodius, or megalotis Lalandii, which is actually iron-gray; or of a viverrous species, of which there are many in Africa both gray and spotted. Still these are unclean animals, and for this reason we turn to another view of the case, which may prove the most satisfactory that can now be obtained. Negroland and Central and

The Tachitze (Antelope Barbata).

Eastern Africa contain a number of ruminating animals of the great antelope family; they are known to the natives under various names, such as puccasse, empucasse, tharacasse, fuacasse, and tachitze, all more or less varieties of the word tachash; they are of considerable size, often of slaty and purple-gray colors, and might be termed stag-goats and ox-goats. Of these one or more occur in the hunting-scenes on Egyptian monuments, and therefore we may conclude that the skins were accessible in abundance, and may have been dressed with the hair on for coverings of baggage, and for boots, such as we see worn by the human figures in the same processions. Thus we have the greater number of the conditions of the question sufficiently realized to enable us to draw the inference that tachash refers to a ruminant of the Aigocerine or Damaline groups, most likely of an iron-gray or slaty-colored species" (Kitto, s. v.). See ANTELOPE.

Bag, a purse or pouch. The following words in the original are thus rendered in the English version of the Bible: 1. כֶּבֶד , charit', a pocket (Sept. $\text{\Theta\acute{\iota}\lambda\alpha\kappa\omicron\varsigma}$, Vulg. saccus), the "bags" in which Naaman bound up the two talents of silver for Gehazi (2 Kings v, 23), probably so called, according to Gesenius, from their long, cone-like shape. The word only occurs besides in Isa. iii, 22 (A. V. "crisping-pins"), and there denotes the reticules carried by the Hebrew ladies. 2. כִּס , kis (Sept. $\text{\mu\acute{\alpha}\rho\tau\iota\pi\omicron\varsigma}$, $\text{\mu\acute{\alpha}\rho\tau\iota\omicron\tau}$, Vulg. sacculus, sacculus), a bag for carrying weights (Deut. xxv, 13; Prov. xvi, 11; Mic. vi, 11); also used as a purse (Prov. i, 14; Isa. xlvi, 6), hence a cup (Prov. xxiii, 31). 3. כֵּל , kel' (Sept. $\text{\kappa\acute{\iota}\lambda\omicron\upsilon\varsigma}$, Vulg. pera), translated "bag" in 1 Sam. xvii, 40, 49, is a word of most general meaning, and is generally rendered "vessel" or "instrument." In Gen. xlii, 25, it is the "sack" in which Jacob's sons carried the corn which they brought from Egypt, and in 1 Sam. ix, 7; xxi, 5, it denotes a bag or wallet for carrying food (A. V. "vessel;" compare Judg. x, 5; xiii, 10, 15). The shepherd's "bag" which David had seems to have been worn by him as necessary to his calling, and was probably, from a comparison of Zech. xi, 15, 16 (where A. V. "instruments" is the same word), for the purpose of carrying the lambs which were unable to walk or were sick, and contained materials for healing such as were sick and binding up those that were broken (comp. Ezek. xxxiv, 4, 16). 4. סֵבֶרֶךְ , seber' (Sept. $\text{\iota\delta\epsilon\sigma\mu\omicron\varsigma}$, $\text{\delta\epsilon\sigma\mu\acute{o}\varsigma}$, Vulg. sacculus), properly a "bundle" (Gen. xlii, 25; 1 Sam. xxv, 29), appears to have been used by travellers for carrying money during a long journey (Prov. vii, 20; Hag. i, 6; compare Luke xii, 33; Tob. ix, 5). In such "bundles" the priests bound up the money which was contributed for the restoration of the Temple under Jehoiada (2 Kings xii, 10; A. V. "put up in bags"). 5. The "bag" ($\text{\gamma\lambda\omega\sigma\sigma\acute{\iota}\omicron\kappa\omicron\mu\omicron\varsigma}$, Vulg. laculi) which Judas carried was probably a small box or chest (John xii, 6; xiii, 29). The Greek word is the same as that used in the Sept. for "chest" in 2 Chron. xxiv, 8, 10, 11, and originally signified a box used by musicians for carrying the mouth-pieces of their instruments. 6. The $\text{\beta\alpha\lambda\acute{o}\nu\tau\iota\omicron\upsilon}$, or walbt (Luke x, 4; xii, 33; xxii, 35, 36). Of these terms it will only be necessary here to discuss one application, which they all sustain, i. e. as a receptacle for money. The money deposited in the treasuries of Eastern princes, or intended for large payments, or to be sent to a government as taxes or tribute, is collected in long, narrow bags or purses, each containing a certain amount of money, and sealed with the official seal. As the money is counted for this purpose, and sealed with great care by officers properly appointed, the bag or purse passes current, as long as the seal remains unbroken, for the amount marked thereon. In the receipt and payment of large sums, this is a great and important convenience in countries where the management of large transactions by paper is unknown, or where a currency is chiefly or wholly of silver; it saves the great trouble of counting or weighing loose money. This usage is so well established that, at this day, in the Levant, "a purse" is the very name for a certain amount of money (now twenty-five dollars), and all large payments are stated in "purses." The antiquity of this custom is attested by the monuments of Egypt, in which the ambassadors of distant nations are represented as bringing their tributes in sealed bags of money to Thothmes III; and we see the same bags deposited intact in the royal treasury (Wilkinson, i, 148, abridgm.). When coined money was not used, the seal must have been considered a voucher not only for the amount, but for the purity of the metal. The money collected in the Temple, in the time of Joash, seems to have been made up into bags of equal value after this fashion, which were probably delivered sealed to those who paid the workmen (2 Kings, xii, 10; comp. also 2 Kings v, 23; Tobit ix, 5; xi, 16).—Smith, Append.; Kitto, s. v. See MONEY.

Bagger, HANS OLESAN, a Danish theologian, born at Lund in 1616, became bishop of Zealand in 1675, and died at Copenhagen in 1693. He is the author of the Danish Church-Ritual, which was introduced in 1656, and of a revised altar-book, both of which are still in use in the Danish Church. Being consulted by the Danish government as to whether the interest of the Lutheran Church allowed the admission to Denmark of the French Calvinists, who had been expelled by Louis XIV, he answered in the negative, because such an admission "would expose the souls of the Lutherans to temptation and to the risk of everlasting damnation."—Pierer, Universal-Lexikon, s. v.

Ba'go (Bayô), the head of one of the Israelitish families ("sons"), to which is assigned the Uthi, son of Ishaburionus, who returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. viii, 40); evidently the BAGAI (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra viii, 14).

Bago'äs (Bayôac), the eunuch (or chamberlain) who had charge of the tent of Holofernes, and introduced Judith (Jud. xii, 11, 13, 15; xiii, 1, 3; xiv, 14). The name is said (Pott, Etymol. Forsch. i, xxxvii) to be equivalent to eunuch in Persian (Plin. Hist. Nat. xiii, 4, 9), and, as such, was probably a title of office rather than a personal appellation (see Quintil. v, 12; comp. Burmann ad Orid. Im. ii, 2, 1). Accordingly, we find the name often recurring in Eastern history (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.) even so late as that of the chief eunuch of Herod's harem, who was put to death for intriguing with the Pharisees (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 2, 4 ad fin.).

Bago'oi (Bayô), one of the Israelitish family heads, whose "sons" (to the number of 2066) returned from the exile (1 Esdr. v, 14); evidently the BAGAI (q. v.) of the Heb. text (Ezra ii, 11).

Bagôses (Bayôac), the general of Artaxerxes (probably Memnon; the text, as emended by Hudson, has τω βασιλευς Αρταξερξου v. r. τω βασιλευς Αρξ); he sacrilegiously entered the Temple at Jerusalem, and imposed oppressive taxes upon the Jews (Josephus, Ant. xi, 7, 1).

Bagot, LEWIS, a bishop of the Church of England, was born in 1710. He was a son of Lord Bagot. After studying at the University of Oxford, he became a canon, and later, successively bishop of Bristol, Norwich, and St. Asaph. He died in 1802. He is the author of numerous theological works, the most important of which is Twelve Discourses on the Prophecies concern- ing the first Establishment and subsequent History of Christianity, preached at the Warburtonian Lecture, in Lincoln's Inn Chapel, 1780.—Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 99; Hoefer, Biographie Générale, iv, 168.

Bagshaw, WILLIAM, a Nonconformist minister, was born in 1628, and died in 1702. His zeal in the northern parts of Derbyshire acquired for him the title of "the Apostle of the Peak." He published Water for a Thirsty Soul, in several sermons on Rev. xxi, 6 (1653), and a number of other works. Some 50 of his works, upon various subjects, have never been printed.—Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 99.

Baharumite (Heb. with the art. hab-Bacharumî, בְּחָרִים; Sept. ὁ Βαχαριμ v. r. Βαχαριμ), an epithet of Azmaveth, one of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi, 33); doubtless as being a native of BAHURIM (q. v.).

Bahr, JOSEPH FRIEDRICH, a German theologian, was born in 1713, and died in 1775. He became, in 1739, deacon at Bischofswerda; in 1741, pastor at Schönfeld; and, after filling several other church positions, finally became superintendent. He wrote, among other works against the Socinians, Abhandlung der reinen Lehre unserer evangelischen Kirche von der Sterblichkeit und dem wählbaren Tod des menschlichen Geschlechtes; a life of Christ (Lebensgeschichte Jesu Christi), 1772.—Hoefer, Biog. Générale, iv, 172.

Bahrdt, CHARLES FREDERICK, a German Rationalist, notorious alike for his bold infidelity and for his evil life, was born in 1741 at Bischofswerda. He studied at Pforta and at Leipzig, where his father was professor of theology. The old Lutheran faith was still taught there; but Ernesti was one of the professors, and a new era was dawning. Bahrdt first imbibed Crusius's (q. v.) philosophical orthodoxy. In 1762 he became master, and began to lecture, and did it fluently and with applause, on dogmatic theology. He soon became very popular, also, from his eloquence in the pulpit. In 1768 he was compelled to resign as professor ext. of theology on account of a charge of adultery, and it is clear that even thus early he was leading a very immoral life. Through the influence of Klotz, a man of kindred spirit, he was made professor of Biblical archæology at Erfurt; but he soon fell into ill repute there, and next obtained a chair at Giessen. Here he abandoned the doctrines of the Trinity and the Atonement, and published several books which brought down the wrath even of Semler (q. v.). After many wanderings to and fro in search of fame and wealth, of which he was always greedy, yet always poor, he returned to Halle in 1779. His career here for ten years was erratic and disgraceful; he wrote books, lectured when he could get hearers, and opened a tavern in a vineyard, with the assistance of his maid, who lived with him as his wife, though his own good wife was yet alive. In 1787 he was imprisoned for one year in a fortress. In 1792 he died. He was the living type and illustration of the vulgar rationalism of his age. His writings were very numerous (nearly 150 in number), but are of no critical or theological value, and therefore need not be enumerated.—Kahnis, German Protestantism, ch. ii, p. 130; Hurst, History of Rationalism, p. 139-142.

Bahurim (Heb. Bacharim, בְּחָרִים, or [in 2 Sam. iii, 16; xix, 17] בְּחִירִים, low grounds, otherwise young men's village; Sept. Βαχαριμ, but Βαχαριμ [v. r. Βαχαριμ] in 2 Sam. iii, 16; Josephus Bacharim, Ant. vii, 9, 7, ed. Havercamp; for other var. readings, see Reland, Palest. p. 614), a place not far from Jerusalem, of which the slight notices remaining connect it almost exclusively with the flight of David (q. v.) from his son Absalom (q. v.). It was apparently on or close to the road leading up from the Jordan valley to Jerusalem. Shimoi, the son of Gera, resided here (2 Sam. xvii, 18; 1 Kings ii, 8), and from the village, when David, having left the "top of the mount" behind him, was making his way down the eastern slopes of Olivet into the Jordan valley below, Shimei issued forth, and running along (Josephus ἀετρώει) on the side or "rib" of the hill over against the king's party, flung his stones and dust, and foul abuse (xvi, 5), with a virulence which is to this day exhibited in the East toward fallen greatness, however eminent it may previously have been. Here in the court of a house was the well in which Jonathan and Ahimaaz eluded their pursuers (xvii, 18). In his account of the occurrence, Josephus (Ant. vii, 9, 7) distinctly states that Bahurim lay off the main road (παύσις ἐκτραπέυτες τῆς ὁδοῦ), which agrees well with the account of Shimei's behavior. Here Phaltiel, the husband of Michal, bade farewell to his wife on her return to king David at Helron (2 Sam. iii, 16). Bahurim must have been near the southern boundary of Benjamin; but it is not mentioned in the lists in Joshua, nor is any explanation given of its being Benjamite, as, from Shimei's residing there, we may conclude it was. In the Targum Jonathan on 2 Sam. xvi, 5, we find it given as Almon (אֱלֹמֹן); but the situation of Almon (see Josh. xxi, 18) will not at all suit the requirements of Bahurim. Dr. Barclay conjectures that the place lay where some ruins (apparently those called Kubbah on Van de Velde's Map, near the remains of Dir es-Sid, as in Robinson's Researches, ii, 109) still exist close to a Wady Roubahy, which runs in a straight course for three miles from Olivet toward Jordan, offering the nearest, though not the best route (City of the Great King, p. 563).

AZMAVETH "the Barhumite" (2 Sam. xxiii, 31), or "the Baharumite" (1 Chron. xi, 33), one of the heroes of David's guard, is the only native of Bahurim that we hear of except Shimei.—Smith, s. v.

Baier, JOHN WILLIAM, a Lutheran divine, born at Nuremberg in 1647. He was a member of several German universities, and rector and theological professor of the University of Halle, where he died in 1694. He wrote, Compendium Theologicæ Positivæ (Jena, 1686, 8vo, often reprinted);—De Purgatorio (Jena, 1677, 4to);—De Aquâ lustrali Pontificiorum (Jena, 1692, 4to);—Collatio doctrinæ Quærcærorum et Protestantium (Jena, 1694, 4to);—*Biog. Bail (Heb. בַּיִל, arab., to become surety; Gr. ἐγγυῶσθαι), as a legal regulation, does not occur in the Mosaic civil polity, nor is the word found in the Auth. Vers. of the Scriptures; but the custom nevertheless prevailed among the (later) Hebrews, as is evident from the many allusions to it in the Book of Proverbs. Indeed, these maxims are evidence of great rigor in the enforcement of such obligations (Prov. xi, 15; xvii, 18; xxii, 26), and recommend great caution (vi sq.) in view of the fact that the security was treated quite as severely as the deltor (comp. the Mishna, Baba Bathra, x. 7) in whose stead he was held (Prov. xx, 16; xxii, 27). A somewhat milder sentiment is expressed in the Apocrypha (Sir. xxix, 17), yet not without a warning to prudence (viii, 16; xxix, 21 [24]).—Winer, i, 200. See SURETY.

Bailey, Jacob, a "frontier missionary" of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Rowley, Mass., 1731. He graduated at Harvard in 1755, and in 1758 was licensed to preach by the Congregational Association at Exeter, N. H. In 1759 he left the Congregational Church, and embarked for England, to be ordained for the ministry in the Church of England. In March of the following year he was ordained, and appointed a missionary of the "Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts" to Pownalboro', Me. He immediately returned and entered on his duties. Taking the side of England in the Revolution, he escaped to Halifax, N. S., in 1779, and labored as a missionary there and at Cornwallis until his death, July 26, 1808. See Bartlet, Life of Rev. Jacob Bailey (N. Y. 8vo).—Sprague, Annals, v, 204.

Bailey, John, Congregational minister, was born in Lancashire, England, Feb. 21, 1644, studied under Dr. J. Harrison, and entered the ministry at Chester, 1666. As a Nonconformist, he was imprisoned in Lancashire jail for some time, and after his release he went to Limerick, Ireland, where he labored faithfully as pastor for 14 years. The office of chaplain to the Duke of Ormond, with the promise of a deanery and bishopric, was tendered to him on condition of conforming to the Established Church, but he refused. He was finally imprisoned, and only released on a promise to leave the country. About 1684 he came to New England, and was ordained minister of the Congregational Society at Watertown, October 6, 1686, with his brother, Thomas Bailey, as his assistant. He removed to Boston in 1692, and became assistant to Mr. Allen, of the First Church, in 1693. Here he labored, as his failing health would allow, till his death, December 12, 1697. He was a man of eminent piety and exemplary life. A volume of his discourses was published in 1689.—Sprague, Annals, i, 201.

Baillet, ADRIAN, a Romanist writer of repute, was born at Neuville, near Beauvais, June 13th, 1649, and was educated at a Franciscan convent. He afterward studied at Beauvais, and in 1676 was admitted to holy orders. For a time he served a cure; but, feeling himself to be unsuited for this kind of life, he left it, and took the charge of the library of M. de Lamoignon, the advocate general, with whom he passed the remainder of his days, and died January 21st, 1706. His works are: Jugement des Savans (4 vols.). The work was to have consisted of seven parts; the first is a kind of preface to the other, and gives general rules for forming a sound judgment of a work; the other six parts were to have contained his own opinions and the judgments of others concerning works of every kind; but he only finished a small part of his design. This work was reprinted, revised, at Paris (7 vols. 4to, 1722); and Amsterdam (1725, 17 vols. 12mo);—Life of Descartes (1692);—Treatise on Devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary (1693). This work was condemned at Rome in 1695, and denounced to the Sorbonne as soon as it appeared as derogating from the worship due to the Virgin;—Les Vies des Saints, his most celebrated work, printed in 1701, in 3 vols. fol. and in 12 vols. 8vo; and reprinted in 1704 and 1708 with the addition of the Histoire des Filles Nobles and Les Vies des Saints de l'Ancien Testament, in 4 vols. fol. and 17 vols. 8vo. These last editions are the most highly esteemed. Baillet also published several less important works, and left thirty-five folio volumes in MS., containing the catalogue of the library of Lamoignon. During the twenty-six years that he was librarian to that gentleman, he only went out once a week; all the rest of his time he spent in reading or conversing with the savans. He slept only five hours, and most frequently in his clothes.—Biog. Univ. iii, 226; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Baillie (or Bailey), ROBERT, principal of the University of Glasgow, was born at Glasgow in 1599, and educated at the university of that town. During the rebellion he was an active opponent of Episcopacy, and he obtained much credit for his refusal in 1337 to preach before the General Assembly in favor of the liturgy and emons, which the king was desirous to introduce into Scotland. In 1638 he was appointed a member of the assembly held at Glasgow, where the Covenant was agreed upon, and in 1640 he was deputed to London to carry the accusations of the lords of the covenant against Laud. In 1642 he was appointed professor of divinity in the University of Glasgow. In 1643 he was sent as one of the commissaries of the Scotch Presbyterians to the assembly at Westminster. He execrated the murder of the king, and denounced it as a horrible parricide, and was always faithful to the house of Stuart. Charles II would have made him bishop, but, true to his principles, Baillie refused this. He was said to know twelve or thirteen languages, and wrote very pure Latin. In 1661 he was appointed principal of the university. In 1662 he died. Of Baillie's works, the most important are, Dissuasive from the Errors of the Time (4to, Lond. 1645);—Anabaptism, the True Foundation of Independency, Brownism, Antinomianism, Familism, &c. (a second part of the Dissuasive, 4to, Lond. 1647);—App. ad Prælecta ad Joannis Ductorij Epitomen Grammaticæ Hebrææ (8vo, Edinb. 1653);—Opus Historicæ et Chronologicæ Libri Duo (fol. Amst. 1663, and Basil, 1669). He also published several sermons and other short tracts. But of all the produce of his pen, by far the most interesting part consists of his Letters, written to various friends, which throw much light on the history of the times. A complete edition was produced under the care of David Laing, Esq. (in 3 vols, crown 8vo, Edinb. 1841–42), with annotations and a life of Baillie. See Hetherington, Church of Scotland, ii, 135.

Bainbridge or Bambridge, CHRISTOPHER, archbishop of York, and cardinal-priest of the Roman Church, was born at Hilton, in Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's College, Oxford, of which he became provost in 1495. He was afterward a liberal benefactor to his college. In 1503 he became dean of York; in 1515 dean of Windsor. In 1507 he was advanced to the see of Durham, and was translated the next year to the archbishopric of York. Bainbridge distinguished himself chiefly by his embassy from King Henry VIII to Pope Julius II, who created him cardinal of St. Praxede in March, 1511. His letter to King Henry VIII concerning the pope's bull, giving him the title of Most Christian King, is extant in Rymers's Fœdera (edit. 1791–1795, xliii, 376). Cardinal Bainbridge died at Rome, July 14, 1511. His death was caused by poison administered by Rinaldo de Modena, a priest whom he had employed in menial offices, and who, after confessing that he was suborned to this act by Sylvester de Giglis, bishop of Worcester, who was at that time envoy from King Henry VIII to Rome, committed suicide. See Engl. Cyclop. s. v.; Biog. Britan. ed. 1778, i, 515; Wood, Athenæ Oxon. ed. Bliss, ii, 702.

Baines, RALPH, was born in Yorkshire, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; he was eminent as a Hebraist, and was made regius professor of Hebrew at Paris. In 1554 he was made bishop of Lichfield and Coventry; in 1559 he was ejected by Queen Elizabeth, and very shortly after died at Islington. He wrote a Commentary on the Proverbs, 1555, and a few Hebrew works.—Godwin, D. Presb. Angliæ, p. 324.

Baird, ROBERT, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister and philanthropist, was born in Fayette Co., Penn., October 6, 1798. After academical training at Uniontown, he entered Washington College, and passed thence to Jefferson College, where he graduated in 1818. After spending a year as a teacher in Bellefonte, where he was a frequent newspaper contributor, he entered the theological seminary at Princeton, where he studied for three years, officiating one year as tutor in the college. In 1822 he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and in the same year took charge of an academy in Princeton, which position he held for five years. In 1828 he was ordained to the work of the Gospel ministry. In 1827 he entered upon the great field of all his subsequent labors—"the extension of Protestantism and the evangelization of the world, in connection with the great religious and benevolent societies." He took a leading part in the movement made by the New Jersey Bible Society to supply every destitute family in New Jersey with the Scriptures. This plan was carried into execution successfully. Next, agent of the New Jersey Missionary Society, Dr. Baird did much to lay the foundation of public education in that state, and originated the first system of common schools established in the state, which, with few modifications, still remains in force. In 1829 he became agent of the American Sunday-school Union, and for five years he held meetings all over the country, doing much to advance the influence of the society, and adding largely to its funds. In 1835 Dr. Baird went to Europe, and resided in Paris and Geneva, with the exception of a few months, for the next eight years. His primary object was to ascertain what the American churches could do to revive the Protestant faith where it had lost its vitality, and to convert the Roman Catholics. Among the results of his labors was the formation of the Foreign Evangelical Society, since merged into the American and Foreign Christian Union, of which he was one of the founders. In the Scandinavian countries, in Russia and in Germany, he met with extraordinary success in giving an impulse to the temperance reform. His exertions in behalf of the Bible and Tract Societies were confined to no single country of Europe, while his intercessions for the persecuted were put forth alike in Protestant Sweden and in Roman Catholic France. The recent translation and publication of the Sacred Scriptures in the modern Russ, under the auspices of the imperial government, are believed to have been greatly attributable to Dr. Baird's strenuous personal efforts. To the cause of Protestantism, of temperance, and of education, Dr. Baird was enthusiastically devoted. Possessed of a fine personal appearance, an amiable disposition, and rare affability of manner, an accomplished linguist, and a man of broad information, Dr. Baird had a large personal acquaintance among the great and good men of America and Europe. He was admitted to interviews and discussions with all the monarchs that rule the destinies of the Old World. His thorough honesty and sincerity, his pure religious character, and his unbounded charity, stamped him as a man who could give counsel to kings, and who had access by right to every source of influence and power. In 1843 he returned to America, continuing to be corresponding secretary of the Foreign Evangelical Society and of the American and Foreign Christian Union (with slight interruption), and making several visits to Europe) to the time of his death, March 15, 1863.

This brief sketch suffices to show Dr. Baird as an indefatigable laborer. His sympathies were eminently catholic, and his activities were cosmopolitan. His name, and even his person, were known to all Protestant branches of the church throughout the United States and Europe. Amid his incessant missionary labors and travels he found time also for a large literary activity. Besides numerous reports for the benevolent societies with which he was connected, and many contributions to newspapers, magazines, and reviews, he wrote A View of the Valley of the Mississippi (Phila. 1832, 12mo); Memoir of Anna Jane Linwood (Phila. 1835, 18mo); Memoir of the Rev. Joseph Sanford (Phila. 1836, 12mo); Histoire des Sociétés de Tempérance des États-Unis d'Amérique (Paris, 1836, 12mo); translated into German, Dutch, Danish, Finnish, Russ, and Swedish—the latter translation by order of Bernadotte; L'Union de l'Église et de l'État dans la Nouvelle Angleterre (Paris, 1837, 18mo); Visit to Northern Europe (N. Y. 1841, 2 vols. 12mo); Religion in America (Glasgow and Edinburgh, 1842, 8vo); translated into German, Dutch, French, Swedish, etc.; revised ed. N. Y. 1844; enlarged and rewritten, N. Y. 1856); Protestantism in Italy (Boston, 1845, 12mo); 2d. ed. 1847); Christian Retrospect and Register (N. Y. 1851, 12mo, in part).—See Life of Dr. Baird, by his son, Prof. H. M. Baird (N. Baius, or De Bay, MICHAEL, a Romanist writer of eminence, was born at Melun in 1513, and studied at Louvain. In 1551 he was appointed professor of theology at Louvain, as substitute for Professor Tapper, a delegate to the Council of Trent. The lectures which he delivered in this capacity gave great offence, and when Tapper and Ravenstein returned, they denounced eighteen propositions taken from his lectures and writings to the faculty of theology at Paris as heretical. In 1560 a censure was issued by that body, whereby three of these dogmas were declared to be erroneous, and fifteen either wholly or partly heretical. The following propositions and the corresponding censures may be cited:

"Proposition 4. Free-will is in itself sinful; and every act of the free-will, left to itself, is either mortal or venial sin.—Censure. This proposition is heretical in both its parts. Proposition 5. Man sins in every thing that depends on himself, and cannot avoid sinning.—Censure. This proposition is heretical. Proposition 7. Man's free-will cannot avoid sin without God's special grace; whence it follows that all the actions of unbelievers are sinful.—Censure. That the second part of this proposition is not properly deduced from the first, and is false. Proposition 9. A schismatic or a heretic, or a man who is not purely an infidel, may sometimes merit eternal life by merit of condignity.—Censure. This proposition is heretical. Proposition 11. Contrition does not remit sin without the sacrament of baptism or that of penance, except in cases of martyrdom or necessity.—Censure. This proposition is heretical. Proposition 12. If a sinner does all that is ordered him, neither his contrition nor his confession avail to the remission of his sin, unless the priest gives him absolution, even though the priest refuse absolution out of malice, or unreasonably.—Censure. This proposition is heretical. Proposition 14. Grace is never given to those who oppose it, and the same holds of the first justification; for justification is faith it-elf, and it is through faith that the sinner is made righteous.—Censure. The first two parts are heretical, and the last false. Proposition 16. No one is without original sin, save Jesus Christ only; and, accordingly, the Blessed Virgin died owing to the sin which she had contracted in Adam; and all her sufferings in this life were, like those of all the other righteous, the penalty of actual or original sin.—Censure. This proposition is heretical in all its parts, and injurious to the Blessed Virgin and all the saints."

The Franciscans appealed against the doctrines of Baius to the Cardinal Granvella, governor of the Low Countries, but he refused to receive the appeal, and enjoined silence on all parties. Baius and John Hessel were sent, in 1563, to the Council of Trent by Granvella as deputies of the University of Louvain. At the council the learning and talent of Baius gained him general admiration. On his return he published several works on the controverted points, viz. De Meritis Operum (1561);—De Privato Hominis Justitia et Virtutibus Impiorum (1565);—De Sacramentis in Genere contra Calvinum (1565);—De Libero Hominis Arbitrio, de Charitate et Justificatione (1566). The controversy was bitterly renewed, and on the 1st of October, 1567, Pius V issued a bull condemning seventy-six dogmas, but without naming Baius, for whom he had great regard; and to this Baius, after having written to the pope, was compelled to yield, which he did before Morillon, the grand vicar of the Cardinal Granvella, and afterward before Cardinal Tolet. In 1577 he was made inquisitor general of Holland. He died December 16th, 1589. His doctrine (called Baïanism) was afterward taken up by the Jansenists. His works were edited by Quesnel and Gerberon (Colon, 1636, 2 vols. 4to); the edition was condemned at Rome, 1697.—*Biog. Ba'jith (Heb. with the art. hab-ba' gith, בַּיִתְּךָ, the house), taken by some to be the name of a city in Moab, where there may have been a celebrated idol temple. It occurs in the prophecy against Moab (Isa. xv, 2): "He is gone up to Bajith and to Dibon, the high places, to weep," which passage is thus interpreted by Bishop Lowth: "He is used for the people of Moab. Bajith and Dibon are in the Chaldee and Syriac versions made into the name of one place, Beth-Dibon. Beth [i. e. Bajith] may signify the house or temple of an idol." The Sept. has Ἀρπιαζεῖ ἐπὶ ἱερῶν, Vulg. Ascendit domus. Gesenius (Comment. zu Jesa. in loc.) understands it as referring, not to a place of this name, but to the "temple" of the false gods of Moab, as opposed to the "high places" in the same sentence (comp. xvi, 12). The allusion has been supposed to be to Beth-Baalmeon, or Beth-dil-lathaim, which are named in Jer. xlviii, 22, as here, with Dibon and Nel o. In this view Henderson (Comment. in loc.) coincides. Bakbak'kar (Heb. Bakbak'kar, בַּכְּבָּקָר, prob. from בָּקַר duplicated, admirable or searcher, perhaps i. q. בָּקַרְבָּקָר, wasting of the mount: Sept. Βακβακάρ), one of the Levites inhabiting the villages of the Neophathites, who were carried captive to Babylon (1 Chron. ix, 15). B. C. 588.

Bak'buk (Heb. Bakbuk', בַּכְּבֻּק, a bottle: Sept. Βακβούκ), the head of one of the families of the Nethinim that returned from Babylon (Ezra ii, 51; Neh. vii, 53). B. C. ante 536.

Bakbuki'ah (Heb. Bakbuki'ah, בַּכְּבֻּקִיָּה, prob. wasting of Jehovah: Sept. Βακβακιὰς, Βακβυκίαις, but other copies omit), a Levite, "second among his brethren," who dwelt at Jerusalem on the return from Babylon (Neh. xi, 17; xii, 9, 23, where the identity is proved by the associated names). B. C. post 536.

Bake (בֶּזֶק, ophim). This domestic operation was usually, among the ancient Israelites, committed to the females or slaves of the family (Gen. xviii, 6; Lev. xxvi, 26; 1 Sam. viii, 13; xxviii, 21; 2 Sam. xiii, 8; Matt. xiii, 33; comp. Jer. vii, 18; xlv, 19; see the Mishna, Chullak, ch. 7; Thilo, Cod. apocryph. i, 96; Pliny, xviii, 28; Arviens, Figyges, iii, 226; v, 418; Burckhardt, ii, 1003; Russell, Abr'p. i, 146; Robinson, ii, 180), but later they had regular bakers (בַּקְּבָנִים, ophim', Hos. vii, 4, 6; comp. Joseph. Ant. xv, 9, 2), and in Jerusalem (Jer. xxxvii, 21) there was a special "Bakers' Street" (bak'car, forum pistorium). See MECHANIC. The dough (בֶּזֶק, batsel', Sept. σπᾶν) was made of wheat, barley, or spelt flour (Mishna, Shebwoth, iii, 2), and every family took care to bake their own supply in small quantities fresh daily (comp. Arviens, i, 69; iii, 227; Tavernier, ii, 280; Harmer, iii, 474), prepared in a wooden bowl or trough (בֶּזֶק־רֶחֶת, mishe' reth, Exod. xii, 28; comp. Shaw, Trav. p. 231; Rosenmüller, Morg. ul. i, 303 sq.), leavened (an act denoted by the verb בָּקַעַת, chemets') properly (Plin. xviii, 26), and kneaded (an operation designated by בָּשָׂה, hush). The ferment was omitted whenever it was necessary to bake in haste (Gen. xix, 3; Exod. xii, 34 sq., 39; Judg. vi, 19; 1 Sam. xxviii, 24; comp. Plin. xviii, 27), and the modern Bedouins scarcely use leaven at all (Arviens, iii, 227; Robinson, iii, 76); and even in cities, for the most part, bread is baked unfermented in the East (Rüppell, Abgss. i, 199). See PASSOVER; LEAVEN. The bread is made in the form of long or round cakes (בֶּזֶק־כִּלְכִּלֹת, kikl'loth le'chem, Exod. xxix, 23; 1 Sam. ii, 76; Judg. vii, 5; Sept. κολλυρίαι ἄφρον), of the size of a plate and the thickness of the thumb (Korte, Re's, p. 436; Russell, Alepp, i, 146; Harmer, Ols. iii, 69 sq.; Robinson, ii, 496); hence in eating they were not cut, but broken (Isa. lviii, 7; Matt. xiv, 19; xxvi, 26; Acts xx, 11; comp. Xenoph. Anab. vii, 3, 22; Plaut. Pan. iii, 5, 19; Curt. iv, 2, 14; Robinson, ii, 497). See MEAL. The proper oven (𐤏𐤍𐤏, *tannur, comp. Hos. vii, 4, 6), which in Oriental cities is sometimes public (Shaw, Trav. p. 202; Harmer, i, 246), differs little from ours (Arvieux, iii, 229). But, besides these, use was principally made of large stone jars, open at the mouth, about three feet high, with a fire made inside (regularly with wood, comp. Isa. xliv, 15, but on occasion also of dry dung, Ezek. iv, 12; comp. Arvieux, iii, 228 sq.; Korte, p. 438; see FUEL), for baking bread and cakes, as soon as the sides were sufficiently heated, by applying the thin dough to the exterior (according to others, to the interior surface likewise), the opening at the top being closed (comp. Arvieux, iii, 227; Niebuhr, Beschr. p. 57; Tavernier, i, 280; Ruppell, ut sup.). Such a pot is still called tannur by the Arabs (Michaëlis, Orient. Bibl. vii, 176). Another mode of baking, which is still very common in the East, consists either in filling a shallow pit with red-hot gravel-stones, which, as soon as they have imparted their heat to the hole, are taken out and the cakes of dough laid in their place (Tavernier, i, 64); or a jar is half filled with hot pebbles and the dough spread on the surface of these (Arvieux, iii, 229). This preparation of bread is probably denoted by the 𐤏𐤍𐤏 𐤏𐤍𐤏, uggoth' natsaphim' ("cakes baked on the coals"), of 1 Kings xix, 6. That baked regularly in the oven, on the other hand, is call-

Fig. 1, 2, Kneading the dough with their feet; 3, 4, Carrying it to the confectioner (15), who rolls out the paste, which is afterward made into cakes of various forms; 5, 6, 7, Making a sort of macaroni (c, n, v, p), on a pan over the fire; 8, 9, Cooking lentils, which are in the baskets, p, v; 10, 11, 12, Making cakes of bread sprinkled with seeds; 13, 14, 15, 16, Kneading paste with the hands; 17, Carrying the cakes to the oven; 18, 19, 20, 21, the dough is probably left to ferment in a basket, as is now done at Cairo.

The Israelites doubtless became early acquainted with the finer method of preparing bread practised among the Egyptians (comp. Rossellini, II, ii, 464). See COOK. The operations are delineated on the annexed cut, taken from the representations on the tombs of Rameses III at Thebes (Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, abridgm. i, 174 sq.).—Winer, i, 129. Baker, Charles, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Scituate, R. I., April 7, 1798. In 1821 he was received into the New England Conference on probation, and subsequently labored for thirty-six consecutive years chiefly in Maine and Massachusetts. After eight years of superannuation, he died, in triumph, at Somerville, Mass., August 16, 1864.—Minutes of Conferences, 1865, p. 61.

Baker, Daniel, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Midway, Ga., Aug. 17, 1791, and studied at Hampden Sidney College, and at Princeton, where he graduated A.B. in 1815. He studied theology with Mr. Hill, pastor of the Presbyterian church in Winchester, Va., and was ordained pastor of the church in Harrisburg, Va., March 5, 1818. Finding himself called to a missionary career, he resigned his charge in 1821; and from 1822 to 1828 was pastor in Washington, D. C. Here John Quincy Adams was one of his hearers, and several acts of great kindness on the part of that eminent man are recorded in his life. Here he wrote A Scriptural View of Baptism, afterward expanded into a work with the quaint title, Baptism in a Nutshell. In 1830, his great success as a revivalist having been noised abroad, he began to travel among the churches, and the remainder of his life was chiefly spent in this way. His travels extended throughout the Southern States, and even to Texas, where he finally settled. Here, among other labors, he founded Austin College, of which he was the first president. He died at Austin, Dec. 10, 1857.—Memoirs of Daniel Baker, by his Son (Philadelphia, 1859, 12mo).

Bakers, one of the scurrilous names given by the heathen to the early Christians. In Minucius Felix (Octavius, c. 14), the heathen interlocutor calls the Christians Plantinae proscypia homines et pistores, "men of the race of Plantus, bakers." Jerome says that Plantus was so poor that, in a time of famine, he was compelled to hire himself out to a baker to grind in his mill (Chron. an. I. Olymp. 145). Such sort of men Cæcilius says the Christians were in the dialogue above cited from Minucius.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. i, ch. ii, § 12.

Ba'laâm (Heb. Bilam', בְּלַעַם; Sept. and N. T. and Philo, Βαλαάμ, Josephus, Βάλαμος). The name is derived by Vitringa from בָּלַעַם and עַם, q. d. lord of the people; but by Simonis from בָּלַעַם and עַם, destruction of the people—an allusion to his supposed supernatural powers; Gesenius derives it from בָּלַעַם, not, and עַם, in the sense of foreigner; Fürst does not decide which etymology to prefer. His father's name, Beor, comes likewise from a root which means to consume or devour. It is deserving of notice that I'ela (q. v.), the first king of the Edomites, was also the son of a Beor (Gen. xxxvi, 32). In 2 Peter ii, 15, Balaam is called the son of Beosor, which Gesenius attributes to an early corruption of the text; but Lightfoot considers it to be a Chaldaism, and infers from the apostle's use of it that he was then resident at Babylon (Works, vii, 80; Sermon on the way of Balaam). See BILEAM. In the other passage of the New Testament (Rev. ii, 14, 15), the sect of the Nicolaitans is described as following the doctrine or teaching of Balaam; and it appears not improbable that this name is employed symbolically, as Nicolaus (Νικολαός, people-conquering) is equivalent in meaning to Balaam.

The first mention of this remarkable person is in Numbers xxii, 5, where we are informed that Balak "sent messengers unto Balaam, the son of Beor, to Pethor, which is by the river of the land of the children of his people." B. C. 1619. He belonged to the Midianites, and perhaps, as the prophet of his people, possessed the same authority that Moses did among the Israelites. At any rate, he is mentioned in conjunction with the five kings of Midian, apparently as a person of the same rank (Num. xxxi, 8; cf. xxxi, 16). He seems to have lived at Pethor, which is said at Deut. xxiii, 4, to have been a city of Mesopotamia (אַרְצֵי נְהַרְרִים). He himself speaks of being "brought from Aram out of the mountains of the East" (Num. xxiii, 7). The reading, therefore, בְּנֵי עַמִּי, instead of בְּנֵי עַמִּי, which at Num. xxii, 5, is found in some MSS., and is adopted by the Samaritan, Syriac, and Vulgate versions, need not be preferred, as the Ammonites do not appear to have ever extended so far as the Euphrates, which is probably the river alluded to in this place. If the received reading be correct, it intimates that Pethor was situated in Balaam's native country, and that he was not a mere sojourner in Mesopotamia, as the Jewish patriarchs were in Canaan. In Josh. xiii, 22, Balaam is termed "the Soothsayer," קַיִן, a word which, with its cognates, is used almost without exception in an unfavorable sense. Josephus calls him an eminent diviner (μάγιστρος, Ant. iv, 6, 2); and what is to be understood by this appellation may be perhaps best learned from the following description by Philo: "There was a man at that time celebrated for divination who lived in Mesopotamia, and was an adept in all the forms of the divining art; but in no branch was he more admired than in augury; to many persons and on many occasions he gave great and astounding proofs of his skill. For to some he foretold storms in the height of summer; to others drought and heat in the depth of winter; to some scarcity succeeding a fruitful year, and then again abundance after scarcity; to others the overflowing and the drying up of rivers; and the remedies of pestilential diseases, and a vast multitude of other things, each of which he acquired great fame for predicting;" (Vita Moysis, § 48). Origen speaks of Balaam as famous for his skill in magic, and the use of noxious incantations, but denies that he had any power to bless, for which he gives the following reason: "For magic, like demons, is unable to bless" (In Num. Hom. xiii). Balak's language, "I wot he whom thou blestest is blessed" (Num. xxii, 6), he considers as only designed to flatter Balaam, and render him compliant with his wishes. (See Berr, La prophétie de Balaam, Par. 1832.)

Balaam is one of those instances which meet us in Scripture of persons dwelling among heathens, but possessing a certain knowledge of the one true God. He was endowed with a greater than ordinary knowledge of God; he was possessed of high gifts of intellect and genius; he had the intuition of truth, and could see into the life of things—in short, he was a poet and a prophet. Moreover, he confessed that all these superior advantages were not his own, but derived from God, and were his gift. And thus, doubtless, he had won for himself, among his contemporaries far and wide, a high reputation for wisdom and sanctity. It was believed that he whom he blessed was blessed, and he whom he cursed was cursed. Elated, however, by his fame and his spiritual elevation, he had begun to conceive that these gifts were his own, and that they might be used to the furtherance of his own ends. He could make merchandise of them, and might acquire riches and honor by means of them. A custom existed among many nations of antiquity of devoting enemies to destruction before entering upon a war with them. At this time the Israelites were marching forward to the occupation of Palestine; they were now encamped in the plains of Moab, on the east of Jordan by Jericho. Balak, the king of Moab, having witnessed the discomfiture of his neighbors, the Amorites, by this people, entered into a league with the Midianites against them, and despatched messengers to Balaam with the rewards of divination in their hands. We see from this, therefore, that Balaam was in the habit of using his wisdom as a trade, and of mingling with it devices of his own by which he imposed upon others and perhaps partially deceived himself. When the elders of Moab and Midian told him their message, he seems to have some misgivings as to the lawfulness of their request, for he invited them to tarry the night with him, that he might learn how the Lord would regard it. These misgivings were confirmed by the express prohibition of God upon his journey. Balaam reported the answer, and the messengers of Balak returned. The King of Moab, however, not deterred by this failure, sent again more and more honorable princes to Balaam, with the promise that he should be promoted to very great honor upon complying with his request. The prophet again refused, but, notwithstanding, invited the embassy to tarry the night with him, that he might know what the Lord would say unto him further: and thus, by his importunity, he extorted from God the permission he desired, but was warned at the same time that his actions would be overruled according to the Divine will. Balaam therefore proceeded on his journey with the messengers of Balak. But God's anger was kindled at this manifestation of determined self-will, and the angel of the Lord stood in the way for an adversary against him. The words of the Psalmist, "Be ye not like to horse and mule which have no understanding, whose mouths must be held with bit and bridle, otherwise they will not come near unto thee" (Psa. xxxii, 9), had they been familiar to Balaam, would have come home to him with most tremendous force; for never have they received a more forcible illustration than the comparison of Balaam's conduct to his Maker with his treatment of his ass affords us. The wisdom with which the tractable brute was allowed to "speak with man's voice," and "forbid" the untractable "madness of the prophet," is palpable and conspicuous. He was taught, moreover, that even she had a spiritual perception to which he, though a prophet, was a stranger; and when his eyes were opened to behold the angel of the Lord, "he bowed down his head and fell flat on his face." It is hardly necessary to suppose, as some do, that the event here referred to happened only in a trance or vision, though such an opinion might seem to be supported by the fact that our translators render the word נָבַח in xxiv, 4, 16, "falling into a trance," whereas no other idea than that of simple falling is conveyed by it. The Apostle Peter refers to it as a real historical event: "The dumb ass, speaking with man's voice, forbade the madness of the prophet" (2 Pet. ii, 16). We are not told how these things happened, but that they did happen, and that it pleased God thus to interfere on behalf of His elect people, and to bring forth from the genius of a self-willed prophet, who thought that his talents were his own, strains of poetry bearing upon the destiny of the Jewish nation and the Church at large, which are not surpassed throughout the Mosaic records. It is evident that Balaam, although acquainted with God, was desirous of throwing an air of mystery round his wisdom, from the instructions he gave Balak to offer a bullock and a ram on the seven altars he everywhere prepared for him; but he seems to have thought also that these sacrifices would be of some avail to change the mind of the Almighty, because he pleads the merit of them (xxiii, 4), and after experiencing their impotency to effect such an object, "he went no more," we are told, "to seek for enchantments" (xxiv, 1). His religion, therefore, was probably such as would be the natural result of a general acquaintance with God not confirmed by any covenant. He knew Him as the fountain of wisdom; how to worship Him he could merely guess from the customs in vogue at the time. Sacrifices had been used by the patriarchs; to what extent they were efficient could only be surmised. There is an allusion to Balaam in the Prophet Micah (vi, 5), where Bishop Butler thinks that a conversation is preserved which occurred between him and the King of Moab upon this occasion. But such an opinion is hardly tenable, if we bear in mind that Balak is nowhere represented as consulting Balaam upon the acceptable mode of worshipping God, and that the directions found in Micah are of quite an opposite character to those which were given by the son of Beor upon the high-places of Baal. The prophet is recounting "the righteousness of the Lord" in delivering His people out of the hand of Moab under Balak, and at the mention of his name the history of Balaam comes back upon his mind, and he is led to make those noble reflections upon it which occur in the following verse. "The doctrine of Balaam" is spoken of in Rev. ii, 14, where an allusion has been supposed to the founder of the sect of the Nicolaitans, mentioned in v. 15. See NICOLAITANS. Though the utterance of Balaam was overruled so that he could not curse the children of Israel, he nevertheless suggested to the Moabites the expedient of seducing them to commit fornication. The effect of this is recorded in ch. xxv. A battle was afterward fought against the Midianites, in which Balaam sided with them, and was slain by the sword of the people whom he had endeavored to curse (Num. xxxi, 8). B.C. 1618. (Comp. Bishop Butler's Sermons, serm. vii; Ewald, Gesch. des Volkes Israel, ii, 277; Stanley, Jewish Ch. i, 209 sq.)

Of the numerous paradoxes which we find in "this strange mixture of a man," as Bishop Newton terms him, not the least striking is that with the practice of an art expressly forbidden to the Israelites ("there shall not be found among you one that useth divination" [Deut. xviii, 10], "for all that do these things are an abomination to the Lord," ver. 12) he united the knowledge and worship of Jehovah, and was in the habit of receiving intimations of his will: "I will bring you word again as the Lord (Jehovah) shall speak unto me" (Num. xxii, 8). The inquiry naturally arises, by what means did he become acquainted with the true religion? Dr. Hengstenberg suggests that he was led to renounce idolatry by the reports that reached him of the miracles attending the Exodus; and that, having experienced the deceptive nature of the soothsaying art, he hoped, by becoming a worshipper of the God of the Hebrews, to acquire fresh power over nature, and a clearer insight into futurity. Yet the sacred narrative gives us no reason to suppose that he had any previous knowledge of the Israelites. In Num. xxii, 11, he merely repeats Balak's message, "Behold, there is a people come out of Egypt," etc., without intimating that he had heard of the miracles wrought on their behalf. The allusion in Num. xxiii, 22, might be prompted by the divine affluus which he then felt. And had he been actuated in the first instance by motives of personal aggrandizement, it seems hardly probable that he would have been favored with those divine communications with which his language, in Num. xxii, 8, implies a familiarity. Since, in the case of Simon Magus, the offer to "purchase the gift of God with money" (Acts viii, 20) called forth an immediate and awful rebuke from the apostles, would not Balaam's attempt to obtain a similar gift, with a direct view to personal emolument and fame, have met with a similar repulse? Dr. Hengstenberg supposes, indeed, that there was a mixture of a higher order of sentiments, a sense of the wants of his moral nature, which led him to seek Jehovah, and laid a foundation for intercourse with him. In the absence of more copious and precise information, may we not reasonably conjecture that Jacob's residence for twenty years in Mesopotamia contributed to maintain some just ideas of religion, though mingled with much superstition? To this source, and the existing remains of patriarchal religion, Balaam was probably indebted for that truth which he unhappily "restrained by unrighteousness" (Rom. i, 18). (See Onder, De Bileamo, Jen. 1715.)

On the narrative contained in Num. xxii, 22-35, a difference of opinion has long existed, even among those who fully admit its authenticity. The advocates for a literal interpretation urge that, in a historical work and a narrative bearing the same character, it would be unnatural to regard any of the occurrences as taking place in vision, unless expressly so stated; that it would be difficult to determine where the vision begins and where it ends; that Jehovah's "opening the mouth of the ass" (Num. xxii, 28) must have been an external act; and, finally, that Peter's language is decidedly in favor of the literal sense: "The dumb ass, speaking with a man's voice, reproved the madness of the prophet" (2 Pet. ii, 16). Those who conceive that the speaking of the ass and the appearance of the angel occurred in vision to Balaam (among whom are Maimonides, Leinitz, and Hengstenberg) insist upon the fact that dreams and visions were the ordinary methods by which God made himself known to the prophets (Num. xii, 6); they remark that Balaam, in the introduction to his third and fourth prophecies (xxiv, 3, 4, 15), speaks of himself as "the man who had his eyes shut," and who, on falling down in prophetic ecstasy, had his eyes opened; that he expressed no surprise on hearing the ass speak; and that neither his servants nor the Moabitish princes who accompanied him appear to have been cognizant of any supernatural appearance. Dr. Jortin supposes that the angel of the Lord suffered himself to be seen by the beast, but not by the prophet; that the beast was terrified, and Balaam smote her, and then fell into a trance, and in that state conversed first with the beast and then with the angel. The angel presented these objects to his imagination as strongly as if they had been before his eyes, so that this was still a miraculous or preternatural operation. In dreaming, many singular incongruities occur without exciting our astonishment; it is therefore not wonderful if the prophet conversed with his beast in vision without being startled at such a phenomenon (see Jortin's Dissertation on Balaam, p. 190-194). See Ass (of Balaam).

The limits of this article will not allow of an examination of Balaam's magnificent prophecies, which, as Herder remarks (Geist der Ebräischen Poesie, ii, 221), "are distinguished for dignity, compression, vividness, and fulness of imagery. There is scarcely any thing equal to them in the later prophets, and" (he adds, what few readers, probably, of Deut. xxxii, xxxiii, will be disposed to admit) "nothing in the discourses of Moses." Hengstenberg has ably discussed the doubts raised by De Wette and other German critics respecting the antiquity and genuineness of this portion of the Pentateuch. A full discussion of the Character and Prophecies of Balaam may be found in the Bib. Sac. 1846, p. 347 sq.—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v.

Ba'la'ac (Βαλάκ), another method of Anglicizing (Rev. ii, 14) the name BALAK (q. v.).

Bal'adan (Heb. Baladaw, בַּלְאָדָן, Bal is his lord; Sept. Βαλαάδιν), a name used in a double capacity. Fürst observes (Heb. Handb. s. v.) that, if of Shemitic origin, it corresponds to the Phœnician Baal-Adonis (בַּלְאֵל אֲדוֹנַי, Ba'al-adon' of coins, Numid. v, 1); but as the associate name Merodach (q. v.) is prob. not Shemitic, we may perhaps better derive Baladan from the Sanscrit balu (strength) and dhanu (riches), with the sense of valiant and wealthy.

1. The father of the Babylonian king Merodach. baladan (2 Kings xx, 12; Isa. xxxix, 1). B. C. ante 711. See MERODACH-BALADAN.

2. A surname of MERODACH-BALADAN (Isa. xxxix, 1), or BERODACH-BALADAN (2 Kings xx, 12) himself (q. v.).

Ba'lah (Heb. Balah, בַּלְהָ, a contraction of the name Baaloh or Bilbah; Sept. Βαλᾶ v. r. Βολᾶ), a city in the tribe of Simeon, mentioned in connection with Hazar-shual and Azem (Josh. xix, 3). It seems to have been the same with that elsewhere called BILHAU (1 Chron. iv, 29) or BAALEH (Josh. xv, 29), and, if so, it must have been transferred to Judah, or so accounted in later times, like many other cities of this region. See BIZOTHEJAN.

Ba'lah (Heb. Balah, בַּלְהָ, empty; Sept. and N. T. Βαλαία, Βαλακαος, Ant. iv, 6, 2), son of Zippor, and king of the Moabites (Num. xxii, 2, 4); he was so terrified at the approach of the victorious army of the Israelites, who, in their passage through the desert, had encamped near the confines of his territory, that he applied to Balaam, who was then reputed to possess great influence with the higher spirits, to curse them. B. C. 1618. But his hostile designs (Josh. xxiv, 9) were frustrated. See BALAM. From Judg. xi, 25, it is clear that Balak was so certain of the fulfilment of Balaam's blessing, "Blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee" (Num. xxiv, 9), that he never afterwards made the least military attempt to oppose the Israelites (comp. Mic. vi, 5; Rev. ii, 14).—Kitto, s. v.

Bal'amo (rather Bal'amon, Βελαμόν, v. r. Βαλ'amon, Βαλαμόν), a place named in the Αποκρυφια (Jud. viii, 3) as not far from Dothaim (Dothar), and usually supposed to be the same as the Belmen of Judith iv, 4, and the ABEL-MAIM (q. v.) of Scripture. Reland (Palæst. p. 613, 622) inclines, however, to identify it with the Belmoth (Βελμοθ) stated by Epiphanius (Vit. Prophetarum, p. 244) to have been the native place of the prophet Hossa, and called Belemon (Βελεμων) in the Pachal Chronicle.

Balances (Heb. in the dual מִזְנֵיִם, mōzenā yim, i. e. two pointers; and so the Chald. equivalent, ܡܙܢܝܢܝܢ, mōzenā yin, Dan. v. 27; once the Heb. מִזְנֵה, kanāch, prop. a branch, as of "cane," used in the sing. Isa. xlvi, 6, the rod or beam of a steelyard; in Rev. vi, 5, זֵרֹעַ, a yoke, hence a "pair of balances"). In the early periods of the world gold and silver were paid by weight, so that persons employed in traffic of any kind carried with them a pair of scales or balances and different weights (generally stones of different sizes) in a pouch or bag. Fraudulent men would carry two sorts of weights, the lighter to sell with and the other to buy with (Mic. vi, 11). Balances or scales of various forms are frequently seen upon the most ancient Egyptian monuments, and were also used for dividing the spoil by the ancient Assyrian warriors (Bonomi, Ninivah, p. 163, 268); they bear a general resemblance to those now in use, and most likely they are similar to those used by the ancient Hebrews (Lev. xix, 36).

Among the Egyptians large scales were generally a flat wooden board, with four ropes attached to a ring at the extremity of the beam; and those of smaller size were of bronze, one and a half inch in diameter, pierced near the edge in three places for the strings. The principle of the common balance was simple and ingenious: the beam passed through a ring suspended from a horizontal rod, immediately above and parallel to it, and when equally balanced, the ring, which was large enough to allow the beam to play freely, showed when the scales were equally poised, and had the additional effect of preventing the beam tilting when the goods were taken out of one and the weights suffered to remain in the other scale. To the lower part of the ring a small plummet was fixed, and this being touched by the hand, and found to hang freely, indicated, without the necessity of looking at the beam, that the weight was just. The figure of a baboon was sometimes placed upon the top, as the emblem of the god Thoth, the regulator of measures, of time, and of writing, in his character of the moon; but there is no appearance of the goddess of justice being connected with the balance, except in the judgment scenes of the dead. The pair of scales was the ordinary and, apparently, only kind of balance used by the Egyptians, no instance of the steelyard being met with in the paintings of Thebes or of Beni Hassan; and the introduction of the latter is confined to a Roman era. The other kind of balance, whose invention has been ascribed by Pliny to Dædalus, is shown to have been known and applied in Egypt at least as early as the time of the Osirtasens. One kind of balance used for weighing gold [see GOLDSMITH] differed slightly from those of ordinary construction, and was probably more delicately formed. It was made, as usual, with an upright pole, rising from a broad base or stand, and a cross-beam turning on a pin at its summit; but instead of strings suspending the scales was an arm on either side, terminating in a hook, to which the gold was attached in small bags (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. abridg. ii, 151, 152). See WEIGHT.

A pair of scales is likewise a well-known symbol of a strict observation of justice and fair dealing. It is thus used in several places of Scripture, as Job xxxi, 6; Psa. lxxii, 9; Prov. xi, 1, and xvi, 11. But balance, joined with symbols denoting the sale of corn and fruits by weight, becomes the symbol of scarcity; bread by weight being a curse in Lev. xxvi, 26, and in Ezek. iv, 16, 17. So in Rev. vi, 5, "He that sat upon him had a pair of balances in his hand." Here the balance is used to weigh corn and the necessities of life, in order to signify great want and scarcity, and to threaten the world with famine. See SCALES.

Balas. See ALEXANDER.

Balas'amus (or rather Baal'samus, Βαλάσαμος; comp. Balsamen in the art. BAAL-), the last named of those that stood at the right hand of Ezra while reading the law (1 Esdr. ix, 43); but the corresponding name in the true text (Neh. viii, 4) is MAASEIAH (q. v.).

Bald (prop. ܕܪܝܚ, karē'āch, naturally bare of hair on the top or back of the head; Sept. φαλακρός; different was the ܕܪܝܚ, g'bbe'āch, diseased loss of hair on forehead, Lev. xiii, 41; Sept. ἀναθήλαιος). There are two kinds of baldness, viz., artificial and natural. The latter seems to have been uncommon, since it exposed people to public derision, and is perpetually alluded to as a mark of squalor and misery (2 Kings ii, 23; Isa. iii, 24, "instead of well-set hair, baldness, and burning instead of beauty." Isa. xv, 2; Jer. xlvii, 5; Ezek. vii, 18, etc.). For this reason it seems to have been included under the "scab" and "scurf" (Lev. xxi, 20, perhaps i. q. d midraff), which were disqualifications for priesthood (Mishna, Berachoth, vii, 2). In Lev. xiii, 29 sq., very careful directions are given to distinguish the scall (ܕܪܝܚ, bahak), "freckled spot," ver. 39), described as "a plague (ܕܪܝܚ, ne'ga, stroke) upon the head and beard" (which probably is the Montagra of Pliny, and is a sort of leprosy), from mere natural baldness which is pronounced to be clean, v. 40 (Jahn, Bibl. Arch. 189). See LEPROSY. But this shows that even natural baldness subjected men to an unpleasant suspicion. It was a defect with which the Israelites were by no means familiar, since the Egyptians were very rarely subject to it, according to Herodotus (iii, 12); an immunity which he attributes to their constant shaving. They adopted this practice for purposes of cleanliness, and generally wore wigs, some of which have been found in the ruins of Thebes. Contrary to the general practice of the East, they only let the hair grow as a sign of mourning (Herod. ii, 36), and shaved themselves on all joyous occasions; hence in Gen. xli, 44, we have an undesigned coincidence. The same custom obtains in China and among the modern Egyptians, who shave off all the hair except the shoosheh, a tuft on the forehead and crown of the head (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. iii, 359 sq.; Lane, Mod. Egypt. i, ch. 1). Baldness was despised both among Greeks and Romans. In Homer (Il. ii, 219) it is one of the defects of Thersites; Aristophanes (who was probably bald himself, Par. 767; Eq. 550) takes pride in not joining in the ridicule against it (Nab. 540). Cæsar was said to have had some deformity of this sort, and he generally endeavored to conceal it (Suet. Cæs. 45; comp. Don. 18).

Artificial baldness marked the conclusion of a Nazarete's vow (Acts xviii, 18; Num. vi, 9), and was a sign of mourning (Cic. Tusc. Disp. iii, 26). It is often alluded to in Scripture, as in Mic. i, 16; Amos vii, 10; Jer. xlvii, 5, etc.; and in Deut. xiv, 1, the reason for its being forbidden to the Israelites is their being "a holy and peculiar people" (comp. Lev. xix, 27, and Jer. ix, 26, marg.). The practices alluded to in the latter passages were adopted by heathen nations (e. g. the Arabs, etc.) in honor of various gods. The Abantes and other half-civilized tribes shaved off the forelocks, to avoid the danger of being seized by them in battle (Herod. ii, 36; i, 82).—Smith. See HAIR.

Baldachin or Baldaquin (umbraculum), (1.) the clitorium, or canopy, overhanging the altar, imitating a roof supported by pillars. (2.) The canopy which is borne over the host, or over the head of the pope, on days of ceremony. The name itself is an ancient French term, signifying the richest kind of silks and tissues, especially of gold thread; so called, perhaps, because imported from Baldak, the mediæval name of Babylon in Persia,—Ducange, Gloss. s. v.

Balde, JOHANN JACOB, surnamed by his contemporaries "the German Horace," was born at Ensisheim, near Colmar, Alsace, in 1603, and was educated at the University of Ingolstadt. He entered the order of Jesuits in 1624, became in 1638 court preacher at Munich, and afterward professor of Philip William, duke of Bavaria. He died Aug. 9th, 1668. His principal writings, all of which are written in classic Latin, are—Carmina lyrice libri IV, Epodon liber, Sylve lyrice, De vanitate mundi;—Solutium podagricorum (Cologne, 1660);—Opera poetica (Munich, 1726, 8 vols.), etc. His Uranie victorieuse was rewarded by Alexander VII with a gold medal. A selection of his works was published by Orelli (Zurich, 2d ed. 1818) and by Cleska (Augsbg, 1829, 2 vols.), a biography by Cleska (Nurnb. 1842).

Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Exeter, where he received a liberal education. He became archdeacon of Exeter, but soon resigned, and became a monk in the Cistercian abbey of Ford, in Devonshire, of which in a few years he was elected abbot. In 1181 he was made bishop of Worcester, and in 1184 Henry II translated him to the see of Canterbury. Urban III afterward made Baldwin his legate for the diocese of Canterbury. On September, 3, 1189, Baldwin performed the ceremony of crowning Richard I at Westminster; and in the same year, when that king's natural brother, Geoffrey, was translated from the see of Lincoln to York, he successfully asserted the pre-eminence of the see of Canterbury, forbidding the bishops of England to receive consecration from any other than the Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1190 he made a progress into Wales to preach the Crusade; and in the same year, having held a council at Westminster, he followed King Richard I to the Holy Land. He embarked at Dover March 25, 1191, abandoning the important duties of his station, and, after suffering many hardships on his voyage, arrived at Acre during the siege, where he died, November 20, in the same year, and where his body was interred. Bishop Tanner has given a list of a great many treatises by Archbishop Baldwin, which remain in manuscript, and has noticed the different libraries in which they are deposited. The most important were collected by Bertrand Tisser, and published, in 1662, in the fifth volume of the "Scriptores Biblioth. Cisterciensis." See Engl. Cyclopaedia; Godwin, De Præv. Ang. p. 79; Collier, Eccl. Hist. ii, 374 sq.

Baldwin, Ebenezer, a Congregational minister, was born at Norwich, Conn., July 3, 1745. He graduated at Yale in 1763, and became tutor there in 1765.

In 1770 he was ordained minister of the first Cong. church in Danbury. In the Revolution he was an ardent Whig, and, as chaplain in the army, contracted the disease of which he died, Oct. 1, 1776.—Sprague, Annals, i, 645.

Baldwin, Elishu W., D.D., an efficient Presbyterian minister, born in Greene Co., N. Y., in 1789, and educated at Yale and Andover, was licensed to preach in 1817, and by his labors established the Seventh Presb. Church in New York, of which he became pastor in 1820. In 1835 he became president of Wabash College, at that time a very arduous post, on account of the pecuniary difficulties in which the institution was involved. In 1849 Mr. Baldwin received the degree of D.D. from Indiana College. He died Oct. 15, 1840, having published several tracts and sermons.—Sprague, Annals, iv, 572.

Baldwin, Thomas, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Bozrah, Conn., Dec. 23, 1753, and died at Waterville, Me., Aug. 29, 1826. Though educated among Pædobaptists, he adopted Baptist views, and was baptized by immersion in 1781. In the following year he began to preach, and was ordained in 1783 pastor of the Baptist church in Canaan, N. H., where he was residing. In 1790 he removed to Boston, taking charge of the Second Baptist Church in that place. In 1794 he received the degree of A.M. from Brown University, and in 1803 that of D.D. from Union College. From the latter year till his death he was the chief editor of the "Mass. Bapt. Miss. Magazine," published in Boston. Dr. Baldwin published several pamphlets on baptism and communion, besides "A Series of Letters in Answer to the Rev. Samuel Worcester," published in 1810, and various tracts and sermons.—Sprague, Annals, vi, 208; Mass. Bapt. Miss. Mag. v.

Bale, JOHN (Balaus), bishop of Ossory, an English historian and theologian, was born at Cove Hithe, in Suffolk, Nov. 21, 1495, and was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, where he early gained a reputation for letters and opposed the Reformation. He attributes his conversion to Lord Wentworth, and although protected for a time by the Earl of Essex, he was, after the death of Cromwell, obliged to retire into Flanders. He returned under Edward VI, and received the living of Bishopstoke, in Hampshire, On Feb. 2, 1553, he was made bishop of Ossory. When Edward died he took refuge at Basle, where he remained till 1559, when he returned into England, and, refusing to resume his bishopric (which he at the first was earnestly desirous not to accept), he was made prebend of the Church of Canterbury. His chief work is his Illustrium majoris Britanniae Scriptorum Summarium, first printed at Ipswich in 1549. This edition contained only five centuries of writers; but an enlarged edition was published at Basle in 1557, etc., containing nine centuries, under the following title: Scriptorum Illustrium M. Britanniae, quam nunc Angliam et Scotiam vocant, Catalogus, a Japheto per 3618 annos usque ad annum hunc Domini 1557, ex Beroso, Geographo, Bala, etc. . . . collectus; and in 1559 a third edition appeared, containing five more centuries. He was a very voluminous writer; a long list of his printed works is given by Fuller, and also in the Engl. Cyclopaedia (s. v. Bale). His works were placed on the prohibitory Index, printed at Madrid in 1667, as those of a heretic of the first class. No character has been more variously represented than Bale's. Gesner, in his Bibliotheca, calls him a writer of the greatest diligence, and Bishop Godwin gives him the character of a laborious inquirer into British antiquities. Similar praise is also bestowed upon him by Vögel (Introductio Universal. in Notit. Scriptor.). Anthony à Wood, however, styles him "the foul-mouthed Bale." Hearne (Pref. to Hemingf.) calls him "Balaus in multis mendax." And even Fuller (Worthies, last ed. ii, 332) says "Biliosus Balaus passeth for his true character."

He inveighed with much asperity against the pope and papists, and his intemperate zeal, it must be acknowledged, often carried him beyond the bounds of decency and candor. Fuller, in his Church History (cent. ix, p. 68), pleads for Bale's railing against the papists. "Old age and ill usage," he says, "will make any man angry. When young, he had seen their superstition; when old, he felt their oppression." The greatest fault of Bale's book on the British writers is its multiplication of their works by frequently giving the heads of chapters or sections of a book as the titles of distinct treatises. A selection from his works was published by the Parker Society (Cambridge, 1849, 8vo). See Strype, Memorials of Crommer, p. 206, 360; Collier, Ecol. Hist. v, 500; Penny Cyclop. s. v.

Balfour, Walter, was born at St. Ninian's, Scotland, 1776, and educated in the Scotch Church at the expense of Mr. Robert Haldane. After some years' preaching he came to America, and became a Baptist about 1806. In 1823 he avowed himself a Universalist, and labored, both as preacher and writer, in behalf of Universalism until his death at Charlestown, Mass., Jan. 3, 1852. He published Essays on the Intermediate State of the Dead (Charlestown, 1828, 12mo). See Whittemore, Memoir of Rev. W. Balfour (Bost. 1830).

Balguy, John, an English divine, was born at Sheffield in 1686, and educated at Cambridge, where he passed M.A. in 1726. In the Bangorian controversy (q. v.) he maintained the views of Bishop Hoadley, and wrote, in 1718, 1719, several tracts on the dispute. In 1726, in view of the infidel principles of Lord Shaftesbury, he published A Letter to a Deist, and The Foundation of Moral Virtue. These, with others, are given in A Collection of Tracts, by the Rev. J. Balguy (Lond. 1734, 8vo). His Sermons (2 vols, 8vo) had reached a third edition in 1790. Balguy was a "latitudinarian" (q. v.) in theology. He died in 1748.—Allibone, s. v.

Balguy, Thomas, D.D., son of John, was born in Yorkshire in 1716, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where in 1741 he became M.A., and in 1758 D.D. In 1757, under the patronage of Hoadley, he was made prebendary of Winchester, and afterward archdeacon of Salisbury and Winchester. He abandoned Hoadley's "latitudinarianism," and brought his sound scholarship to the "defence of the Christian religion and of the English Church." He wrote a number of excellent sermons and charges, which may be found in his Discourses on various Subjects, edited by Drake, with a Memoir of Balguy (Cambridge, 1822, 2 vols, 8vo). He wrote, also, Divine Bewevidence vindicated from the Reflections of Sceptics (Lond. 2d ed. 1803, 12mo). He died unmarried, Jan. 19, 1795. See Hook, Ecol. Biog. i, 477; Rose, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Ball (??, dur), well known as being used in various sports and games from the earliest times, several kinds of which are depicted on the Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, i, 158 sq. abridg.). The word occurs in this sense in Isa. xxii, 18, but in a subsequent chapter (xxix, 3) it is employed of a ring or circle, and translated "round about" in the prophecy of the siege of Jerusalem. In Ezek. xxiv, 5, in the symbol of the same event, it is translated "burn," but probably means hop, as in the margin.

Ancient Egyptian Ball.—1. Leather; 2. Painted Earthenware.

Among the Egyptians the balls were made of leather or skin, sewed with string, crosswise, in the same manner as our own, and stuffed with bran or husks of corn; and those which have been found at Thebes are about three inches in diameter. Others were made of string, or of the stalks of rushes platted together so as to form a circular mass, and covered, like the former, with leather. They appear also to have a smaller kind of ball, probably of the same materials, and covered, like many of our own, with slips of leather of an elliptical shape, sewed together longitudinally, and meeting in a common point at both ends, each alternate slip being of a different color; but these have only been met with in pottery (Wilkinson, i, 200).

Ball, John, a Roman priest, who seems to have imbibed Wickliffe's doctrines, and who was (previously to 1366) excommunicated repeatedly for preaching "errors, and schisms, and scandals against the pope, archbishops, bishops, and clergy." He preached in favor of the rebellion of Wat Tyler, and was executed at Coventry in 1381. See Collier, Ecol. Hist. iii, 148 sq.

Ball, John, a Puritan divine, was born in 1585, at Cassington, in Oxfordshire. He studied at Brazenose College, Oxford, and was admitted to holy orders, and passed his life in poverty on a small cure at Whitmore, Staffordshire, to which was united the care of a school. He died in 1640. His Catechism had gone through fourteen editions before the year 1632, and has had the singular lot of being translated into Turkish. His Treatise on Faith (Lond. 1632, 4to) also passed through many editions. He published also The Power of Godliness and other treatises (Lond. 1657, fol.). See Rose, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, i, 108.

Balle, Nikolai Edinger, a distinguished Lutheran theologian of Denmark, was born in 1744 in Zealand, became in 1772 Professor of Theology at Copenhagen, and in 1783 bishop of Zealand. He died in 1816. He wrote, Theses theologicae (Copenh. 1776), and A Manual of Religious Doctrines (Copenh. 1783); he was also the editor of a magazine for modern church history of Denmark (Magazin for den nyere danske Kirkehistorie, Copenh. 1792-94, 2 vols.).

Ballerini, Peter and Jerome, brothers, priests of Verona, distinguished for their learning. Peter was born in 1698, Jerome in 1702. They lived and studied together, and published, in conjunction and separately, many important works on jurisprudence and theology. Among these were, The Works of Cardinal Norris, containing, among other matters, a Life of the Writer; a History of the various Congregations held for the Reform of the Calendar, at which the cardinal presided; a History of the Donatists, in 2 parts, Supplements, and an Appendix (Verona, 1732, 4 vols. fol.); Suæti Antonini Archiep. Florentini Summa Theologiae, etc. (Verona, 1740-41, 2 vols. fol.); S. Rainaldi de Pennaforte Summa Theologicae, etc. (Verona, 1744). Among the works edited by them may be mentioned the Sermons of Zeno, bishop of Verona, 1739; the works of John Mathew Gilbert, bishop of Verona, 1736; the works of Pope St. Leo, in 3 vols. fol., containing works of that pope which are not to be found in Quessel's edition. Peter wrote several treatises in behalf of the papacy, especially De Potestate s. Pontif. etc. (1765), and De Vi ac ratione primatus Pontif. (1766).—Biog. Universelle.

Ballimathiee (evanton dances, from βαλλίσειν), is generally understood to refer to those wanton dances which were practised at marriage festivals, but sometimes indicates the practice of playing on cymbals and other musical instruments. The word βαλλίσειν means to throw the legs and feet about rapidly; hence to dance a certain lively dance peculiar to Magna Græcia and Sicily. The words ballet and ball are from this root. The Council of Laodicea, and the third Council of Toledo, forbade the promiscuous and lascivious dancing of men and women together under this name, which is generally interpreted wanton dances associated with lascivious songs. Ambrose, Chrysostom, and others of the fathers, are faithful in condemning the practices which were adopted in their day at marriage ceremonies, many of which were highly disgraceful. See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xvi, ch. xi, § 16.

Ballou, HOSEA, a Universalist minister, was born April 30th, 1771, at Richmond, N. H. At an early age he joined the Baptist Church, of which his father was a minister, but was soon after expelled on account of his embracing Universalist and Unitarian opinions. At the age of twenty-one he became an itinerant preacher of the then new doctrines he had adopted. His ability and eloquence attracting attention, he was invited in 1794 to a permanent charge at Dana, Mass., which he accepted. In 1802 he removed to Barnard, Vt.; in 1807, to Portsmouth, N. H.; and in 1815, to Salem, Mass. Two years later he accepted the charge of the Second Universalist Society at Boston, which he held till his death, June 7th, 1852. Mr. Ballou was an industrious writer. In 1819 he commenced the Universalist Magazine, and in 1831 the Universalist Expositor (now the Universalist Quarterly). He published The Doctrine of future Retribution (1824), and numerous other controversial works, besides Notes on the Parables: A Treatise on the Atonement; and several volumes of Sermons. See Whittemore, Life of the Rev. H. Ballou.

Balm (for the original term, see below), a production more particularly ascribed to Gilead (Gen. xxxvii, 25; Jer. viii, 22). Balm or bals m is used as a common name for many of those oily, resinous substances which flow spontaneously or by incision from certain trees or plants, and are of considerable use in medicine and surgery. Kimchi and some of the modern interpreters understand the Heb. word rendered "balm" to be that particular species called opobalsamum, or balm of Gilead, so much celebrated by Pliny, Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, Tacitus, Justin, and others, for its costliness, its medicinal virtues, and for being the product of Judea only; and which Josephus says grew in the neighborhood of Jericho, the tree, according to tradition, having been originally brought by the Queen of Sheba as a present to King Solomon. On the other hand, Bochart strongly contends that the balm mentioned Jer. viii, 22, could not possibly be that of Gilead, and considers it as no other than the resin drawn from the terebinth or turpentine tree. Pliny says, "The trees of the opobalsamum have a resemblance to fir-trees, but they are lower, and are planted and husbanded after the manner of vines. On a particular season of the year they sweat balsam. The darkness of the place is, besides, as wonderful as the fruitfulness of it; for, though the sun shines nowhere hotter in the world, there is naturally a moderate and perpetual gloominess of the air." Mr. Buckingham observes upon this passage, that "the situation, boundaries, and local features of the valley of Jericho are accurately given in these details, though darkness, in the sense in which it is commonly understood, would be an improper term to apply to the gloom. At the present time there is not a tree of any description, either of palm or balsam, and scarcely any verdure or bushes to be seen, but the complete desolation is undoubtedly rather to be attributed to the cessation of the usual agricultural labors, and to the want of a proper distribution of water over it by the aqueducts, the remains of which evince that they were constructed chiefly for that purpose, rather than to any radical change in the climate or the soil." The balsam, carried originally, says Arab tradition, from Yemen by the Queen of Sheba, as a gift to Solomon, and planted by him in the gardens of Jericho, was brought to Egypt by Cleopatra, and planted at Ain-Shemesh, now Matara, in a garden which all the old travellers, Arab and Christian, mention with deep interest. The balsam of Jericho, or true balm of Gilead, has long been lost (De Sacy).

Balsam, at present, is procured in some cases from the fruit of a shrub which is indigenous in the mountains between Mecca and Medina. This shrub was cultivated in gardens in Egypt in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and that this was also the case in Palestine, in very early times, appears from the original text in Gen. xliii, 11, and Jer. xlvi, 11. The balsam of Mecca has always been deemed a substance of the greatest value; though it is not the only one possessing medicinal properties, yet it is, perhaps, more eminently distinguished for them than other balsamic plants of the same genus, of which sixteen are enumerated by botanists, each exhibiting some peculiarity. There are three species of this balsam, two of which are shrubs, and the other a tree. In June, July, and August they yield their sap, which is received into an earthen vessel. The fruit, also, when pierced with an instrument, emits a juice of the same kind, and in greater abundance, but less rich. The sap extracted from the body of the tree or shrub is called the opobalsamum; the juice of the balsam fruit is denominated carpobalsamum, and the liquid extracted from the branches when cut off, the xylobalsamum (Jahn, Bibl. Archaeol. i, § 74). According to Bruce, "The balsam is an evergreen shrub or tree, which grows to about fourteen feet high, spontaneously and without culture, in its native country, Azab, and all along the coast to Babelmandel. The trunk is about eight or ten inches in diameter, the wood light and open, gummy, and outwardly of a reddish color, incapable of receiving a polish, and covered with a smooth bark, like that of a young cherry-tree. It is remarkable for a penury of leaves. The flowers are like those of the acacia, small and white, only that three hang upon three filaments or stalks; where the acacia has but one. Two of these flowers fall off, and leave a single fruit. After the blossoms follow yellow fine-scented seed, inclosed in a reddish-black pulpy nut, very sweet, and containing a yellowish liquor like honey." A traveller, who assumed the name of Ali Bey, says that "there is no balsam made at Mecca; that, on the contrary, it is very scarce, and is obtained principally in the territory of Medina. As the repute of the balsam of Mecca rose, the balm of Gilead disappeared; though in the era of Galen, who flourished in the second century, and travelled into Palestine and Syria purposely to obtain a knowledge of this substance, it grew in Jericho and many other parts of the Holy Land. The cause of its total decay has been ascribed, not without reason, to the royal attention being withdrawn from it by the distractions of the country. In more recent times its naturalization seems to have been attempted in Egypt; for Prosper Alpinus relates that forty plants were brought by a governor of Cairo to the garden there, and ten remained when Belon travelled in Egypt, nearly two hundred and fifty years ago; but, whether from not agreeing with the African soil or otherwise, only one existed in the last century, and now there appears to be none. (See also Thomson, Laud and Book, ii. 193, 457.) See GILEAD, BALM OF.

The word balm occurs frequently in the Authorized Version, as in Gen. xxxvii, 25; xliii, 11; Jer. viii, 22; xlv, 11; li, 8; and Ezek. xxviii, 17. In all these passages the Hebrew text has תְּשׁוֹרִי or תְּשׁוֹרִי (tsori or tsori', Sept. αγρινη), which is generally understood to be the true balsam, and is considered a produce of Gilead, a mountainous district, where the vegetation is that of the Mediterranean region and of Europe, with few traces of that of Africa or of Asia. Lee (Lev. p. 520) supposes it to be mistiak, a gum obtained from the Pistacia Lentiscus; but Gesenius defends the common rendering, balsam. It was the gum of a tree or shrub growing in Gilead, and very precious. It was one of the best fruits of Palestine (Gen. xliii, 11), exported (Gen. xxxvii, 25; Ezek. xxvii, 17), and especially used for healing wounds (Jer. viii, 22; xlv, 11; li, 8). The balsam was almost peculiar to Palestine (Strab. xvi, 2, p. 763; Tac. Hist. v, 6; Plin. xii, 25, § 54; 32, § 59), distilling from a shrub like the vine and rue, which in the time of Josephus was cultivated in the neighborhood of Jericho and of the Dead Sea (Ant. xiv, 4, 1; xv, 4, 2), and still grows in gardens near Tiberias (Burekhardt, Nipon, p. 323). In Ezek. xxvii, 17, the Auth. Vers. gives in the margin rosin. The fact that the tsori grew originally in Gilead does not forbid us to identify it with the shrub mentioned by Josephus as cultivated near Jericho. The name balsam is no doubt derived from the Arabic balasam, which is probably also the origin of the βάλσαμον of the Greeks. Forskål informs us that the balsam-tree of Mecca is there called absham, i. e. "very odorous." The word busham, given by him, is the name of a fragrant shrub growing near Mecca, with the branches and tufts of which they clean the teeth, and is supposed to refer to the same plant. These names are very similar to words which occur in the Hebrew text of several passages of Scripture, as in the Song of Solomon, v, 1, "I have gathered my myrrh with my spice" (balsam); ver. 13, "His cheeks are as a bed of spices" (balsam); and in vi, 2, "gone down into his garden to the beds of spices" (balsam). The same word is used in Exod. xxxv, 28, and in 1 Kings x, 10, "There came no more such great abundance of spices (balsam) as those which the Queen of Sheba gave to King Solomon." In all these passages balsam or bal'sam (בַּלְשָׁמִים and בַּלְשָׁמִים), though translated "spices," would seem to indicate the balsam-tree, if we may infer identity of plant or substance from similarity in the Hebrew and Arabic names. But the word may indicate only a fragrant aromatic substance in general. The passages in the Song of Solomon may with propriety be understood as referring to a plant cultivated in Judea, but not to spices in the general sense of that term. Queen Sheba might have brought balsam or balsam-trees, as well as spices, for both are the produce of southern latitudes, though far removed from each other. (On the balsams of modern commerce, see the Penny Cyclopædia, s. v. Balsamineæ et sq.) See BAL-SAM.

Balmes, JAIME, a Spanish theologian, was born Aug. 28, 1810, at Vich in Catalonia, and died there

July 9, 1848. He was for some time teacher of mathematics at Vich, was exiled under the regency of Espartero, and founded in 1844, at Madrid, a political weekly, El Pensamiento de la Nación, as an organ of the Conservative or Catholic party. In 1847 a pamphlet in favor of the political reforms of Pius IX. (Pio IX., Madrid and Paris, 1847) brought him into conflict with his party. His principal works are a comparison of the relation of Protestantism and Roman Catholicism to European civilization (El Protestantismo comparado con el Catholicismo en sus relaciones con la civilizacion Europea, 3 vols. 8vo, Madrid, 1848; Engl. transl., London, 1849, 8vo); a Filosofia fundamental (Barcelona, 1846, 4 vols.; translated into French, 3 vols. 1852; into English, by H. F. Brownson, 2 vols. New York, 1857); and a Curso de Filosofia Elemental (Madrid, 1837). Balsam (Gr. βάλσαμον, i. e. epibalsamum, Arab. balasam), the fragrant resin of the balsam-tree, possessing medicinal properties; according to Pliny (xii, 54), indigenous only to Judea, but known to Diodorus Sic. (iii, 46) as a product of Arabia also. In Palestine, praised by other writers also for its balsam (Justin, xxxvi, 3; Tacit. Hist. v, 6; Plutarch, Vita Anton. c. xxxvi; Florus, iii, 5, 29; Dioscor. i, 18), this plant was cultivated in the environs of Jericho (Strabo, xvi, 763; Diod. Sic. ii, 48; xix, 98), in gardens set apart for this use (Plin. xii, 54; see Joseph. Ant. xiv, 4, 1; xv, 4, 2; War. i, 6, 6); and after the destruction of the state of Judea, these plantations formed a lucrative source of the Roman imperial revenue (see Diod. Sic. ii, 48). Pliny distinguishes three different species of this plant: the first with thin, capillaceous leaves; the second a crooked scabrous shrub; and the third with smooth rind and of taller growth than the two former. He tells us that, in general, the balsam plant, a shrub, has the nearest resemblance to the grapevine, and its mode of cultivation is almost the same. The leaves, however, more closely resemble those of the rue, and the plant is an evergreen. Its height does not exceed two cubits. From slight incisions made very cautiously into the rind (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 4, 1; War. i, 6, 6) the balsam trickles in thin drops, which are collected with wool into a horn, and then preserved in new earthen jars. At first it is whitish and pellucid, but afterward it becomes harder and reddish. That is considered to be the best quality which trickles before the appearance of the fruit. Much inferior to this is the resin pressed from the seeds, the rind, and even from the stems (see Theophrast. Plant. ix, 6; Strabo, xvi, 763; Pausan. ix, 28, 2). This description, which is not sufficiently characteristic of the plant itself, suits for the most part the Egyptian balsam-shrub found by Belon (Paulus, Samm. iv, 188 sq.) in a garden near Cairo (the plant, however, is not indigenous to Egypt, but the layers are brought there from Arabia Felix; Prosp. Alpin. De balsamo, iii; Plant. .Eg. xiv, 30, with the plate; Abdullatif, Memoirs, p. 58). Forskal found between Mecca and Medina a shrub, absham (Niebuhr, Reis. i, 351), which he considered to be the genuine balsam-plant, and he gave its botanical description under the name Amryris opobalsanum, in his Flora Egypt. Arab. p. 79 sq., together with two other varieties, Amryris kataf and Amryris kafal. There are two species distinguished in the Linnean system, the Amryris Gileadensis (Forsk. "A. opobals.") and A. opobals. (the species described by Belon and Alpin); see Linne's Veget. Pflanzensyst. i, 473 sq., plates; Plenck, Plant. Med. pl. 155; Berlin. Jahrb. d. Pharm. 1795, pl. 1; Ainslie, Mater. Indica, i, 26 sq. More recent naturalists have included the species Amryris Gilead. in the genus Protium; see Wight and Walker (Arnott), Prodrum. flore p-ninsule Indis Orient. (London, 1834), i, 177; Lindley, Flora Medica (London, 1838, 8vo), p. 169. This tree, from which the Mecca balsam is gained in very small quantity (Plin. xii, 51, "succus e plaga manat . . . sed tenui gutta plorata"), which never reaches us unadulterated, grows only in a single district of Yemen; of late, however, it was discovered in the East Indies also. See generally Prosp. Alpin. Dial. de balsamo (Venet. 1591; as also, in several editions of his work De Plant. .Eg. p. 1592; and in Ugelin, Thesaur. xi, with plates); Ve-ling, Opobalsami veterib. cogniti rind rar. p. 217 sq.; Bochart, Hierez. i, 628 sq.; Michaelis, Suppl. 2142 sq.; Le Moyné, Diss. Botanik. II, ii, 681 sq.; Martius, Pharmakogn. p. 343 sq.; Sprengel, in Dioscor. ii, 355 sq.—Winer.

Our only reason for mentioning all this is of course the presupposition that the Palestinian balsam is named in the Bible also, and indeed, the bosom (בֹּשֶׂם, Cant. v, 13), also balsam (בַּשְׂמָן, v, 1; comp. Arab. bashama), which in both passages appear to be names of garden-plants, must be taken for the balsam-shrub (the ancient translators consider the word as a name). It is more difficult to determine whether the resin of the balsam-tree is mentioned also in the Books of the O. T. The tseri or tsori (צֶרֶי or צֹרִי) is commonly taken for such. This name is given to a precious resin found in Gilead (Gen. xxxvii, 25; Jer. xlvi, 11), and circulated as an article of merchandise by Arab and Phœnician merchants (Gen. xxxvii, 25; Ezek. xxvii, 17). It was one of the principal products of Palestine which was thought to be worthy to be offered as a gift even to Egyptian princes (Gen. xliii, 11), and was considered a powerful salve (Jer. viii, 22; xlv, 11; li, 8). Hebrew commentators understand, in fact, balsam by tseri. The ancient translators render it mostly by gum. Others, however (Oedmann, Samm. iii, 110 sq.; Rosenmüller, Alterth. IV, i, 168 sq.), take it to be the oil of the Myrobalanus of the ancients (Plin. xii, 46 sq.) or the Elaeagnus angustifolia of Linnaeus. The fruit of this plant resembles the olive, and is of the size of a walnut. It contains a fat, oily kernel, from which the Arabs press an oil highly esteemed for its medicinal properties, especially for open wounds (Maunderell, in Paulus, Samm. I, 116; Mariti, Trav. p. 415; Troilo, Trav. p. 107). That this tree grows in Palestine, especially in the environs of Jericho, we are told not only by modern travellers (Hasselquist, Voyages, p. 150; Arvieux, ii, 155; Pococke, East. ii, 47 sq.; Volney, Voyages, ii, 240; Robinson, ii, 291), but even by Josephus (War. iv, 8, 3). We must admit, however, that the Hebrew name tseri seems to imply rather a resin trickling from some plant than a pressed oil, and that the arguments of Rosenmüller in favor of his statement, that the Mecca balsam is a mere perfume and not a medicine, have not much weight (see Gesenius, Thes. iii, 1185). Our physicians make, indeed, no medicinal use of it; but we can never obtain the genuine Mecca balsam. The ancients certainly ascribed medicinal powers to the balsam (see Dioscor. ut sup.), and it is considered even at present as a medicine of well-attested quality, especially if applied externally (Prosp. Alpin. Rev. Eg. iii, 15, p. 192; Hasselquist, p. 565, "rescivi quod vulnerarium Turcis sit excellentissimum et palmarium, dum in vulnera recens inflicta guttas aliquot infundunt quo continuato brevissimo tempore vulnera maximi momenti persanant"). The tseri, therefore, might have been the balsam, and if so, the shrub, which originally grew in Gilead, may have been transplanted and cultivated as a garden-plant on the plains of Jericho, and preserved only there. We greatly doubt, however, whether the balsam shrub ever grew wild anywhere but in Arabia, and it seems to us more probable that it was brought from Arabia to Palestine, though, perhaps, not by the Queen of Sheba (Josephus, Ant. viii, 6, 6). Besides the tseri (צֶרֶי), another word, nataph (נַטַּפָּה), mentioned in Exod. xxx, 34, as an ingredient of the holy incense, is taken by Hebrew commentators for opobalsamum; this, however, is perhaps rather STACTE (q. v.). See MASTICK; AROMATICS.

Balsamon, THEODORE, an eminent canonist of the Greek Church, was born at Constantinople in the twelfth century; was made chancellor and librarian of the church of St. Sophia, and about 1186 became patriarch of Antioch, without, however, being able to go there to discharge the functions of the office, since the city was occupied by the Latins, who had intruded a bishop of their own. He died about 1200. His first work (which he undertook at the wish of the Emperor Manuel Comnenus and the patriarch Michael Anchiolus) was Photii Nomocanon Canonum SS. Apostolorum, etc. (with a Commentary on the Canons of the Apostles and the general and particular Councils, and on the Canonical Epistles of the Fathers), printed at Paris, 1615, fol.; also a Commentary on the Synagma of Photius, given in Beveridge, Synodicon, sive Pandectæ Canonum (Oxon. 1672-82, 2 vols. fol.). For an account of Balsamon and his works, see Beveridge's Synodicon, Prolegomena to vol. i.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1180; Hoefler, Biog. Générale, iv, 311.

Balthasar (Ba'ráraa), a Grecized form (Baruch i, 11, 12) of the name of the Babylonian king BEL-SHAZZAR (q. v.).

Balthasar, the name given in the Romish legends, without any foundation, to one of the magi who came to adore our Lord Jesus Christ. See MAGI.

Baltus, JOHN FRANCIS, a Jesuit, born at Metz, June 8th, 1667. He became a Jesuit in 1682, and in 1717 was called to Rome to examine the books written by the members of his company. Returning to France, he was, in succession, rector of several colleges of his order, and died at Rheims, librarian of the college, March 19th, 1743. He wrote, Réponse à l'Histoire des Oracles de M. Fontenelle (Strasb. 1707 and 1709, 8vo).—Défense des Saints Peres accusés de Platonisme (Paris, 1711, 4to); new ed. under the title Parité du Chrétiensme (Paris, 2 vols, 8vo, 1838).—Défense de s'Prophéties de la Religion Chrétienne (1737, 3 vols. 12mo), with other works.—Biog. Universelle.

Baluzé, STEPHEN, an eminent canonist and historian, was born at Tulle, in Limousin, December 24th, 1630. He studied first among the Jesuits at Tulle, and in 1646 was sent to the college of the company at Toulouse, where he remained for eight years. He soon acquired a high reputation in ecclesiastical history and the canon law. Not wishing to serve as a priest, but desirous of opportunity to pursue his studies quietly, he received the tonsure, and put himself under the patronage of Peter de Marca, who brought him to Paris in 1656, and made him the associate of his labors. Upon the death of De Marca in 1662, the chancellor of France, Le Tellier, took Baluze under his protection; but in 1667 he attached himself to Colbert, who made him his librarian, and it was by his care that the library of that eminent man acquired its richest treasures, and attained to such great celebrity among the learned. He left the family of Colbert in 1670, and afterward Louis XIV. made him director of the royal college, with a pension. This situation he held until his eightieth year, when he was banished for having published the "Genealogical History of the House of Auvergne," in 2 vols. fol. (1705), by order of the Cardinal de Bouillon, who had fallen into disgrace at court. He obtained a recall in 1713, after the peace of Utrecht, without, however, recovering his appointments, and died July 28th, 1718. His library, when it was sold after his death, contained 1500 MSS., which were purchased for the Bibliothèque Royale. Baluze left as many as forty-five published works, of which the most important are—Regnum Francorum Capitularia (1677, 2 vols. fol.; also, edited by Chiniac in 1780, 2 vols. fol. a superb edition);—Epistole Innocentii Papae III (1682, 2 vols. fol. This collection is incomplete, owing to the unwillingness of the Romans at the time to give him free access to the pieces in the Vatican library. Brequigny and De la Porte du Theil, in their Diplomata, Charta, etc., 1791, have given the letters which Baluze could not obtain);—Conciliorum Nova Collectio (1683, vol. i. fol. This work was intended to embrace all the known councils which Labbe has omitted in his collection, and would have filled many volumes; but Baluze abandoned his first design, and limited himself to one volume);—Vite Populorum Ardiensium ("Vies des Papes d'Avignon," 1693, 2 vols. 4to, an admirable refutation of the ultramontane pretensions. He maintains that the holy see is not necessarily fixed at Rome);—Miscellanea (7 vols. 8vo. A new edition, considerably enlarged and improved, was published by Muzi at Lucca in 1761, in 4 vols. fol.). A complete list of his works may be found at p. 66 of the Capitularia. See Dupin, Ecol. Writers, 17th cent.; Vie de Baluze, written by himself, and continued by Martin.

Ba'mah (Heb. Bamah, בָּמָה, a height; Sept. Bamah), an eminence or high-place, where the Jews worshipped their idols, occurs as a proper name, Ezek. xx. 29. In other passages it is usually translated "high place;" and in Ezek. xxxvi. 2, such spots are termed "ancient high places," or "ancient heights." See BAMOTH. On such high places the Hebrews made oblations to idols, and also to the Lord himself, before the idea obtained that unity of place for the divine worship was indispensable. The Jewish historians, therefore, for the most part, describe this as an unlawful worship, in consequence of its being so generally associated with idolatrous rites. See HIGH-PLACE. The above passage in Ezekiel is very obscure, and full of the pronounasia so dear to the Hebrew poets, so difficult for us to appreciate: "What is the high place (בָּמָה) whereunto ye lie (בְּרִמְתְּכֶם)? and the name of it is called Bamah (בָּמָה) unto this day." Ewald (Prophecy, p. 286) pronounces this verse to be an extract from an older prophet than Ezekiel. The name here, however, seems to refer, not to a particular spot, but to any such locality individualized by the term (see Henderson, Comment., in loc.).

Bambas, ΝΕΟΦΥΤΟΣ, an archimandrite of the Greek Church, and one of the principal prose writers of modern Greece, was born upon the island of Chios, and died at Athens in Feb. 1855. He studied at the College of Chios and at the University of Paris, reorganized, after his return from Paris, the College of Chios, and remained its president until the war of independence in 1821. In 1824 he became Professor of Philosophy at the University of Corfu, afterward director of the college at Syra, and, at last, Professor of Philosophy and Rhetoric at the University of Athens. On account of his extensive learning, the British and Foreign Bible Society confided to him the task of translating, in union with Rev. Mr. Lowndes, and Mr. Nicolaides of Philadelphia in Asia Minor, the Bible into modern Greek. During the latter years of his life, Mr. Bambas attached himself, however, to the Russian or Neapetan party, which is hostile to the reformation of the Church. He wrote a manual of sacred eloquence (Εγχειρίδιον τῆς τοῦ ἱεροῦ ἀμβροσίου ῥητορικῆς, Athens, 1851), a manual of ethics (Εγχειρίδιον τῆς ἠθικῆς, Athens, 1853), and other works on philosophy, ethics, and rhetoric, and several Greek grammars. See Baird, Molera Greece, p. 60, 330 (N. Y. 1856).

Bambino, the name of the swaddled figure of the infant Saviour, which, surrounded by a halo, and watched over by angels, occasionally forms the subject of altar-pieces in Roman Catholic churches. The Santissimo Bambino in the church of the Ara Cœli at Rome is held in great veneration for its supposed miraculous power of curing the sick. It is carved in wood, painted, and richly decorated with jewels and precious stones. The carving is attributed to a Franciscan pilgrim, out of a tree that grew on Mount Olivet, and the painting to the evangelist Luke. The festival of the Bambino, which occurs at the Epiphany, is attended by great numbers of country people, and the Bambino is said to draw more in the shape of fees than from the most successful medical practitioner in Rome.—Chambers's Encyclopaedia, s. v.

Bambridge. See BAINBRIDGE.

Ba'môth (Heb. Bamoth, בָּמוֹת, heights; Sept. Bamôth), the forty-seventh station of the Israelites, on the borders of Moab (Num. xxi. 19, 20); according to Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Βαβώθ, Bamoth), a city near the river Arnon. As it was the next encampment before reaching Pisgah (usually identified with Jebel Attarus [see NEBO]), it may not improbably be identified with Jebel-Hamch, immediately east, a position which seems to agree with the circumstances of all the notices. Kruse, however (in Seetzen's Reise, iv. 225), thinks it the place now called Wahh, on the wady of the same name. It is probably the same place elsewhere called BAMOTH-BAAI (Josh. xiii. 17).

Ba'môth-ba'al (Heb. Bamoth'-Ba'al, בָּמוֹת בְּאֵל, heights of Baal; Sept. Bamôth Bâal v. r. Bamoth Bâal, and at στέλαι τοῦ Βάαλ), or, as the margin of our version reads, "the high places of Baal" [see BAAI], a place given to the tribe of Reuben, and situated on the river Arnon, or in the plain through which that stream flows, east of the Jordan (Josh. xiii. 17; comp. Num. xxi. 28; xxii. 41; not Jer. xxxii. 35). It is probably the same place elsewhere (Num. xxi. 19) called simply BAMOTH (q. v.). Knobel (Comment. in loc.) identifies it with the modern Jebel Attarus, a site marked by stone-heaps observed both by Seetzen (ii. 312) and Berekhardt (Syria, p. 370); but this is rather the summit of Nebo.

Bampton Lectures, a course of eight sermons preached annually at the University of Oxford, under the will of the Rev. John Bampton, canon of Salisbury, who died in 1751. According to the directions in his will, they are to be preached upon any of the following subjects: To confirm and establish the Christian faith, and to confute all heretics and schismatics; upon the divine authority of the holy Scriptures; upon the authority of the writings of the primitive fathers as to the faith and practice of the primitive Church; upon the divinity of our LORD and SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST; upon the divinity of the HOLY GHOST; upon the articles of the Christian faith, as comprehended in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds. For the support of this lecture he bequeathed his lands and estates. The lecturer must have taken the degree of master of arts in Oxford or Cambridge, and must never preach the sermons twice. When the lectures were commenced in 1780, the income of the estate was £120 per annum. A list of the Bampton Lectures, as far as published in 1854, is given by Darling, Cyclopædia Bibliographica, i. 165. More than seventy volumes (8vo) of the Bampton lectures are now before the public, and one is added annually. The most remarkable are the following: Those delivered in 1784, on Christianity and Mohammedanism, by Dr. White, who was accused of having obtained assistance in their composition from Dr. Parr and Dr. Badcock; those by Dr. Tatham in 1790, on the Logic of Theology; those of Dr. Nott in 1802, on Religious Enthusiasm—this series was directed against Wesley and Whitefield; those of Dr. Mant in 1812; those of Reginald Heber in 1815; Whately in 1822; Milman in 1827; Burton in 1829, on the Heresies of the Apostolic Age; Soames in 1830, on the Doctrines of the Anglo-Saxon Church. But of the whole series, none have caused greater controversy than those by Dr. Hampden in 1832, on The Scholastic Philosophy considered in its Relation to Christian Theology. They were attacked on all sides, but especially by the leaders of the Oxford Tract Association. When Hampden was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity in 1836, a petition against his appointment was sent up to the throne, and upon this being rejected, a censure was passed upon him in convocation by a large majority, declaring his teaching to be unsound, and releasing undergraduates from attendance at his lectures. In spite of this clerical persecution, he was raised to the see of Hereford in 1847. A recent course of Bampton Lectures, delivered by Mansel in 1858, on The Limits of Religious Thought, has caused a less bitter, but scarcely less interesting controversy. The main position which he takes up is, "That the human mind inevitably, and by virtue of its essential constitution, finds itself involved in self-contradictions whenever it ventures on certain courses of speculation," i. e. on speculations concerning the infinite nature of God. He maintains that all attempts to construct an objective or metaphysical theology must necessarily fail, and that the attainment of a philosophy of the infinite is utterly impossible, under the existing laws of human thought—the practical aim of the whole course being to show the "right use of reason in religious questions." Mr. Mansel has been accused by his critics of condemning all dogmatic theology (e. g. all creeds and articles), and of making revelation itself impossible. The Bampton Lectures for 1859 were delivered by Geo. Rawlinson, the subject being The Historical Evidences of the Truth of the Scripture Records, stated anew, with Special Reference to the Doubts and Discoveries of Modern Times. The volume for 1862 was Farrar's Critical History of Free Thought (N. Y. 1863, 12mo).—Chambers, Encyclopedia, s. v.; Methodist Quarterly, 1863, p. 687.

Ban (banuus, banuum), in ancient jurisprudence, a declaration, especially a declaration of outlawry; in ecclesiastical law, a declaration of excommunication (q. v.). According to the canon law of the Roman Church the authority to decree the ban lies in the pope for the whole church, in the bishop for his diocese, in the apostolic legate for his legation, and in the prior of an order for his subordinates. Priests had formerly an independent right of excommunication, but can now exercise that right only by authority of the bishop. The ban covers all Christians, whether heretics or not, under the jurisdiction of the administrator (Conc. Trident. Sess. xxv, cap. 3). See EXCOMMUNICATION.

For Banns of Marriage, see BANNS.

Ban (רֹב בָּנִים v. r. Ban'ân; Vulg. Tabal), given as the name of one of the priestly families that had lost their pedigree after the exile in a very corrupt passage (1 Esdr. v, 37); it doubtless stands for TOBIAM (q. v.), i. e. תּוֹבִיָּא בְּנֵי־בְנֵי־בְנֵי־בְנֵי, in the parallel lists of Ezra (ii, 60) and Nehemiah (vii, 62).

Bana'as (Bana'iac), the last named of the "sons of Ethna" among the Israelites who had taken foreign wives after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 35); evidently the BENSAIAH (q. v.) of the genuine list (Ezra, x, 43).

Bancroft, Aaron, D. D., was born at Reading, Penn., 1755, and graduated at Harvard College. In 1785 he became pastor of the Congregational Church of Worcester, Mass., where he remained until his death. He was educated a Calvinist, but became an Arian in middle life. In 1808 he published a Life of Washington, which was well received, and has been often reprinted (last ed. N. Y., 2 vols. 12mo). In 1822 he published a volume of Sermons.—Allibone; New Am. Encycl.

Bancroft, Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Farnworth in 1544, and entered at Christ's College, Cambridge. In 1584 he was made rector of St. Andrew's in Holborn. When chaplain to Archbishop Whitgift, he delivered a sermon at St. Paul's Cross, in which he strongly warned the Parliament against the Puritans. In 1597 he was made bishop of London through the influence of the archbishop, and was sent by Queen Elizabeth in 1600 to Emblen, to put an end to the differences which existed between the English and Danes, but his mission was unsuccessful. He attended the Hampton Court Conference in 1603-4, and in March in that year was appointed by the king's writ president of convocation, the see of Canterbury being vacant. In the eleventh session, held May 24, he presented the Book of Canons now in force, which he had selected out of the articles, injunctions, and synodical acts passed in the two previous reigns. After this he was promoted to the see of Canterbury, and his primacy is distinguished for the commencement of the now authorized version of the Scriptures. He was a strenuous High-Churchman, and a bitter opponent of the Puritans. He was the first Anglican divine who publicly maintained the divine right of bishops. This was in a sermon preached at St. Paul's Cross, February, 1588-9, in which he maintained that "bishops were, as an order, superior to priests and deacons; that they governed by divine appointment; and that to deny those truths was to deny a portion of the Christian faith." On the effect produced by this sermon, see Heylin, Aerius Reliquicus, p. 284. He died at Lambeth in 1610, leaving his books to his church. His principal published works were, Discovery of the Untruths and Slanders against Reformation (sermon preached February, 1588);—Survey of the pretended Holy Discipline (Lond. 1593, 4to);—Dangerous Positions and Proceedings published under the Pretence of Reformation, for the Presbyterian Discipline (Lond. 1595, 8vo). See Biog. Brit. vol. i.; Neal, Hist. of Puritans, i. 449; Lathbury, Hist. of Convocation (Lond. 1842, 8vo); Hoak, Eccles. Biography, i. 506.

Band, the representative of several Heb. and Gr. words, and in the N. T. especially of ἀράκη, a conour (q. v.).

Band, a part of clerical dress, said to be a relic of the ancient amice (q. v.). It belongs to the full dress of the bar and university in England. "In Scotland it distinguishes ordained ministers from licentiates or probationers, and is said to be a remnant of the old cravat worn universally by the clergy a hundred years ago."—(Eadie.) It is worn in the Church of England, in the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, and by the Protestant ministers of the Continental churches of Europe generally. See CLERGY, Dress of the.

Band (SOCIETIES). See BANDS.

Bandinel, James, D.D., was educated at Jesus College, Oxford; became M.A. in 1758, D.D. in 1777, and died at Winchester in 1804. He was rector of Netherly, Dorsetshire, for many years. He published Eight Sermons on the peculiar Doctrines of Christianity, being the Bampton Lectures for 1780 (Oxford, 1780, 8vo), which are marked by ingenuity and critical talent.

Bands, small societies instituted by Wesley to promote personal holiness and good works among the early Methodists. The first "rules of the band societies," drawn up December 25, 1738, may be found in Emory, History of the Methodist Discipline, p. 200. These societies were more select than class-meetings (q. v.), and admitted only persons of the same sex, all married or all single, who were put in charge of a "band-leader." They have nearly gone out of use in America, the article relating to them in the Discipline having been struck out by the General Conference of 1856. They still may be found in England, though not very numerous. See Emory, History of the Discipline, p. 200 sq.; Grindrod, Compendium of Lives of Methodists, 174 sq.; Porter, Compendium of Methodism, 50, 400; Stevens, History of Methodism, i, 122; ii, 455; Wesley, Works, v, 183.

Bangius or Bang, Peter, a Swedish theologian, was born at Helsingfors in 1633, was made professor of theology in the University of Abo, and bishop of Wilborg. He died in 1696, having published a Commentarius in Hebraeos, and a Historia Ecclesiastica.

Bangor (Bangertium), an episcopal see in Wales, in Caernarvonshire. The foundation of this see is altogether involved in obscurity. The cathedral is dedicated to St. Daniel, its first bishop, and the chapter consists of a dean, treasurer, precentor, two archdeacons, five canons, and two minor canons. The diocese comprises Anglesea, and parts of Caernarvonshire, Denbigh, Montgomery, and Merionethshire, containing one hundred and seventy parishes, of which thirty-seven are impropriated. The present (1866) incumbent is James Colquhoun Campbell, D.D., consecrated in 1859.

Bangorian Controversy, a title derived from the bishop of Bangor (Hoadley), who, in the reign of George I. wrote "A Preservative against the Principles and Practices of Non-Jurors;" and afterward preached and published a sermon from the passage, "My kingdom is not of this world" (John xviii, 36), in which he maintained the supreme authority of Christ as king in his own kingdom; and that he had not delegated his power, like temporal lawgivers during their absence from their kingdom, to any persons as his viceregents and deputies. The publication of this sermon by order of the king led to the controversy above named, in which Dr. Snape and Dr. Sherlock, the king's chaplains, took a prominent part as the opponents of Hoadley, maintaining that there were certain powers distinctly vested in the church by Christ, its king, of which the ministers of the church were the constitutionally-appointed executive. This controversy lasted many years, and led to the discontinuance of the Convocation. The pamphlets on the subject are very numerous; one of the most important is, William Law, Three Letters to Bishop Hoadley, to be found in Law's Schooler's Armoir, i, 279, and also in Law's Complete Works (London, 1762), vol. i. See ENGLAND, CHURCH OF; HOADLEY.

Bangs, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Stratford, Conn., in 1781, commenced preaching in 1806, entered the itinerant ministry in N. Y. Conference in 1819, became superannuated in 1835, and died in great peace, Feb. 4, 1849. His youth was vain and profane, but from his conversion he was full of holy zeal and love for souls. "He preached holiness to others, and enjoyed its exalted felicity himself," and about three thousand conversions were the fruit of his labors.—Minutes of Conferences, iv, 328.

Bangs, Nathan, D.D., an eminent minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born May 2, 1778, near Bridgeport, Conn. When he was about thirteen, the family removed to Stamford, Delaware Co., N. Y., and here, on the home farm, the boy grew up, receiving the common school education of the time, by which he profited so well that at eighteen he was capable of teaching such a school himself. In 1799 he went to Canada, and spent three years there in teaching and in surveying land. In 1800 he was converted, and in 1802 was admitted into the New York Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which then embraced Canada. The next six years he spent in arduous labors in Canada, going from village to village as an itinerant minister, often through virgin forests, guided only by the "marks" of the wood-cutter or the hunter. In 1808 he was returned to the state of New York, being appointed by the bishop to Delaware Circuit. Such had been his rapid rise in influence that his brethren sent him to the General Conference of this year, and so commanding were his subsequent services that he was a delegate in every session after, except that of 1848, down to 1856, when his advanced years justified his release from such responsibilities. In 1810 he was sent to New York City, which was ever after the headquarters of his labors and influence for his denomination. Methodism here was then still in its youthful struggles; it consisted of one circuit, with five preaching-places. The city population was below one hundred thousand. The city and its suburbs now (1865) comprise a million of people, and more than twice as many Methodist preachers as the whole Conference then reported, though it swept over much of Connecticut, Massachusetts, Vermont, and over Eastern New York, up the Hudson into Canada to even Montreal and Quebec! What a history for one life! In 1813 he was appointed presiding elder of the Rhinebeck District; from 1817 to 1820 he was pastor in New York; and in 1820 he was elected "Book Agent," and assumed the charge of the Methodist Book Concern, then a small business, and deeply involved in debt. Under his skillful management (from 1820 to 1828) the concern rapidly recovered from its embarrassments, and its business was immensely extended. In 1826 the "Christian Advocate" was established, and the editorial matter from 1826 to 1828 was chiefly furnished by Dr. Bangs, though he was still discharging the arduous duties of senior book-agent. During the whole period of his agency (1820-1828) he was also editor of the Methodist Magazine. Such an amount of labor would have worn out any man not endowed with great intellectual and bodily vigor—qualities which, in Dr. Bangs, were supplemented by indomitable industry and perseverance. In 1828 he was appointed editor of the Advocate, including, also, the editorial labors of the Magazine. In 1832 the General Conference appointed him editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review, a new form of the Methodist Magazine. His office comprised also the editorial charge of the books of the general catalogue. He had no paid assistance in the labors of the two periodicals, no appropriation being made for contributions; but the variety and vigor of his own articles imparted continued freshness and power to their pages.

His services to the missionary cause were perhaps the most important of all his vast and varied labors. He was one of the founders of the Methodist Missionary Society; he framed its original Constitution; he wrote its first "Circular Address" to the church. During sixteen years prior to the organization of the secretaryship as a special and salaried function, he labored indefatigably and gratuitously for the society as its vice-president, secretary, or treasurer. He wrote in these years all its annual reports. In 1836 he was appointed "Missionary Secretary." He now devoted his entire energies to the Missionary Society, conducting its correspondence, seeking missionaries for it, planning its mission-fields, pleading for it in the pulpits, and representing it in the Conferences until 1841, when he accepted the presidency of the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn. In 1842 he returned to pastoral work in New York, and remained in active service until 1852. The remainder of his life was passed in quiet literary labor, with occasional preaching as his health served. Much of the literary labor of his later years was devoted to the exposition of the doctrine of entire sanctification. In his eightieth year he preached with vigor, and his writings of that period are luminous and powerful. His last sermon was on the certain triumph of the Gospel. He died in great peace May 3, 1862.

Dr. Bangs was a man of vigor and force—a fighter, when need be, to the last. "No man could show a nobler indignation against anything unrighteous or mean; no man could speak more unflinchingly or directly to the very face and teeth of a pretentious, an evasive, or disingenuous disputant, but no man ever had a more genial heart, a more instinctive sympathy with whatever is generous, heroic, or tender. His friendships were as steadfast as adamant. Unlike most old men, he was, to the last, progressive in his views. He sympathized with all well-considered measures for the improvement of his church, but its old honor was dearer to him than life, and woe to the man that dare impeach it in his presence. To him its history was all providential, and the very necessity of changes was the gracious summons of Providence for it to arise and shine still brighter. This hearty, resolute love of his friends and his cause, was one of the strongest, noblest traits of the war-worn old hero. It made him lovable as he was loving. His old age seemed to mellow rather than wither his generous dispositions. He was always deeply devout, but with advanced years he seemed to attain advanced heights of Christian experience and consolation. The Pauline doctrine of sanctification, as defined by Wesley, became his habitual theme of interest and conversation. He delighted to attend social gatherings for prayer on this subject, and during several late years he presided over one of the most frequented assemblies of this kind in New York. He seemed to take increasingly cheerful views of life, and of the prospects of the kingdom of God in the world, as he approached the end of his career. There was no querulousness in his temper, no repining in his conversation, at the changes which were displacing him from public view."

His writings alone would have made him an historical character of his church. His editorial productions in the Advocate, the Magazine, and the Quarterly Review would fill scores of volumes. His Annual Missionary Reports would make no small library of missionary literature. His more substantial publications are more numerous than those of any other American Methodist. As early as 1809 he began his career as an author by a volume against "Christianism," an heretical sect of New England. Three years later the General Conference appointed him chairman of a committee to collect the historical materials of the denomination, and thus began the researches which resulted in his History of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Before the appearance of this, his most important production, he published Errors of Hopkinsianism (1815, 12mo); Predestination examined (1817, 12mo); Reformer Reformed (1818, 12mo); Methodist Episcopacy (1820, 12mo); Life of the Rev. Freeborn Garrettson, one of the best of our biographies, and an essential collection of data for the history of the church. In 1832 appeared his Authentic History of the Missions under the care of the Methodist Episcopal Church, a volume which has aided much the missionary enterprise of the denomination. In 1835 he published Letters to a Young Preach- er, full of excellent counsels on ministerial habits, on books, study, preaching, etc.; and in 1836, The Original Church of Christ (12mo). In 1839 appeared the first volume of his History of the M. E. Church. In three years the remaining three volumes were issued. It was a book for the times, if not for all time. His other publications are an Essay on Emancipation (1848, 8vo); State and Responsibilities of the Methodist Episcopal Church (1850, 12mo); Letters on Sanctification (1851, 12mo); Life of Arminius (1850); and numerous occasional sermons. His scheme of "Emancipation" is substantially that recommended in the message of the President of the United States to Congress, 1862. "Let Congress," he says, "make a proposition to the several slave states that so much per head shall be allowed for every slave that shall be emancipated, leaving it to the state Legislatures respectively to adopt their own measures to effect the object." Thus did this sagacious old man anticipate by several years the best suggestion which our national leaders were able to utter on our greatest national problem before its final solution by the sword. It is elaborated with skillful and intrepid ability, and fortified by decisive proofs from facts and figures. It has been said of his concluding "array of motives to emancipation," that they "are strong enough, one would think, to rouse all but the dead to the importance of the task." See Stevens, Life and Times of Nathan Bangs, D.D. (N. Y. 1863, 12mo); Ladies' Repository, June, 1859; The Methodist, May 10, 1862; Methodist Quarterly, January, 1864, p. 172.

Bangs, Stephen Beekman, a prominent young Methodist preacher, son of the Rev. Heman Bangs, was born in New York in 1823, graduated at the N. Y. University in 1843, and was licensed to preach in the following year, joining the N. Y. Conference. His style of preaching excited strong anticipations of great usefulness, which were, however, disappointed by his early death, March 20, 1846.—Magruder, Memoir of S. B. Bangs (New York, 1853); Minutes of Conferences, iv, 32.

Bangs, William M'Kendree, son of the Rev. Nathan Bangs, D.D., was born in New York, December 15, 1810, and graduated at 19 years of age at the University of Ohio with the highest honors. He was immediately offered a professorship in Augusta College, Ky., which he held for only one year, being impressed with the duty of entering the Christian ministry. In 1831 he entered the N. Y. Conference of the M. E. Church, and continued to labor, except when his feeble health compelled him to desist, till his death in 1852. His logical powers were of the highest order, and his command of language rarely equalled. "Whether conversing familiarly with his friends, discussing some difficult abstract question, or preaching to a congregation, his style was remarkably adapted to the subject and the occasion. His sermons were clear, systematic, easy to be understood, neither encumbered by extraneous matter, nor disfigured by learned pedantry. They were characterized by a beautiful simplicity, and always bore the impress of a great mind." As a controversial writer he excelled greatly; his articles in the Methodist Quarterly Review, especially those of 1836 and 1837, in reply to the "Christian Spectator," and his reviews of Watson's Theological Institutes, are fine specimens of analytical as well as comprehensive thinking.—Minutes of Conferences, v, 211; Sprague, Annals, vii, 773.

Ba'ni (Heb. Bani, בָּנִי, built; Sept. usually Bari, sometimes Bovri or Baroni, etc.), the name of at least five men.

1. A Levite, son of Shamer, and father of Amzi, of the family of Gershon (1 Chron. vi, 46). B. C. long ante 1043.

2. A Gadite, one of David's thirty-seven warriors (2 Sam. xxiii, 36). B. C. 1046.

3. A descendant of Pharez, and father of Imri, one of whose descendants returned from Babylon (1 Chron. ix, 4). B.C. long ante 536.

4. One of the heads of families whose retainers to the number of 642 returned from Babylon with Zerubabel (Ezra ii, 19; x, 29, 34; Neh. x, 14; 1 Esdr. v, 12). He is elsewhere (Neh. vii, 15) called BIXNU (q. v.). See also BASTID. He was himself one of those who divorced their heathen wives (Ezra x, 38). Others consider this last a different person, and identify him with some of those referred to below. B.C. 536-410.

5. A Levite, whose son Rehum repaired a portion of the (bracket) wall of Jerusalem skirting the brow of Mount Zion on the east (Neh. iii, 17). Apparently the same Banī was among those who were conspicuous in all the reforms on the return from Babylon (Neh. viii, 7; ix, 4 twice, 5; x, 13). He had another son named Uzzi, who was appointed overseer of the Levites at Jerusalem; his own father's name was Hashabiah (Neh. xi, 22). B.C. 415-410. See CHENANI.

Ba'nid (Baniq v. r. Bari; Vulg. Banid), the ancestor or family-head of one of the parties (that of Asalimoth, son of Josa, with 160 retainers) that returned from Babylon with Ezra (1 Esd. viii, 36). This represents a name, BANĪ (q. v.), which has apparently escaped from the present Hebrew text (Ezra viii, 10).

Banish (found in the Auth. Vers. only in the forms "banished," Heb. מִדְּבַר, niddak), 2 Sam. xiv, 13, 14, outrast, as elsewhere; and "banishment," Heb. מִדְּבַר, madhukim', "causes of ban," Lam. ii, 14, rather seductions; Chald. מִדְּבַר, sherosh' or sherosh', lit. a rooting out, Ezra vii, 26). This was not a punishment enjoined by the Mosaic law; but after the captivity, both exile and forfeiture of property were introduced among the Jews; and it also existed under the Romans, by whom it was called d'eminutio capitis, because the person banished lost the rights of a citizen, and the city of Rome thereby lost a head. But there was another description of exile termed dispartatio, which was a punishment of greater severity. The party banished forfeited his estate, and, being bound, was put on board ship and transported to some island specified by the emperor, there to be confined in perpetual banishment (see Smith's Diet. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Banishment). In this manner the apostle John was exiled to the little island of Patmos (Rev. i, 9). See EXILE.

Bank. In Luke xix, 23, the Greek word τάπητα, tabē, is rendered "bank" in the modern sense of the term, which, by a similar appropriation, is derived from the same root as bench. In Matt. xxi, 12; Mark xi, 15; and John ii, 15, it is employed literally, and denotes the "table" of the money-changer (q. v.), at which he sat in the market-place, as is still the custom in the East, and also in the outer court of the Temple. In other passages it denotes an ordinary table for food.

The term "bank," מִדְּבַר, solelak', also occurs in 2 Sam. xx, 15; 2 Kings xix, 32; Isa. xxxvii, 33, as the name of the mount raised against a besieged city; it is elsewhere rendered "mount" in the same sense. See MOUNT.

The "bank" or shore of a river or sea is designated by the Heb. term מִדְּבַר, gudal' or gidyal', and מִדְּבַר, sophak', a lip.

Bann. See BANNS.

Banna'ya (Σαββαριαῖος v. r. Baryvaioq, Vulg. Bannas), one of the "sons of Ason" that renounced their Gentile wives after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 33); apparently a corruption for ZABAD (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra x, 33).

Banner, or STANDARD, or ENSIGN, or SIGNAL (q. v. severally). These words are probably used indiscriminately by the sacred writers. Some of the rabbins suppose that the ancient Hebrew tribe-standards were flags bearing figures derived from the comparisons used by Jacob in his final prophetic blessing on his sons. Thus they have Judah represented by a lion, Dan by a serpent, Benjamin by a wolf, etc. (Gen. xlix, 1-28). Sir Thomas Brown, indeed, observes (Vulgar Errors, v, 10), "The eschtheons of the tribes, as determined by these ingenious triflers, do not in every instance correspond with any possible interpretation of Jacob's prophecy, nor with the analogous prophecy of Moses when about to die." However, there may be some truth in the rabbinical notion after all. And as the tribe of Judah was represented by a lion, may not its motto have been, "Who shall rouse him up?" Thus the banner of the royal tribe would be an interesting prediction of the appearance and universal triumph of Christ, who is called "the lion of the tribe of Judah" (Hos. v, 14; Rev. v, 5). The four following Hebrew words signify banner, standard, ensign, flag, or signal:

Ancient Banners—1, 2, Egyptian; 3, 4, Persian; 5, 6, Roman.

1. DUGEL (דֹּגֵל, as being conspicuous), flag, banner, or standard of a larger kind, serving for three tribes together, one of which pertained to each of the four general divisions. The four standards of this name were large, and ornamented with colors in white, purple, crimson, and dark blue. The Jewish rabbins assert (founding their statement on Gen. xlix, 3, 9, 17, 22, which in this case is very doubtful authority) that the first of these standards, that of Judah, bore a lion; the second, or that of Reuben, bore a man; that of Ephraim, which was the third, displayed the figure of a bull; while that of Dan, which was the fourth, exhibited the representation of cherubim. The standards were worked with embroidery (Num. i, 52; ii, 2, 3, 10, 18, 25; Sol. Song ii, 4; vi, 4, 10). See CAMP.

2. OTH (אֹת, a sign), an ensign or flag of a smaller kind. It belonged to each single tribe, and perhaps to the separate classes of families. Most likely it was originally merely a pole or spear, to the end of which a bunch of leaves was fastened, or something similar. Subsequently it may have been a shield suspended on the elevated point of such pole or spear, as was sometimes done among the Greeks and Romans. The Targumists, however, believe that the banners were distinguished by their colors, the color for each tribe being analogous to that of the precious stone for that tribe in the breast-plate of the high-priest; and that the great standard (d'gel) of each of the four camps combined the three colors of the tribes which composed it. They add that the names of the tribes appeared on the standards, together with a particular sentence from the law, and were moreover charged with appropriate representations, as of the lion for Judah, etc. Most modern expositors seem to incline to the opinion that the ensigns were flags distinguished by their colors, or by the name of the tribe to which each belonged (Num. ii, 2, 34). See FLAG.

3. NES (נֶס, from its loftiness), a lofty signal, a standard. This standard was not, like the others, borne from place to place. It appears from Num. xxi, 8, 9, that it was a long pole fixed in the earth; a flag was fastened to its top, which was agitated by the wind, and seen at a great distance. In order to render it visible as far as possible, it was erected on lofty mountains, chiefly on the eruption of an enemy, in order to point out to the people a place of rendezvous. It no sooner made its appearance on such an elevated position than the war-cry was uttered, and the trumpets were blown (Psa. lx, 4; Isa. v, 26; xi, 12; xiii, 2; xviii, 3; xxx, 17; xlix, 22; lxii, 10; Jer. iv, 6, 21; li, 12, 27; Ezek. xxvii, 7; in this last passage it is the standard or flag of a ship, not the sail). See WAR.

4. MASETH (מַסֵּת, from its elevation), a sign, a signal given by fire. Some writers have supposed that this signal was a long pole, on the top of which was a grate not unlike a chafin-dish, made of iron bars, and supplied with fire, the size, height, and shape of which denoted the party or company to whom it belonged (Jer. vi, 1). See BEACON.

There appear to be several allusions in Scripture to the banners, standards, or ensigns of ancient nations; a proper knowledge of them might aid us in understanding more clearly many of the sacred predictions. In Daniel, the various national symbols or standards are probably referred to instead of the names of the nations, as the he-goat with one horn was the symbol of Alexander the Great and the Macedonian people, and the ram with two horns Media and Persia, etc. (Dan. viii, 3-9). See MACERON. The banners and ensigns of the Roman army had idolatrous, and, therefore, abominable images upon them, hence called "the abomination (q. v.) of desolation;" but their principal standard was an eagle. Among the evils threatened to the Hebrews in consequence of their disobedience, Moses predicted one in the following terms: "The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle's flight" (Deut. xxxviii, 49; compare also Jer. iv, 15). In Matt. xxiv, 28; Luke xvii, 37, the Jewish nation, on account of its iniquity, is compared to a dead body, exposed in the open field, and inviting the Roman army, whose standard often bore the figure of an eagle, to come together and devour it. See EAGLE.

It was customary to give a defeated party a banner as a token of protection, and it was regarded as the surest pledge of fidelity. God's lifting or setting up a banner is a most expressive figure, and imports his peculiar presence, protection, and aid in leading and directing his people in the execution of his righteous will, and giving them comfort and peace in his service (Psa. xx, 5; lx, 4; Sol. Song ii, 4; see the dissent, on the latter passage by Löwe, in Eichhorn's Bibl. ii, 184 sq.). See STANDARD-BEARER.

Banns of MATRIMONY (bannum nuptiale), a phrase that has been for many ages used to signify the public announcement in church of the intention of two parties to become united in matrimony. Ignatius, in his Ep. to Polycarp, cap. 5, says that it becomes those who marry to do so with the consent or direction of the bishop. And Tertullian (ad Uerorem, lib. ii, cap. 2 and 9; De Pudicitia, cap. 4) implies that the Church, in the primitive ages, was forewarned of marriages. The earliest existing canonical enactment on the subject in the English Church is that in the 11th canon of the synod of Westminster, A.D. 1200, which enacts that "no marriage shall be contracted without banns thrice published in the church." It is supposed by some that the practice was introduced into France as early as the ninth century; and it is certain that Odo, bishop of Paris, ordered it in 1176. The council of Lateran, in 1215, prescribed it to the whole Latin Church; and the 62d canon of the synod of London, 1603-4, forbids the celebration of marriage "except the banns of matrimony have been first published three several Sundays or holy-days in the time of divine service in the parish churches or chapels where the parties dwell," on pain of suspension for three years. Marriage without the publication of banns is valid in England, but the parties so married offend against the spirit of the laws. The principal motives which led to the order for the publication of banns were to prevent clandestine marriages, and to discover whether or no the parties have any lawful hinderance. The Church of England enacts that the banns shall be published in church immediately before the sentences for the offertory. If the parties dwell in different parishes, then banns must be published in both. In the Roman Church the banns are ordered to be published at the parochial mass, at sermon-time, upon some three Sundays or festivals of observance. With regard to dispensations of banns, the council of Lateran speaks of nothing of the kind. The council of Trent (De Reform. sess. xxiv, cap. 1) permits them in certain cases. Such dispensations have been granted by bishops in England ever since Archbishop Meopham's time at least, who died in 1333, which power of dispensing was continued to them by the statute law, viz. the Act xxv Hen. VIII, cap. 21, by which all bishops are allowed to dispense as they were wont to do. Before publishing the banns it was the custom for the curate anciently to affiance the two persons to be married in the name of the Blessed Trinity; and the banns were sometimes published at vespers, as well as during the time of mass. See Bingham, Or. Eccl. lib. xxii, cap. ii, § 2; Martene, De Ant. Rit. lib. ii, cap. ix, art. v, p. 135, 136; Landon, s. v.

Ban'us (Bavvôic), one of the "sons of Maani" who renounced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (1 Esdr. ix, 34); apparently either the BANUS or BANNUS (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra x, 38).

Banquet (מִשְׁתֶּחָה, mishk'ch), a feast; and so rendered except on the formal occasions in Esther v, vi, vii; in 1 Pet. iv, 3, πέρας, from the drinking prevalent among the heathen on such occasions). The entertainments spoken of in Scripture, however large and sumptuous, were all provided at the expense of one individual; the ἑσπέραι, pic-nic, of the Greeks, to which every guest present contributed his proportion, being apparently unknown to the Jews, or at least practised only by the humbler classes, as some suppose that an instance of it occurs in the feast given to our Lord, shortly before his Passion, by his friends in Bethany (Matt. xxvi, 2; Mark xiv, 1; comp. with John xii, 2). Festive meetings of this kind were held only toward the close of the day, as it was not till business was over that the Jews freely indulged in the pleasures of the table; and although, in the days of Christ, these meals were, after the Roman fashion, called suppers, they corresponded exactly to the dinners of modern times, the hour fixed for them varying from five to six o'clock P.M., or sometimes later. See MEAL.

On occasions of ceremony the company were invited a considerable time previous; and on the day and at the hour appointed, an express by one or more servants, according to the number and distance of the expected guests, was dispatched to announce that the preparations were completed, and that their presence was looked for immediately (Matt. xxii, 8; Luke xiv, 17). (Grotius, in loc.; also Morier's Journey, p. 75.) This custom obtains in the East at the present day; and the second invitation, which is always verbal, is delivered by the messenger in his master's name, and frequently in the very language of Scripture (Matt. xxii, 4). It is observable, however, that this after-summmons is sent to none but such as have been already invited, and have declared their acceptance; and as, in these circumstances, people are bound by every feeling of honor and propriety to postpone all other engagements to the duty of waiting upon their entertainer, it is manifest that the vehement resentment of the grandee in the parable of the great supper (Luke xiv, 16 sq.), where each of the guests is described as offering to the bearer of the express some frivolous apology for absence, was so far from being harsh and unreasonably, as infidels have characterized it, fully warranted and most natural according to the manners of the age and country. By accepting his invitation they had given a pledge of their presence, the violation of which on such trivial grounds, and especially after the liberal preparations made for their entertainment, could be viewed in no other light than as a gross and deliberate insult.

At the small entrance-door a servant was stationed to receive the tablets or cards of those who were expected; and as curiosity usually collected a crowd of troublesome spectators, anxious to press forward into the scene of gayety, the gate was opened only so far as was necessary for the admission of a single person at a time, who, on presenting his invitation-ticket, was conducted through a long and narrow passage into the receiving-room; and then, after the whole company was assembled, the master of the house shut the door with his own hands—a signal to the servant to allow himself to be prevailed on neither by noise nor by importunities, however loud and long-continued, to admit the by-standers. To this custom there is a manifest reference in Luke xiii, 24, and Matt. xxv, 10 (see Morier's Journey, p. 112).

One of the first marks of courtesy shown to the guests, after saluting the host, was the refreshment of water and fragrant oil or perfumes; and hence we find our Lord complaining of Simon's omission of these customary civilities (Luke vii, 41; see also Mark vii, 4). See ANOINTING. But a far higher, though necessarily less frequent attention paid to their friends by the great was the custom of furnishing each of the company with a magnificent habit of a light and showy color, and richly embroidered, to be worn during the festivity (Eccles. ix, 8; Rev. iii, 4, 5). The loose and flowing style of this gorgeous mantle made it equally suitable for all; and it is almost incredible what a variety of such sumptuous garments the wardrobes of some great men could supply to equip a numerous party. In a large company, even of respectable persons, some might appear in a plainer and humbler garb than accorded with the taste of the voluptuous gentry of our Lord's time, and where this arose from necessity or limited means, it would have been harsh and unreasonable in the extreme to attach blame, or to command his instant and ignominious expulsion from the banquet-room. But where a well-appointed and sumptuous wardrobe was opened for the use of every guest, to refuse the gay and splendid costume which the munificence of the host provided, and to persist in appearing in one's own habiliments, implied a contempt both for the master of the house and his entertainment, which could not fail to provoke resentment; and our Lord therefore spoke in accordance with a well-known custom of his country when, in the parable of the marriage of the king's son, he describes the stern displeasure of the king on discovering one of the guests without a wedding garment, and his instant command to thrust him out (Matt. xxii, 11).

At private banquets the master of the house of course presided, and did the honors of the occasion; but in large and mixed companies it was anciently customary to elect a governor of the feast (John ii, 8; see also Eccles. xxxii, 1), who should not merely perform the office of chairman, ἀρχιπρωτομαχος, in preserving order and decorum, but take upon himself the general management of the festivities. As this office was considered a post of great responsibility and delicacy, as well as honor, the choice, which among the Greeks and Romans was left to the decision of dice, was more wisely made by the Jews to fall upon him who was known to be possessed of the requisite qualities—a ready wit and convivial turn, and at the same time firmness of character and habits of temperance. ANCIENT EGYPTIAN PART OF GUESTS, TO WHOM WINE, OINTMENT, AND GARLANDS ARE BROUGHT.

Fig. 1. A female attendant presenting a cup of wine to a gentleman and lady, 2, 3, seated on chairs with cushions, probably of leather; 4, Another holding a vase of ointment and a garland; 5, Presents a lotus-flower, and 9, a necklace or garland, which she is about to bind round the neck of the guest, 10; 12, A female attendant offering wine to a guest; in her left hand is a lotus-flower, 13, wiping the mouth after drinking. The tables, a, b, f, have cakes of bread, c, r; meat, d, g; gese, n; and oil, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, in baskets, h; flowers, p; and other things prepared for the feast; and beneath them are ARCHITRCLIXES. The guests were scrupulously arranged either by the host or governor, who, in the case of a family, placed them according to seniority (Gen. xlii, 33), and in the case of others, assigned the most honorable (comp. 1 Sam. ix, 22) a place near his own person; or it was done by the party themselves, on their successive arrivals, and after surveying the company, taking up the position which appeared fittest for each. It might be expected that among the Orientals, by whom the laws of etiquette in these matters are strictly observed, many absurd and ludicrous contests for precedence must take place, from the arrogance of some and the determined perseverance of others to wedge themselves into the seat they deem themselves entitled to. Accordingly, Morier informs us "that it is easy to observe, by the countenances of those present, when any one has taken a higher place than he ought." "On one occasion," he adds, "when an assembly was nearly full, the Governor of Kasban, a man of humble mien, came in, and had seated himself at the lowest place, when the host, after having testified his particular attentions to him by numerous expressions of welcome, pointed with his hand to an upper seat, which he desired him to take" (Second Journey). As a counterpart to this, Dr. Clarke states that "at a wedding feast he attended in the house of a rich merchant at St. Jean d'Acre, two persons who had seated themselves at the top were noticed by the master of ceremonies, and obliged to move lower down" (see also Joseph. Ant. xv, 24.) The knowledge of these peculiarities serves to illustrate several passages of Scripture (Prov. xxv, 6, 7; Matt. xxiii, 6; and especially Luke xiv, 7, where we find Jesus making the unseemly ambition of the Pharisees the subject of severe and merited animadversion).

In ancient Egypt, as in Persia, the tables were ranged along the sides of the room, and the guests were placed with their faces toward the walls. Persons of high official station were honored with a table apart for themselves at the head of the room; and in these particulars we trace an exact correspondence to the arrangements of Joseph's entertainment to his brethren. According to Lightfoot (Exercit. on John xiii, 23), the tables of the Jews were either wholly uncovered, or two thirds were spread with a cloth, while the remaining third was left bare for the dishes and vegetables. In the days of our Lord the prevailing form was the triclinium, the mode of reclining at which is described elsewhere. See ACCUBATION. This effeminate practice was not introduced until near the close of the Old Testament history, for among all its writers prior to the age of Amos, שָׁבַט , to sit, is the word invariably used to describe the posture at table (1 Sam. xvi, margin, and Psa. cxxviii, 3, implying that the ancient Israelites sat round a low table, cross-legged, like the Orientals of the present day), whereas ἀνακλινα, signifying a recumbent posture, is the word employed in the Gospels. And whenever the word "sit" occurs in the New Testament, it ought to be translated "lie," or recline, according to the universal practice of that age.

The convenience of spoons, knives, and forks being unknown in the East, or, where known, being a modern innovation, the hand is the only instrument used in conveying food to the mouth; and the common practice, their food being chiefly prepared in a liquid form, is to dip their thin, wafer-like bread in the dish, and, folding it between their thumb and two fingers, enclose a portion of the contents. It is not uncommon to see several hands plunged into one dish at the same time. But where the party is numerous, the two persons near or opposite are commonly joined in one dish; and accordingly, at the last Passover, Judas, being close to his master, was pointed out as the traitor by being designated as the person "dipping his hand with Jesus in the dish." The Apostle John, whose advantageous situation enabled him to hear the minutest parts of the conversation, has recorded the fact of our Lord, in reply to the question, "Who is it?" answering it by "giving a sop to Judas when he had dipped" (John xiii, 27.) It is not the least among the peculiarities of Oriental manners that a host often dips his hand into a dish, and, lifting a handful of what he considers a dainty, offers the ῥοπιον or sop to one of his friends, and to decline it would be a violation of propriety and good manners (see Jowett's Christian Researches). In earlier ages, a double or a more liberal portion, or a choice piece of cookery, was the form in which a landlord showed his respect for the individual he delighted to honor (Gen. xliii, 34; 1 Sam. i, 4; ix, 23; Prov. xxxi, 15; see Voller's Grec. Ant. ii, 287; Forbes, Orient. Mem. iii, 187.)

While the guests reclined in the manner described above, their feet, of course, being stretched out behind, were the most accessible parts of their person, and accordingly the woman with the alabaster box of ointment could pay her grateful and reverential attentions to Jesus without disturbing him in the business of the table. Nor can the presence of this woman, uninvited and unknown even as she was to the master of the house, appear at all an incredible or strange circumstance, when we consider that entertainments are often given in gardens, or in the outer courts, where strangers are freely admitted, and that Simon's table was in all likelihood accessible to the same promiscuous visitors as are found hovering about at the banquets and entering into the houses of the most respectable Orientals of the present day (Forbes, Orient. Mem.). In the course of the entertainment servants are frequently employed in sprinkling the head and person of the guests with odoriferous perfumes, which, probably to counteract the scent of too copious perspiration, they use in great profusion, and the fragrance of which, though generally too strong for Europeans, is deemed an agreeable refreshment (see Psa. xlv, 8; xxiii, 5; cxxxiii, 2).

The various items of which an Oriental entertainment consists, bread, flesh, fish, fowls, melted butter, honey, and fruits, are in many places set on the table at once, in defiance of all taste. They are brought in upon trays—one, containing several dishes, being assigned to a group of two, or at most three persons, and the number and quality of the dishes being regulated according to the rank and consideration of the party seated before it. In ordinary cases four or five dishes constitute the portion allotted to a guest; but if he be a person of consequence, or one to whom the host is desirous of showing more than ordinary marks of attention, other viands are successively brought in, until, if every vacant corner of the tray is occupied, the bowls are piled one above another. The object of this rude but liberal hospitality is, not that the individual thus honored is expected to surfeit himself by an excess of indulgence in order to testify his sense of the entertainer's kindness, but that he may enjoy the means of gratifying his palate with greater variety; and hence we read of Joseph's displaying his partiality for Benjamin by making his "mess five times so much as any of theirs" (Gen. xliii, 24). The shoulder of a lamb, roasted, and plentifully besmeared with butter and milk, is regarded as a great delicacy still (Buckingham's Travels, ii, 136), as it was also in the days of Samuel. But according to the favorite cookery of the Orientals, their animal food is for the most part cut into small pieces, stewed, or prepared in a liquid state, such as seems to have been the "broth" presented by Gideon to the angel (Judg. vi, 19). The made-up dishes are "savory meat," being highly seasoned, and bring to remembrance the marrow and fatness which were esteemed as the most choice morsels in ancient times. As to drink, when particular attention was intended to be shown to a guest, his cup was filled with wine till it ran over (Psa. cxxiii, 5), and it is said that the ancient Persians began their feasts with wine, whence it was called "a banquet of wine" (Esther

v. 6). See Rinck, De apparatus conr'eii regis Persarum (Regiom. 1755); Köhler, Obscervat. (Lips. 1763), p. 1 sq.

The hands, for occasionally both were required, were anciently cleaned by rubbing them with the soft part of the bread, the crumbs of which, being allowed to fall, became the portion of dogs (Matt. xv, 27; Luke xvi, 21). But the most common way now at the conclusion of a feast is for a servant to go round to each guest with water to wash, a service which is performed by the menial pouring a stream over their hands, which is received into a strainer at the bottom of the basin. This humble office Elisha performed to his master (2 Kings iii, 11). See EWERT.

People of rank and opulence in the East frequently give public entertainments to the poor. The rich man in the parable, whose guests disappointed him, dispatched his servants on the instant to invite those that might be found sitting by the hedges and the high-ways—a measure which, in the circumstances, was absolutely necessary, as the heat of the climate would spoil the meats long before they could be consumed by the members of his own household. But many of the great, from benevolence or ostentation, are in the habit of proclaiming set days for giving feasts to the poor; and then, at the time appointed, may be seen crowds of the blind, the halt, and the maimed bending their steps to the scene of entertainment. This species of charity claims a venerable antiquity. Our Lord recommended his wealthy hearers to practice it rather than spend their fortunes, as they did, on luxurious living (Luke xiv, 12); and as such invitations to the poor are of necessity given by public proclamation, and female messengers are employed to publish them (Hasselquist saw ten or twelve thus perambulating a toan in Egypt), it is probably to the same venerable practice that Solomon alludes in Prov. ix, 3.—KITTO, s. v. See FEAST.

Among the Hebrews banquets were not only a means of social enjoyment, but were a part of the observance of religious festivity. At the three solemn festivals, when all the males appeared before the Lord, the family also had its domestic feast, as appears from the place and the share in it to which "the widow, the fatherless, and the stranger" were legally entitled (Deut. xvi, 11). Probably, when the distance allowed and no inconvenience hindered, both males and females went up (e. g. to Shiloh; 1 Sam. i, 9) together to hold the festival. These domestic festivities were doubtless to a great extent retained, after laxity had set in as regards the special observance by the male sex (Neh. viii, 17). Sacrifices, both ordinary and extraordinary, as among heathen nations (Exod. xxxiv, 15; Judg. xvi, 25), included a banquet, and Eli's sons made this latter the prominent part. The two, thus united, marked strongly both domestic and civil life. It may even be said that some sacrificial recognition, if only in pouring the blood solemnly forth as before God, always attended the slaughter of an animal for food. The firstlings of cattle were to be sacrificed and eaten at the sanctuary if not too far from the residence (1 Sam. ix, 13; 2 Sam. vi, 19; Exod. xxii, 29, 30; Lev. xxi, 5, 6; Deut. xii, 17, 20, 21; xv, 19-22). From the sacrificial banquet probably sprang the AGAPÆ; as the Lord's Supper, with which it for a while coalesced, was derived from the Passover. Besides religious celebrations, such events as the weaning a son and heir, a marriage, the separation or reunion of friends, and sheep-hearing, were customarily attended by a banquet or revel (Gen. xxi, 8; xxix, 22; xxxii, 27, 54; 1 Sam. xxv, 2, 36; 2 Sam. xiii, 23). At a funeral, also, refreshment was taken in common by the mourners, and this might tend to become a scene of indulgence, but ordinarily abstemiousness seems on such occasions to have been the rule. The case of Archelaus is not conclusive, but his inclination toward alien usages was doubtless shared by the Herodiazizing Jews (Jer. xvi, 5-7; Ezek. xxiv, 17; Hos. ix, 4; Eccl. vii, 2; Josephus, Itor. ii, 1). Birthday-banquets are only mentioned in the cases of Pharaoh and Herod (Gen. xl, 20; Matt. xiv, 6). A leading topic of prophetic rebuke is the abuse of festivals to an occasion of drunken revelry, and the growth of fashion in favor of drinking-parties. Such was the invitation typically given by Jeremiah to the Rechabites (Jer. xxxv, 5). The usual time of the banquet was the evening, and to begin early was a mark of excess (Isa. v, 11; Eccl. x, 16). The slaughtering of the cattle, which was the preliminary of a banquet, occupied the earlier part of the same day (Prov. ix, 2; Isa. xxii, 13; Matt. xxii, 4). The most essential materials of the banqueting-room, next to the viands and wine, which last was often drugged with spices (Prov. ix, 2; Cant. viii, 2), were garlands or loose flowers, exhibitions of music, singers, and dancers, riddles, jesting and merriment (Isa. xxviii, 1; Wisd. ii, 6; 2 Sam. xix, 35; Isa. xxv, 6; v, 12; Judg. xiv, 12; Neh. viii, 10; Eccl. x, 19; Matt. xxii, 11; Amos vi, 5, 6; Luke xv, 25). Seven days was a not uncommon duration of a festival, especially for a wedding, but sometimes fourteen (Tob. viii, 19; Gen. xxix, 27; Judg. xiv, 12); but if the bride were a widow, three days formed the limit (Buxtorf, De Conr'e. Hebr.). The reminder sent to the guests (Luke xiv, 17) was probably only usual in princely banquets on a large scale, involving protracted preparation. There seems no doubt that the Jews of the O. T. period used a common table for all the guests. In Joseph's entertainment a ceremonial separation prevailed, but there is no reason for supposing a separate table for each, as is distinctly asserted in the Talmud (Tosphot Berach. c. vi) to have been usual. The latter custom certainly was in use among the ancient Greeks and Germans (Helm. Od. xxxiii, xxii, 74; Tac. German. 22), and perhaps among the Egyptians (Wilkinson, ii, 202, engravings). But the common phrase to "sit at table," or "eat at any one's table," shows the originality of the opposite usage. The separation of the woman's banquet was not a Jewish custom (Esth. i, 9). Portions or messes were sent from the entertainer to each guest at table, and a special part was sometimes reserved for a late comer (1 Sam. i, 5; Gen. xliiii, 34; 1 Sam. ix, 23, 24). Portions were similarly sent to poorer friends direct from the banquet-table (Neh. viii, 10; Esth. ix, 19, 22). The kiss on receiving a guest was a point of friendly courtesy (Luke vii, 45). It was strictly enjoined by the rabbins to wash both before and after eating, which they called the "first water" and the "last water" (בְּמַיִם אֲחֵרִים וּבְמַיִם אֲחֵרִים); but washing the feet seems to have been limited to the case of a guest who was also a traveller. See ABUTION.

In religious banquets the wine was mixed, by rabbinical regulation, with three parts of water, and four short forms of benediction were pronounced over it. At the Passover four such cups were mixed, blessed, and passed round by the master of the feast (ἀρχιεπίσκοπος). It is probable that the character of this official varied with that of the entertainment; if it were a religious one, his office would be quasi-priestly; if a revel, he would be the mere symposiarch (συμπόσιάρχης) or arbiter bibendi. (See Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v. Symposium; Comissatio.)—Smith, s. v. See ENTERTAINMENT; EATING; HOSPITALITY, etc.

Banuas (Βάνυας, Vulg. Bumis), a name of a Levite occurring in the lists of those who returned from captivity (1 Esdr. v, 26); this, with the following name, answers to HODAVIAH (q. v.) or Hodevah in the parallel lists of Ezra (ii, 40) and Nehemiah (vii, 43).

Baphomet (Βαφή Μήτρως, baptism of Melis, or of fire, the Gnostic baptism), is the name given to certain symbolic figures, half male and half female, carved in stone, etc., which are said by some to have belonged to the insignia of the Knight Templars. Specimens of them are to be found in the collections of antiquities of Weimar and Vienna. These figures have generally two heads or faces, one of which is bearded; they are surrounded by serpents, and bear various inscriptions and representations of the sun, moon, truncated crosses (otherwise called Egyptian key of life and death), etc. Some have considered them as images of the devil, others as representing Mete (Wisdom), the Gnostic divinity, and others, seeing in them busts of Mohammed, considered them as proofs of the apostasy of the Templars. It seems more probable, however, that they were merely some alchemico-theosophical symbols. See Joseph von Hammer, Faustgruben d. Orientis (6 vols.); Von Nell, Baphometische Actenstücke, etc. (Vienna, 1819); Same, Essay on a Cosmological Interpretation of the Phœnician Worship of the Cabiri, etc.

Baptism, a rite of purification or initiation, in which water is used; one of the sacraments (q. v.) of the Christian Church. The word baptism is simply an Anglicized form of the Greek βαπτισμός, a verbal noun from βαπτίζω (likewise Anglicized "baptize"), and this, again, is a derivative from βάπτω, the predominant signification of which latter is to whelm or "dye," Lat. tingo. Not being a verb implying motion, βαπτίζω is properly followed in Greek by the preposition ἐν, denoting the means or method (with the "instrumental dative"), which has unfortunately, in the Auth. Engl. Vers., often been rendered by the ambiguous particle "in," whereas it really (in this connection) signifies only with or by, or at most merely designates the locality where the act is performed. The derivative verb and noun are sometimes used with reference to ordinary lustration, and occasionally with respect to merely secular acts; also in a figurative sense. In certain cases it is followed by the preposition εἰς, with the meaning "to," "for," or "unto," as pointing out the design of the act, especially in phrases (comp. πιστεύω εἰς) expressive of the covenant or relation of which this rite was the seal. (In Mark i, 9, the εἰς depends upon ἄλζεν preceding; and in Mark xiv, 20, there is a constructio pugnans by which some other verb of motion is to be supplied before the preposition.) On these and other applications of the Greek word, see Robinson's Lex. of the N. T. s. v.; where, however (as in some other Lexicons), the statement that the primary force of the verb is "to dip, immerse," etc., is not sustained by its actual usage and grammatical construction. This would always require εἰς, "into," after it; which occurs in 15 examples only out of the exhaustive list (175) adduced by Dr. Conant (Meaning and Use of Baptiz in, N. Y., 1860); and a closer and more critical examination will show that it is only the context and association of the word that in any case put this signification upon it, and it is therefore a mere gloss or inference to assign this as the proper sense of the term. The significations "plunge," "submerge," etc., are here strictly derived, as cognates, from the more general and primitive one of that complete envelopment with a liquid which a thorough wetting, saturation, or dyeing usually implies. In like manner, Dr. E. Beecher (in a series of articles first published in the Am. Bib. Repos. during 1840 and 1841) has mistaken the allied or inferential signification of purification for the primitive sense of the word, whereas it is only the result expected or attendant in the act of washing. See further below.

As preliminary to the theological discussion of this subject, it will be proper here to discuss, more fully than can be conveniently done elsewhere, the classical and Biblical uses of the word, and some subordinate topics. We here make use chiefly of Kitto's Cyclopædia, s. v.

1. Philological Usage of the Word βαπτίζω.—1. By Classical Writers.—No instance occurs in these writers of the use of βάπτισμα, and only one in a very late author (Antyllus) of the use of its equivalent βαπτισμός; but the verb occurs frequently, especially in the later writers. It is used to designate:

(1.) The washing of an object by dipping it into water, or any other fluid, or quasi-fluid, for any purpose whatever: as βάπτισον σιατόν εἰς θάλασσαν, "bathe yourself by going into the sea" (Plut. Mor. p. 166 A.); βαπτίζω τὸν Διόνυσον πρὸς τὴν θάλατταν (Ibid. p. 914).

(2.) The plunging or sinking of an object: as οὐδὲ γὰρ τοῖς ἀκολύμβοις βαπτίζεσθαι συμβαίνει ἕξιλον τῶσπιν ἐπιπλάζουσαι, where βαπτίζεσθαι, in the sense of "submerged," is contrasted with ἐπιπλάζουσαι, in the sense of "float"; ἐν ἕδρασι γενέσθαι τὴν πορείαν συνέβη, μέγα ὄψελος βαπτισμένον, being in water up to the navel (Strabo, Geogr. xiv, p. 667); μόλις ἕως τῶν μαστῶν ἦ πεσοῖ βαπτισόμενοι εὐξάνον (Polyb. iii). So Pindar says (Pyth. ii, 145), ἀβάπτιστός εἰμι, φελλός ὧς, where the cork of the fisherman is styled unbaptized, in contrast with the net which sinks into the water. From this, by metonymy of cause for effect, is derived the sense to drown, as ἐβάπτισεν εἰς τὸν οἶνον, "I whelmed him in the wine" (Julian Ægypt. Anacrenti).

(3.) The covering over of any object by the flowing or pouring of a fluid on it; and metaphorically (in the passive), the being overwhelmed or oppressed: thus the Pseudo-Aristotle speaks of places full of bulrushes and sea-weeds, which, when the tide is at the ebb, are not baptized (i. e. covered by the water), but at full tide are flooded over (Alirabil. Auscult. § 137, p. 50, in Westerman's edit. of the Script. Rev. Mir. Gr.); Diodorus Siculus (bk. i) speaks of land animals being destroyed by the river overtaking them (καρθηόμενα βαπτίζομενα); Plato and Athenæus describe men in a state of obriety as baptized (Sympos. p. 176 B.; and Deipnos. v.); and the former says the same of a youth overwhelmed with sophistry (Euthyd. 277 D.); Plutarch denounces the forcing of knowledge on children beyond what they can receive as a process by which the soul is baptized (De Lib. educ.); and he speaks of men as baptized by debts (Galbr. c. 21); Diodorus Siculus speaks of baptizing people with tears (bk. i, c. 73); and Libanius says, "He who hardly bears what he now bears, would be baptized by a little addition" (Epist. 310), and "I am one of those baptized by that great wave" (Ep. 25).

(4.) The complete drenching of an object, whether by aspersion or immersion: as ἄσπυς βαπτίζεθ, εἶναι ἐξ

701 ὁ ὄμιος ἔστι, "As a bladder they shall be washed (i. e. by the waves breaking over thee), but thou canst not go down" (Orac. Sylgl. de Athenis, ap. Plutarch, Thes.).

From this it appears that in classical usage βαπτίζω is not fixed to any special mode of applying the baptizing element to the object baptized; all that is implied by the term is, that the former is closely in contact with the latter, or that the latter is wholly in the former.

2. By the Septuagint.—Here the word occurs only four times, viz. 2 Kings v. 14: "And Naaman went down and baptized himself (ἐβαπτίσαστο) seven times in the river Jordan," where the original Hebrew is בָּטַח, from בָּטַח, to dip, plunge, immerse; Isa. xxi. 4, "Iniquity baptizes me" (ἡ ἐνομία με βαπτίζει), where the word is plainly used in the sense of overwhelm, answering to the Heb. בָּטַח, to come upon suddenly, to terrify; Judith xii. 7, "She went out by night . . . and baptized herself (ἐβαπτίσθη) at the fountain;" and Ecclus. xxxi [xxxiv]. 30, "He who is baptized from a corpse" (βαπτίζομενος ἀπὸ νεκροῦ), etc. In these last two instances the word merely denotes washed, without indicating any special mode by which this was done, though in the former the circumstances of the case make it improbable that the act described was that of bothng (comp. Num. xix. 19).

In the Greek, then, of the Sept., βαπτίζω signifies to plunge, to bath, or to overwhelm. It is never used to describe the act of one who dips another object into a fluid, or the case of one who is dipped by another.

3. In the New Testament.—Confining our notice here simply to the philology of the subject, the instances of this usage may be classified thus:

(1) The verb or noun alone, or with the object baptizēd merely: as βαπτισθήτω, Matt. iii. 13, 14; βαπτισθῆτε, Mark xvi. 16; βαπτίζω, Mark i. 4; βαπτισώμεθα, vii. 4; βαπτίζετε, John i. 25; ἐβάπτισα, 1 Cor. i. 14, etc.; βάπτισμα αἵματος, Matt. iii. 7; ἐν βάπτισμα, Eph. iv. 5; βάπτισμα, Col. ii. 12; 1 Pet. iii. 21, etc.; βαπτισμοῦ ποτηρίου, Mark vii. 4, 8; βαπτισμῶν ἐκείνων, Heb. vi. 2; ἐκείνων βαπτισμοῦ, ix. 10.

(2) With addition of the element of baptism: as ἐν ἕρῳ, Mark i. 8, etc.; ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ καὶ ὕδατι, Matt. iii. 11, etc.; ἕρῳ, Luke iii. 16, etc. The force of ἐν in such formulæ has by some been pressed, as if it indicated that the object of baptism was in the element of baptism; and by most the ἐν is regarded as merely the nota dative, so that ἐν ἕρῳ means no more than the simple ἕρῳ, as the ἐν πλοίῳ of Matt. xiv. 13. means no more than the πλοίῳ of Mark vi. 32. (See Matthiæ, sec. 401, obs. 2; Kühner, sec. 585, Ann. 2.) Only in one instance does the accusative appear in the N. T., Mark i. 9, where we have εἰς τὸν Ἰορδάνην, and this can hardly be regarded as a real exception to the ordinary usage of the N. T., because εἰς here is local rather than instrumental. In connection with this may be noticed the phrases καταβαίνειν εἰς τὸ ἕρῳ, and ἀποβαίνειν ἐκ or ἀπὸ τοῦ ἕρῳ. According to some, these decisively prove that the party baptized, as well as the baptizer, went down into the water, and came up out of it. But, on the other hand, it is contended that the phrases do not necessarily imply more than that they went to (i. e. to the margin of) the water and returned thence.

(3) With specification of the end or purpose for which the baptism is effected. This is usually indicated by εἰς: as βαπτίζοντες εἰς τὸ ἕρῳ, Matt. xxviii. 19, and frequently; ἐβαπτισθήτω εἰς ἕρῳ, . . . εἰς τὸν Ἰορδάνην ἁγίου, Rom. vi. 3, 4; εἰς τὸν Μωυσῆν ἐβαπτισθήτω, 1 Cor. x. 3; εἰς ἕρῳ ἐβαπτισθήτω, xii. 13; βαπτισθήτω ἕρῳ, . . . εἰς ἄβυσσον ἁμαρτιῶν, Acts ii. 38, etc. In these cases εἰς retains its proper significance, as indicating the terminus ad quem, and tropically, that for which, or with a view to which the thing is done, modified according as this is a person or a thing. Thus, to be baptized for Moses, means to be baptized with a view to following or being subject to the rule of Moses; to be baptized for Christ means to be baptized with a view to becoming a true follower of Christ; to be baptized for his death means to be baptized with a view to the enjoyment of the benefits of his death; to be baptized for the remission of sins means to be baptized with a view to receiving this; to be baptized for the name of any one means to be baptized with a view to the realization of all that the meaning of this name implies, etc. In one passage Paul uses ἵπτιο to express the end or design of baptism, βαπτίζομενοι ἵπτιο τῶν νεκρῶν, 1 Cor. xv. 29; but here the involved idea of substitution justifies the use of the preposition. Instead of a preposition, the genitive of object is sometimes used, as βάπτισμα μετανοίας, Luke iii. 3, al. = βάπτισμα εἰς μετανοίαν, the baptism which has μετανοία as its end and purpose.

(4) With specification of the ground or basis on which the baptism rests. This is expressed by the use of ἐν in the phrases ἐν ἐνόμῳ τίνος, and once by the use of ἐπι with the dative, Acts ii. 38: "to be baptized on the name of Christ, i. e. so that the baptism is grounded on the confession of his name" (Winer, p. 463). Some regard these formulæ as identical in meaning with those in which εἰς is used with ἕρῳ, but the more exact scholars view them as distinct.

The two last-mentioned usages are peculiar to the N. T., and arise directly from the new significance which its writers attached to baptism as a rite.

II. Non-ritual Baptisms mentioned in the N. T.—These are:

1. The baptism of utensils and articles of furniture, Mark vii. 4, 8.

2. The baptism of persons, Mark vii. 3, 4; Luke xi. 38, etc.

These are the only instances in which the verb or noun is used in a strictly literal sense in the N. T., and there may be some doubt as to whether the last instance should not be remanded to the head of ritual baptisms. These instances are chiefly valuable as bearing on the question of the mode of baptism; they show that no special mode is indicated by the mere use of the word baptize, for the washing of cups, of couches, and of persons is accomplished in a different manner in each case: in the first by dipping, or immersing, or rinsing, or pouring, or simply wiping with a wet cloth; in the second by aspersion and wiping; and in the third by plunging or stepping into the bath.

3. Baptism of affliction, Mark x. 38, 39; Luke xii. 50. In both these passages our Lord refers to his impending sufferings as a baptism which he had to undergo. Chrysostom, and some others of the fathers, understand this objectively, as referring to the purgation which his sufferings were to effect (see the passages in Suicer, Thes. s. v. βάπτισμα, i. 7); but this does not seem to be the idea of the speaker. Our Lord rather means that his sufferings were to come on him as a mighty overwhelming torrent (see Krinold on Matt. x. 22, 23; Blomfield, ibid.). Some interpreters suppose there is an allusion in this language to submersion as essential to baptism (see Olshausen in loc.; Meyer on Mark x. 38); but nothing more seems to be implied than simply the being overwhelmed in a figurative sense, according to what we have seen to be a common use of the word by the classical writers.

4. Baptism with the Spirit, Matt. iii. 11; Mark i. 8; Luke iii. 16; John i. 33; Acts i. 5; xi. 16; 1 Cor. xii. 13. In the first of these passages it is said of our Lord that he shall baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire. Whether this be taken as a hendiadys = the Spirit as fire, or as pointing out two distinct baptisms, the one by the Spirit, the other by fire; and whether, on the latter assumption, the baptism by fire means the destruction by Christ of his enemies, or the miraculous endowment of his apostles, it does not concern us at present to inquire. Respecting the intent of baptism by the Spirit, there can be little room for doubt or difference of opinion; it is obviously a figurative mode of describing the agency of the Divine Spirit given through and by Christ, both in conferring miraculous endowments and in purifying and sanctifying the heart of man. By this Spirit the disciples were baptized on the day of Pentecost, when "there appeared unto them cloven tongues of fire, and it sat upon each of them; and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and they began to speak with tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance" (Acts ii, 3, 4); by this Spirit men are saved when they are "born again of water and of the Spirit" (John iii, 5), when they receive "the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost" (Tit. iii, 5); and when there is the putting away from them of the filth of the flesh, and they have the answer of a good conscience toward God (1 Pet. iii, 21); and by this Spirit believers are baptized for one body, when through his gracious agency they receive that Spirit, and those impulses by which they are led to realize their unity in Christ Jesus (1 Cor. xii, 13). Some refer to the Spirit's baptism also, the apostle's expression, ἐν βάπτισμα, Eph. iv, 5; but the common and more probable opinion is that the reference here is to ritual baptism as the outward sign of that inner unity which the εἰς Κόινον and the μία πνεύμα secure and produce (see Alford, Ellicott, Meyer, Matthes, etc. etc. in loc.). In this figurative use of the term "baptism" the tertium comparationis is found by some in the Spirit's being viewed as the element in which the believer is made to live, and in which he receives the transforming influence; while others find it in the biblical representation of the Spirit as coming upon men, as poured upon them (Isa. xxxii, 15; Zech. xii, 10; Joel ii, 28; Acts ii, 17), and as sprinkled on them like clean water (Ezek. xxxvi, 25).

5. Baptism for Moses.—In 1 Cor. x, 2, the apostle says of the Israelites, "And they all received baptism" ('the middle voice is selected to express a recipiente sense,' Meyer) for Moses (εἰς τὸν Μωϋσῆν ἐβάπτισαντο) in (or by, ἐν) the cloud, and in (or by) the sea." In the Syr. εἰς τ. Μ. is translated "by the hand of Moses;" and this is followed by Beza and others. Some render una cum Mose; others, amplicius Mosis; others, in Mose, i. e. "sub ministerio et ductu Mosis" (Calvin), etc. But all these interpretations are precluded by the proper meaning of εἰς, and the fixed significance of the phrase βαπτίζεν ἐν in the N. T. The only rendering that can be admitted is "for Moses," i. e. with a view to him, in reference to him, in respect of him. "They were baptized for Moses, i. e. they became bound to fidelity and obedience, and were accepted into the covenant which God then made with the people through Moses" (Rückert in loc.; see also Meyer and Alford on the passage).

111. The Types of Baptism.—1. The apostle Peter (1 Pet. iii, 21) compares the deliverance of Noah in the Deluge to the deliverance of Christians in baptism. The apostle had been speaking of those who had perished "in the days of Noah when the ark was a-preparing, in which few, that is eight souls, were saved by water." According to the A. V., he goes on, "The like figure whereunto baptism doth now save us." The Greek, in the best MSS., is "Ὁ καὶ ἡμεῖς ἀντίστονον νῦν σώζα βαπτισμα. Grotius well expounds ἀντίστονον by ἀντίστοιχα, "accurately corresponding." The difficulty is in the relative ὅ. There is no antecedent to which it can refer except ἕκαστος, "water;" and it seems as if βαπτισμα must be put in apposition with ὅ, and as an explanation of it. Noah and his company were saved by water, "which water also, that is, the water of baptism, correspondingly saves us." Even if the reading were ὅς, it would most naturally refer to the preceding ἕκαστος. Certainly it could not refer to κεφαλῶν, which is feminine. We must, then, probably interpret that, though water was the instrument for destroying the disolcedant, it was yet the instrument ordained of God for floating the ark, and so for saving Noah and his family; and it is in correspondence with this that water also, viz. the water of baptism, saves Christians. Augustine, commenting on these words, writes that "the events in the days of Noah were a figure of things to come, so that they who believe not the Gospel, when the church is building, may be considered as like those who believed not when the ark was preparing; while those who have believed and are baptized (i. e. are saved by baptism) may be compared to those who were formerly saved in the ark by water" (Epist. 164, tom. ii, p. 579). "The building of the ark," he says again, "was a kind of preaching." "The waters of the deluge presignified baptism to those who believed—punishment to the unbelieving" (ib.).

It would be impossible to give any definite explanation of the words "baptism doth save us" without entering upon the theological question of baptismal regeneration. The apostle, however, gives a caution which no doubt may itself have need of an interpreter, when he adds, "not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer (ἀπεκρίθη) of a good conscience toward God." Probably all will agree that he intended here to warn us against resting on the outward administration of a sacrament, with no corresponding preparation of the conscience and the soul. The connection in this passage between baptism and "the re-erection of Jesus Christ" may be compared with Col. ii, 12.

2. In 1 Cor. x, 1, 2, the passage of the Red Sea; and the shadowing of the miraculous cloud are treated as types of baptism. In all the early part of this chapter the wanderings of Israel in the wilderness are put in comparison with the life of the Christian. The being under the cloud and the passing through the sea resemble baptism; eating manna and drinking of the rock are as the spiritual food which feeds the church; and the different temptations, sins, and punishments of the Israelites on their journey to Canaan are held up as a warning to the Corinthian Church. It appears that the Rabbins themselves speak of a baptism in the cloud (see Wetstein in loc., who quotes Pirke R. Eliezer, 44; see also Schöttgen in loc.). The passage from the condition of bondmen in Egypt was through the Red Sea, and with the protection of the luminous cloud. When the sea was passed the people were no longer subjects of Pharaoh, but were, under the guidance of Moses, forming into a new commonwealth, and on their way to the promised land. It is sufficiently apparent how this may resemble the enlisting of a new convert into the body of the Christian Church, his being placed in a new relation, under a new condition, in a spiritual commonwealth, with a way before him to a better country, though surrounded with dangers, subject to temptations, and with enemies on all sides to encounter in his progress.

3. Another type of, or rather a rite analogous to, baptism was circumcision. Paul (Col. ii, 11) speaks of the Colossian Christians as having been circumcised with a circumcision made without hands, when they were buried with Christ in baptism, in which they were also raised again with him (ἐν ᾧ περιτομή ἤγειρε . . . συνταβύτην αὐτῷ ἐν τῷ βαπτισματι). "The aorist participle, as often is contemporary with the preceding past verb."—Alford in loc.). The obvious reason for the comparison of the two rites is that circumcision was the entrance to the Jewish Church and the ancient covenant, baptism to the Christian Church and to the new covenant; and perhaps also that the spiritual significance of circumcision had a resemblance to the spiritual import of baptism, viz. "the putting off the body of the sins of the flesh," and the purification of the heart by the grace of God. Paul therefore calls baptism the circumcision made without hands, and speaks of the putting off of the sins of the flesh by Christian circumcision (ἐν τῷ περιτομῇ τοῦ Χριστοῦ), i. e. by baptism.

4. Before leaving this part of the subject, we ought perhaps to observe that in more than one instance death is called a baptism. In Matt. xx. 22; Mark x. 29, our Lord speaks of the cup which he had to drink, and the baptism that he was to be baptized with; and again, in Luke xii. 50, "I have a baptism to be baptized with." It is generally thought that baptism here means an inundation of sorrows; that, as the baptized went down in the water, and water was to be poured over him, so our Lord meant to indicate that he himself had to pass through "the deep waters of affliction" (see Kuinol on Matt. xx. 22; Schleusner, s. v. βαπτίζω). In after times martyrdom was called a baptism of blood. But the metaphor in this latter case is evidently different; and in the above words of our Lord baptism is used without any qualification, whereas in passages adduced from profane authors we always find some words explanatory of the mode of the immersion. Is it not then probable that some deeper significance attaches to the comparison of death, especially of our Lord's death, to baptism, when we consider, too, that the connection of baptism with the death and resurrection of Christ is so much insisted on by Paul?

IV. Names of Baptism.—1. "Baptism" (βαπτισμα: the word βαπτισμός occurs only three times, viz. Mark vii. 8; Heb. vi. 2; ix. 10). The verb βαπτίζω (from βάπτω, to wet) is the rendering of בָּטַח, to plunge, by the Sept. in 2 Kings v. 14; and accordingly the Rablins used בָּטַח for βαπτισμα. The Lat. fathers render βαπτίζω by tingere (e. g. Tertull. de. Prae. c. 26; "Novissime mandavit ut tingerent in Patrem Filium et Spiritum Sanctum"); by mergere (as Ambros. De Sacramentis, lib. ii. c. 7; "Interrogatus es, Credis in Deum Patrem Omnipotentem? Dixisti Credo; et mersisti, hoc est sepultus es"); by mergulare (as Tertullian, De Coronâ Militis, e. 3; "Delinquer mergulatur"); see Suicer, s. v. ἀνάτω. By the Greek fathers the word βαπτίζω is often used figuratively for overwhelming with sleep, sorrow, sin, etc. Thus ἐπὶ μὲν βαπτίζομενος εἰς ὕπνον, buried in sleep through drunkenness. So μυστικῶς βαπτίζομενος φρόνησει, absorbed in thought (Chrysost.). Ταῖς δουλοπάταις ἀμαρτίας βαβαπτίζομενοι, steeped in sin (Justin M.). See Suicer, s. v. βαπτίζω.

2. "The Water" (τὸ ὕδωρ) is a name of baptism which occurs in Acts x. 47. After Peter's discourse, the Holy Spirit came visibly on Cornelius and his company; and the apostle asked, "Can any man forbid the water, that these should not be baptized, who have received the Holy Ghost?" In ordinary cases the water had been first administered, after that the apostles laid on their hands, and then the Spirit was given. But here the Spirit had come down manifestly, before the administration of baptism; and Peter argued that no one could then reasonably withhold baptism (calling it "the water") from those who had visibly received that of which baptism was the sign and seal. With this phrase, τὸ ὕδωρ, "the water," used of baptism, compare "the breaking of bread" as a title of the Eucharist, Acts ii. 42.

3. "The Washing of Water" (τὸ λουτρὸν τοῦ ὕδατος, "the bath of the water") occurs Eph. v. 26. There appears clearly in these words a reference to the bridal bath; but the allusion to baptism is clearer still, baptism of which the bridal bath was an emblem, a type, or mystery, signifying to us the spiritual union between Christ and his church. For as the bride was wont to bathe before being presented to the bridegroom, so washing in the water is that initiatory rite by which the Christian Church is betrothed to the Bridegroom, Christ.

There is some difficulty in the construction and interpretation of the qualifying words, ἐν ὀνόματι, "by the word." According to the more ancient interpretation, they would indicate that the outward rite of washing is insufficient and unavailing without the added potency of the Word of God (comp. 1 Pet. iii. 21), "Not the putting away the filth of the flesh," etc.); and as the λουτρὸν τοῦ ὕδατος had reference to the bridal bath, so there might be an allusion to the verbs of betrothal. The bridal bath and the words of betrothal typified the water and the words of baptism. On the doctrine so expressed the language of Augustine is famous; "Detrahe verbum, et quid est aqua nisi aqua? Accedit verbum ad elementum, et fit sacramentum" (Tract. 80 in Johann.). Yet the general use of ὄνομα in the New Testament and the grammatical construction of the passage seem to favor the opinion that the Word of God preached to the church, rather than the words made use of in baptism, is that accompaniment of the laver without which it would be imperfect (see Ellicott, in loc.).

4. "The washing of regeneration" (λουτρὸν παλιγγενεσίας) is a phrase naturally connected with the foregoing. It occurs Tit. iii. 5. All ancient and most modern commentators have interpreted it of baptism. Controversy has made some persons unwilling to admit this interpretation; but the question probably should be, not as to the significance of the phrase, but as to the degree of importance attached in the words of the apostle to that which the phrase indicates. Thus Calvin held that the "bath" meant baptism; but he explained its occurrence in this context by saying that "Baptism is to us the seal of salvation which Christ hath obtained for us." The current of the apostle's reasoning is this. He tells Titus to exhort the Christians of Crete to be submissive to authority, showing all meekness to all men: "for we ourselves were once foolish, erring, serving our own lusts; but when the kindness of God our Saviour and His love toward man appeared, not by works of righteousness which we performed, but according to His own mercy He saved us by (through the instrumentality of) the bath of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost (ἐν λουτρῷ παλιγγενεσίας καὶ ἀνακαινώσεως Πνεύματος ἁγίου), which He shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour, that, being justified by His grace, we might be made heirs of eternal life through hope (or according to hope, κατ' ἐλπίδα)." The argument is, that Christians should be kind to all men, remembering that they themselves had been formerly disobedient, but that by God's free mercy in Christ they had been transplanted into a better state, even a state of salvation (ἐσώσεν ἡμᾶς), and that by means of the bath of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Spirit. If, according to the more ancient and common interpretation, the laver means baptism, the whole will seem pertinent. Christians are placed in a new condition, made members of the Church of Christ by baptism, and they are renewed in the spirit of their minds by the Holy Ghost.

There is so much resemblance, both in the phraseology and in the argument, between this passage in Titus and 1 Cor. vi. 11, that the latter ought by all means to be compared with the former. Paul tells the Corinthians that in their heathen state they had been stained with heathen vices; "but," he adds, "ye were washed" (lit. ye washed or bathed yourselves, ἀπελούσαθες), "but ye were sanctified, but ye were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the Spirit of our God." It is generally believed that here is an allusion to the being baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ; though some connect "sanctified" and "justified," as well as "washed," with the words "in the name," etc. (see Stanley, in loc.). But, however this may be, the reference to baptism seems unquestionable.

Another passage containing very similar thoughts, clothed in almost the same words, is Acts xxii. 16, where Ananias says to Saul of Tarsus, "Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling upon the name of the Lord" (ἀναστὰς βάπτισαι καὶ ἀπ' ἡρώσων τὰς ἀμαρτίας σου, ἐπικαλεσάμενος τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ). See Calvin's Commentary on this passage.

5. "Illumination" (φωτισμός). It has been much questioned whether φωτισθεῖσθε, "enlightened," in Heb. vi, 4; x, 32, be used of baptism or not. Justin M., Clement of Alexandria, and almost all the Greek fathers, use φωτισμός as a synonym for baptism. The Syriac version, the most ancient in existence, gives this sense to the word in both the passages in the Epistle to the Hebrews. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, and other Greek commentators so interpret it; and they are followed by Ernesti, Michaelis, and many modern interpreters of the highest authority (Wetstein cites from Orac. Sibyll. i. ἵνατι φωτισθεῖσθε). On the other hand, it is now very commonly alleged that the use is entirely ecclesiastical, not scriptural, and that it arose from the undue esteem for baptism in the primitive church. It is impossible to enter into all the merits of the question here. If the usage be scriptural, it is to be found only in the two passages in Hebrews above mentioned; but it may perhaps correspond with other figures and expressions in the New Testament. The patristic use of the word may be seen by referring to Suicer, s. v. φωτισμός, and to Bingham (E. A. i. bk. xi, ch. i, § 4). The rationale of the name, according to Justin Martyr, is, that the catechumens, before admission to baptism, were instructed in all the principal doctrines of the Christian faith, and hence "this laver is called illumination, because those who learn these things are illuminated in their understanding" (Apol. ii, 94). But if this word be used in the sense of baptism in the Epistle to the Hebrews, as we have no mention of any training of catechumens in the New Testament, we must probably seek for a different explanation of its origin. It will be remembered that φωτισγοῦντα was a term for admission into the ancient mysteries. Baptism was without question the initiatory rite in reference to the Christian faith (comp. τοιαῦτα βαπτίσματα μὲς μυσέως, Can. Apost. 1). Now that Christian faith is more than once called by Paul the Christian "mystery." The "mystery of God's will" (Eph. i, 9), "the mystery of Christ" (Col. iv, 3; Eph. iii, 4), "the mystery of the Gospel" (Eph. vi, 19), and other like phrases, are common in his epistles. A Greek could hardly fail to be reminded by such language of the religious mysteries of his own former heathenism. But, moreover, seeing that "in Him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," it seems highly probable that in three memorable passages Paul speaks, not merely of the Gospel or the faith, but of Christ himself as the great Mystery of God or of godliness. (1) In Col. i, 27, we read, "the glory of this mystery, which is Christ in you," τὸν μυστήριον τοῦτον, ὃς ἵσταν Χριστὸς ἐν ὑμῖν. (2) In Col. ii, 2, Lachmann, Tregelles, and Ellicott, as we think on good grounds, add the reading τὸν μυστήριον τοῦ Θεοῦ, Χριστοῦ, rightly compared by Bp. Ellicott with the preceding passage occurring only four verses before it, and interpreted by him "the mystery of God, even Christ." (3) It deserves to be carefully considered whether the above usage in Colossians does not suggest a clear exposition of 1 Tim. iii, 16, τὸ τῆς ἐκείβειας μυστήριον ὃς ἰθανεσθη κ. τ. λ. For, if Christ be the "Mystery of God," he may well be called also the "Mystery of godliness;" and the masculine relative is then easily intelligible, as being referred to Χριστὸς understood and implied in μυστήριον; for, in the words of Hieron., "Deus Christus est Sacramentum."

But, if all this be true, as baptism is the initiatory Christian rite admitting us to the service of God and to the knowledge of Christ, it may not improbably have been called φωτισμός, and afterward φωτισγοῦντα, as having reference, and as admitting to the mystery of the Gospel, and to Christ himself, who is the Mystery of God.

V We pass to a few of the more prominent passages, not already considered, in which baptism is referred to.

1. John iii, 5—"Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God"—has been a well-established battle-field from the time of Calvin. Hooker states that for the first fifteen centuries no one had ever doubted its application to baptism (Eecl. Pol. v, lix). Zuinglius was probably the first who interpreted it otherwise. Calvin understood the words "of water and of the Spirit" as ἐν ὕδατι ἰσταν, "the washing or cleansing of the Spirit" (or rather perhaps "by the Spirit"), "who cleanses as water," referring to Matt. iii, 11 ("He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire"), as a parallel usage. Stier (Words of the Lord Jesus, in loc.) observes that Lücke has rightly said that we may regard this interpretation by means of a hendiadych, which erroneously appealed to Matt. iii, 11, as now generally abandoned. Stier, moreover, quotes with entire approbation the words of Meyer (on John iii, 5); "Jesus speaks here concerning a spiritual baptism, as in chap. vi, concerning a spiritual feeding; in both places, however, with reference to their visible auxiliary means." That our Lord probably adopted expressions familiar to the Jews in this discourse with Nicodemus may be seen by reference to Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in loc.

2. The prophecy of John the Baptist just referred to, viz. that our Lord should baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire (Matt. iii, 11), has usually been interpreted by that rhetorical figure (hendiadych) which designates one thing by a double expression. Bengel thus paraphrases it: "The Holy Spirit, with which Christ baptizes, has a fiery force, and this was once even manifest to human sight" (Acts ii, 3). The fathers, indeed, spoke of a threefold baptism with fire: first, of the Holy Ghost in the shape of fiery tongues at Pentecost; secondly, of the fiery trial of affliction and temptation (1 Pet. i, 7); thirdly, of the fire which at the last day is to try every man's works (1 Cor. iii, 13). It is, however, very improbable that there is any allusion to either of the last two in Matt. iii, 11. There is an antithesis in John the Baptist's language between his own lower mission and the divine authority of the Saviour. John baptized with a mere earthly element, teaching men to repent, and pointing them to Christ; but He that should come after, ὁ ἰστανενοσ, was empowered to baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire. The water of John's baptism could but wash the body; the Holy Ghost, with which Christ was to baptize, should purify the soul as with fire. See BAPTISM WITH FIRE.

3. Gal. iii, 27: "For as many as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." In the whole of this very important and difficult chapter Paul is reasoning on the inheritance by the Church of Christ of the promises made to Abraham. Christ—i. e. Christ comprehending his whole body mystical—is the true seed of Abraham, to whom the promises belong (ver. 16). The law, which came afterward, could not annul the promises thus made. The law was fit to restrain (or perhaps rather to manicis) transgression (ver. 23). The law acted as a pedagogue, keeping us for and leading us on to Christ, that he might bestow on us freedom and justification by faith in him (ver. 21). But after the coming of faith we are no longer, like young children, under a pedagogue, let we are free, as heirs in our Father's house (ver. 25; comp. ch. iv, 1-5). "For ye all are God's sons (fili emancipati, not παῖδεσ, but υἱοσ, Bengel and Ellicott) through the faith in Christ Jesus." For as many as have been baptized into Christ have put on (clothed yourselves in) Christ (see Schottgen on Rom. xiii, 14). In him is neither Jew nor Greek, neither bond nor free, neither male nor female; for all ye are one in Christ Jesus" (ver. 26-28). The argument is plain. All Christians are God's sons through union with the Only-begotten. Before the faith in him came into the world, men were held under the tutelage of the law, like children, kept as in a state of bondage under a pedagogue. But after the preaching of the faith, all who are baptized into Christ clothe themselves in him; so they are esteemed as adult sons of his Father, and by faith in him they may be justified from their sins, from which the law could not justify them (Acts xiii, 37). The contrast is between the Christian and the Jewish Church: one bond, the other free; one infant, the other adult. The transition point is naturally when by baptism the service of Christ is undertaken and the promises of the Gospel are claimed. This is represented as putting on Christ and in him assuming the position of full-grown men. In this more privileged condition there is the power of obtaining justification by faith, a justification which the law had not to offer.

4. I Cor. xii, 13: "For by one Spirit (or in one spirit, ἐν ἑνὶ πνεύματι) we were all baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether bond or free, and were all made to drink of one Spirit." The resemblance of this passage to the last is very clear. In the old dispensation there was a marked division between Jew and Gentile; under the Gospel there is one body in Christ. As in Gal. iii, 16, Christ is the seed (ὁ σπέρμα), so here he is the body (ὁ σῶμα) into which all Christians become incorporated. All distinctions of Jew and Gentile, bond and free, are abolished. By the grace of the same Spirit (or perhaps "in one spirit" of Christian love and fellowship (comp. Eph. ii, 18), without division or separate interests) all are joined in baptism to the one body of Christ, his universal church. Possibly there is an allusion to both sacraments. "We were baptized into one body, we were made to drink of one Spirit" (Ἐν ἑνὶ πνεύματι ἐπτισθημεν; Latin, and Tisch, omit ἐν). Both our baptism and our partaking of the cup in the communion are tokens and pledges of Christ's unity. They mark our union with the one body of Christ, and they are means of grace, in which we may look for one Spirit to be present with blessing (comp. I Cor. x, 3, 17; see Waterland on the Eucharist, l. ch. x, and Stanley on I Cor. xii, 13).

5. Rom. vi, 1, and Col. ii, 12, are so closely parallel that we may notice them together. As the apostle in the two last-considered passages views baptism as a joining to the mystical body of Christ, so in these two passages he goes on to speak of Christians in their baptism as buried with Christ in his death, and raised again with him in his resurrection. As the natural body of Christ was laid in the ground and then raised up again, so his mystical body, the church, descends in baptism into the waters, in which also (ἐν ᾧ, sc. βπτισματι, Col. ii, 12) it is raised up again with Christ, through "faith in the mighty working of God, who raised him from the dead." Probably, as in the former passages Paul had brought forward baptism as the symbol of Christian unity, so in those now before us he refers to it as the token and pledge of the spiritual death to sin and resurrection to righteousness; and moreover of the final victory over death in the last day, through the power of the resurrection of Christ. It is said that it was partly in reference to this passage in Colossians that the early Christians so generally used triple immersion, as signifying thereby the three days in which Christ lay in the grave (see Suicer, s. v. ἀνάστασις, ll. α.—Smith, App. ut, s. v.).

2. JEWISH BAPTISM.—Purifications by washing are to be very common among the Jews. See ANTIQUITIES. In the language of the prophets, cleansing with water is used as an emblem of the purification of the heart, which in the Messianic age is to glorify the soul in her innumerable recesses, and to embrace the whole of the theocratic nation (Ezek. xxxvi, 25 sq.; Zech. xiii, 1). Of the antiquity of illustrations by water among the Jews there is no question, but it is still an initiatory rite, in connection with circumcision, before the coming of Christ. It is well established that, as early as the second century of the Christian era, this proselyte baptism was an established rite among the Jews; and their writers, as well as many Christian theologians (e. g. Lightfoot, Weststein, Wall, and others), claim for it a much greater antiquity. But this opinion is hardly tenable, for, as an act which strictly gives validity to the admission of a proselyte, and is no mere accompaniment to his admission, baptism certainly is not alluded to in the New Testament; while, as to the passages quoted in proof from the classical (profane) writers of that period, they are all open to the most fundamental objections. Nor is the utter silence of Josephus and Philo on the subject, notwithstanding their various opportunities of touching on it, a less weighty argument against this view. It is true that mention is made in the Talmud of that regulation as already existing in the first century A. D.; but such statements belong only to the traditions of the Gemara, and require careful investigation before they can serve as proper authority. This Jewish rite was probably originally only a purifying ceremony; and it was raised to the character of an initiating and indispensable rite, co-ordinate with that of sacrifice and circumcision, only after the destruction of the Temple, when sacrifices had ceased, and the circumcision of proselytes had, by reason of public edicts, become more and more impracticable. See PROSELYTE.

2. JOHN'S BAPTISM.—It was the principal object of John the Baptist to combat the prevailing opinion that the performance of external ceremonies was sufficient to secure participation in the kingdom of God and his promises; he required repentance, therefore, as a preparation for the approaching kingdom of the Messiah. That he may possibly have baptized heathens also seems to follow from his censuring the Pharisees for contending in their descent from Abraham, while they had no share in his spirit; yet it should not be overlooked that this remark was drawn from him by the course of the argument (Matt. iii, 8, 9; Luke iii, 7, 8). We must, on the whole, assume that John considered the existing Judaism as a stepping-stone by which the Gentiles were to arrive at the kingdom of God in its Messianic form. The general point of view from which John contemplated the Messiah and his kingdom was that of the Old Testament, though closely bordering on Christianity. He regards, it is true, an alteration in the mind and spirit as an indispensable condition for partaking in the kingdom of the Messiah; still, he looked for its establishment by means of conflict and external force, with which the Messiah was to be endowed; and he expected in him a Judge and Avenger, who was to set up outward and visible distinctions. It is, therefore, by no means a matter of indifference whether baptism be administered in the name of that Christ who floated before the mind of John, or of the suffering and glorified One, such as the apostles knew him; and whether it was considered a preparation for a political, or a consecration into a spiritual theocracy. John was so far from this latter view, so far from contemplating a purely spiritual development of the kingdom of God, that he even began subsequently to entertain doubts concerning Christ (Matt. xi, 2). John's baptism had not the character of an immediate, but merely of a preparatory consecration for the glorified theocracy (John i, 31). The apostles, therefore, found it necessary to rebaptize the disciples of John, who had still adhered to the notions of their master on that head (Acts xix). To this apostolic judgment Tertullian appeals, and in his opinion coincide the most eminent teachers of the ancient church, both of the East and the West.—Jacobi, in Kitt's Cyclop. s. v. See JOHN (THE BAPTIST).

The Baptism of Jesus by John (Matt. iii, 13; Mark i, 9; Luke iii, 21; comp. John i, 19), as the first act of Christ's public career, is one of the most important events recorded in the evangelical history. We might be apt to infer from Luke and Matthew that there had been an acquaintance between Christ and John prior to the baptism, and that hence John declines (Matt. iii, 14) to baptize Jesus, arguing that he needed to be baptized by him. This, however, has been thought to be at variance with John i, 31, 33. Lücke (Comment. i, 416 sq., 3d edit.) takes the words "I knew him not" in their strict and exclusive sense. John, he says, could not have spoken in this manner if he had at all known Jesus; and had he known him, he could not, as a prophet, have failed to discover, even at an earlier period, the but too evident "glory" of the Messiah. On the other hand, the narrative of the first three Gospels presupposes John's personal acquaintance with him, since, although the herald of the Messiah, he could not otherwise have given that refusal (Matt. iii, 14) to the Messiah alone; for his own language necessarily implies that Jesus was not a stranger to him. See MESSIAH.

With regard to the object of Christ in undergoing baptism, we find, in the first instance, that he ranked this action among those of his Messianic calling. This object is still more defined by John the Baptist (John i, 31), which passage Lücke interprets in the following words: "Only by entering into that community which was to be introductory to the Messianic, by attaching himself to the Baptist like any other man, was it possible for Christ to reveal himself to the Baptist, and through him to others." Christ himself never for a moment could doubt his own mission, or the right period when his character was to be made manifest by God; but John needed to receive that assurance, in order to be the herald of the Messiah who was actually come. For all others whom John baptized, either before or after Christ, this act was a mere preparatory consecration to the kingdom of the Messiah; while for Jesus it was a direct and immediate consecration, by means of which he manifested the commencement of his career as the founder of the new theocracy, which began at the very moment of his baptism, the initiatory character of which constituted its general principle and tendency. See JESUS.

Baptism of the Disciples of Christ.—Whether our Lord ever baptized has been doubted. (See Schenk, De latine a Christo administrato, Marb, 1745.) The only passage which may distinctly bear on the question is John iv, 1, 2, where it is said "that Jesus made and baptized more disciples than John, though Jesus himself baptized not, but his disciples." We necessarily infer from it that, as soon as our Lord began his ministry, and gathered to him a company of disciples, he, like John the Baptist, admitted into that company by the administration of baptism. Normally, however, to say the least of it, the administration of baptism was by the hands of his disciples. Some suppose that the first-called disciples had all received baptism at the hands of John the Baptist, as must have pretty certainly been the case with Andrew (see John i, 25, 37, 40), and that they were not again baptized with water after they joined the company of Christ. Others believe that Christ himself baptized some few of his earlier disciples, who were afterward authorized to baptize the rest. But in any case the words above cited seem to show that making disciples and baptizing them went together; and that baptism was, even during our Lord's earthly ministry, the formal mode of accepting his service and becoming attached to his company.

After the resurrection, when the church was to be spread and the Gospel preached, our Lord's own commission enjoins the making of disciples with their baptism. The command, "Make disciples of all nations by baptizing them" (Matt. xxviii, 19), is merely the extension of his own practice, "Jesus made disciples and baptized them" (John iv, 1). The conduct of the apostles is the plainest comment on both; for so soon as ever men, convinced by their preaching, asked for guidance and direction, their first exhortation was to repentance and baptism, that thus the convert should be at once publicly received into the fold of Christ (see Acts ii, 38; viii, 12, 36; ix, 18; x, 47; xvi, 15, 33, etc.). (See Zimmermann, De Baptismi orig. et usu, Gott. 1816.) See DISCIPLE.

3. CHRISTIAN BAPTISM is a sacrament instituted by Christ himself. When he could no longer personally and immediately choose and receive members of his kingdom, when at the same time all had been accomplished which the founder thought necessary for its completion, he gave power to the spiritual community to receive, in his name, members by baptism. The authority and obligation of baptism as a universal ordinance of the Christian Church is derived from the commission of Christ, "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in (to, etc) the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost" (Matt. xxviii, 19). See II below.

1. Design and Benefits of Baptism.—As to the design and benefits of baptism there are various views held. The principal are the following: 1. That it is a direct instrument of grace; the application of water to the person by a properly qualified functionary being regarded as the appointed vehicle by which God bestows regenerating grace upon men. This is the view of the Roman and Eastern churches, and of one (the "High-Church") party in the Protestant Episcopal and the Lutheran churches. Nearly the same view is held by the Disciples of Christ (Campbellites), who regard baptism as the remitting ordinance of the Gospel, and the appointed means through which the penitent sinner obtains the assurance of that remission of sins procured by the death of Christ. See REGENERATION. 2. That it is neither an instrument nor a seal of grace, but simply a ceremony of initiation into church membership. This is the Socinian view of the ordinance. 3. That it is a token of regeneration, to be received only by those who give evidence of being really regenerated. This is the view adopted by the Baptists. 4. That it is a symbol of purification, the use of which simply announces that the religion of Christ is a purifying religion, and intimates that the party receiving the rite assumes the profession, and is to be instructed in the principles of that religion. This opinion is extensively entertained among the Congregationalists of England. 5. That it is the rite of initiation into the visible church, and that, though not an instrument, it is a seal of grace, divine blessings being thereby confirmed and obligated to the individual. This is the doctrine of the Confessions of the majority of the Reformed churches. The Augsburg Confession states, Art. 9: "Concerning baptism, our churches teach that it is a necessary ordinance; that it is a means of grace, and ought to be administered also to children, who are thereby dedicated to God, and received into his favor. They condemn the Anabaptists who reject the baptism of children, and who affirm that infants may be saved without baptism." The Westminster Confession, Art. 28: "Baptism is a sacrament of the New Testament, obtained by Jesus Christ, not only for the solemn admission of the party baptized into the visible church, but also to be unto him a sign and seal of the covenant of grace, of his ingrafting into Christ, of regeneration, of remission of sins, and of his giving up unto God, through Jesus Christ, to walk in newness of life; which sacrament is, by Christ's own appointment, to be continued in his church until the end of the world. The outward element to be used in this sacrament is water, wherewith the party is to be baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, by a minister of the Gospel lawfully called thereunto. Dipping of the person into water is not necessary; but baptism is rightly administered by pouring or sprinkling water upon the person. Not only those that do actually profess faith in and obedience unto Christ, but also the infants of one or both believing parents, are to be baptized. Although it be a great sin to contemn or neglect this ordinance, yet grace and salvation are not so inseparably annexed unto it as that no person can be regenerated or saved without it, or that all that are baptized are undoubtedly regenerated. The efficacy of baptism is not tied to that moment of time wherein it is administered; yet, notwithstanding, by the right use of this ordinance the grace promised is not only offered, but really exhibited and conferred by the Holy Ghost to such (whether of age or infants) as that grace belongeth unto, according to the counsel of God's own will, in his appointed time. The sacrament of baptism is but once to be administered to any person." In the 17th article of the Methodist Episcopal Church it is declared that "Baptism is not only a sign of profession and mark of difference whereby Christians are distinguished from others that are not baptized, but it is also a sign of regeneration, or the new birth. The baptism of young children is to be retained in the church." The same formula appears in the Articles of the Church of England and of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, with certain additions, as follows: "Art. 27. Baptism is not only a sign of profession and mark of difference whereby Christian men are discerned from others that be not christened, but it is also a sign of regeneration, or new birth, whereby, as by an instrument, they that receive baptism rightly are grafted into the church; the promises of the forgiveness of sin, and of our adoption to be the sons of God by the Holy Ghost, are visibly signed and sealed: faith is confirmed, and grace increased by virtue of prayer unto God. The baptism of young children is in any wise to be retained in the church as most agreeable with the institution of Christ." The following excellent summary of the benefits of baptism is given by Watson (Institutes, ii, 646): "Baptism introduces the adult believer into the covenant of grace and the Church of Christ, and is the seal, the pledge to him on the part of God of the fulfilment of all its provisions in time and in eternity, while on his part he takes upon himself the obligations of steadfast faith and obedience. To the infant child it is a visible reception into the same covenant and church—a pledge of acceptance through Christ—the bestowment of a title to all the grace of the covenant as circumstances may require, and as the mind of the child may be capable, or made capable of receiving it, and as it may be sought in future life by prayer, when the period of reason and moral choice shall arrive. It conveys, also, the present 'blessing' of Christ, of which we are assured by his taking children in his arms and blessing them; which blessing cannot be merely nominal, but must be substantial and efficacious. It recures, too, the gift of the Holy Ghost in those secret spiritual influences by which the actual regeneration of those children who die in infancy is effected, and which are a seed of life in those who are spared, to prepare them for instruction in the Word of God, as they are taught it by parental care, to incline their will and affections to good, and to begin and maintain in them the war against inward and outward evil, so that they may be divinely assisted, as reason strengthens, to make their calling and election sure. In a word, it is, both as to infants and to adults, the sign and pledge of that inward grace which, though modified in its operations by the difference of their circumstances, has respect to, and flows from, a covenant relation to each of the three persons in whose one name they are baptized—acceptance by the Father, union with Christ as the head of his mystical body, the church, and the communion of the Holy Ghost. To these advantages must be added the respect which God bears to the believing act of the parents, and to their solemn prayers on the occasion, in both which the child is interested, as well as in that solemn engagement of the parents which the rite necessarily implies to bring up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

Exaggerated ideas of the necessity and efficacy of baptism developed themselves as early as the second and third centuries (see references in Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, § 72). It became the custom to defer baptism as long as possible (a practice recommended, e. g. by Tertullian, De Bapt. c. 18). Many would not be baptized until just before death; e. g. Constantine. They supposed that baptism removes all previous sins in a sort of magical way; but that sins after baptism are remitted with difficulty, or not at all. Hence the baptism of new converts was delayed, entirely contrary to the spirit and practice of the apostles, who baptized converts immediately (Acts ii, 41; xvi, 15). See Baumgarten, De Procrustinatione Baptismi op. Veteres, Halle, 1747. After Augustine, through whom the doctrine of "no salvation out of the church" came to be received, it began to be held that infants dying without baptism were lost, and the baptism of very young infants became the common rule, while the baptism of adult converts was hastened (Knapp, Theology, § 141).

The Church of Rome continues to teach that original sin is effaced by the sacrament of baptism. The Anglican Church holds that "this infection of nature doth remain in them that are regenerated." The Russian Catechism declares that in holy baptism the believer "dies to the carnal life of sin, and is born again of the Holy Ghost to a life spiritual and holy;" which is the doctrine of the Greek Church generally. See GRACE; REGENERATION; SACRAMENTS.

II. Obligation and Perpetuity of Baptism.—That baptism is obligatory is evident from the example of Christ, who by his disciples baptized many that, by his miracles and discourses, were brought to profess faith in him as the Messiah; from his command to his apostles after his resurrection (Matt. xxviii, 19); and from the practice of the apostles themselves (Acts ii, 38). But the Quakers assert that water baptism was never intended to continue in the Church of Christ any longer than while Jewish prejudices made such an external ceremony necessary. They argue from Eph. iv, 5, in which one baptism is spoken of as necessary to Christians, that this must be a baptism of the Spirit. But, from comparing the texts that relate to this institution, it will plainly appear that water baptism was instituted by Christ in more general terms than will agree with this explication. That it was administered to all the Gentile converts, and not confined to the Jews, appears from Matt. xxviii, 19, 20, compared with Acts x, 47; and that the baptism of the Spirit did not supersede water baptism appears to have been the judgment of Peter and of those that were with him; so that the one baptism spoken of seems to have been that of water, the communication of the Holy Spirit being only called baptism in a figurative sense. As for any objection which may be drawn from 1 Cor. i, 17, it is sufficiently answered by the preceding verses, and all the numerous texts in which, in epistles written long after this, the apostle speaks of all Christians as baptized, and argues from the obligation of baptism in such a manner as we could never imagine he would have done if he had apprehended it to have been the will of God that it should be discontinued in the church (compare Rom. vi, 3, etc.; Col. ii, 12; Gal. iii, 27).—Doddridge, Lectures on De'nity, Lect. 201. For a clear view of the obligation of baptism, see Hibbard on Christian Baptism, pt. ii, ch. x. See ANTI-BAPTISTS; QUAKERS.

III. Modes of Baptism.—The ceremonies used in baptism have varied in different ages and countries; a brief account of them is given below (VII). Among Protestants baptism is performed with great simplicity; all that is deemed essential to the ordinance being the application of water by sprinkling, pouring, or immersion, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

1. The Baptists (q. v.) maintain, however, that immersion is the only valid baptism, in this point separating themselves from all the rest of Christendom. They rely for their justification chiefly upon the following arguments: (1.) That the word βαπτίζω means, literally, to "immerse," and nothing else; while its figurative uses always include the idea of "burying" or "overwhelming;" (2.) That the terms washing, purifying, burying in baptism, so often mentioned in the Scriptures, allude to this mode; (3.) That the places selected for baptism in the New Test. imply immersion; (4.) that immersion only was the practice of the apostles, the first Christians, and the church in general for many ages, and that it was only laid aside from the love of novelty and the coldness of climate. These positions, they think, are so clear from Scripture and the history of the church that they stand in need of but little argument for their support. (5.) Further, they also insist that all positive institutions depend entirely upon the will and declaration of the institutor; and that, therefore, reasoning by analogy from previously abrogated rites is to be rejected, and the express command of Christ respecting baptism ought to be our rule. See IMMERSION.

2. The Christian Church generally, on the other hand, denies that immersion is essential to the ordinance of baptism, and admits any of the three modes, sprinkling, pouring, or immersion. The Greek Church requires trine immersion in its rubrics, but in Russia baptism by sprinkling or affusion is regarded as equally valid. The Roman ritual favors affusion thrice repeated, but admits also of immersion. In the "Office for the Public Baptism of Infants" in the Church of England it is directed that the "priest shall dip the child in the water if the sponsors shall certify him that the child may well endure it;" but "if they certify that the child is weak, it shall suffice to pour water upon it." In the "Office for the Private Baptism of Infants" it is directed that the baptism shall be by affusion, the infant in such cases being always certified to be weak. In the "Office for the Baptism of Adults," it is left altogether to the discretion of the minister to dip the person to be baptized in the water or to pour water upon him. The framers of the Office evidently, by the discretionary power left to the officiating minister, have decided that the mode in this respect is immaterial. The ritual of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in like manner, leaves the administrator free; and he is so, in fact, in most (but not all) Protestant Churches. The substantial question, therefore, between the Baptists and the Christian Church generally, is whether immersion is essential to baptism or not. The negative is maintained by the following arguments (besides others for which we have not space), viz.:

(1.) As to the meaning of βαπτίζω, it is allowed, on all hands, that it is (at least sometimes) applied to acts involving the process of immersion both by profane and sacred writers (see above). But the best lexicographers agree that this is not its exclusive meaning, and none but a daring controversialist would assert that it is. The word βαπτίζω is derived from βαπτύω, the verbal adjective of βάπτω, to wet thoroughly, and its etymological meaning is to put into a drunken or imbecil condition (Meth. Quar. Rev. 1850, p. 406). In the New Testament it generally means to purify by the application of water. (See Beecher on Baptism; Murlock, in Bib. Sac. Oct. 1850, on the Syriac words for baptism.) "As the word βαπτίζω is used to express the various ablutions among the Jews, such as sprinkling, pouring, etc. (Heb. ix, 10), for the custom of washing before meals, and the washing of household furniture, pots, etc., it is evident from hence that it does not express the manner of doing a thing, whether by immersion or affusion, but only the thing done—that is, washing, or the application of water in some form or other. It nowhere signifies to dip, but in denoting a mode of, and in order to, washing or cleansing; and the mode or use is only the ceremonial part of a positive institute, just as in the Lord's Supper the time of day, the number and posture of the communicants, the quantity and quality of bread and wine, are circumstances not accounted essential by any part of Christians. If in baptism there be an expressive emblem of the descending influence of the Spirit, pouring must be the mode of administration, for that is the scriptural term most commonly and properly used for the communication of divine influences (Matt. iii, 11; Mark i, 8, 10; Luke iii, 16, 22; John i, 33; Acts i, 5; ii, 38, 39; viii, 12, 17; xi, 15, 16). The term sprinkling, also, is made use of in reference to the act of purification (1-sa. lii, 15; Ezek. xxxvi, 25; Heb. ix, 13, 14), and therefore cannot be inapplicable to baptismal purification" (Watson). So far, then, as the word βαπτίζω is concerned, there is no foundation for the exclusive theory of the Baptists.

(2.) As for the fact that John baptized "in Jordan," it is enough to reply that to infer always a plunging of the whole body in water from this particle would, in many instances, be false and absurd. Indeed, if immersion were intended, the preposition should be εἰς and not ἐν. The same preposition, ἐν, is used when it is said they should be "baptized with fire," but few will assert that they should be plunged into it. The apostle, speaking of Christ, says he came not, ἐν, "by water only," but, ἐν, "by water and blood." There the same word, ἐν, is translated by; and with justice and propriety, for we know no good sense in which we could say he came in water. Jesus, it is said, came up out of the water, but this is no proof that he was immersed, as the Greek term ἀνά properly signifies from; for instance, "Who hath warned you to flee from," not out of, the "wrath to come?" with many others that might be mentioned. Again, it is urged that Philip and the eunuch went down both into the water. To this it is answered that here also is no proof of immersion, for if the expression of their going down into the water necessarily includes dipping, then Philip was dipped as well as the eunuch. The preposition εἰς, translated into, often signifies no more than to or unto, see Matt. xv, 24; Rom. x, 10; Acts xxviii, 14; Matt. iii, 11; xvii, 27; so that from none of these circumstances can it be proved that there was one person of all the baptized who went into the water ankle deep. As to the apostle's expression, "buried with him in baptism," that has no force in the argument for immersion, since it does not allude to a custom of dipping, any more than our baptismal crucifixion and death has any such reference. It is not the sign, but the thing signified, that is here alluded to. As Christ was buried and rose again to a heavenly life, so we by baptism signify that we are separated from sin, that we may live a new life of faith and love. (See above.)

(3.) It is urged further against immersion that it carries with it too much of the appearance of a burdensome rite for the Gospel dispensation; that it is too indecent for so solemn an ordinance; that it has a tendency to agitate the spirits, often rendering the subject unfit for the exercise of proper thoughts and affections, and, in fact, utterly incapable of them; that in many cases the immersion of the body would, in all probability, be instant death; that in other situations it would be impracticable for want of water; hence it cannot be considered as necessary to the ordinance of baptism, and there is the strongest improbability that it was universally practised in the times of the New Testament, or in the earliest periods of the Christian Church; indeed, the allegation of the exclusiveness of this mode is far from being adequately supported by ancient testimony, while in many instances (e. g. that of the Philippine jailer, Acts xvii, 33) that theory involves the most unlikely suppositions. See above (1-V).

IV. Subjects of Baptism.—The Christian churches generally baptize infants as well as adult believers, and this is believed to have been the practice of the church from the apostolical age. The Roman and Lutheran churches teach that baptism admits children into the church and makes them members of the body of Christ. The Reformed churches, generally, teach that the children of believers are included in the covenant, and are therefore entitled to baptism. The Methodist Church holds that all infants are redeemed by Christ, and are therefore entitled to baptism, wherever they can receive the instruction and care of a Christian church or family.

(i.) As to the antiquity of infant baptism, it is admitted by Baptist writers themselves that it was practised in Tertullian's time (A.D. 200); but they insist that beyond that date there is no proof of any other baptism than that of adult believers. The principal passages cited in the controversy are from Origen, Tertullian, Irenæus, and Justin Martyr.

1. Origen (A.D. 185-253) speaks in the most unequivocal terms of the baptism of infants, as the general practice of the church in his time, and as having been received from the apostles. His testimony is as follows: "According to the usage of the church, baptism is given even to infants; when, if there were nothing in infants which needed forgiveness and mercy, the grace of baptism would seem to be superfluous" (Homil. VIII in Levit. ch. xii). Again: "Infants are baptized for the forgiveness of sins. Of what sins? Or, when have they sinned? Or, can there be any reason for the laver in their case, unless it be according to the sense which we have mentioned above, viz. that no one is free from pollution, though he has lived but one day upon earth? And because by baptism native pollution is taken away, therefore infants are baptized" (Homil. in Luc. xiv). Again: "For this cause it was that the church received a tradition from the apostles (παράδοσις ἀποστολική) to give baptism even to infants" (Comm. on Rom. lib. v, cap. 9). Neander (Ch. Hist. i, 514) depreciates this testimony, but without any real ground. On any ordinary subject it would be taken as decisive, at least as to the prevalence of infant baptism in Origen's time, and long before.

2. Tertullian (A.D. 169-240), in his treatise De Baptismo (c. 18), opposes infant baptism on the ground (1) "that it is too important; not even earthly goods are intrusted to infants;" (2) "that sponsors are imperilled by the responsibility they incur." Tertullian adopted the superstitious idea that baptism was accompanied with the remission of all past sins, and that sins committed after baptism were peculiarly dangerous. He therefore advised that not merely infants, but young men and young women, and even young widows and widowers, should postpone their baptism until the period of their youthful appetite and passion should have passed. In short, he advised that, in all cases in which death was not likely to intervene, baptism be postponed until the subjects of it should have arrived at a period of life when they would be no longer in danger of being led astray by youthful lusts. And thus, for more than a century after the age of Tertullian, we find some of the most conspicuous converts to the Christian faith postponing baptism till the close of life. Further, if he could have said that infant baptism was "an innovation," he would; no argument was surer or weightier in that age; and he constantly appeals to it on other subjects. All attempts to invalidate this testimony have failed. If any fact in history is certain, it is that infant baptism was practised in Tertullian's time, and long before. For the Baptist view, however, on this point, see an able article in the Christian Review, xvi, 519. See also Bibliotheca Sacra, iii, 680; v, 307.

3. Irenæus (circa A.D. 125-199) has the following passage (lib. ii, cap. 39): "Omnes venit per semetipsum salvare; omnes, inquam, qui per eum renascuntur in Deum, infantes et parvulos et pueros," etc.; i. e. "He came to save all by himself; all, I say, who, by him, are born again into God, infants, and little children, and youth," etc. All turns here on the meaning attached by Irenæus to the word renasci; and this is clear from a passage (lib. iii, c. 19) in which he speaks of the Gospel commission. "When," says he, "[Christ] gave this commission of regenerating to God [renasci], he said, 'Go, teach all nations, baptizing them, etc.'" Neander (whose loose admissions as to the entire question are eagerly made use of by Baptists) remarks of this passage that "it is difficult to conceive how the term regeneration can be employed in reference to this age (i. e. infancy), to denote any thing else than baptism" (Ch. Hist. i, 314).

4. Justin Martyr, who wrote his "Apology" about A.D. 138, declares that there were among Christians, in his time, "many persons of both sexes, some sixty and some seventy years old, who had been made disciples to Christ from their infancy" (ὅτι ἐκ παιῶν ἠμαρτήθησαν τῷ Χριστῷ, Apol. 2), and who must therefore have been baptized during the lifetime of some of the apostles. In his Trypho he says, "We are circumcised by baptism, with Christ's circumcision." If ἐκ παιῶν means from infancy, which is probable, but not absolutely certain, this passage is conclusive.

These citations seem clearly to carry back the practice of infant baptism to a date very near the apostles' time. If it were then "an innovation," we should have had some indication of so great a change; but there is none. Up to the rise of the Anabaptists in the 16th century, the practice of infant baptism existed in the church without opposition, or with only here and there an occasional word of question.

(ii.) At the present day the Greek Church, the Roman Church, and all Protestant churches (except the Baptists) hold to infant baptism. The usage rests on the following grounds (among others), viz.:

1. If the practice of infant baptism prevailed at the early period above mentioned, and all history is silent as to the time of its introduction, and gives no intimation of any excitement, controversy, or opposition to an innovation so remarkable as this must have been had it been obtruded on the churches without apostolical authority, we may fairly conclude, even were Scripture silent on the subject, that infant baptism has invariably prevailed in the church as a New Testament institution.

2. From the very nature of the case, the first subjects of the baptism of Christ and his apostles were adults converted from Judaism or heathenism. But although there are no express examples in the New Testament of Christ and his apostles baptizing infants, there is no proof that they were excluded. Jesus Christ actually blessed little children; and it is difficult to believe that such received his blessing, and yet were not to be members of the Gospel church. If Christ received them, and would have us "receive" them, how can we keep them out of the visible church? Besides, if children were not to be baptized, it is reasonable to expect that they would have been expressly forbidden. As whole households were baptized, it is also probable there were children among them.

3. Infants are included in Christ's act of redemption, and are entitled thereby to the benefits and blessings of his church. Moreover, they are specifically embraced in the Gospel covenant. The covenant with Abraham, of which circumcision was made the sign and seal, is not to be regarded wholly, nor even chiefly, as a political and national covenant. The engagement was, (1.) That God would bless Abraham. This included justification, and the imputation of his faith for righteousness, with all spiritual blessings. (2.) That he should be the father of many nations. This refers quite as much to his spiritual seed as to his natural descendants. (3.) The promise of Canaan; and this included the higher promise of the eternal inheritance (Heb. xi, 9, 10). (4.) God would be "a God to Abraham and to his seed after him," a promise connected with the highest spiritual blessing, and which included the justification of all believers in all nations. See Gal. iii, 8, 9. Now of this spiritual covenant, circumcision was the sign and the seal, and, being enjoined on all Abraham's posterity, was a constant publication of God's covenant grace among the descendants of Abraham, and its repetition a continual confirmation of that covenant. Baptism is, in like manner, the initiatory sign and seal of the same covenant, in its new and perfect form in Christ Jesus; otherwise the new covenant has no initiatory rite or sacrament. The argument that baptism has precisely the same federal and initiatory character as circumcision, and that it was instituted for the same ends, and in its place, is clearly established in several important passages of the New Testament. To these we can only refer (Col. ii, 10-12; Gal. iii, 27, 29; 1 Pet. iii, 21).

"The ultimate authority for infant baptism in the bosom of a regular Christian community and under a sufficient guarantee of pious education—for only on these terms do we advocate it—lies in the universal import of Christ's person and work, which extends as far as humanity itself. Christ is not only able, but willing to save mankind of all classes, in all circumstances, of both sexes, and at all stages of life, and consequently to provide for all these the necessary means of grace (comp. Gal. iii, 28). A Christ able and willing to save none but adults would be no such Christ as the Gospel presents. In the significant parallel, Rom. v, 12 sq., the apostle earnestly presses the point that the reign of righteousness and life is, in its divine intent and intrinsic efficacy, fully as comprehensive as the reign of sin and death, to which children among the rest are subject—nay, far more comprehensive and availing; and that the blessing and gain by the second Adam far outweigh the curse and the loss by the first. When the Lord, after solemnly declaring that all power is given to him in heaven and earth, commands his apostles to make all nations disciples (μαθητεύειν) by baptism and instruction, there is not the least reason for limiting this to those of maturer age. Or do nations consist only of men, and not of youth also, and children? According to Ps. cxvii, 1, 'all nations,' and according to Ps. cl, 6, 'every thing that hath breath,' should praise the Lord: and that these include babes and sucklings is explicitly told us in Ps. viii, 2, and Matt. xxi, 16. With this is closely connected the beautiful idea, already clearly brought out by Irenæus, the disciple of Polycarp, and the faithful medium of the apostolical tradition descending from John's field of labor—the idea that Jesus Christ became for children a child, for youth a youth, for men a man; and by thus entering into the various conditions and stages of our earthly existence, sanctified every period of life, infancy as well as manhood. The Baptist view robs the Saviour's infancy of its profound and cheering significance."—Schaff, Apost. Ch., § 143.

(iii.) The BAPTISTS reject infant baptism, and maintain that the ordinance is only to be administered to persons making a profession of faith in Christ. The arguments by which they seek to maintain this view are substantially as follows, viz.:

1. The commission of Christ to the disciples (Mark xvi, 15, 16) fixes instruction in the truths of the Gospel and belief in them as prerequisites to baptism.

2. The instances of baptism given in the N. T. are adduced as confirming this view. "Those baptized by John confessed their sins (Matt. iii, 6). The Lord Jesus Christ gave the command to teach and baptize (Matt. xxviii, 19; Mark xvi, 15, 16). At the day of Pentecost, they who gladly received the word were baptized, and they afterward continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship (Acts ii, 41, 42, 47). At Samaria, those who believed were baptized, both men and women (Acts viii, 12). The eunuch openly avowed his faith (in reply to Philip's statement, 'If thou believest with all thine heart thou mayest'), and went down into the water and was baptized (Acts viii, 35, 39). Saul of Tarsus, after his sight was restored, and he had received the Holy Ghost, arose and was baptized (Acts ix, 17, 18). Cornelius and his friends heard Peter, received the Holy Ghost, and were baptized (Acts x, 44-48). Lydia heard Paul and Silas; the Lord opened her heart, and she was baptized, and her household."

3. The Baptists further assert that the N. T. affords no single example of infant baptism. They explain the baptisms of "households" by the assumption that none of their members were infants.

4. They argue that if infant baptism be a Christian ordinance, it must be expressly enjoined in Scripture, which is not the case.

5. They argue, finally, that as "Christian faith is a personal matter, its profession ought to be a matter of free conviction and choice, which cannot be the case with infants."

V. The Minister of Baptism.—The administration by baptism is a function of the ministerial office (Matt. xxviii, 16-20). But it is the general opinion, both of the Roman and Protestant churches, that the presence of an ordained minister is not absolutely essential to the ordinance, and that, in extreme cases, it is lawful for lay persons to baptize. At the present day, not only lay baptism, but baptism administered by heretics, schismatics, and even women, is held to be valid by the Greek and Roman churches. The Lutherans also hold the same view. Baptism by midwives was admitted by the Church of England in extreme cases down to the Great Rebellion. Not that it was believed that laymen have the right to baptize, but that, the baptism having been once performed, it is valid to such an extent that rebaptism is improper. See BAPTISM (LAY).

VI. Repetition of Baptism.—In the third century the question arose whether the baptism of heretics was to be accounted valid, or whether a heretic who returned to the Catholic Church was to be rebaptized. In opposition to the usage of the Eastern and African churches, which was defended by Cyprian, the principle was established in the Roman Church under Stephen, that the right of baptism, if duly performed, was always valid, and its repetition contrary to the tradition of the church. In the next age Basil and Gregory of Nazianzen followed Cyprian's view, but by the influence of Augustine the Roman view became the prevalent one; but the Donatists maintained that heretics must be rebaptized. See DONATISTS (Hagenbach, Hist. of Doct., § 72 and 137, and references there). After the Reformation, the Roman Church, compelled by its old usage and principle, continued to acknowledge the validity of Protestant baptisms, while Protestants, in turn, admit the validity of Roman Catholic baptism.

VII. Sponsors or Godfathers.—Sponsors (called also godfathers and godmothers) are persons who, at the baptism of infants, answer for their future conduct, and solemnly promise that they will renounce the devil and all his works, and follow a life of purity and virtue; and by these means lay themselves under an indispensable obligation to instruct them and watch over their conduct. In the Roman Church the number of godfathers and godmothers is reduced to two; in the Church of England, to three; formerly the number was not limited. It is prohibited, in the Roman Church, to sponsors to marry their godchildren, or each other, or either parent of their godchild; nor may the baptizer marry the child baptized or its parent. The custom of having sponsors is not in use among the dissenting denominations in England, nor among the evangelical churches in America. The parents are held to be the proper persons to present their children for baptism, and to train them up afterward; indeed, while they live, no other persons can possibly take this duty from them. In the early church the parents were commonly the sponsors of infants. The duty of those who undertook the office of sponsor for adult persons was not to answer in their names, but to admonish and instruct them, both before and after baptism. In many churches this office was chiefly imposed upon the deacons and deaconesses. The only persons excluded from this office by the ancient Church were catechumens, emergents, heretics, and penitents; also persons not confirmand are excluded by some canons. Anciently one sponsor only was required for each person to be baptized, who was to be of the same sex as the latter in the case of adult persons; in the case of infants the sex was indifferent. The origin of the prohibition of sponsors marrying within the forbidden degrees of spiritual relationship appears to have been a law of Justinian, still extant in the Codex (lib. v, tit. 4, De Nuptiis, Leg. xxvi), which forbade a godfather to marry the woman for whom he had stood sponsor at baptism. The council in Trullo extended this prohibition to the marrying the mother of the baptized infant (can. 53); and it was subsequently carried to such an extent that the council of Trent (Sess. xxiv, De Reform. Matrimon. cap. ii) was compelled to relax it in some degree.—Bingham, xi, viii. See SPONSORS.

VIII. Ceremonies, Places, and Times of Baptism.—1. In the earlier ages of the Church there were several peculiarities in the mode of baptism which have now fallen into disuse, except, perhaps, in the Roman Catholic and Greek churches. Among these usages were trine immersion (i. e. dipping three times, once at the naming of each person in the Trinity, Tertull. Cont. Præf. xxvi), anointing with oil, giving milk and honey to the baptized person, etc. After the council of Nice, Christians added to baptism the ceremonies of exorcism and adjuration, to make evil spirits depart from the persons to be baptized. They made several signings with the cross, they used lighted candles, they gave salt to the baptized person to taste, and the priest touched his mouth and ears with spittle, and also blew and spat upon his face. At that time also baptized persons wore white garments till the Sunday following.

Three things were required of the catechumens immediately before their baptism: (1.) A solemn renunciation of the devil; (2.) A profession of faith in the words of some received creed; and (3.) An engagement to live a Christian life. The form of renunciation is given in the Const. Apost. lib. vii, cap. 41.

The time of administering the rite was subject to various changes; at first it was without limitation, Soon Easter and Whitsuntide were considered the most appropriate seasons, and Easter-eve deemed the most sacred; afterward, Epiphany and the festivals of the apostles and martyrs were selected in addition. From the tenth century the observance of the stated seasons fell into disuse, and children were required to be baptized within a month of their birth (Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xi, ch. vi; Coleman, Ancient Christianity, ch. xix). See IMPOSITION OF HANDS.

Until the time of Justin Martyr there appears to have been no fixed place for baptism, which was administered wherever it best suited; but in after times baptisteries were built near the churches, in which alone baptism might be administered. Baptism was not permitted to be conferred in private houses without the bishop's express license, and persons so baptized could never be received into priest's orders (Council of Neocaesæa, can. 2). Such private baptisms were called παιδικα βαπτισματα. Afterward the font appears to have been set up in the church porch, and thence was removed into the church itself. See BAPTISTERY.

2. The following are the baptismal ceremonies of the Church of Rome, though not all of universal obligation: (1.) The child is held without the Church, to signify an actual exclusion from heaven, which is symbolized by the Church. (2.) The priest blows three times in the face of the child, signifying thereby that the devil can be displaced only by the Spirit of God. (3.) The sign of the cross is made on the forehead and bosom of the child. (4.) The priest, having exorcised the salt (to show that the devil, until God prevents, avails himself of every creature in order to injure mankind), puts it into the mouth of the infant, signifying by it that wisdom which shall preserve him from corruption. (5.) The child is exorcised. (6.) The priest touches his mouth and ears with saliva, pronouncing the word Ephphatha. (7.) The child is unclothed, signifying the laying aside the old man. (8.) He is presented by the sponsors, who represent the Church. (9.) The renunciation of the devil and his works is made. (10.) He is anointed with oil. (11.) The profession of faith is made. (12.) He is questioned whether he will be baptized. (13.) The name of some saint is given to him, who shall be his example and protector. (14.) He is dipped thrice, or water is poured thrice on his head. (15.) He receives the kiss of peace. (16.) He is anointed on the head, to show that by baptism he becomes a king and a priest. (17.) He receives the lighted taper, to mark that he has become a child of light. (18.) He is folded in the alb, to show his baptismal purity (Elliott, Delineation of Romanism, i, 241).

The practice of exorcising water for baptism is kept up in the Roman Church to this day. It exhibits a thoroughly pagan spirit. The following formula, taken from the Rituale Romanum, is used at the ceremony of exorcising the water: "I exorcise thee, creature of water, by God + the living, by God + the true, by God + the holy; by God who, in the beginning, separated thee by a word from the dry land, whose Spirit over thee was borne, who from Paradise commanded thee to flow." Then follows the rubric: "Let him with his hand divide the water, and then pour some of it over the edge of the font toward the four quarters of the globe, and then proceed thus: I exorcise thee also by Jesus Christ his only Son, our Lord, who, in Cana of Galilee, changed thee by his wonderful power into wine; who walked upon thee on foot, and who was baptized in thee by John in Judæa, etc.; . . . that thou mayest be made water holy, water blessed, water which washes away our filth, and cleanses our guilty stain. Thee therefore I command—every foul spirit—every phantasm—every lie—be thou eradicated, and put to flight from the creature of water; that, to those who are to be baptized in it, it may become a fountain of water springing up into life eternal, regenerating them to God the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, in the name of the same our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall come again to judge the living and the dead, and the whole world by fire, Amen." Then follows a prayer, in which the priest supplicates the Almighty to send down the "ANGEL OF SANCTITY" over the waters thus prepared for the purpose of purification. Afterward the rubric directs that "he shall BLOW THREE TIMES upon the water, in three different directions, according to a prescribed figure, Ψ. In the next place, he is to deposit the incense upon the censor, and to incense the font. Afterward, pouring of the Oil of the Catechumens into the water after the form of a Cross, he says, with a loud voice, Let this font be sanctified, and made fruitful by the Oil of salvation for those who are born again thereby unto life eternal in the name of the Father +, and of the Son +, and of the Holy Ghost +, Amen." Then follows another rubric: "Next, he pours in of the CHRISM after the manner above mentioned, saying, Let this infusion of the Christ of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Ghost the Comforter, be made in the name of the sacred Trinity, Amen." Again: "Afterward he takes the two vessels of the before-mentioned holy Oil and Christ, and in pouring from each in the form of a Cross, he says, Let this mixture of the Christ of Sanctification, of the Oil of Unction, and of the Water of Baptism, be made together in the name of the Father +, and of the Son +, and of the Holy Ghost +, Amen." Finally, the rubric again directs as follows: "Then the vessel being put aside, he mingles with his right hold the holy Oil and the infused Chrism with the water, and sprinkles it all over the font. Then he wipes his hand upon (what is termed) medulla panis; and if any one is to be baptized, he baptizes him as above. But if there is no one to be baptized, he is forthwith to wash his hands, and the water of ablutio must be poured out into the sacrum (see Rit. Rom., p. 58.—Elliott, Delimitation of Romanism, bk. ii, ch. ii).

3. The ceremonies of baptism in the Protestant churches are generally very simple, consisting, as has been said, in the application of water, by sprinkling, pouring, or immersion, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Ritual services are fixed in the Church of England, and the same (or nearly the same) are used in the Protestant Episcopal Church in America (see Prayer-book, Ministration of Baptism). The same forms, omitting the sign of the cross, and those parts which imply baptismal regeneration (ex opere) and the use of sponsors, is used in the Methodist Episcopal Church (Discipline, pt. iv, ch. i). The Presbyterian Church prescribes no complete ritual, but gives certain rules in the Directory for Worship, ch. vii. The Reformed Dutch Church prescribes a simple and scriptural form (Constitution of R. D. Church, ed. Mentz, p. 93). The German Reformed Church admits sponsors, but they must be "in full communion with some Christian church" (Constitution, pt. iv); and a form approaching to that of the Methodist Episcopal Church is given in the Provisional Liturgy of 1858, p. 204. The Lutheran Church prescribes forms of baptism (Liturgy, § 4), and admits sponsors, who may be the parents of the child.

The sign of the cross is used in baptism in the Greek and Roman churches, and in the Church of England; it is optional in the Protestant Episcopal Church. See CROSS IN BAPTISM.

BAPTISM, LAY, baptism administered by unordained persons. In ordinary practice, the Christian Church has always held that baptism should be performed by ordained ministers (see above, Ministers of Baptism). Nevertheless, in case of necessity, baptism may be performed by any Christian, and is valid if performed according to Christ's order in Matt. xxviii, 19. It would be clearly wrong to assert that lay baptism is, under all circumstances, as regular as that by a minister; but it is also very difficult to decide that lay baptism is invalid where the services of a minister cannot be procured. The principle upon which this view of the case rests has been thus fairly stated by Hooker (Ecl. Polity, bk. v, lxii, 19): "The grace of baptism cometh by donation from God alone. That God hath committed the ministry of baptism unto special men, it is for order's sake in his church, and not to the end that their authority might give being, or add force to the sacrament itself. That infants have right to the sacrament of baptism we all acknowledge. Charge them we cannot as guiltful and wrongful possessors of that wherunto they have right, by the manifest will of the donor, and are not parties unto any defect or disorder in the manner of receiving the same. And, if any such disorder be, we have sufficiently before declared that, 'delictum cum capite super ambulat,' men's own faults are their own harms." From this reasoning (which appears to be just), the inference is, that in the case of lay baptism, infants are not deprived of whatever benefits and privileges belong to that sacrament, the administrator, in any instance, being alone responsible for the urgency of the circumstances under which he performs the rite. By the rubrics of the second and of the fifth of Edward VI it was ordered thus: "The pastors and curates shall often admonish the people, that without great cause and necessity they baptize not children at home in their houses; and when great need shall compel them so to do, that then they minister it in this fashion: First, let them that be present call upon God for his grace, and say the Lord's Prayer, if the time will suffer; and then one of them shall name the child and dip him in the water, or pour water upon him, saying these words: I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." But in the revision of the Prayer-Book after the Hampton Court Conference (1604), the rubrics were altered so as to exclude entirely this authority for lay baptism. Still, such baptism is not decided to be invalid. The Romanists admit its validity. See Procter On Common Prayer, p. 378, 382; Bingham, Orig. Ecl. bk. xvi, ch. i, § 4. On the practice of the Church of England with regard to lay baptism, see Bingham, Scholastical History of Lay Baptism (1712, 2 vols.), ch. iii, § 5, extracted in Henry, Compendium of Christian Antiquities, Appendix. See also Waterland, Letters on Lay Baptism (Works, vol. x); Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, § 137; Summers On Baptism, ch. iv. The Presbyterian Directory for Worship declares that "baptism is not to be unnecessarily delayed; nor to be administered, in any case, by any private person, but by a minister of Christ, called to be the steward of the mysteries of God" (ch. vii, § 1). The Reformed Confessions, so far as they speak on this point, generally oppose lay-baptism: see Conf. Helvet., ii, 20; Conf. Scoticae, xxii. Comp. also Calvin, Institutes, bk. iv, ch. xv, § 24.

BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD (ἵπτις τῶν νεκρῶν, 1 Cor. xv, 29). This difficult passage has given rise to multitudinous expositions. Among them are the following (see also Am. Presb. Rev., Jan. 1865):

1. The Corinthians (according to Suicer), and after them the Marcionites and other heretics, practised a sort of vicarious baptism in the case of those who had died unbaptized; that is, they caused a relation or friend of the dead person to be baptized in his stead, in the belief that such baptism would operate to obtain the remission of the sins of the deceased in the other world (Chrysostom, Hom. xi in 1 Cor., and Tertullian e. nra Marcion, lib. v, cap. 10). The apostle then drew an argument from the heretical practice to prove their belief in the resurrection.

2. Chrysostom, however, declares that Paul refers to the declaration made by each catechumen at his baptism, of his belief in the resurrection of the dead, meaning to say this: "If there is, in fact, no resurrection of the dead, why, then, art thou baptized for the dead, i. e. the body?" An improvement, perhaps, upon this interpretation would be to consider the ancient martyrs to be referred to, over whose remains the churches were often built (probably, however, not as yet), in which such vows were taken.

3. Among the best interpretations is that of Spanheim (see Wolf, Cur. in N. T., in loc.), which considers "the dead" to be martyrs and other believers, who, by firmness and cheerful hope of resurrection, have given in death a worthy example, by which others were also animated to receive baptism. Still, this meaning would be almost too briefly and enigmatically expressed, when no particular reason for it is known, while also the allusion to the exemplary death of many Christians could chiefly apply to the martyrs alone, of whom there were as yet none at Corinth. This interpretation, however, may perhaps also be improved if Christ be considered as prominently referred to among those deceased, by virtue of whose resurrection all his followers expect to be likewise raised.

4. Olshausen's interpretation is of a rather doubtful character. The meaning of the passage he takes to be, that "all who are converted to the church are baptized for the good of the dead, as it requires a certain number (Rom. xi, 12-25), a 'fulness' of believers, before the resurrection can take place. Every one, therefore, who is baptized is for the good of believers collectively, and of those who have already died in the Lord." Olshausen is himself aware that the apostle could not have expected that such a difficult and remote idea, which he himself calls "a mystery," would be understood by his readers without a further explanation and development of his doctrine. He therefore proposes an explanation, in which it is argued that the miseries and hardships Christians have to struggle against in this life can only be compensated by resurrection. Death causes, as it were, vacancies in the full ranks of the believers, which are again filled up by other individuals. "What would it profit those who are baptized in the place of the dead (to fill up their place in the community if there be no resurrection?" — Kitto, p. v.

5. None of these explanations, however, well suits the signification of ἵπτις, "for," i. e. in behalf of, on account of, and is, at the same time, consistent in other respects. Dr. Trogellus (Printed Text of the Gr. Test., p. 216) has proposed a slight emendation of the text that appears to obviate the difficulty almost entirely.

It consists simply in the following punctuation: "Else what shall they do which are baptized? [It is] for the dead, if the dead rise not at all," i. e. we are baptized merely in the name of (for the sake of, out of regard to) dead persons, namely, Christ and the prophets who testified of him. This interpretation renders No. 3 above more easy of adoption.

Treatises entitled De baptismo ἵπτις τῶν νεκρῶν have been written by Schmidt (Argent. 1656), Calon (Vitæ, 1684), Deutsch (Regiom. 1698), Græde (Gryph. 1690), Hasæus (Brem. 1725), Müller (Rost. 1665), Olearius (Lips. 1704), Reichmann (Vitæ, 1652), Schenck (Francq. 1667), Zentschner (Fest. a. V. 1706), Facius (Col. 1792), Neumann (Jen. 1740), Nöhling (Sus. 1784), Richter (Zwic. 1803), Heumann (Isen. 1710, Jen. 1740), Streccius (Jen. 1736).

BAPTISM OF THE DEAD, a superstitious custom which anciently prevailed among the people in Africa of baptizing the dead. The third council of Carthage (canon vi) speaks of it as a matter of which ignorant Christians were fond, and forbids "to believe that the dead can be baptized." Gregory Nazianzen also observes that the same superstitious opinion prevailed among some who delayed to be baptized. It is also mentioned by Philastrius (De Hæres., cap. 2) as the general error of the Montanists or Cataphrygians, that they baptized men after death. The practice seems to be founded on a vain opinion that when men had neglected to receive baptism during their life, some compensation might be made for this default by receiving it after death. See Burton, Bampton Lectures, art. 78; Bingham, Orig. Eccl., bk. xi, ch. iv, § 3.

BAPTISM OF FIRE. The words of John the Baptist (Matt. iii, 11), "He that cometh after me shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire," have given occasion to various interpretations. Some of the fathers (e. g. John Damascenus) hold it to mean the everlasting fire of hell. Others of the fathers (as Chrysostom, Hom. 11 in Matt.) declare that by fire in this passage the Baptist means the Holy Spirit, who, as fire, should destroy the pollutions of sin in the regeneration conferred by holy baptism. Others again, as Hilary and Ambrose, as well as Origen, believe it to mean a purifying fire through which the faithful shall pass before entering Paradise, thus giving rise to the Romish doctrine of purgatory. Others think that it means the fire of tribulations and sorrows; others, the abundance of graces; others, the fire of penitence and self-mortification, etc. (Suicer, Thesaurus, p. 629). Some old heretics, as the Selencians and Ihermians, understood the passage literally, and maintained that material fire was necessary in the administration of baptism; but we are not told either how, or to what part of the body they applied it, or whether they obliged the baptized to pass through or over the flames. Valentinus rebaptized those who had received baptism out of his sect, and drew them through the fire; and Heraclion, who is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus, says that some applied a red-hot iron to the ears of the baptized, as if to impress on them some mark.

The simplest and most natural view is that the passage is not to be interpreted of any separate form of baptism from that "with the Holy Ghost;" but the expression "with fire" is epecegetical, or explanatory of the words "with the Holy Ghost." Such a mode of expression, in which the connecting particle and only introduces an amplification of the former idea, is very common in the Scriptures. The sense will therefore be, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, through the outward symbol of fire," viz. the "cloven tongues like as of fire" (Acts ii, 3). See PENTECOST; HOLY GHOST. It must be admitted, however, against this view, that "fire" elsewhere is the symbol of vengeance or destruction, and that in all the parallel passages it has this import (see Kuinol in loc.). It would therefore be more appropriate to understand the fiery baptism to be the temporal and eternal punishments to which the Jews were exposed, in contrast with the spiritual baptism offered as the other alternative (comp. the context in Matt. and Luke; also the parallel passages in Acts). See FIRE.

Baptistry, a place or room set apart for performing baptism. We have no account in the New Testament of any such separated places. John and the disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ baptized in the Jordan. But baptism could be administered in other places (see Acts viii, 36, 37; xvi, 13-16). There was a public baptism of three thousand converts on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii, 41), but no account is given of the place. Examples also occur in the Acts of the Apostles of baptism in private houses. Passages in the writings of Justin Martyr, Clement, and Tertullian show that, during their time, there were no baptisteries. In later times the baptistry was one of the credoe, or buildings distinct from the church itself, and consisted of the porch, where the person about to be baptized made the confession of faith, and an inner room, where the ceremony was performed. Thus it remained till the sixth century, when the baptistry was taken into the church porch, and afterward into the church itself. The ancient baptisteries were sometimes called φοριστήρια (illuminatoria), either because baptism was sometimes called φωτισμός, illumination, or because they were places of illumination or instruction, preceding baptism, where the catechumens were taught the first principles of the Christian faith. We occasionally meet with the word καλνπ βίφρα, or piscina (the font). The octagonal or circular form was adopted, surmounted with a dome, and the baptistry was situated at the entrance to the principal or western gate. These edifices are of considerable antiquity, since one was prepared for the ceremonial of the baptism of Clovis. It is not possible to decide at what period they began to be multiplied, and at length united to, or changed into parish churches; yet it appears that the alteration took place when stated seasons of baptism ceased, and the right of administration was ceded to all presbyters and deacons. The word baptistry is now applied also to the baptismal font.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. viii, ch. vii, § 1-4; Farrar, s. v.

Baptists, a name given to these Christian denominations which reject the validity of infant baptism, and hold that the ordinance of baptism can be administered only to those who have made a personal profession of faith in Christ. The Baptist churches also, in general, maintain that the entire immersion of the body is the only scriptural mode of baptism; yet the Mennonites, who are generally regarded as Baptists, use sprinkling. The name Baptist, as assumed by the Baptist denominations, of course implies that they alone maintain the Christian doctrine and practice of baptism; and in this sense their right to this distinctive name is denied by all other Christian denominations, as well as the similar claims of the Unitarians and (Roman) Catholics to their respective names. But, as established by usage, without having regard to its original signification, it is now generally adopted. The name Anabaptist is rejected by the Baptists as a term of reproach, because they protest against being identified with the Anabaptists of Munster and as also incorrect, because most of their members receive the rite for the first time on their admission to a Baptist church.

I. History.—1. Before the sixteenth Century.—All Baptists, of course, claim that the apostolic church was essentially Baptist, and that infant baptism is an innovation. But Baptist writers differ concerning the time of the introduction of infant baptism, and also as to the question whether it is possible to trace an uninterrupted succession of Baptist churches from the apostles' time down to the present. Some Baptist writers have attempted to trace this succession, as Orchard (History of Foreign Baptists, Lond. 1838), who gives, as the summing up of his researches, that "all Christian communities during the first three centuries were of the Baptist denomination in constitution and practice. In the middle of the third century the Novatian Baptists established separate and independent societies, which continued until the end of the sixth age, when these communities were succeeded by the Paterines, which continued until the Reformation (1517). The Oriental Baptist churches, with their successors, the Paulicians, continued in their purity until the tenth century, when they visited France, re-enscating and extending the Christian profession in Languedoc, where they flourished till the crusading army scattered, or drowned in blood, one million of unoffending professors. The Baptists in Piedmont and Germany are exhibited as existing under different names down to the Reformation. These churches, with their genuine successors, the Mennonites of Holland, are connectedly and chronologically detailed to the present period."

This view is, however, far from being shared by all Baptists. The leading Baptist Quarterly of America, The Christian Review (Jan. 1855, p. 23), remarks as follows: "We know of no assumption more arrogant, and more destitute of proper historic support, than that which claims to be able to trace the distinct and unbroken existence of a church substantially Baptist from the time of the apostles down to our own." Thus also Cutting (Historic Indications, Boston, 1859, p. 14) remarks on such attempts: "I have little confidence in the results of any attempt of that kind which have met my notice, and I attach little value to inquiries pursued for the predetermined purpose of such a demonstration."

The non-Baptist historians of the Christian Church almost unanimously assert that infant baptism was practised from the beginning of Christianity [see BAPTISM], and generally maintain that no organized body holding Baptist principles can be found before the rise of the Anabaptists (q. v.), about 1520. See PAULICIANS; LOLLARDS; WALDENSES. Soon after the Anabaptists, Menno (q. v.) renounced the doctrines of the Roman church, and organized (after 1536) a Baptist denomination, which spread widely, especially in Germany and Holland, and still exists. See MENNONITES.

2. Great Britain.—Whether and to what extent Baptist principles were held in Great Britain before the sixteenth century is still a matter of historic controversy. In 1535 Henry VIII ordered sixteen Dutchmen to be put to death for being Anabaptists, and in 1539, 39 persons were exiled because they rejected infant baptism. The general pardon of 1550 excepted the Baptists. Elizabeth commanded all Anabaptists to depart out of the kingdom within 21 days. King James refused all concessions to Baptists, as well as to Nonconformists in general. At the beginning of the seventeenth century, Mr. Smyth (1610), a leading minister among the Baptists, published a work against persecution, but it called forth a new proclamation against the Baptists and their looks, and in 1611, another Baptist, Mr. Wightman, was burned. Cromwell protected the Baptists, but they were again persecuted under Charles II and James II. The Toleration Act of William III, 1689, recognised them as the third dissenting denomination. The first Baptist churches were Arminian; a Calvinistic Baptist church was established about 1633. In 1610 there were 7 Baptist congregations in London, and about 40 more in the country. Those who held Arminian views received the name General, those who held Calvinistic views, the name Particular Baptists. Many General Baptists adopted Arianism and Socinianism; and in 1770, the orthodox portion seceded, and formed what is known as the "New Connection of General Baptists." In 1792 William Carey prevailed on the Nottingham Association to found the Baptist Missionary Society, an event of the utmost importance in the history of the Christian church in general, for from it dates the awakening of a new zeal in the European and American churches for the conversion of the pagan world. In 1842 the Baptist Missionary Society reported at its "jubilee" that it had translated the Scriptures, wholly or in part, into forty-four languages or dialects of India, and printed, of the Scriptures alone, in foreign languages nearly half a million.

Among the earliest writers of the Baptist denomination in England were Edward Barker, Samuel Richardson, Christopher Blackwood, Hansard Knollys, Francis Cornwell, and in the latter half of the seventeenth century, Jeremiah Ives, John Tombes, John Norcott, Henry D'Anvers, Benjamin and Elias Keach, Edward Hutchinson, Thomas Grantham, Nehemiah Cox, D.D., Thomas de Launne, and Dr. Russell Collins. But by far the most celebrated of all Baptist writers is John Bunyan. John Milton also is claimed by the Baptists, though not as a member of their denomination, at least as a professor of their distinctive principles; for they say he "composed his two most elaborate, painstaking volumes to prove from the Scriptures the divine origin and authority of the distinguishing principles of Baptists." Among the Baptist writers in the early part of the eighteenth century were Samuel Ewen, John Brine, Benjamin Bedlome, the three Stennetts (Joseph Stennett, Joseph Stennett, jun., D.D., Samuel Stennett, D.D.), John Evans, LL.D., J. H. Evans, Dr. Gale, the famous Dr. Gill, Joseph Burroughs, William Zoat, Caleb Evans, D.D., Abraham Booth, and Joseph Jenkins. Toward the close of the last and the beginning of the present century, the Baptist denomination had a large number of writers, among whom were William Jones, Thomas Le-wellyn, William Richards, Robert Hall, John Foster, Andrew Fuller, Christopher Anderson, and Joseph Ivimey. The Rev. F. A. Cox (a Baptist writer) states (Ecce. Metrop.), however, that, "till of late years, Baptist literature must be regarded as, on the whole, somewhat inferior." Cox enumerates among the great men of the English Baptists, "Gale and Carson for Greek scholarship; Gill for Hebrew knowledge and rabbinical lore; Carey for Oriental research; Fuller for theological wisdom and controversial acuteness; Hughes for the union of elegant taste and public zeal in the formation of the Bible and Tract Societies; Foster for the reach and profundity of his mind; and Hall as the most chaste and beautiful of writers, and, perhaps, the greatest of English preachers." More recently, the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon acquired the reputation of being one of the most popular preachers of the nineteenth century. Sir Morton Peto has become a prominent member of the House of Commons. See Crowell, Literature of American Baptists in Missionary Jubilee (p. 100, 105).

3. United States.—The Baptist churches in the United States owe their origin to Roger Williams (q. v.), who, before his immersion, was an Episcopalian minister. He was persecuted for opposing the authority of the state in ecclesiastical affairs and for principles which "tended to Anabaptism." In 1639 he was immersed by Ezekiel Holliman, and in turn immersed Holliman and ten others, who with him organized a Baptist Church at Providence, Rhode Island. A few years before (1635), though unknown to Williams, a Baptist preacher of England, Hansard Knollys, had settled in New Hampshire and taken charge of a church in Dover; but he resigned in 1639 and returned to England. Williams obtained in 1644 a charter for the colony which he and his associates had founded in Rhode Island, with full and entire freedom of conscience. Rhode Island thus became the first Christian state which ever granted full religious liberty. In the other British colonies the persecution against the Baptists continued a long time. Massachusetts issued laws against them in 1644, imprisoned several Baptists in 1651, and banished others in 1669. In 1680 the doors of a Baptist meeting-house were nailed up. In New York laws were issued against them in 1662, in Virginia in 1604. With the beginning of the eighteenth century the persecution greatly abated. They were released from tithes in 1727 in Massachusetts, in 1729 in New Hampshire and Connecticut, but not before 1785 in Virginia. The spread of their principles was greatly hindered by these persecutions, especially in the South, where in 1776 they counted about 100 societies. After the Revolution they spread with extraordinary rapidity, especially in the South and South-west, and were inferior in this respect only to the Methodists. In 1817 a triennial general convention was organized, which, however, has since been discontinued. In 1845 the discussion of the slavery question led to a division of the Northern and Southern Baptists. The destruction of slavery, in consequence of the failure of the Great Rebellion and the adoption of the constitutional amendment in 1865, led to efforts to reunite the societies of the Northern and the Southern States. The Northern associations generally expressed a desire to co-operate again with their Southern brethren in the fellowship of Christian labor, but they demanded from the Southern associations a profession of loyalty to the United States government, and they themselves deemed it necessary to repeat the testimony which, during the war, they had, at each annual meeting, borne against slavery. The Southern associations that met during the year 1865 were unanimous in favor of continuing their former separate societies, and against fraternization with the Northern societies. They censured the American Baptist Home Missionary Society for proposing, without consultation or co-operation with the churches, associations, conventions, or organized boards of the Southern States, to appoint ministers and missionaries to preach and raise churches within the bounds of the Southern associations. Some of the Southern associations, like that of Virginia, consequently advised the churches "to decline any co-operation or fellowship with any of the missionaries, ministers, or agents of the American Baptist Home Mission Society." A number of negro Baptist churches in the Southern States separated from the Southern associations, and either connected themselves with those of the North, or organized, with the co-operation of the Northern missionaries, independent associations. Divisions among the American Baptists commenced early to take place; see SIX-PRINCIPLE BAPTISTS; SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS; SEVENTH-DAY GERMAN BAPTISTS; ANTI-MISSION BAPTISTS; FREE-WILL BAPTISTS; DISCIPLES; CHURCH OF GOD. Some divisions have become extinct, as the Rogerores, organized in 1650 in Connecticut, and called after Jonathan Rogers. They observed the seventh day instead of Sunday, and believed in spiritual marriages. The Free or Open Communion Baptists, who were organized about 1810, united in 1841 with the Free-will Baptists.

The Baptist literature of the United States begins in the seventeenth century with the pleas of Roger Williams and his companion, John Clarke, for religious liberty. Contributions to the denominational literature were also made by the Wightmans, of Connecticut (Valentine, Timothy, and John Gano), the two Abel Morgans, John Callender, and Benjamin Griffith. The first Baptist book on Systematic Theology was published in 1700 by the Rev. John Watts. About the middle of the eighteenth century the Rev. Isaac Backus commenced his literary career. He was followed by the Rev. Dr. Stillman, Rev. Morgan Edwards, Samuel Shepard, Rev. William Rogers, Rev. Richard Furman, and the eccentric John Leland. Fruitful authors at the beginning of the present century were Thomas Baldwin, D.D., Rev. Henry Holcombe, James Manning, D.D., Rev. Dr. Stanford, Rev. Dr. Mercer, Rev. A. Broadbudd, Rev. Jonathan Maxey, D.D., and Rev. William Staughton, D.D. The literature of the last fifty years is very numerous. We give below (from Crowell, Literature of the American Baptists during the last fifty years, in Missionary Jubilee, N. 4. Content of Europe.—After the extirpation of the Anabaptists, the Baptist principles were represented on the European continent almost exclusively by the Mennonites (q. v.). In 1834 a Baptist society was organized in Hamburg by Oncken, a native German, who was immersed in the Elbe in 1833 by Dr. Sears, since which time the Baptists have spread rapidly in Northern Europe. In several states, as Sweden and Mecklenburg, they met with cruel persecution, but in Hamburg they were recognised by the state in 1859. Besides the independent churches organized by them, Baptist doctrine, or at least the rejection of paedobaptism, has found some adherents in several other churches, e. g. some pastors in the Free Evangelical churches of France, in the Reformed State Church of France, and in the Free Apostolic Church, founded in 1856 in Norway. Among the missions established by the Baptists in Asia, Africa, and Australasia, those in India, especially those among the Karens in Burmah (q. v.), have been the most successful. The Karen mission not only counts numerous congregations, but is already the nucleus of a Christian nation.

II. Doctrines and Government.—The Baptists have no standard Confession of Faith. As their churches are independent, each adopts its own articles of religion. In England, as has been stated above, the "Old Connection" are chiefly Socinians; the "New Connection," evangelical Arminians; the "Particular Baptists," Calvinists of various shades. In the Unit d States, the regular Baptists are for the most part Calvinists, perhaps of a stricter order than their British brethren. The Baptists generally form "Associations," which, however, exercise no jurisdiction over the churches. They recognise no higher church officers than pastors and deacons. Elders are sometimes ordained as evangelists and missionaries. Between clergy and laity they recognise no other distinction but that of office.

Though Regular Baptists accept of no authority other than the Bible for their faith and practice, yet nearly all of the societies have a confession of faith in pamphlet form for distribution among its members. The following form, generally known as the "New Hampshire Confession of Faith," is perhaps in more general use among the societies in the North and East, while the "Philadelphia Confession of Faith" is that generally adopted in the South. We give both:

Confession of Faith of Regular Baptists (Northern).

1. The Scriptures.—We believe that the Holy Bible was written by men divinely inspired, and is a perfect treasure of heavenly instruction; that it has God for its author, salvation for its end, and truth, without any mixture of error, for its matter; that it reveals the principles by which God will judge us; and therefore is, and shall remain to the end of the world, the true centre of Christian union, and the supreme standard by which all human conduct, creeds, and opinions should be tried.

2. The True God.—We believe the Scriptures teach that there is one, and only one, living and true God, an infinite, intelligent Spirit, whose name is JEHOVAH, the Maker and Supreme Ruler of heaven and earth; inexpressibly glorious in holiness, and worthy of all possible honor, confidence, and love; that in the unity of the Godhead there are three persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, equal in every divine perfection, and executing distinct but harmonious offices in the great work of redemption.

3. The Fall of Man.—We believe the Scriptures teach that man was created in holiness, under the law of his Maker; but by voluntary transgression fell from that holy and happy state; in consequence of which all mankind are now sinners, not by constraint, but choice; being by nature utterly void of that holiness required by the law of God, positively inclined to evil, and therefore under just condemnation to eternal ruin, without defence or excuse.

4. The Way of Salvation.—We believe the Scriptures teach that the salvation of sinners is wholly of grace, through the mediatorial offices of the Son of God, who, by the appointment of the Father, freely took upon him our nature, yet without sin; honored the divine law by his personal obedience, and by his death made a full atonement for our sins; that, having risen from the dead, he is now enthroned in heaven; and uniting in his word and truth person the tenderest sympathies with divine perfections, he is every way qualified to be a suitable, a compassionate, and an all-sufficient Saviour.

5. Justification.—We believe the Scriptures teach that the great Gospel blessing which Christ secures to such as believe in him is justification; that justification includes the pardon of sin and the promise of eternal life on principles of righteousness; that it is bestowed, not in consideration of any works of righteousness which we have done, but solely through faith in the Redeemer's blood, by virtue of which faith his merit of righteousness is freely imputed to us of God; that it brings us into a state of most blessed peace and favor with God, and secures every other blessing needful for time and eternity.

6. Sanctification.—We believe the Scriptures teach that the blessings of salvation are made free to all by the Gospel; that it is the immediate duty of all to accept them by a cordial, penitent, and obedient faith; and that nothing prevents the salvation of the greatest sinner on earth but his own determined depravity and voluntary rejection of the Gospel, which rejection involves him in an aggravated condemnation.

7. Regeneration.—We believe the Scriptures teach that in order to be saved sinners must be regenerated, or born again; that regeneration consists in giving a holy disposition to the mind; that it is effected in a manner above our comprehension by the power of the Holy Spirit, in connection with divine truth, so as to cause our voluntary obedience to the Gospel; and that its proper evidence appears in the holy fruits of repentance, and faith, and newness of life.

8. Repentance and Faith.—We believe the Scriptures teach that repentance and faith are sacred duties, and also inseparable graces, wrought in our souls by the regenerating Spirit of God, whereby, being deeply convinced of our guilt, danger, and helplessness, and of the way of salvation by Christ, we turn to God with unfeigned contrition, confession, and supplication for mercy; at the same time heartily receiving the Lord Jesus Christ as our prophet, priest, and king, and relying on him alone as the only and all-sufficient Saviour.

9. God's Purpose of Grace.—We believe the Scriptures teach that election is the eternal purpose of God, according to which he graciously regenerates, sanctifies, and saves sinners; that being perfectly consistent with the free agency of man, it comprehends all the means in connection with the end; that it is a most glorious display of God's sovereign goodness, being infinitely true, wise, holy, and unchangeable; that it utterly excludes boasting, and promotes humility, love, prayer, praise, trust in God, and active imitation of his free mercy; that it encourages the use of means in the highest degree; that it may be ascertained by its effects in all who truly believe the Gospel; that it is the foundation of Christian assurance; and that to ascertain it with regard to ourselves demands and deserves the utmost diligence.

10. Sanctification.—We believe the Scriptures teach that sanctification is the process by which, according to the will of God, we are made partakers of his holiness; that it is a progressive work; that it is begun in regeneration; and that it is carried on in the heart of believers by the presence and power of the Holy Spirit, the Sealer and Comforter, in the continual use of the appointed means—especially the word of God, self-examination, self-denial, watchfulness, and prayer.

11. Persistence of Saints.—We believe the Scriptures teach that such only are real believers as endure unto the end; that their persevering attachment to Christ is the grand mark which distinguishes them from superficial professors; that a special Providence watches over their welfare; and they are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation.

12. The Last and Gospel.—We believe the Scriptures teach that the law of God is the eternal and unchangeable rule of his moral government; that it is holy, just, and good; and that the inability which the Scripture ascribes to fallen man to fulfil its precepts arises entirely from their love of sin; to deliver them from which, and to restore them through a Mediator to an eternal obedience to the holy law, is one great end of the Gospel, and of the means of grace connected with the establishment of the visible church.

13. A Church of Christ.—We believe the Scriptures teach that a visible church is a congregation of baptized believers, associated by covenant in the faith and fellowship of the Gospel; observing the ordinances of Christ; governed by his laws; and exercising the rights, and privileges invested in them by his word; that its officers, who are pastors, elders, and deacons, or just as the Scriptures define them, are to be faithful and diligent in their duties.

14. Baptism and the Lord's Supper.—We believe the Scriptures teach that Christian baptism is the immersion in water of a believer, into the name of the Father, and Son, and Holy Ghost; to show forth in a solemn and beautiful emblem our faith in the crucified, buried, and risen Saviour, with its effect in our death to sin and resurrection to a new life; that it is prerequisite to the privileges of church relation, and to the Lord's supper, in which the members of the church, by the course of bread and wine, are to communicate together the dying love of Christ, preceded always by solemn self-examination.

15. The Christian Sabbath.—We believe the Scriptures teach that the first day of the week is the Lord's day, or Christian Sabbath; and it is to be kept sacred to religious purposes by abstaining from all secular labor and sinful recreation, by the devout observance of all the means of grace, both private and public, and by preparation for that rest which remaineth for the people of God.

16. Civil Government.—We believe the Scriptures teach that civil government is of divine appointment, for the interest and good order of human society; and that magistrates are to be prayed for, conscientiously honored and obeyed, except only in things opposed to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the only Lord of the conscience, and the Prince of the kings of the earth.

17. Righteous and Wicked.—We believe the Scriptures teach that there is a radical and essential difference between the righteous and the wicked; that such only as through faith are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and sanctified by the Spirit of our God, are truly righteous in his esteem; while all such as continue in impotence and unbelief are, in his sight, wicked and under the curse; and this distinction holds among men both in and after death.

18. The World to Come.—We believe the Scriptures teach that the end of the world is approaching; that at the last day Christ will descend from heaven, and raise the dead from the grave for final retribution; that a solemn separation will then take place; that the wicked will be adjudged to endless punishment, and the righteous to endless joy; and that this judgment will fix forever the final state of men in heaven or hell, on principles of righteousness.

19. Communion.—Having been, as we trust, brought by divine grace to embrace the Lord Jesus Christ, and to give ourselves wholly to him, we do now solemnly and joyfully covenant with each other to WALK TOGETHER IN HIM, WITH BROTHERLY LOVE, to his glory as our common Lord. We do therefore, in his strength, engage—

That we will exercise a Christian care and watchfulness over each other, and faithfully warn, exhort, and admonish each other on each occasion may require:

That we will not forsake the assembling of ourselves together, but will uphold the public worship of God and the ordinances of his house:

That we will not omit closet and family religion at home, nor neglect the great duty of religiously training our children and those under our care for the service of Christ and the enjoyment of heaven:

That, as we are the light of the world and salt of the earth, we will seek divine aid to enable us to deny ungodliness, and even worldly lust, and to walk circumspectly in the world, that we may win the souls of men:

That we will cheerfully contribute of our property, according as God has prospered us, for the maintenance of a faithful and evangelical ministry among us, for the support of the poor, and to spread the Gospel over the earth:

That we will in all conditions, even till death, strive to live to the glory of him who hath called us out of darkness into his marvelous light.

And may the God of peace, who brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make us perfect in every good work, to do his will, working in us that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory forever and ever. AMEN.

Confession of Faith of Baptist Churches (Southern).

1. His Scripture.—The Holy Scripture is the only sufficient, certain, and infallible rule of all saving knowledge, faith, and obedience; the supreme judge by which all controversies of religion are to be determined, and all decrees of councils, opinions of ancient writers, doctrines of men, and private spirits, are to be examined, and in whose sentence we are to rest.

2. God the Trinity.—The Lord our God is but one only living and true God, infinite in being and perfection. In this divine and infinite being there are three subsistencies, the Father, the Word (or Son), and Holy Spirit, of one substance, power, and eternity.

3. God's Decree.—Those of mankind that are predestinated to life, God, before the foundation of the world was laid, according to his eternal and immutable purpose, and the secret counsel and good pleasure of his will, hath chose in Christ unto everlasting glory, out of his mere free grace and love, without any other thing in the creature as a condition or cause moving him thereto. As God hath appointed the elect unto glory, so he hath, by the eternal and most free purpose of his will, foreordained all the means thereto; who refuse they who are elected, being fallen in Adam, are redeemed by Christ, are effectually called unto faith by Christ, by his Spirit working in the season, are justified, adopted, sanctified, and kept by his power through faith unto salvation.

4. The Fall of Man and Sin.—Although God created man upright and perfect, and gave to him a righteous law, yet he did not long abide in this honor, but did wilfully transgress the command given unto him in eating the forbidden fruit; which God was pleased, according to his wise and holy counsel, to permit, having purposed to order it to his own glory. Our first parents, by this sin, fell from their original righteousness and communion with God, whereby death came upon all;

all becoming dead in sin, and wholly defiled in all the faculties and parts of soul and body. They being the root, corrupted nature, conveyed to all their posterity, descending from them by ordinary generation, being now conceived in sin, and by natural children of wrath.

5. God's Covenant.—Man having brought himself under the curse of the law by his fall, it pleased the Lord to reveal the Covenant of Grace, wherein he freely offereth unto sinners life and salvation by Jesus Christ, requiring of them faith in him that they might be saved; and promising to give unto all those that are ordained unto eternal life his Holy Spirit, to make them willing and able to believe.

6. Christ the Mediator.—The Son of God, the second person in the Holy Trinity, being very and eternal God, the brightness of the Father's glory, of one substance, and equal with him, who made the world, who upholdeth and governeth all things he hath made, did, when the fullness of time was come, take upon him man's nature, with all the essential properties and common infirmities thereof, yet without sin—so that two whole, perfect, and distinct natures were inseparably joined together in one person, which person is very God and very man, yet one Christ, the only Mediator between God and man.

7. Redemption.—The Lord Jesus, by his perfect obedience and sacrifice of himself, which he, through the eternal Spirit, once offered up unto God, hath fully satisfied the justice of God, procured reconciliation, and purchased an everlasting inheritance in the kingdom of heaven for all those whom the Father hath given unto him.

To all those for whom Christ hath obtained eternal redemption he doth certainly and effectually apply and communicate the same; making intercession for them; uniting them to himself by his Spirit; revealing unto them, in and by the word, the mystery of salvation; persuading them to believe and obey; governing their hearts by his word and Spirit, and overcoming all their enemies by his almighty power and wisdom, in such manner and ways as are most consonant to his wonderful and unsearchable disposition, and all of free and absolute grace, without any condition foreseen in them to procure it.

8. The Will.—Man, by his fall into a state of sin, hath wholly lost all will to any spiritual good accompanying salvation; so as a natural man, being altogether averse from that good, and dead in sin, is not able by his own strength to convert himself, or to prepare himself thereunto.

When God converts a sinner, and translates him into a state of grace, he freeth him from his natural bondage under sin, and by his grace alone enables him freely to will and to do that which is spiritually good.

9. Election and Calling.—Those whom God hath predestinated unto life he pleases, in his appointed and accepted time, effectually to call by his word and Spirit out of that state of sin and death in which they are by nature, to grace of salvation by Jesus Christ.

10. Justification.—Those whom God effectually calleth he also freely justifieth, accounting and accepting their persons as righteous; not for anything wrought in them or done by them, but for Christ's sake alone.

11. Adoption.—All those that are justified, God vouchsafeth, in and for the sake of his only Son, Jesus Christ, to make partakers of the grace of adoption, by which they are taken into the number, and enjoy the liberties and privileges of children of God.

12. Sanctification.—They who are united to Christ, effectually called and regenerated, having a new heart and a new spirit created in them, through the virtue of Christ's death and resurrection, are also further sanctified, really and personally, through the same virtue, by his word and Spirit dwelling in them.

13. Saving Faith.—The grace of faith, whereby the elect are enabled to believe to the saving of their souls, is the work of the Spirit of Christ in their hearts, and is ordinarily wrought by the ministry of the word.

14. Repentance.—Saving repentance is an evangelical grace, whereby a person, being by the Holy Spirit made sensible of the manifold evils of his sin, doth, by faith in Christ, humble himself for it, with godly sorrow, detestation of it, and self-abhorrence.

15. Good Works.—Good works, done in obedience to God's commandments, are the fruits and evidences of a true and lively faith.

16. Perserverance.—Those whom God hath accepted in the Beloved, effectually called and sanctified by his Spirit, shall certainly persevere therein to the end, and be eternally saved.

17. Moral Law.—The moral law doth forever bind all, as well justified persons as others, to the obedience thereof, and that not only in regard to the matter contained in it, but also in respect of the authority of God the Creator who gave it; neither doth Christ in the Gospel any way dissolve, but much strengthen this obligation.

18. The Sabbath.—God, by his word, in a positive, moral, and perpetual commandment, binding all men, in all ages, hath particularly appointed one day in seven for a Sabbath to be kept holy unto him, which, from the beginning of the world to the resurrection of Christ, was the last day of the week; and from the resurrection of Christ was changed into the first day of the week, which he called the Lord's day.

19. The Church.—The Lord Jesus Christ is the head of the church, in whom, by the appointment of the Father, all power for the calling, institution, order, or government of the church is invested in a supreme and sovereign manner. In the ex-

tion of this power, the Lord Jesus calleth out of the world unto himself, through the ministry of his word, by his Spirit, those that are given unto him by his Father, that they may walk before him in all the ways of obedience, which he prescribeth to them in his word.

20. Church Officers.—A particular church gathered, and completely organized according to the mind of Christ, consists of officers and members; and the officers appointed by Christ to be chosen and set apart by the church are bishops, or elders, and deacons.

21. Ministry, their Duty and Swjort.—The work of pastors being constantly to attend the service of Christ, in his churches, in the ministry of the word, and prayer, with watching for their souls, as they that must give an account to him, it is incumbent on the churches to whom they minister not only to give them all due respect, but to communicate to them of all their good things, according to their ability.

22. Baptism.—Baptism is an ordinance of the New Testament, ordained by Jesus Christ to be unto the party baptized a sign of his fellowship with him in his death and resurrection; of his being ingrafted into him; of remission of sins; and of his giving up unto God, through Jesus Christ, to live and walk in newness of life. Those who do actually profess repentance toward God, and obedience to our Lord Jesus Christ, are the only proper subjects of this ordinance. The outward element to be used in this ordinance is water, wherein the party is to be immersed, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

23. Lord's Supper.—The supper of the Lord Jesus was instituted by him, the same night wherein he was betrayed, to be observed in his churches unto the end of the world, for the perpetual remembrance and showing forth the sacrifice of himself in his death.

24. The Resurrection.—The bodies of men after death return to dust, but their souls, which neither die nor sleep, having an immortal subsistence, immediately return to God who gave them; the souls of the righteous, being then made perfect in holiness, are received into paradise, where they are with Christ, and behold the face of God, in light and glory, waiting for the full redemption of their bodies; and the souls of the wicked are cast into hell, where they remain in torment and utter darkness, reserved to the judgment of the great day.

25. The Judgment.—God hath appointed a day wherein he will judge the world in righteousness, by Jesus Christ, to whom all power and judgment is given of the Father, that he shall bring us into everlasting life, and receive the fulness of joy and glory, with everlasting reward, in the presence of the Lord; but the wicked who know not God, and obey not the Gospel of Jesus Christ, shall be cast into eternal torments, and punished with everlasting destruction, from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.

The American Baptists differ also from the British in a more general adoption of "close communion." See COMMUNION.

III. Statistics: 1. United States.—According to the Populist Almanac for 1866, there were, in 1865, 552 associations, 12,702 churches, 7867 ordained ministers, and 1,040,343 members. Of the latter, 244 were members in German and Dutch, 600 in Swedish, and 1400 in Welsh churches. The number of Baptist colleges in 1859 was 14. The oldest is Brown University, at Providence, Rhode Island, which was founded in 1764. The next in age, Madison University, at Hamilton, New York, was founded in 1819. Fifteen were organized from 1855 to 1859. The oldest theological school was organized in connection with Madison University in 1820. The whole number in 1859 was 12. The Baptists, in 1859, published 28 weekly papers, 14 monthlies, and 2 quarterlies—the Christian Review, at New York, and the Southwestern Review and Eclectic, at Nashville, Tenn. Two of the monthlies were published in foreign languages—one in German, one in Welsh. During the Civil War (from 1860 to 1864) nearly all colleges, seminaries, and papers in the states belonging to the Southern Confederacy were suspended, but after the close of the war were gradually revived.

The general benevolent associations are (1.) American Baptist Missionary Union, established in 1814. The receipts in 1865 were $169,792. The Board has under its care 19 missions: 3 among the Indians of North America, 2 in Europe, and 14 in South-eastern Asia. The Asiatic missions have 15 stations, and more than 400 out-stations. There are now connected with the missions, including these in this country and exclusive of Europe, 84 American laborers—41 males and 43 females—together with over 500 native helpers, of whom about 50 are ordained. Of native laborers in Europe there are 200. According to incomplete returns, there are about 36,000 members. See MISSIONS.

(2.) American Baptist Publication Society, established in 1824. In 1865 its receipts amounted to $153,954 93. Twenty-eight new publications were issued during the year, making 99,997,150 pages 18mo. The total number of pages printed since the society's organization is about 531,000,000. The Reaper has a circulation of over 100,000. Twenty-six colporteurs were in commission, distributed in the different states and in Sweden.

Connected with the American Baptist Publication Society is the American Baptist Historical Society, which was established in 1853.

(3.) American Baptist Home Mission Society, established in 1832. Total receipts in 1865, $122,519. Missionaries and agents employed during the year, 246.

(4.) American and Foreign Bible Society. See BIBLE SOCIETIES.

(5.) American Baptist Free Mission Society, established in 1843. Total receipts for the year 1865, $26,631.

(6.) Southern Baptist Convention, established in 1845. It holds biennial meetings. Its Foreign Mission Board is located at Richmond, Va., and reported in 1859, receipts, $39,824 38; expenditures, $31,024 63. The Domestic and Indian Mission Board is located at Marion, Ala. Receipts, $47,698 27; expenditures, $41,369 70. There have been under commission during the year 35 missionaries: 19 among the Creeks, 10 among the Choctaws, and 6 among the Cherokees. The Bible Board is located at Nashville, Tenn.

(7.) Southern Baptist Publication Society, established in 1847. Receipts in 1858, $9794 25; expenditures, $9159 69. The amount of volumes issued by the society from the first is 222,175, containing 82,775,666 pages.

2. Great Britain.—According to the English Baptist Manual for 1858, there were in Great Britain and Ireland 33 associations of Particular Baptists, 1917 churches (of which 1132 were associated), 101,397 members, 137,524 pupils of Sunday-schools. The annual report of the secretary of the Baptist Union in 1865 contained the following statistical statements: "All the country and district associations in England but one were now affiliated with the Union, and in all Great Britain and Ireland but four. Twenty churches had joined the Union during the year. The total number of churches in connection with the Union is 1332, the number of Baptist churches in the kingdom (England and Wales) being about 2400. Returns had been obtained from 1898 churches, and these showed a total of 198,295 members, or an excess of 22,063 over the preceding year." In Scotland there were, in 1865, 97 Baptist churches, 95 ministers, and 5000 members. In Ireland, 37 churches, 21 ministers, 950 members. The Particular Baptists have 6 colleges: Bristol (founded in 1770); Horton College, Bradford (1804); Regent's Park, London (1810); Pontypool (1807); Haverford West (1811); and Edinburgh. The first five had together, in 1859, 103 pupils. The General Baptists have a college at Nottingham (since 1798), with 7 students; the New Connection of General Baptists a college at Leicester. The religious and benevolent societies are very numerous; the Baptist Year-book for 1869 mentions 17. The Baptist Missionary Society had in 1859 an income of £26,513, and missions in India, Ceylon, the West Indies, Africa, and France. The Baptist Union strives to be a bond of union for the independent churches, to obtain statistical information on Baptist churches and institutions throughout the world, and to prepare an annual report on the state of the denomination. The General Baptist Missionary Society of the New Connection of General Baptists sustains a mission in India. (A complete list is also given in Schem's Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859, p. 110.) According to the Baptist Year-book, the periodicals of the English Baptists consist of 1 weekly, 3 annual, and 9 monthly magazines.

3. In other Countries.—The British Possessions in America had, in 1859, 17 associations, 460 churches, 337 ordained ministers, 65,450 members, and 6 periodicals, of which one was in the French language. For Germany, the Report of the American Baptist Missionary Union, in May, 1866, gives 11,239 members; for Switzerland, 269; for Denmark, 1702. Sweden had, in 1865, 6606 members. The membership of the Baptist churches in France is estimated at about 700. Baptist periodicals are published in Sweden and in Germany. The number of Baptists in Holland is given (by Dr. Cox) in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana as 238. The mission in Greece has been discontinued. In Asia the missions of the American Baptist Missionary Union (in India, Burmah, and Ceylon) reported, in 1859, 14,323 members; those of the English Baptist Missionary Society (in India and Ceylon), 2123 members; those of the General Baptist Missionary Society of England (in India), 333 members; those of the American Southern Baptists (in China), 30 members. In Africa, the American Southern Baptists have missions in Liberia, with about 1200 members. The missions of the English Baptist Missionary Society had, in 1859, 184 members. The number of Baptists in Australasia is estimated at from 4000 to 6000.—Benedict, History of the Baptists; Cox, The Baptists (in the Enc. Metr.); Missionary Jubilee (N. Y. 1865); Smith, Tables of Church History; Herzog, Real-Encyclopædie, s. v.; Baptist Manual (of England); American Baptist Almanac; Schem, Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859, p. 27, 41, 110; Cutting, Historical Vindications. BAPTISTS, FREE-COMMUNION, a denomination of Baptists which arose in the eighteenth century in Rhode Island and Connecticut, and owed its origin to the preaching of Whitfield. Many of those who were converted through his instrumentality formed a separate organization, and took the name "Separates." Gradually they became Baptists, without, however, practicing close communion. In 1785 they formed an association called the "Groton Union Conference." In 1820 they had 25 churches, some of which soon united with the Free-will Baptists. A General Conference was organized in 1835, but in 1841 the whole body united with the Free-will Baptists. See Belcher, Religious Denominations; Cox, The Baptists (in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana).

BAPTISTS, FREE-WILL, a section of Baptists which commenced in North America in 1780. The first church was organized at New Durham, N. H., by Benjamin Randall, who in his twenty-second year was a convert of George Whitfield. In 1784 the first quarterly meeting was organized; in 1792, the first yearly meeting, consisting of delegates of the quarterly meetings. The most successful minister of this denomination was John Colby, who entered the ministry in 1809, and died in 1817. In 1827 a general conference was formed, which was at first annual, then biennial, and is now triennial, and is composed of delegates appointed by the yearly meetings. In 1841, nearly the whole body of another Baptist denomination, the Free-Communion Baptists, united with them, while, on the other hand, they withdrew, a few years ago, connection from 4000 members in North Carolina on account of their being slaveholders. On the same principle, they refused to receive into the connection some 12,000 from Kentucky and vicinity, who sent deputies to the general conference for that purpose. They are Arminians, and agree in doctrine almost wholly with the New Connection of General Baptists in England, except that they are open communionists, while the English New Connection generally hold to strict communion. At the fifth general conference, held at Wilton, Me., in October, 1831, the subject of "Washing the Saints' Feet," which had produced no small excitement among this denomination, was discussed, and it was agreed that the churches of the denomination should be at full liberty to retain the ordinance or not. It is now not generally practised, though not entirely in desuetude. The ecclesiastical bodies among Free-will Baptists are, the church, the quarterly meeting conference, the annual meeting, and the general conference. The officers in the church are two—elders and deacons. Each church elects its own pastor, and exercises discipline over its own members; but, as a church, it is accountable to the yearly meeting. Also ministers are accountable to the quarterly meetings to which they belong, and not to the churches over which they are pastors. A council from the quarterly meeting organizes churches and ordains ministers. The quarterly meetings consist of ministers and such brethren as the churches may select. The general conference meets every three years, and consists of delegates chosen from the annual conferences.

Confession of Faith.

1. The Scriptures.—The Holy Scriptures, embracing the Old and New Testaments, were given by inspiration of God, and constitute the Christian's perfect rule of faith and practice.

2. God.—There is only one true and living God, who is a spirit, self-existent, eternal, immutable, omnipresent, omniscient, omnipotent, independent, good, wise, just, and merciful; the creator, preserver, and governor of the universe; the redeemer, saviour, sanctifier, and judge of man; and the only proper object of divine worship. He exists in three persons, offices, distinctions, and relations—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, which mode of existence is above the understanding of finite men.

3. Christ.—The Son of God possesses all divine perfections, which is proven from his titles: true God, great God, mighty God, God over all, etc.; his attributes: eternal, unchangeable, omniscient, etc., and from his works. He is the only incarnation of the Divine Being.

4. The Holy Spirit.—He has the attributes of God ascribed to him in the Scriptures; is the sanctifier of the souls of men, and is the third person in the Godhead.

5. Creation.—God created the world and all it contains for his own glory, and the enjoyment of his creatures; and the angels, to glorify and obey him.

6. Man's Primitive State, and his Fall.—Our first parents were created in the image of God, holy, and upright, and free: but, by yielding to temptation, fell from that state, and all their posterity with them, they then being in Adam's loins; and the whole human family became exposed to temporal and eternal death.

7. The Atonement.—As sin cannot be pardoned without a sacrifice, and the blood of beasts could never actually wash away sin, Christ gave himself a sacrifice for the sins of the world, and thus made salvation possible for all men. Through the redemption of Christ man is placed on a second state of trial; this second state so far differing from the first, that now men are naturally inclined to transgress the commands of God, and will not regain the image of God in holiness but through the atonement by the operation of the Holy Spirit. All who die short of the age of accountability are rendered sure of eternal life. Through the provisions of the atonement all are obligated to repent of their sins and yield to God; the Gospel call is to all, the Spirit enlightens all, and men are agents capable of choosing or refusing.

8. Regeneration.—An instantaneous renovation of the soul by the Spirit of God, whereby the penitent sinner, believing in and giving up all for Christ, receives new life, and becomes a child of God. This change is preceded by true conviction, repentance of and penitent sorrow for sin; it is called in Scripture being born again, born of the Spirit, passing from death into life. The soul is then justified with God.

9. Sanctification.—is a setting apart the soul and body for holy service, an entire consecration of all our ransomed powers to God; believers are to strive for this with all diligence.

10. Persecution.—As the regenerate are placed in a state of trial during life, their future obedience and final salvation are neither determined nor certain; it is, however, their duty and privilege to be steadfast in the truth, to grow in grace, persevere in holiness, and make their election sure.

11. Immediately after death men enter into a state of happiness or misery, according to their character. At some future period, known only to God, there will be a resurrection both of the righteous and the wicked, when there will be a general judgment, when all will be judged according to the deeds done in the body; the righteous be admitted into eternal happiness, and the wicked assigned to eternal misery.

12. The Church.—A Christian church is an assembly of persons who believe in Christ, and worship the true God agreeably to his word. In a more general sense, it signifies the whole body of real Christians throughout the world. The church being the body of Christ, none but the regenerate, who obey the Gospel, are its real members. Believers are received into a particular church on their giving evidence of faith, covenanting to walk according to the Christian rule, and being baptized.

13. Baptism.—Baptism is an immersion of the candidate in water, in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; the only proper candidate being one who gives evidence of a change of heart.

14. Communion.—Communion is a solemn partaking of bread and wine, in commemoration of the death and sufferings of Christ.—American Christian Record.

The denomination has a printing establishment at Dover, N. H.; two colleges—Bates, at Lewiston, Me., with 48 students, and Hillsdale, Mich., with 600 students; two theological institutions—one at New Hampton, N. H., with 16 students, the other at Hillsdale, Mich., with 21 students (1867). In 1866 the following statistics were reported: Yearly meetings, 51; quarterly meetings, 147; ordained preachers, 1076; licensed preachers, 164; churches, 1264; total membership, 56,258. The Foreign Missionary Society has a mission at Orissa, India (receipts for 1866, £12,166); they have also a Home Miss. Society and an Education Society. In New Brunswick and Nova Scotia they have about 4000 members, and a journal, the Religious Intelligencer, published at St. John's, N. B. See Stewart, History of Free-will Baptists, Dover, 1862, vol. i, from 1780 to 1830; (Winebrenner) History of Denominations in the United States; Belcher, Religious Denominations; Cox, The Baptists (in the Encyclopaedia Metropolitana); Schem, Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859; Free-will Baptist Register.

BAPTISTS, GERMAN, a denomination of American Baptists who are commonly called Dunkers, while they call themselves Brethren. They originated at Schwarzenau, in Germany, in 1708, but were driven by persecution to America between 1719 and 1729. They purposely neglect any record of their proceedings, and are opposed to statistics, which they believe to savor of pride. They originally settled in Pennsylvania, but are now most numerous in Ohio. In 1790, a party of Universalists, led by one John Ham, separated from the Dunkers, since which time there has been no connection between them. The seceders are to be found in Kentucky, Illinois, Missouri, and Iowa. The whole denomination has been believed to hold Universalist views, but they have always protested against the charge. With the Mennonites, they appeal to the Confessions of Faith published in Holland two centuries ago. They practise trine immersion, with laying on of hands while the person is in the water. They lay their candidate forward in the water instead of backward, as the regular Baptists do. Their officers are bishops (or ministers), elders, teachers, and deacons (or visiting brethren). They also have deaconesses—aged women, who are allowed to exercise their gifts steadily. Bishops are chosen from the teachers, after they have been fully tried and found faithful. It is their duty to travel from one congregation to another, to preach, to officiate at marriages and funerals, to set in order whatever may be wanting, to be present at love-feasts and communions, when a bishop is to be ordained, when teachers or deacons are chosen or elected, and when any officer is to be excommunicated. An elder is the first or eldest chosen teacher in a congregation where there is no bishop. It is his duty to appoint meetings, to assist in excommunication, to exhort and preach, to baptize, to travel occasionally, and, where no bishop is present, to perform all the duties of the latter. Teachers are chosen by vote. It is their duty to exhort and preach at any of their stated meetings, and, when so requested by a bishop or elder, to perform the ceremonies of matrimony and of baptism. It is the duty of deacons to keep a constant oversight of poor widows and their children, and give them such aid from time to time as may be necessary; to visit all the families in the congregation at least once a year, and exhort, comfort, and edify them, as well as to reconcile all offences and misunderstandings that may occur from time to time; and, when necessary, to read the Scriptures, pray, and exhort at the regular meetings. An annual meeting is held about Whitsuntide, and attended by bishops and teachers, as well as by such other members as may be delegated by the congregations. A committee of five of the oldest bishops hears those cases which may be referred to them by the teachers and representatives from the congregations. Their decisions are published in English and German. In plainness of speech and dress they resemble the Society of Friends. They will not go to law, nor engage in war, and seldom take interest for the money which they lend to their poorer brethren. The Baptist Almanac for 1860 estimates the number of their preachers at 200, of congregations at 150, of members at 8200. The census of 1850 gives them only 52 church edifices, which indicates that a large number of their congregations worship in school-houses. See Belcher, Religious Denominations; Baptist Almanac for 1860.

BAPTISTS, OLD-SCHOOL. A name assumed by those Baptists who, in the second half of the past century, opposed the formation of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, and similar institutions, which they considered as floodgates for letting in all those contrivances in religion which make the salvation of men appear to depend on human effort. They are frequently, also, called Anti-mission or Anti-effort Baptists. They have neither colleges nor theological institutions, and are almost entirely confined to the Western and South-western States. Their number is at present on the decrease. In 1844 they counted 61,000 members; in 1854, 66,500; in 1859, 58,000. In 1859 they had 155 associations, 1720 churches, 825 ordained ministers, and 1500 had been baptized in 1858. See Belcher, Religious Denominations; Cox, The Baptists; American Baptist Almanac.

BAPTISTS, SEVENTH-DAY, a denomination of Baptists who keep the seventh day of the week instead of the first as the Sabbath. In England they assumed, soon after the Reformation, the name of Sabbatharians; but in 1818 this term was rejected by the general conference in America, and the term Seventh-day Baptists adopted. They believe that the first day was not generally used in the Christian Church as Sabbath before the reign of Constantine. Traces of seventh-day keepers are found in the times of Gregory I., Gregory VII., and in the twelfth century in Lombardy. In Germany they appeared late in the fifteenth, and in England in the sixteenth century. In 1595, a work advancing their views was published in England by one Nicholas Bound, D.D., and several of their members suffered imprisonment. They assumed a denominational organization in 1650, and counted at the end of the seventeenth century eleven churches, of which now only three remain. In America the first Seventh-day Baptists were connected with First-day Baptist churches. A separate organization was commenced in 1671. Yearly meetings commenced at the beginning of the eighteenth century, and a general conference was organized at the beginning of the nineteenth century, which held its meetings at first annually, later (since 1816) triennially. In 1815 they divided themselves into five associations (Eastern, Western, Central, Virginia, and Ohio). They have repeatedly taken action against slavery, and in favor of temperance and other reforms. A foreign missionary society was established in 1812, and supports missionaries in China and Palestine. Besides, they have a Tract and Publishing Society. The latter issues a weekly, a monthly, and a quarterly periodical. Their literary institutions are De Ruyster Institute and Alfred University, both in the State of New York, besides several smaller academies. The Baptist Almanac for 1860 gives the following statistics: 67 churches, 70 ministers, 17 licentiates, 7250 members. See Belcher, Religious Denominations.

BAPTISTS, SEVENTH-DAY (GERMAN), a denomination of Baptists which arose by secession from the German Baptists (q. v.) or Dunkers. In 1725 Conrad Beissel published a tract against the celebration of the first day, and, when this created some disturbance in the society at Mill Creek, of which he was a member, he retired to a cell on the banks of the Co-calico, and lived there for some time unknown to the people he had left. When discovered, some other members of the society at Mill Creek settled around him, and in 1728 introduced the seventh day into public worship. In 1732 the solitary life was changed into a conventual one, and a monastical society was established in May, 1733. The establishment received the name Ephrata. The habit of C. puchins was adopted by both the brethren and the sisters, and monastic names given to all who entered the cloister. No monastic vows, however, were taken, neither had they any written covenant. The property which belonged to the society was common stock, yet none were obliged to give up any of their possessions. Celibacy they recommend as a virtue, but do not require it. Governor Penn, who visited them frequently, offered to them five thousand acres of land, but they refused it. At an early period they established a literary institution, a Sabbath-school, and a printing-office, and greatly cultivated music. Branches of the society of Ephrata were established in 1756 in York county, and in 1763 in Bedford county. Their principal settlement at present is at Snowhill, near the Antilam Creek, in Franklin county, Pa. Dr. Baird says, "They are not believed to exceed a few hundreds in numbers, and their ministers may be as many as ten or twelve." See Belcher, Religious Denominations; (Winebremer) Hist. of Denom. in the U. S.

BAPTISTS, SIX-PRINCIPLE. The six principles which distinguish this section of Baptists from all others are those mentioned in the Epistle to the Hebrews vi, 1, 2, viz.: 1. Repentance from dead works; 2. Faith toward God; 3. The doctrine of baptisms; 4. The laying on of hands; 5. The resurrection of the dead; 6. Eternal judgment. They distinguish four baptisms: 1. John's baptizing with the baptism of repentance;" 2. The baptism of the Holy Ghost and with fire on the day of Pentecost; 3. The baptism of Christ's sufferings. But after the resurrection of Christ there is only one kind of baptism to remain, viz., 4. The baptism of the believers in Christ in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Their rite of "laying on of hands" corresponds with Episcopal confirmation, and is the chief point in their system on which they insist. They refuse communion as well as church-fellowship with churches who do not practise it. The Six-Principle Baptists are Arminians, holding to a general atonement. Their ministry generally has not been liberally educated nor adequately supported. They are almost confined to Rhode Island, out of which they have only a few congregations in Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania. They originated as a separate organization in 1639, and at no period of their history counted more than 39 churches. In 1852 they formed two yearly conferences, the one of Rhode Island and Massachusetts, the other of New York and Pennsylvania. The Baptist Almanac for 1860 gives the following statistics: 18 churches, 16 ordained ministers, 3000 members. See (Winebremer) History of Denominations in the U. S.; Belcher, Religious Denominations; Smith, Table of Church History; American Baptist Almanac.

Baptize. See BAPTISM.

Bar (properly $\overline{\text{בַּר}}$, berí'ach) chiefly occurs in the following senses: that whereby a door is bolted and made fast (Neh. iii, 3); a narrow cross-board or rafter wherewith to fasten other boards (Exod. xxvi, 26); a rock in the sea (Jonah ii, 6); the bank or shore of the sea, which, as a bar, shuts up its waves in their own place (Job xxxviii, 10); strong fortifications and powerful impediments are called bars, or bars of iron (Isa. xlv, 2; Amos i, 5). See DOOR.

Bar. See CORN.

Bar- (בָּרַךְ, Heb. and Chald. ܒܪܟܬܐ, a son), a patronymic sign, as BAR-JESUS, BAR-JOXA, etc. See BEN-.

Barabbas (Βαραββᾶς, for the Chald. ܒܪܫܝܫ ܒܪܒܐ, son of Abba, Simonis, Onom. X. T. p. 38; a common name in the Talmud, Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. p. 489), a robber (Ἀρσής, John xviii, 40) who had committed murder in an insurrection (Mark xiv, 7; Luke xxiii, 19) in Jerusalem, and was lying in prison at the time of the trial of Jesus before Pilate, A. D. 29. The procurator, in his anxiety to save Jesus, proposed to release him to the people, in accordance with their demand that he should release one prisoner to them at the Passover. As a rebel, he was subject to the punishment laid down by the Roman law for such political offences, while as a murderer he could not escape death even by the civil code of the Jews. But the latter were so bent on the death of Jesus that, of the two, they preferred pardoning this double criminal (Matt. xxvii, 16-26; Mark xv, 7-15; Luke xxiii, 18-25; John xviii, 40), who was accordingly set free (Acts iii, 14). There appears to have been a usage in Jerusalem, at the paschal feast, for the governor to release to the people a prisoner whom they might particularly desire. This custom does not appear to have been ancient; it was probably derived either from the Syrians or from the Greeks and Romans, the former of whom had such a custom at their Thesmophoria, the latter at their Lectisternia. Some think the policy of this provision was obviously to conciliate the favor of the Jews toward the Roman government. See PASSOVER.

Origen says that in many copies Barabbas was also called Jesus (Ἰησοῦν Βαραββᾶν; see the Darmst. Liber. Bl. 1843, p. 538). The Armenian Version has the same reading: "Whom will you that I shall deliver unto you, Jesus Barabbas, or Jesus that is called Christ?" Griesbach, in his Comment., considers this as an interpolation, while Fritzsche has adopted it in his text (so also Tischendorf in Matt. xxvii, 16, 17, but not his last ed.). We can certainly conceive that a name afterward so sacred may have been thrown out of the text by some bigoted transcriber. On the other hand, the contrast in ver. 20, "that they should ask Barabbas and destroy Jesus," seems fatal to its original position in the text. See JESUS.

Bar'achel (Heb. Barakel', ܒܪܟܬܐ ܥܩܝܠܐ, whom God has blessed; Sept. Βαραχίηλ), the father of Elihu the Buzite, one of Job's three "friends" (Job xxxii, 2, 6). B. C. prob. ante 2000.

Barachi'ah (same name as BERECHIAH; Sept. Βαραχίαι), the father of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. i, 1, 7). B. C. ante 500.

Barachi'as (Βαραχίαι, the Greek form of the name BARACHIAH), father of the Zechariah (Zacharias) mentioned in Matt. xxiii, 35, as having been murdered by the Jews. See ZACHARIAH.

Baradaeus, JACOBUS. See JACOBITES.

Barah. See BETH-BARAH.

Ba'arak (Heb. Barak', ܒܪܩܐ, lightning; Sept. and N. T. Βαράκ, Joseph. Ant. v, 5, 2, Βαράκoc; comp. the family name of Hannibal, Barca="lightning of war"), son of Abinoam of Kedesh-naphtali, a Galilean city of refuge in the tribe of Naphtali (Judg. iv, 6; comp. Josh. xix, 37; xxi, 32). He was summoned by the prophet Deborah to take the field against the hostile army of the Canaanitish king Jabin (q. v.), commanded by Sisera (q. v.), with 10,000 men from the tribes of Naphtali and Zebulun, and to encamp on Mount Tabor, probably because the 900 chariots of iron (Judg. iv, 3), in which the main force of Sisera consisted, could not so easily manoeuvre on uneven ground. After some hesitation, he resolved to do her bidding, on condition that she would go with him, which she readily promised. At a signal given by the prophetess, the little army, seizing the opportunity of a providential storm (Joseph. Ant. v, 4) and a wind that blew in the faces of the enemy, boldly rushed down the hill, and utterly routed the unwieldy host of the Canaanites in the plain of Jezreel (Esdracou), "the battle-field of Palestine." From the prominent mention of Taanach (Judg. v, 19, "sandy soil") and of the river Kishon, it is most likely that the victory was partly due to the suddenly swollen waves of that impetuous torrent, particularly its western branch, called Megiddo. The victory was decisive, Harosheth taken (Judg. iv, 16), Sisera murdered, and Jabin ruined. A peace of forty years ensued, and the next danger came from a different quarter. The victors composed a splendid epicurean ode in commemoration of their deliverance (Judg. v). See DEBORAH. Barak's faith is commended among the other worthies of the Old Test. in Heb. xi, 32. See also BENE-BARAK.

From the incidental date apparently given in Judg. v, 6, some have regarded Barak as a contemporary of Shamgar. If so, he could not have been so late as 178 years after Joshua, where he is generally placed. Lord A. Hervey supposes the narrative to be a repetition of Josh. xi, 1-12 (Genealogies, p. 228 sq.). A great deal may be said for this view: the names Jabin and Hazor; the mention of subordinate kings (Judg. v, 19; comp. Josh. xi, 2 sq.); the general locality of the battle; the prominence of chariots in both narratives, and especially the name Misrephoth-maim, which seems to mean "burning by the waters," as in the margin of the A. V., and not "the flow of waters." Many chronological difficulties are also thus removed; but it is fair to add that, in Stanley's opinion (Palest. p. 392 note), there are geographical difficulties in the way (Ewald, Gesch. des Israel; Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 141 sq.). There appears, therefore, on the whole, no good reason for departing from the regular order of the judges, which places his rule B. C. 1409-1369.—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v. See JUDGES.

Baratier, JOHN PHILIP, an eminent boy-scholar, was born January 19th, 1721, at Schwabach, in Anspach. His father, Francis, was pastor of the French Protestant church in Schwabach, and gave his son careful education from infancy. At five years old he could speak Latin, French, and German, and at seven he knew by heart the Psalms in Hebrew. In his tenth year he composed a Hebrew Dictionary of rare words, and in his thirteenth he translated the Itinerary of Benjamin of Tudela (Amst. 1734, 2 vols. 8vo). He afterward applied himself to ecclesiastical history, the fathers, and theology, and answered a Unitarian work which Crellius published under the name of Art-manius in a book entitled Anti-art-manius (Nuremb. 1735). In 1735, on his way to Berlin, he passed through Halle, where he was made M. A.; upon which occasion he composed, impromptu, fourteen theses in the presence of the professors, and on the following day defended them for three hours before a public audience with entire success. At Berlin he was received with honor by the king, and was enrolled among the members of the Royal Society. At the king's request he established himself at Halle to study law, and died there October 5th, 1740, being only nineteen years of age. He also published Disquisitio Chronologica de Successione antiquissima Rom. Pontificum (Utrecht, 1740, 4to), and some other works. His life, by Forney, was published at Halle, 1741 (2d ed. Frankfort, 1755).—Biog. Univ. iii, 322; Landon, Eccel. Diet. s. v.

Barbadoes, one of the Windward group of the West India Islands, which in 1850 had a population of 125,864 inhabitants, seven eighths of whom are blacks. It is the see of a bishop of the Church of England, whose diocese comprises all the British Windward Islands, and had, in 1850, 88 clergymen, including two ar. hdeacons. There are many well-endowed public schools, among which Codrington College has a revenue of £3000 a year (Charity List for 1860, Lond. 1860, 8vo.). See WEST INDIES.

Barbara, St., whose day is observed in the Greek and Roman churches December 4th, is said to have suffered martyrdom at Heliopolis, Egypt, under Gallienus, A. D. 266 (Assemani, Lit. Orient., i, 63). Another account makes the place Nicomedia, the time A. D. 255, and says that after her conversion she excited her father to be converted, but he accused her and put her to death with torture.—A. Butler, Lives of Saints, Dec. 4.

Barbarian (βάρβαρος), a term used in the New Testament, as in classical writers, to denote other nations of the earth in distinction from the Greeks (Serv. ad Virg. Æn. ii, 504). "I am debtor both to the Greeks and Barbarians" (Rom. i, 14). (Comp. Plato, Polit. p. 260; Érat. p. 383; Theop. p. 175; Pliney, xxix, 7; Aristot. De Cuba, i, 3; Polyb. v, 33, 5.) In Coloss. iii, 11, "Greek nor Jew—Barbarian, Scythian"—βάρβαρος seems to refer to those nations of the Roman empire who did not speak Greek, and Σκύθης to nations not under the Roman dominion. In 1 Cor. xiv, 11, the term is applied to a difference of language: "If I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me." Thus Ovid, "Barbarus hic ego sum, quia non intelligor ulli" (Trist. v, 10, 37). In Acts xxviii, the inhabitants of Malta are called βάρβαροι, because they were originally a Carthaginian colony, and chiefly spoke the Punic language. In the Sept. βάρβαρος is used for the Hebrew לִּזְרָאִי, "a people of strange language" (Psa. cxiv, 1); Chaldee כְּשָׁרִי. In the rabbinical writers the same Heb. word is applied to foreigners in distinction from the Jews; and in the Jerusalem Talmud it is explained as meaning the Greek language; Rabbi Solomon remarks that whatever is not in the holy tongue is called by this term (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v.). According to Herodotus, the Egyptians called all men barbarians who did not speak the same language as themselves (ii, 158). Clement of Alexandria uses it respecting the Egyptians and other nations, even when speaking of their progress in civilization, as in his Strom. i, ch. xvi, § 74: "Barbarians have been inventors not only of philosophy, but likewise of almost every art. The Egyptians, and, in like manner, the Chaldeans, first introduced among men the knowledge of astrology." In a singular passage of Justin Martyr's first Apology the term is applied to Abraham and other distinguished Hebrews: "We have learned and have before explained that Christ is the first-begotten of God, being the Word (or reason, λόγος ὄντος) of which the whole human race partake. And they who live agreeably to the Word (or reason, ὁ μετὰ λόγον βιῶντων) are Christians, even though esteemed atheists: such among the Greeks were Socrates, Heraclitus, and Plato; and among the barbarians (among other nations,) Chrysippus, Zeno, and Seneca, Alcibiades, Ananias, Azarias, Misael, and Elieas, and many others." Apol. i, 16. Strabo (xv, 2) suggests that the word barbarus was originally an imitative sound, designed to express a harsh, dissimilar language, or sometimes the indistinct articulation of the Greek by foreigners, and instances the Carians, who, on the latter account, he conjectures, were named by Homer καὶ βάρβαροι (Il. ii, 167), although it is doubtful whether in the same sense (Thucyd. i, 3). The word appears to have acquired a reproachful sense during the wars with the Persians; their country was called ἡ βάρβαρος γῆ (Demosth. Philipp. iii). In 1 Cor. v, 13, 1 Tim. iii, 7, we have "those outside" (οἱ ἔξω), and Matt. vi, 32, "the nations" (τὰ ἔθνη), used hyperbolically for "the Gentiles" (כְּתִיב, כְּתִיב, in very much the same sort of sense as that of βάρβαροι), to distinguish all other nations from the Jews; and in the Talmudists we find Palestine opposed to "the lands" (כְּתִיב, כְּתִיב), just as Greece was to Barbaria or ἡ βάρβαρος (con p. Cic. Fam. ii, 15; Lightfoot, Centuria Chærog. ad init.). And yet so completely was the term βάρβαρος accepted, that even Josephus (Ant. xi, 7, 1; xiv, 10, 1; xxvi, 6, 8; War. introd.; Apion. i, 11 and 22) and Philo (Opp. i, 29) scruple as little to reckon the Jews among them as the early Romans did to apply the term to themselves ("Demophilus scriptis, Marcus veritit barbare," Plaut. Asin. prol. 10). Very naturally, the word, after a time, began to involve notions of cruelty and contempt (ἄσπις βάρβαρον, 2 Macc. iv, 25; xv, 2, etc.), and then the Romans excepted themselves from the scope of its meaning (Cic. Le Rep. i, 37, § 68). Afterward only the savage nations were called barbarians, though the Greek Constantinopolitans called the Romans "barbarians" to the very last (Gibbon, li; vi, 351, ed. Smith). See Iken, De Scythis et Barbaris, in the Biblioth. Brem. I, v, 767 sq.; Kypf, obserr. ii, 152; Schlessner, Theol. Phil. i, 50; Douglzet Analect. ii, 100 sq.; Rauth, *Ueb. Sinn v. Barbe-lo, one of the chief female deities of the Gnostics, especially of the Nicolaites and the Borborians, the mother of every thing living. She lived with the father of the universe and with Christ in the eighth heaven. Hence the surname Barbelites, which was given to the Gnostics. See GNOSTICISM.

Barber (כַּרְבֵּי, gallab'). "Son of man, take thee a sharp knife, take thee a barber's razor, and cause it to pass upon thine head and upon thy beard" (Ezek. v, 1). Shaving the head was customary among the Jews as an act of mourning. See GRIEF. Sometimes, for the same reason, the hair of the beard was also shaven, or plucked off, as was done by Ezra on his arrival at Jerusalem on finding that the Hebrews had intermixed with the nations around them, and plunged into all their idolatries (Ezra ix, 3). See HAIR. The operation of shaving the head was probably performed much in the same manner as is now usual in the East. The operator rubs the head gently and comfortably with his hand moistened with water. This he does for a considerable time; and he afterward applies the razor (q. v.), shaving from the top of the head downward.

Barber, Joun, an English civilian of All Souls', Oxford, who graduated D.C.L. in 1532. He was patronized by Archbishop Cramer, and assisted in the preparation of the well-known king's book, the Necessary Doctrine of a Christian Man. Barber died at Wrotham about the beginning of 1549. — New Gen. Biog. Dict. iii, 143; London, Ecol. D'et. s. v.

Barcelona, one of the chief cities of Spain, and see of a Roman Catholic archbishop. Councils were held there in 549, 599, 906, 1054, and 1068. They passed canons respecting church discipline and church property, and the last, in particular, proposed the substitution of the Roman for the Gothic rite.

Bar-cepha, MOSES a Jacobite bishop and author, who early in life entered the convent of Sergius, on the Tigris. He was afterward raised to the episcopal order under the name of Severus, and is sometimes called bishop of Beth-Ceno, sometimes of Bothraman. He is said to have died in 913. He composed a "Commentary on Paradise" in Syriac, which was translated into Latin by And. Masius, and printed at Antwerp in 1569, 8vo (also in Bibliotheca Patrum and in Criticæ Sævi). This work is divided into three parts. Part I inquires whether there was both a terrestrial and a spiritual paradise, and concludes that there was but one. Part II gives the mystic significance of all the passages of Holy Scripture relating to the terrestrial paradise. Part III answers the objection of heretics, e. g. that of Simon Magus, who accused the Almighty of the want of power to preserve Adam from the fall. — Clarke, Sacred Literature, ii, 555.

Barckhausen, CONRAD HEINRICH, a German theologian of the 18th century. He was professor, and later rector of one of the Berlin colleges. He had with his colleague Volkman an animated controversy on the subject of divine grace, Volkman advocating universal grace, and Barckhausen maintaining particularism. The title of the work of Barckhausen, which he published under the name of Pacificus Verinus, is Amica Collatio doctrinæ de gratia quæ vera reformatæ confititur ecclesiæ, cum doctrinâ quæ Volkmanianis publici juris fecit (Furth, 1714). The controversy was joined in by several other theologians on both sides; and Barckhausen himself is said to be the author of another work on the subject, published in the German language (Abg-nöthigte Ehr- und Lehr-Rettung der Reformirten Kirchen [1714]). In 1719, a royal edict of King Friedrich Wilhelm I. imposed silence upon both parties. — Herzog, Suppl. em. i, 167.

Barclay, Barklay, or De Barclay, Alexander, a poet and prose writer, born toward the end of the 15th century, but whether English or Scotch by birth is uncertain. He was certainly at Oriel College, Oxford, about 1495, and, after finishing his studies, he travelled in Holland, Germany, Italy, and France, and studied the languages and literature of those countries. Returning to England, he became one of the priests or prebendaries of the college of St. Mary Ottery, Devonshire, and was afterward a monk of the Benedictine monastery of Ely, where he continued till the suppression of the monastery in 1539. In 1546 he obtained the vicarage of Great Badow and that of Wokey. On 30th April, 1552, he was presented to the rectory of Allhallows, but died in June of that year at Croydon. His character as a priest is dubious, but of his merit as a writer there is no dispute, if there were no other proof of it than his famous Ship of Fools, partly a translation and partly an imitation from the German of Sebastian Brandt, the old title being The Ship of Fools of the Worlds (London, 1509). — New Gen. Biog. Dict. ii, 47; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 116.

Barclay, Henry, D.D., was born in 1714, and graduated at Yale in 1734, serving for some years as missionary among the Mohawks. He went to England in 1737 to be ordained, and on his return assumed the charge of the Protestant Episcopal Church at Albany. In 1746 he became rector of Trinity Church, New York, where he remained till his death in 1764. He was made D.D. by the University of Oxford in 1760. Dr. Barclay was zealous and indefatigable, his disposition engaging, and his life most exemplary. — Sprague, Anals. v, 91.

Barclay, John, was born at Pont-à-Mousson, in Lorraine, where his father, William Barclay (q. v.), was law professor, in 1582. He studied at the college of the Jesuits there, and the brethren, observing his genius, attempted to draw him into their order. This offended his father, who left the college with his son in 1633 and returned to England. He wrote verses in praise of King James, and would doubtless have succeeded at court had he not been a Romanist. His literary reputation rests on his Argenis (1621, and many editions since), which had an immense popularity, and was translated into various languages. We mention him here for the following works: Series pitefactæ divinitus periculi, etc. (A History of the Gunpowder Plot, Amst. 1665, 12mo); Petas, etc. (a defence of his father's work, De Potestate Papæ, against Bellarmine; Paris, 1611, 4to); Parænesis ad Sæcularios hujus temporis (Rome, 1617, 12mo; an appeal to Protestants in favor of Romanism). He died at Rome, Aug. 12, 1621. — New Gen. Biog. Dictionary, ii, 49; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 117.

Barclay John, founder of the "Bereans" (q. v.), was born at Muthill, Perthshire, Scotland, in 1731, and studied at St. Andrews, where he graduated A.M. In 1759 he was licensed by the presbytery of Auchterarder, and became assistant minister of Erol, and in 1763 assistant minister of Fettercairn in Forfarshire. Here he began to act the religious leader, and attracted crowds of hearers by his novelties of doctrine. In 1766 he published a Paraphrase of the Book of Psalms, with a dissertation on interpretation, which was censured by the presbytery. On the death of the clergyman to whom he was assistant in 1772, the presbytery refused him the necessary testimonials for accepting a benefice elsewhere, and he then left the Church of Scotland, and became the leader of the sect called Bereans, of which a few congregations still exist. He preached for some time in Edinburgh, and subsequently in London and Bristol. In London he kept open a debating society, where he supported his doctrines against all impugnors. He died on the 29th of July, 1798. — Penny Cyclopædia, s. v. See BEREANS.

Barclay, Robert, of Ury, the eminent Quaker, was the son of Colonel David Barclay, and was born at Gordonstown, in Morayshire, Scotland, December 23, 1648. His elementary education over, he was sent to the Scotch college at Paris, where his uncle was rector, and there he imbibed a strong predilection for Romanism. His uncle offered to make him his heir if he would stay in France and enter the Roman Church; but, though his youthful imagination had been impressed by the splendid services of the church, he refused, and returned to England in 1664. It is said that even at this time (when he was only sixteen) he was an excellent scholar, and could speak in the Latin language with wonderful fluency and correctness. His father joined the Quakers in 1666, and his example was soon followed by his son, who thenceforward became an indefatigable propagator of their opinions both at home and in Holland. He gives an account of his change, in substance, as follows (in his Treatise on Universal Love), viz.: that "his first ed-revelation fell among the strictest sort of Calvinists,' those of his country 'surpassing in the heat of zeal not only Geneva, from whence they derive their pedigree, but all the other so-called reformed churches;' that shortly afterward, his transition to France had thrown him among the opposite 'sect of papists,' whom, after a time, he found to be no less deficient in charity than the other; and that consequently he had refrained from joining any, though he had listened to several. The ultimate effect of this was to liberalize his mind by convincing him of the folly and wickedness of religious strife. In both Calvinists and Catholics he found an absence of 'the principles of love,' 'a straitness of doctrine,' and a 'practice of persecution,' which offended his idea of Christianity, as well as his gentle and generous nature. He therefore allied himself gladly to this new sect, whose distinguishing feature was its charity and pure simplicity of Christian life, and soon became one of its most devoted adherents and its ablest advocate. In the course of his life he made several excursions into England, Holland, and Germany, earnestly propagating his peaceful views wherever he went, and occasionally enjoying the companionship of William Penn."

Barclay believed, as the Society of Friends now do, that divine revelation is not incompatible with right reason, yet he believed, as orthodox Friends also now do, that the faculty of reason alone, unassisted by divine illumination, is unable to comprehend or receive the sublime truths relative to that redemption and salvation which came by Jesus Christ. To show that the tenets held by the society were capable of a rational vindication, Barclay employed all the powers of his intellect and produced a succession of works in explanation and defence of Quakerism. The first was Truth cleared of Calumnies (1697), especially in reply to Mitchell, a minister near Aberdeen, who reiterated his slanders in a pamphlet, which was answered by Barclay in his William Mitchell unmasked, etc. (Ury, 1671). Then followed an exposition of the doctrines and principles of the Quakers, bearing the title "A Catechism and Confession of Faith, approved of and agreed unto by the General Assembly of the Patriarchs, Prophets, and Apostles, Christ himself chief Speaker in and among them; in which the answers are all given in the language of the Bible" (1675); translated into Latin, Catechismus et Fidei Confessio Approbata, etc. (Rotterd. 1676, 8vo); The Anarchy of the Ranters (1676, 12mo); a Vindication of the same (1679); Theses Theologicæ, comprising, in fifteen propositions, the doctrines maintained by the Quakers. This was sent abroad, in various languages, to the principal clergy of Europe, and was made the basis of Barclay's greatest work, Theologicæ vere Christianæ Apologia (Amsterdam, 1676, 4to); translated into English, An Apology for the true Christian Divinity, etc. (London, 1678; often reprinted, and translated into German and other languages). The Apology was dedicated to King Charles II, and had the misfortune to receive the praise of Voltaire. "The leading doctrine which runs through the whole book is, that divine truth is made known to us not by logical investigation, but by intuition or immediate revelation; and that the faculty, if it can be technically defined, by which such intuition is rendered possible, is the 'internal light,' the source of which is God, or, more properly, Christ, who is the 'light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world.' The identity of this doctrine with that held by Mr. Maurice and others of the Broad Church in the present day has been more than once remarked." "Holy Writ," according to Barclay, "is a declaratio fontis, not the original source of knowing the truth; it is no adequate rule for doctrine and morals, though it gives a true and credible testimony to the original source of knowledge. It is subordinate to the Holy Spirit, from whom it derives its excellence. It is worthy of notice, that he argues for the subordination of Scripture to the inward light on the same grounds as Romanism pleads for the necessity of tradition. He points to the many contradictory interpretations of the Bible, which require a higher criterion, and asserts that this can only be found in the inward divine word. The subjective tendency, if carried out to its consequences, might lead to entirely giving up the objectivity of divine revelation" (Neander, History of Dogmas, ii, 672). So able a book naturally gave rise to controversy, the assumption of inward light being supposed by many to set aside the superior authority of Scripture, and the denial of the perpetuity of baptism and the Lord's Supper occasioning a suspicion of infidelity. On this supposed tendency of the system it was acrimoniously attacked by John Brown, in a work to which he gave the title of "Quakerism the Pathway to Paganism." The Apology was also much canvassed in various seats of learning. Nicholas Arnold, a professor in the University of Francker, wrote against it, and Barclay replied; and in the same year an oral discussion took place between some students in the University of Aberdeen on the one side, and the author, assisted by his friend George Keith, on the other. "No part of the 'Apology' was controverted by so many opponents as that in which the necessity of an inward and immediate revelation was insisted upon. It was the only portion of the work which could be considered original. The other doctrines contained in it had all been maintained by abler defenders, their arrangement in the Quaker system of theology being the only point in which they differed from the Arminian scheme. None of the numerous publications in which this leading tenet of this new faith was attempted to be disproved called for a reply from the writer; but having been requested by Adrian Paets, an ambassador from the court of the Netherlands, with whom he had some conversation on the principles of the Friends, to reconsider the strength of some objections which he had advanced against them, Barclay addressed him in Latin on the subject while he was in the prison at Aberdeen, reviewed his former arguments, and declared himself more convinced of their truth than he had ever been, in his treatise on Immediate Revelation (see below).

"The discipline or church government of the Society of Friends was as much defamed as their religious opinions. It could not be denied that in their forms of worship, of marriage, and of burial there was a wide departure from the customary ceremonial, and it was generally understood that the society carried its interference to a great extent in the private concerns of those who belonged to its communion. These regulations were vindicated by Barclay in a work wherein he contrasts the internal government of the Quakers with the anarchy of the Ranters and the hierarchy of the Romanists, justifying the discipline of his sect, and defending its members 'from those who accuse them of confusion and disorder, and from such as charge them with tyranny and imposition.' The publication of this treatise engaged its author in a long altercation with some persons of his own persuasion, who took offence at various parts of it as tending to violate the rights of private judgment and to restrain the operations of the Spirit. Their opposition, being discountenanced by the society, soon passed away, and the work itself rose into such favor among the sect that its title was changed at one of its yearly meetings to A Treatise on Christian Discipline, and it became the standard authority on all matters to which it relates."

In 1677 Barclay was in prison at Aberdeen, together with his father and many others, but was released at the instigation of Elizabeth, the princess palatine of the Rhine, who greatly favored him and William Penn. While in prison he wrote his Universal Love considered and established upon its right Foundation, etc. (London, 1677), a work relating the purest spirit of Christian benevolence and peace. His last literary work was his Possibility and Necessity of the immediate Revelation of the Spirit of God (1686, 8vo). He afterward enjoyed so high a reputation that in 1682 he was appointed governor of New Jersey, in America, by royal commission, liberty being granted to him of appointing a deputy, which he did, and never visited his government in person. He died October 13th, 1690, at his estate of Ury.—Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v.; Chambers's Encyclopaedia, s. v.; Biographia Britannica: Alibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 117; Collected Works of Robert Barclay, by Penn (London, 1692, fol., and 1718, 3 vols. 8vo); *Short Account of the Life and Writings of R. Barclay, William, was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, about 1545, was a Roman Catholic, and a favorite of Mary Queen of Scots. After her fall he went to France, studied law, and was made professor of that branch at the new University of Pont-à-Mousson. Finding that the Jesuits were likely to draw his son John into their ranks (see BARCLAY, JOHN), he left the University, returned to England, and was offered a professorship of civil law at one of the universities if he would conform to the Anglican Church. This, however, he refused to do, and returned to France, where he was made professor at Angers, and died in 1605 (or 1609). He wrote (besides other works on law, etc.) De Potestate Papae, an et quatenus in Reges et Principes seculares Jus et Imperium habeat (London, 1609, 8vo; Pont-à-Mousson, 1610, 8vo; transl. into French, Pont-à-Mousson, 1611; Cologne, 1688, 8vo). In this work he vindicates the independent rights of princes against the usurpations of the pope.—Bayle, Dictionary, s. v.; Hosfer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, iii, 471.

Bar-cocheba (Chal. $\text{בֶּרֶךָּ בְּרִי שֵׁטַר}$, son of the star), or SIMON BAR-COCHEBA, a Jewish impostor, who applied to himself the prophecy of Balaam (Num. xxiv, 17), and incited the Jews to revolt against the emperor Hadrian (A.D. 130). He passed himself off for the Messiah, and his pretensions were supported by Akiba (q. v.), the chief of the Sanhedrim. The better to deceive the credulous Jews, according to Jerome, he pretended to vomit flames, by means of a piece of lighted tow which he kept in his mouth. Bar-cocheba profited by the seditious state in which he found the Jews, and took Jerusalem, A.D. 132. He issued coins having on one side his own name, and on the other "Freedom of Jerusalem." In the British Museum is a coin ascribed by some to Simon the Maccabee (q. v.), after some of whose it appears to have been modelled, corresponding to the description given by Tychem and others of a coin of Bar-cocheba. One side of this coin represents a portion of four columns, in the midst of which is a lyre; a serpentine stroke below is said to represent the brook of Kedron, and a star seems to allude to Numbers xxiv, 17. The other side has a vessel of manna and a leaf. Münter concluded, from a similar coin, that Bar-cocheba had commenced the rebuilding of the Temple; but Nicephorus Callist. (Hist. Eccl. iii, c. 24) and Cœrenus (Script. Byz. xii, 24) say only that the Jews intended to rebuild the Temple. All the thieves, murderers, and disorderly characters in the country quickly repaired to his standard, and he was soon strong enough to vanquish, in several engagements, J. Annus Rufus, the Roman commandant in Judaea. On this the emperor Hadrian ordered his most able commander, Julius Severus, to leave his post in Britain and repair to Palestine; but the time which elapsed during his journey was favorable to the rebels. After his arrival, Julius Severus prudently avoided battles, but took a number of fortified places before he marched against Jerusalem, which he took and destroyed after sustaining great losses. The Jews, after the capture of the city, concentrated their forces in the mountain-fortress of Bethar, in the neighborhood of Jerusalem. While Julius Severus was gradually reconquering the country, Bar-cocheba still played the king in Bethar for three years, and, on the unfounded suspicion of treason, executed the learned Eleazar of Modain, who, having prayed for the welfare of the fortress, was slandered by a Cuthite (that is, a Samaritan), as if he intended to betray Bethar to Hadrian. According to Talmudical statements, Bethar was taken in 135 by the Romans, on the 9th day of the month of Ab, the anniversary of the burning of the Temple under Titus. It has been stated that on this occasion 580,000 Jews perished, but this must be greatly exaggerated. Bar-cocheba fell in the combat, and his head was brought into the Roman camp. Akiba (according to most accounts), and many rabbins, who were considered authors of the rebellion, were put to a cruel death. The new city, Elia Capitolina (q. v.), was founded on the site of Jerusalem.—Jost, Gesch. d. Jer. Volks, vol. ii; *Mosheim, Ch. Bardesanes, a Gnostic heresiarch, scholar, and poet of the second century at Edessa, in Mesopotamia (about A.D. 170). Lucius Verus, it is said, tried to seduce him from the Christian faith, and at last threatened him. He replied "that he feared not death, from which he should not escape, even if he complied with the emperor's desire." According to Epiphanius, he defended the faith against Apollonius, a Stoic, and wrote against Marcion; but afterward he fell into the errors of the Valentinian Gnostics, though in some points he differed materially from Valentinus. Jerome speaks highly of the style in which his works were written, and Eusebius speaks of his recantation of error before his death. His treatise on Fate will be found translated in Cureton's Syneclogion Syriacum (Lond. 1855). See Eusebius, Prep. Evang. lib. vi, ch. x. Bardesanes left a son called Harmonius, and many other disciples, who added to the errors which he had sown. He maintained that the supreme God, being free from all imperfection, created the world and its inhabitants pure and incorrupt; that the Prince of Darkness, who is the fountain of all evil and misery, enticed men to sin; in consequence of which, God permitted them to be divested of those ethereal bodies with which he had endued them, and to fall into sluggish and gross bodies, formed by the evil principle; and that Jesus descended from heaven, clothed with an unreal or aerial body, to recover mankind from that body of corruption which they now carry about them; and that he will raise the obedient to mansions of felicity, clothed with aerial vehicles, or celestial bodies. The errors of Bardesanes arose chiefly from his attempt to explain the origin of evil. Admitting a beneficent Supreme Being, he could not believe him the source of evil. He sought that source in Satan, whom he described, not as the creator, but the enemy of God, and as endowed with self-existence ($\text{ἐγὼ τὸν Διὰ-βαλον ἀποσπῶ λογίζομαι, καὶ ἀπογεννητορ}$, is the phrase of the Bardesanist in Origen, Diad. cont. Marcionitas). Yet he represents God alone as immortal, and therefore probably held Satan to be the production of matter (which he supposed eternal), and that he would perish on the dissolution of his component particles. He taught that the soul, created pure, was not originally clothed with flesh, but after the fall was imprisoned in flesh, the "coat of skins" of Gen. iii, 21 (comp. Clem. Alex. Strom. iii, 466). Hence a perpetual conflict: the union of soul and body is the cause of all existing evils, and hence the apostle's desire to be freed from the "body of this death" (Rom. vii, 24). To deliver man, Christ came, not in sinful flesh, but with an ethereal body; through the Virgin, but not formed of her substance (ὡς Μαριάμ ἀλλ' ὡς ἐκ Μαριάμ). Fasting and subjugation of the body are the means of becoming like Christ; and his followers at the resurrection will have a body like his (1 Cor. xv, 37), with which, and not with "flesh and blood," they shall inherit the kingdom (1 Cor. xv, 50). Bardesanes was the first Syrian hymn-writer, and his hymns, being very attractive, were popular, and contributed largely to diffuse his opinions. As a poet, his fame rested upon the 150 psalms which, in imitation of David, he composed for the edification of his countrymen. The popularity of this work was immense, and when Ephrem Syrus subsequently replaced it by another more agreeable to sound doctrine, he was compelled to associate his orthodoxy with the heretical tunes to which the musical genius of his antagonist had given birth. None of Bardesanes's psalms are preserved, and we only know that his metrical system was entirely of his own invention, and was based upon accent instead of quantity. Nor are any of his prose writings extant; a dialogue under his name, fragments of which have been preserved by Eusebius, being undoubtedly spurious, and chiefly derived from the Pseudo-Clementine Recognitions. Barefoot (Heb. בְּרֵגֶל, yech'ph', "unshod," Jer. ii, 25). To go barefoot was an indication of great distress (Isa. xx, 2, 3, 4); for in ancient times the shoes of great and wealthy persons were made of very rich materials, and ornamented with jewels, gold, and silver. See SHOE. When any great calamity befell them, either public or private, they not only stripped themselves of these ornaments, but of their very shoes, and walked barefoot (2 Sam. xv, 20). See GRIEF. Persons were also accustomed to put off their shoes on spots account of holy (Exod. iii, 5). See ATTIRE.

Bargain. Buying and selling in the East are very tiresome processes to persons unaccustomed to such modes of bargaining. When a shopkeeper is asked the price of any of his goods, he generally demands more than he expects to receive; the customer declares the price exorbitant, and offers about half or two thirds of the sum first named. The price thus bidden is, of course, rejected; but the shopkeeper lowers his demand, and then the customer in his turn bids somewhat higher than before. Thus they usually go on, until they meet about half way between the sum first demanded and that first offered, and so the bargain is concluded. To a regular customer, or one who makes any considerable purchase, the shopkeeper generally presents a pipe (unless the former have his own with him, and it be filled and lighted), and he calls or sends to the boy of the nearest coffee-shop and desires him to bring some coffee, which is served in the same manner as in the house, in small china cups placed within cups of brass. When a person would make any but a trifling purchase, having found the article that exactly suits him, he generally makes up his mind for a long altercation; he mounts upon the mastab'ah of the shop, seats himself at his ease, fills and lights his pipe, and then the contest of words commences, and lasts often half an hour, or even more. Among the lower orders a bargain of the most trifling nature is often made with a great deal of vehemence of voice and gesture. A person ignorant of their language would imagine that the parties engaged in it were quarrelling, and highly enraged. The peasants will often say, when a person asks the price of any thing which they have for sale, "Receive it as a present," as Ephron did to Abraham when the latter expressed his wish to purchase the cave and field of Machpelah (Gen. xxxiii, 11). This answer having become a common form of speech, they know that advantage will not be taken of it; and when desired again to name the price, they will do so, but generally name a sum that is exorbitant (Lane, Mod. Eg. ii, 15; Kitto, Pict. Libl., note in loc. Gen.; Daily Bible Illust. i, 255). See MERCHANT; CONTRACT.

Barger, JOHN H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Kentucky, June 29, 1831. He was educated at the Illinois Wesleyan University, where he passed A.B. in 1853. In the same year he entered the itinerant ministry in the Illinois Conference, and was appointed successively to Perry, Payson, Winchester, Griggsville, and Carlinville, in all which appointments his ministry was signally acceptable and useful, scores, and even hundreds, being added to the church in these places during his term of service. In 1860 he was appointed presiding elder of Quincy District, where he was actively engaged until his life, which was so full of promise to the church, was suddenly cut short. On the 31st of Oct., 1861, he was accidentally shot on a hunting excursion on an island in the Mississippi.—Minutes of Conferences, 1862, p. 223.

Baris (Βάρις, from Chald. בִּרְיָא, birah', a fortress), the name attributed by Josephus to two structures.

1. A tower said to have been built by the prophet Daniel at Ebatana, and described as "a most elegant building, and wonderfully made," remaining in later times, where "they bury the kings of Media, Persia, and Parthia to this day." A Jewish priest is said to have been intrusted with the care of it (Joseph. Ant. x, 11, 7). See ECBATANA.

2. A palace begun by John Hyrcanus on the mountain of the Temple, and which afterward was used for the residence of the Asmonean princes. Herod the Great made a citadel of it, which he called Antonia, in honor of his friend Mark Antony (Joseph. Ant. xv, 11, 4). See ANTONIA.

Barizer, THOMAS, an English theological writer, was born in 1721, and died in 1809. He was a grandson of the celebrated Thomas Whiston. Among his theological works are a work on baptism (1771); The Messiah (1780); The Demoniacs of the Gospel (1780).—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, p. 121.

Bar'kos (Heb. Barkos', בַּרְקוֹס, prob. for בַּרְקוֹסֵי לֵב, painter; Sept. Βαρκός, Βαρκωνί), the head of one of the families of Nethinim that returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii, 53; Neh. vii, 55). B.C. ante 536. Schwarz, however, regards it as the name of a place, identical with the modern village Berkusia, six miles north-west of Beit-Jebrin (Palestine, p. 116).

Barlaam, a martyr of Syria or Cappadocia (mentioned by Basil and Chrysostom), who was forced to hold his hand, filled with incense, over the fire of an idol altar, in order that the pain might compel him to open his hand, and so let the incense fall upon the flames. In the course of this torment he died.—Basil, Hom. xviii; Chrysost. Hom. lxxiii; Butler, Lives of Saints, Nov. 19.

Barlaam, a Calabrian monk of St. Basil. He was educated among the Latins, but afterward went over to the Greeks. He is chiefly known for his attack upon the Hesychists or Quietists, as the monks of Mount Athos were styled, who held certain very peculiar views. The question was brought before a synod at Constantinople in 1341, but nothing was definitively determined. In 1339 Barlaam went to Pope John, at Avignon, to induce him to take up the case, but in vain. He was afterward condemned in various synods. He then forsook the Greek side, and took part with the Latins, strenuously opposing the dogmas peculiar to the Greek Church, for which service he was rewarded with the see of Gidraee, in Naples. He was the Greek tutor of Petrarch. He died about A.D. 1398. He wrote a number of controversial books, and among them a Libellus contra Primum Papam (Oxford, 1592; Hanov. 1618). Also Ethica secularia Stoicos, lib. 2 (Bib. Mus. Pat. xxvi, 4). See Cave, Hist. Lit. ann. 1240; Hoefler, Biog. Générale, iv, 575; Landon, Eccles. Dict. ii, 36. See HESYCHISTS.

Barletta, GABRIEL, a Dominican monk of Barletta, in Naples, who was living in 1480. He became so distinguished as a preacher that it was a saying in his time, "Qui nescit Barlettæ nescit predicare." He published some extraordinary sermons, entitled Sermones a Septuagesima ad Feriam tertiam post Pascha. Item Sermones 28 de Sanctis. Item Sermones 3, de Patrie subraudorura, de Ira Dei, et de Choris, et 4 pro Dominica Adventus (Brescia, 1498, Biog. Univ.; Paris, 1502), etc.—Biog. Univ. iii, 384; Landon, *Eccles. Barley (עֵבֶר, se'rah', from its bristling beard; the plur. עֵבֶרִים, se'rahim', designates the grains; Gr. κριθή), a grain mentioned in Scripture as cultivated and used in Egypt (Exod. ix, 31), and in Palestine (Lev. xxvii, 16; Num. v, 15; Deut. viii, 8; 2 Chron. ii, 10; Ruth ii, 17; 2 Sam. xiv, 30; Isa. xxviii, 25; Jer. xli, 8; Joel i, 11; etc.). Barley was given to cattle, especially horses (1 Kings iv, 28), and was, indeed, the only corn grain given to them, as oats and rye were unknown to the Hebrews, and are not now grown in Palestine, although Volney affirms (ii, 117) that small quantities are raised in some parts of Syria as food for horses (comp. Homer, Il. v, 196). Hence barley is mentioned in the Mishna (Pesach, fol. 3) as the food of horses and asses. This is still the chief use of barley in Western Asia. Bread made of barley was, however, used by the poorer classes (Judg. vii, 13; 2 Kings iv, 42; John vi, 9, 13; comp. Ezek. iv, 9). In Palestine barley was for the most part sown at the time of the autumnal rains, October—November (Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. ad Matt. xii, 1), and again in early spring, or rather as soon as the depth of winter had passed (Mishna, Berachoth, p. 18). This later sowing has not hitherto been much noticed by writers on this part of Biblical illustration, but is confirmed by various travellers who observed the sowing of barley at this time of the year. Russell says that it continues to be sown to the end of February (Nat. Hist. Aleppo, i, 74; see his meaning evolved in Kitto's Phys. Hist. of Palestine, p. 214; comp. p. 229). The barley of the first crop was ready by the time of the Passover, in the month Abib, March—April (Ruth i, 22; 2 Sam. xxi, 9; Judith viii, 2); and if not ripe at the expiration of a (Hebrew) year from the last celebration, the year was intercalated (Lightfoot, ut supra) to preserve that connection between the feast and the barley-harvest which the law required (Exod. xxiii, 15, 16; Deut. xvi, 16). Accordingly, travellers concur in showing that the barley-harvest in Palestine is in March and April—advancing into May in the northern and mountainous parts of the land; but April is the month in which the barley-harvest is chiefly gathered in, although it begins earlier in some parts and later in others (Pict. Palestine, p. 214, 229, 239). At Jerusalem, Niebuhr found barley ripe at the end of March, when the later (autumnal) crop had only been lately sown (Beschreib. von Arabien, p. 160). It was earlier than wheat (Exod. ix, 31), and less prized (Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 166), although reckoned among the valuable products of the promised land in Deut. viii, 8. We read of barley-meal in Num. v, 15, of barley-loaf in Judg. vii, 13, and barley-cakes in Ezek. iv, 12. It was measured by the ephah and homer. The jealousy-offering (Num. v, 15) was to be barley-meal, though the common mincha was of fine wheat-flour (Lev. ii, 1), the meager grain being appointed to denote the vile condition of the person on whose behalf it was offered. The purchase-money of the adulteress in Hos. iii, 2, is generally believed to be a mean price. See CEREALS.

The passage in Isa. xxxii, 20, has been supposed by many to refer to rice, as a mode of culture by submersion of the land after sowing, similar to that of rice, is indicated. The celebrated passage, "Cast thy bread upon the waters," etc. (Eccles. xi, 1), has been by some supposed to refer also to such a mode of culture. But it is precarious to build so important a conclusion as that rice had been so early introduced into the Levant upon such slight indications; and it now appears that barley is in some parts subjected to the same submersion after sowing as rice, as was particularly noticed by Major Skinner (i, 320) in the vicinity of Damascus. In Exod. ix, 31, we are told that the plague of hail, some time before the Passover, destroyed the barley, which was then in the green ear; but not the wheat or the rye, which were only in the blade. This is minutely corroborated by the fact that the barley sown after the inundation is reaped, some after ninety days, some in the fourth month (Wilkinson's Thebes, p. 395), and that there ripens a month earlier than the wheat (Soncini, p. 395).—Kitto, s. v. See AGRICULTURE.

Barlow, Thomas, Bishop of Lincoln, born in Westmoreland in 1607; educated at Appleby, and removed thence to Queen's College, Oxford. Although no favorer of the Parliamentary party, he retained his fellowship through the Commonwealth, and in 1651 was appointed keeper of the Bodleian. Afterward he was made provost of his college, Lady-Margaret professor, and in 1675 Bishop of Lincoln, being then nearly seventy years of age. He never removed to his see. He died in 1691, on the 8th of October. He was of the Calvinistic school of theology, and left, among other writings, the following, viz.: (1.) The Case of Toleration in Matters of Religion (1660); (2.) The Original of Sinners (1676); (3.) Papery, or the Principles and Opinions of the Church of Rome; (4.) Brutum fulmen, or the Bull of Pope Pius V, etc. (Lond. 1681, 4to). After his death, Sir Peter Pett published a volume of Cases of Conscience, resolved by Barlow, and another volume of Genuine Romans (Lond. 1693, 8vo).—Darling, s. v.

Barlow, William, Bishop of Chichester, was born in Essex, and educated at Oxford. He was a regular canon of St. Augustine, and became prior of the house of Bi-ham, in Berks, in 1535, in which year Henry VIII sent him on an embassy into Scotland. He rendered up his house at the time of the dissolution of the monastic houses, and endeavored to induce others to follow his example. He was rewarded with the see of St. Asaph in 1535, from which he was translated, in 1536, to St. David's, and thence again to Bath and Wells in 1547. He was one of the strongest opponents of popery in England, and was largely instrumental in spreading the reformation. He married Agatha Wellesbourne, and was, in consequence, deprived on the accession of Queen Mary. During the reign of that princess he lived in Germany; but after her death he returned to England, and was appointed, in 1559, to the see of Chichester, which he held till his death in August, 1568. He left eleven children; five of them were daughters, all of whom were married to bishops. His son William was an eminent mathematician. See Burnet, Hist. of Reformation, iii, 158, 391, 623; Hook, Ecl. Biog. i, 512.

Barn (בָּרְנָה, asam', Prov. iii, 10; "store-house," Dent. xxviii, 8; ἀποθήκη, "barn" or "garner"), a magazine or place of deposit for grain, which, among the Orientals, was frequently under-ground. See CAYE. The phraseology in Luke xii, 18, shows that the Jews at that time had granaries above-ground, but it does not follow that they had altogether relinquished the older and still common custom of depositing grain in subterranean store-houses, in which it was more secure, and, as some think, preserved in better condition, than in the other. Those who are exposed to danger and alarm would naturally prefer the subterranean granary, which may, on occasions of emergency, be abandoned by the proprietor with tolerable confidence that when he is enabled to return he shall find his treasured grain untouched, the entrance being so carefully concealed that it is sometimes discovered with difficulty even by the owner himself. This plan may in general be said to be resorted to by the peasantry throughout the East, granaries above-ground being confined to towns and their vicinities, a distinction which may also have prevailed among the Jews. See GRANARY.

The Heb. word בָּרְנָה, go'ren, rendered "barn" in Job xxxix, 12; 2 Kings vi, 27, signifies rather a threshing-floor, as it is elsewhere translated. In Hag. ii, 19; Joel i, 17, the original terms are מְגוּרָה, megurah', and מְגוּרָה, mannegurah', a granary. See AGRICULTURE.

Bar'nabas (Βαρνάβας, from the Syro-Chaldee בָּרְנָה בָּבַי, originally Ἰωσήφ, Joses, or Ἰωσήφ, Joseph (Acts iv, 36); but he received from the apostles the surname of Barnabas, which signifies the son of prophesy, or as it is interpreted in the above text, voc. παρακλήσεως, i. e. son of exhortation (Auth. Vers. less accurately, "son of consolation"). The Hebrew term בָּרְנָה and its cognates are used in the Old Testament with a certain latitude of meaning, and are not limited to that of foretelling future events (see Gen. xx, 7; Exod. vii, 1). See PROPHECY. In like manner, παροφειά, in the New Testament, means not merely prediction, but includes the idea of declarations, exhortations, or warnings uttered by the prophets while under divine influence (see 1 Cor. xiv, 3). Of Silas and Judas it is said, "being prophets, they exhorted (παροκλήσαντες) the brethren" (Acts xv, 32). It can hardly be doubted that this name was given to Joses to denote his eminence as a Christian teacher. In Acts xiii, 1, his name is placed first in the list of prophets and teachers belonging to the Church at Antioch. Chrysostom, however, understands the surname to have been given to Barnabas on account of his mild and gentle disposition (In Act. Apost. Hom. xxi). He is described by Luke as "a good man, full of the Holy Ghost and of faith" (Acts xi, 24). He was a native of Cyprus, but the son of Jewish parents of the tribe of Levi; he was possessed of land (but whether in Judaea or Cyprus is not stated), and generously disposed of the whole for the benefit of the Christian community, and "laid the money at the apostles' feet" (Acts iv, 36, 37). A. D. 29. As this transaction occurred soon after the day of Pentecost, he must have been an early convert to the Christian faith (comp. Assemani, Bibl. Or. III, i, 319 sq.). According to Clement of Alexandria (Strom. ii, c. 20, vol. ii, p. 192, ed. Kletz), Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. i, 12), and Epiphanius (Hov. xx, 4), he was one of the seventy disciples (Luke x, 1). It has been maintained that Barnabas is identical with Joseph Barsabas, whose name occurs in Acts i, 23. Most modern critics, however, embrace the contrary opinion, which they conceive is supported by the circumstantial manner in which Barnabas is first mentioned. However similar in sound, the meanings of the names are very different; and if no farther notice is taken of Barsabas (a circumstance which Ullmann urges in favor of his identity with Barnabas), the same may be affirmed of Matthias (see Chrysostom, In Act. Apost. Homil. xi, 1). From the incident narrated in Acts xiv, 8-12, Chrysostom infers that the personal appearance of Barnabas was dignified and commanding, "When the inhabitants of Lystra, on the cure of the impotent man, imagined that the gods were come down to them in the likeness of men, they called Barnabas Zeus (their tutelary deity), and Paul Hermes, because he was the chief speaker" (In Act. Apost. Hom. xxx).

When Paul made his first appearance in Jerusalem after his conversion, Barnabas introduced him to the apostles, and attested his sincerity (Acts ix, 27). A. D. 30. This fact lends some support to an ancient tradition (Theodor. Lector, Hist. Eccles. ii, 557, ed. Vales.) that they had studied together in the school of Gamaliel; that Barnabas had often attempted to bring his companion over to the Christian faith, but hitherto in vain; that, meeting with him at this time in Jerusalem, not aware of what had occurred at Damascus, he once more renewed his efforts, when Paul threw himself weeping at his feet, informed him of "the heavenly vision," and of the happy transformation of the persecutor and blasphemer into the obedient and zealous disciple (Acts xxvi, 16). Though the conversion of Cornelius and his household, with its attendant circumstances, had given the Jewish Christians clearer views of the comprehensive character of the new dispensation, yet the accession of a large number of Gentiles to the Church at Antioch was an event so extraordinary that the apostles and brethren at Jerusalem resolved on deputing one of their number to investigate it. Their choice was fixed on Barnabas. After witnessing the flourishing condition of the Church, and adding fresh converts by his personal exertions, he visited Tarsus to obtain the assistance of Saul, who returned with him to Antioch, where they labored for a whole year (Acts xi, 23-26). A. D. 34. In anticipation of the famine predicted by Agabus, the Antiochian Christians made a contribution for their poorer brethren at Jerusalem, and sent it by the hands of Barnabas and Saul (Acts xi, 28-30), A. D. 44, who speedily returned, bringing with them John Mark, a nephew of the former. By divine direction (Acts xii, 2), they were separated to the office of missionaries, and as such visited Cyprus and some of the principal cities in Asia Minor (Acts xiii, 14). Soon after their return to Antioch, A. D. 45, the peace of the Church was disturbed by certain zealots from Judaea, who insisted on the observance of the rite of circumcision by the Gentile converts. To settle the controversy, Paul and Barnabas were deputed to consult the apostles and elders at Jerusalem (Acts xv, 1, 2); they returned to communicate the result of their conference (ver. 22) accompanied by Judas Barsabas and Silas, or Silvanus, A.D. 47. On preparing for a second missionary tour a dispute arose between them on account of John Mark, which ended in their taking different routes; Paul and Silas went through Syria and Cilicia, while Barnabas and his nephew revisited his native island (Acts xv, 36-41). A.D. 47-51. In reference to this event, Chrysostom remarks, "What then? Did they part as enemies? Far from it. For you see that after this Paul bestows in his Epistles many commendations on Barnabas." If we may judge from the hint furnished by the notice that Paul was commended by the brethren to the grace of God, it would seem that Barnabas was in the wrong. At this point Barnabas disappears from Luke's narrative, which to its close is occupied solely with the labors and sufferings of Paul. From the Epistles of the latter a few hints (the only authentic sources of information) may be gleaned relative to his early friend and associate. From 1 Cor. ix, 5, 6, it would appear that Barnabas was unmarried, and supported himself, like Paul, by some manual occupation. In Gal. ii, 1, we have an account of the reception given to Paul and Barnabas by the apostles at Jerusalem, probably on the occasion mentioned in Acts xv. In the same chapter (ver. 13) we are informed that Barnabas so far yielded to the Judaizing zealots at Antioch as to separate himself for a time from communion with the Gentile converts. This event took place about A.D. 47. See PAUL. It has been inferred from 2 Cor. viii, 18, 19, that Barnabas was not only reconciled to Paul after their separation (Acts xv, 39), but also became again his coadjutor; that he was "the brother whose praise was in the Gospel through all the churches." Chrysostom says that some suppose the brother was Luke, and others Barnabas. Theodoret asserts that it was Barnabas, and appeals to Acts xiii, 3, which rather serves to disprove his assertion, for it ascribes the appointment of Paul and Barnabas to an express divine injunction, and not to an elective act of the Church; and, besides, the brother alluded to was chosen, not by a single church, but by several churches, to travel with Paul (2 Cor. viii, 19). In Coloss. iv, 10, and Philemon, ver. 24, Paul mentions Mark as his fellow-laborer; and at a still later period, 2 Tim. iv, 11, he refers with strong approbation to his services, and requests Timothy to bring him to Rome; but of Barnabas (his relationship to Mark excepted) nothing is said. The most probable inference is that he was already dead, and that Mark had subsequently associated himself with Paul. Barnabas seems not to have possessed Paul's thoroughness of purpose.

For the latter years of Barnabas we have no better guides than the Acta et Passio Bartholomaei in Cypro (first complete edition, from a Paris codex of the 9th cent., in Tischendorf's Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, Lpz. 1841), a forgery in the name of John Mark, and, from the acquaintance it discovers with the localities of Cyprus, probably written by a resident in that island; and the legends of Alexander, a Cyprian monk, and of Theodore, commonly called Lector (that is, an ἀναγνώστης, or reader), of Constantinople; the two latter belong to the sixth century. According to Alexander, Barnabas, after taking leave of Paul, landed in Cyprus, passed through the whole island, converted numbers to the Christian faith, and at last arrived at Salamis, where he preached in the synagogue with great success. Thither he was followed by some Jews from Syria (the author of the Acta names Bar-jesus as their leader), who stirred up the people against him. Barnabas, in anticipation of his approaching end, celebrated the Eucharist with his brethren, and bade them farewell. He gave his nephew directions respecting his interment, and charged him to go after his decease to the apostle Paul. He then entered the synagogue, and began as usual to preach Christ. But the Jews at once laid hands on him, shut him up till night, then dragged him forth, and, after stoning him, endeavored to burn his mangled body. The corpse, however, resisted the action of the flames; Mark secretly conveyed it to a cave about five stadia from the city; he then joined Paul at Ephesus, and afterward accompanied him to Rome. A violent persecution, consequent on the death of Barnabas, scattered the Christians at Salamis, so that a knowledge of the place of his interment was lost. This account agrees with that of the pseudo Mark, excepting that, according to the latter, the corpse was reduced to ashes. Under the emperor Zeno (A.D. 474-491), Alexander goes on to say, Peter Fullo, a noted Monophysite, became patriarch of Constantinople. He aimed at bringing the Cyprian church under his patriarchate, in which attempt he was supported by the emperor. When the Bishop of Salamis, a very worthy man, but an indifferent debater, was called upon to defend his rights publicly at Constantinople, he was thrown into the greatest perplexity. But Barnabas took compassion on his fellow-countryman, appeared to him by night no less than three times, assured him of success, and told him where he might find his body, with a copy of Matthew's gospel lying upon it. The bishop awoke, assembled the clergy and laity, and found the body as described. The sequel may easily be conjectured. Fullo was expelled from Antioch; the independence of the Cyprian church acknowledged; and the manuscript of Matthew's gospel was deposited in the palace at Constantinople, and at Easter lessons were publicly read from it; and by the emperor's command a church was erected on the spot where the corpse had been interred. These suspicious visions of Barnabas are termed by Dr. Cave "a mere addition to the story, designed only to serve a present turn, to gain credit to the cause, and advance it with the emperor." Neither Alexander nor Theodore is very explicit respecting the copy of Matthew's gospel which was found with the corpse of Barnabas. The former represents Barnabas as saying to Anthemius, "There my whole body is deposited, and an autograph gospel which I received from Matthew." Theodore says, "Having on his breast the Gospel according to Matthew, an autograph of Barnabas." The pseudo Mark omits the latter circumstance. If we believe that, as Alexander reports, it was read at Constantinople, it must have been written, not in Hebrew, but in Greek. The year when Barnabas died cannot be determined with certainty; if his nephew joined Paul after that event, it must have taken place not later than A.D. 56 or 57. "Chrysostom," it has been asserted, "speaks of Barnabas as alive during Paul's first imprisonment at Rome." The exact statement is this; in his Eleventh Homily on the Epistle to the Colossians he remarks, on ch. iv, 10, "touching whom ye received commandments, if he come unto you receive him"—perhaps they received commands from Barnabas." There is a vague tradition that Barnabas was the first bishop of the church at Milan, but it is so ill supported as scarcely to deserve notice. It is enough to say that the celebrated Ambrose (b. A.D. 340, d. 397) makes no allusion to Barnabas when speaking of the bishops who preceded himself (see Hefele, Das Sendschreiben des Apostels Barnabas, Tübing. 1849, p. 42-47). His festival is celebrated throughout the Roman Church on the 11th of June. The Church of Toulouse pretends to possess his body, and no less than eight or nine other churches lay claim to the possession of his head. See the Acta Sanctorum, tom. iii; Baronius, *Martyrol. BARNABAS, EPISTLE OF. An epistle has come down to us bearing the name of Barnabas, but clearly not written by him.

1. Literary History.—This epistle was known to the early church, as it is cited by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. l. ii. p. 273, Paris, 1629, et al. seven times); by Origen (contra Celsum, p. 49, Cantab. 1677, et al. three times); and is mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vi. 11), and by Jerome (Catal. Script. Eccl. c. vi). It was lost sight of for several centuries, until Simon (17th century) discovered it at the end of a manuscript of Polycarp's Epist. ad Phil'pp. Hugo Menardus also found a Latin version of it in the abbey of Corbey, and prepared it for publication. It appeared after his death, edited by D'Achery (Paris, 1615), and this was the first printed edition of the epistle. Isaac Vossius had previously obtained a copy of the Corbey MS. and of that of Simon, and had conveyed them to archbishop Usher, who annexed them to a copy of the Ignatian Epistles he was preparing for the press. But the fire at Oxford (1614) destroyed all but a few pages, which are given by Fell in the preface to his edition of Barnabas (Oxford, 1685). Vossius published this epistle in 1646, at the end of the Ignatian Epistles. It is given also in Cotelierius, Patr. Apostol. (1672), in both what was then known of the Greek text and also in the Corbey Latin version; in Russel, Apost. Fathers (1746); Galland, Biblioth. Patrum (1765); and recently in Hefele, Patr. Apostol. Opera (1842). Several German translations were made; also an English one by Wake, Apostolic Fathers. All these editions were based on the same materials, viz. a defective Greek text, in which the first four chapters, and part of the fifth, were wanting, and the Latin version of Corbey, which lacked four chapters at the end. But in 1859 Tischendorf brought from Mt. Sinai a manuscript containing the entire epistle in Greek, with a part of the Pastor of Hermas. It was published in his Novum Testamentum Sinaiticum (2d edit. Lips. 1863). The first five chapters are also given in the second edition of Dressel, Patr. Apostol. Opera (Lips. 1863, 8vo), with a preface by Tischendorf; also, separately, by Volkmar, under the title Monumentum v. Just. Christiani in Æthiopia (Zurich, 1861), with a critical and exegetical commentary. The best edition is that of Hilgenfeld, Barnabe Epist.: integ. Græcæ primæ et l., with the ancient Latin version, a critical commentary and notes (Lips. 1865, 8vo). An English version of the Epistle, from the Codex Sinaiticus, is given in the Journal of Sacred Literature, Oct. 1863; reprinted in the American Presbyterian Review, Jan. and July, 1864.

2. Authorship and Date.—Some of the early editors (e. g. Voss), and some eminent modern critics (e. g. Pearson, Carr, Wake, Lardner, Gieseler, Black), maintain that this epistle was written by Barnabas, the companion of St. Paul. But the current of criticism has gone the other way, and it is now held as settled that Barnabas was not the author. For a history of the discussion, see Jones, Critical Authority of the New Testament (Lond. 1726; new ed. Oxford, 1827, 3 vols., 8vo); Lardner, Credibility, etc., Works, ii. 19; Hefele, Patres Apost. Prolegomena. Kitto's Cyclopaedia gives the following summary of the reasons against the genuineness of the epistle:

"1. Though the exact date of the death of Barnabas cannot be ascertained, yet, from the particulars already stated respecting his nephew, it is highly probable that that event took place before the martyrdom of Paul, A. D. 64. But a passage in the epistle (ch. xvi) speaks of the Temple at Jerusalem as already destroyed. It was consequently written after the year 70.

"2. Several passages have been adduced to show that the writer, as well as the persons addressed, belonged to the Gentile section of the church; but, waiving this point, the whole tone of the epistle is different from what the knowledge we possess of the character of Barnabas would lead us to expect, if it proceeded from his pen. From the hints given in the Acts, he appears to have been a man of strong attachments, keenly alive to the ties of kindred and father-land. We find that, on both his missionary tours, his native island and the Jewish synagogues claimed his first attention. But throughout the epistle there is a total absence of sympathetic regard for the Jewish nation; all is cold and distant, if not contemptuous. 'It remains yet that I speak to you (the 16th chapter begins) concerning the Temple; how those miserable men, being deceived, have put their trust in the house.' How unlike the friend and fellow-laborer of him who had 'great heaviness and continual sorrow in his heart for his brethren, his kindred according to the flesh' (Rom. ix. 2).

"3. Barnabas was not only a Jew by birth, but a Levite. From this circumstance, combined with what is recorded in the Acts of the active part he took in the settlement of the points at issue between the Jewish and the Gentile converts, we might reasonably expect to find, in a composition bearing his name, an accurate acquaintance with the Mosaic ritual, a clear conception of the nature of the Old Economy and its relation to the New Dispensation, and a freedom from that addiction to allegorical interpretation which marked the Christians of the Alexandrian school in the second and succeeding centuries. But the following specimens will suffice to show that exactly the contrary may be affirmed of the writer of this epistle; that he makes unauthorized additions to various parts of the Jewish Cultus; that his views of the Old Economy are confused and erroneous; and that he adopts a mode of interpretation countenanced by none of the inspired writers, and at utter variance with every principle of sound criticism, being to the last degree puerile and absurd.

"(1.) He mentions in two passages the fact recorded in Exod. xxxii. 19, of Moses breaking the two tables of stone, and infers that Jehovah's covenant was thereby annulled. The falsity of this statement need not be pointed out to the Biblical student. He says, 'They (the Jews) have forever lost that which Moses received. For thus saith the Scripture: and Moses . . . received the covenant from the Lord, even two tables of stone, etc. But, having turned themselves to idols, they lost it; as the Lord said unto Moses, Go down quickly, etc. And Moses cast the two tables out of his hands, and their covenant was broken, that the love of Jesus might be sealed in your hearts unto the hope of his faith' (ch. iv). The second passage, in ch. xiv, is very similar, and need not be quoted.

"(2.) On the rite of circumcision (Acts xv, 1, 2) we find in this epistle equal incorrectness. The writer denies that circumcision was a sign of the covenant. 'You will say the Jews were circumcised for a sign, and so are all the Syrians and Arabians, and all the idolatrous priests.' Herodotus (ii. 37), indeed, asserts that the Syrians in Palestine received the practice of circumcision from the Egyptians; but Josephus, both in his Antiquities and Treatise against Apion, remarks that he must have alluded to the Jews, because they were the only nation in Palestine who were circumcised (lat. viii. 10, 3; Apion, i. 22). 'How,' says Hug, 'could Barnabas, who travelled with Paul through the southern provinces of Asia Minor, make such an assertion respecting the heathen priests!'

"(3.) Referring to the goat (ch. vii), either that mentioned in Num. xix or Lev. xvi, he says, 'All the priests, and they only, shall eat the unwhashed entrails with vinegar.' Of this direction, in itself highly improbable, not a trace can be found in the Bible, or even in the Talmud.

"(4.) In the same chapter, he says of the scape-goat that all the congregation were commanded to spit upon it, and put scarlet wool about its head; and that the person appointed to convey the goat into the wilderness took away the scarlet wool and put it on a thorn-bush, whose young sprouts, when we find them in the field, we are wont to eat; so the fruit of that thorn only is sweet. On all these particulars the Scriptures are silent.

"(5.) In ch. viii the author's fancy seems to grow more fruitful and luxuriant. In referring to the red heifer (Num. xix), he says that men in whom sins are come to perfection (ἐν οὗτῃ ἀπαρτία τῆς αἵμα) were to bring the heifer and kill it; that three youths were to take up the ashes and put them in vessels; then to tie a piece of scarlet wool and hyssop upon a stick, and so sprinkle every one of the people. 'This heifer is Jesus Christ; the wicked men that were to offer it are those sinners that brought him to death; the young men signify those to whom the Lord gave authority to preach his gospel, being at the beginning twelve, because there were twelve tribes of Israel.' But why (he asks) were there three young men appointed to sprinkle? To denote Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. And why was wool put upon a stick? Because the kingdom of Jesus was founded upon the cross, etc.

"(6.) He interprets the distinction of clean and unclean animals in a spiritual sense. 'Is it not (Ἄρα οὐκ—see Dr. Hefele's valuable note, p. 85) the command of God that they should not eat these things? (Yes.) But Moses spoke in spirit (ἐν πνεύματι). He named the swine in order to say, 'Thou shalt not join those men who are like swine, who, while they live in pleasure, forget their Lord,' etc. He adds, 'Neither shalt thou eat of the hyena; that is, thou shalt not be an adulterer.' If these were the views entertained by Barnabas, how must he have been astonished at the want of spiritual discernment in the apostle Peter, when he heard from his own lips the account of the symbolic vision at Joppa, and his reply to the command, 'Arise, Peter, slay and eat. But I said, Not so, Lord, for nothing common or unclean hath at any time entered into my mouth' (Acts xi, 8).

"(7.) In ch. ix he attempts to show that Abraham, in circumcising his servants, had an especial reference to Christ and his crucifixion: 'Learn, my children, that Abraham, who first circumcised in spirit, giving a regard to the Son (ἐν Ἰησοῦ, Lat. Vers.), circumcised, applying the mystic sense of the three letters (Ααβββ ἑπτὰ ἑνὸς ἑκατοῦτον ὄνομα—den geheimen Sinn dreier Buchstaben anwendend, Hefele). For the Scripture says that Abraham circumcised 318 men of his house. What, then, was the deeper insight (γνώσις) imparted to him? Mark first the 18, and next the 300. The numeral letters of 18 are I (Iota) and II (Eta), I = 10, II = 8; here you have Jesus, Ἰησοῦν; and because the cross in the T (Tau) must express the grace (of our redemption), he names 300; therefore he signified Jesus by two letters, and the cross by one.' It will be observed that the writer hastily assumes (from Gen. xiv, 14) that Abraham circumcised only 318 persons, that being the number of 'the servants born in his own house,' whom he armed against the four kings; but he circumcised his household nearly twenty years later, including not only those born in his house (with the addition of Ishmael), but 'all that were bought with money' (Gen. xvii, 23). The writer evidently was unacquainted with the Hebrew Scriptures, and has committed the blunder of supposing that Abraham was familiar with the Greek alphabet some centuries before it existed."

The probable opinion is that this epistle existed anonymously in the Alexandrian Church, and was ignorantly attributed to Barnabas. It was probably written by a Jewish Christian, who had studied Philo, and who handled the O. T. in an allegorical way in behalf of his view of Christianity. Its date is assigned to the first century by Hilgenfeld, Die App. Väter (Halle, 1853); Reuss, Geschichte d. Schriften d. N. T., i, 233; Ewald, Gesch. d. Volks Israel, vii, 136; and to the early part of the 2d century by Dressel, Patres Apost. Proleg., and Ritschl, Entscheidung d. Altkath. Kirche, 294. Volkmar gives the date as 119, or later, in Hadrian's time. Hefele puts it between 107 and 120. Weizsäcker, in his treatise Zur Kritik d. s. Barnabasbriefes aus dem Codex Sinaiticus (Tübingen, 1864), seeks to prove that the epistle was written shortly after the destruction of Jerusalem, and not under Hadrian. See also Weizsäcker in d. Jahrbücher für Deutsche Theologie, 1865, p. 331.

3. Contents and Object of the Epistle.—The first part of the epistle (ch. i-xvii) is directed against the Judaizing party, and aims to show that the abolition of Judaism, by means of the spiritual institutions of Christianity, is foretold in the O. T., so that the true covenant people of God are the Christians, not the Jews. The four remaining chapters are ethical, containing practical advices and exhortations for walking "in the way of light," and avoiding "the way of darkness." "The names and residence of the persons to whom it is addressed are not mentioned, on which account, probably, it was called by Origen a Catholic epistle (Origen contr. Cel. lib. i, p. 49). But if by this title he meant an epistle addressed to the general body of Christians, the propriety of its application is doubtful, for we meet with several expressions which imply a personal knowledge of the parties. It has been disputed whether the persons addressed were Jewish or Gentile Christians. Dr. Hefele strenuously contends that they were of the former class. His chief argument appears to be, that it would be unnecessary to insist so earnestly on the abolition of the Mosaic economy in writing to Gentile converts. But the Epistle of Paul to the Galatians is a proof to what danger Gentile Christians were exposed in the first ages from the attempts of Judaizing teachers; so that, in the absence of more exact information, the supposition that the persons addressed were of this class is at least not inconsistent with the train of thought in the epistle. But more than this: throughout the epistle we find a distinction maintained between the writer and his friends on the one hand, and the Jews on the other. Thus, in chap. iii, 'God speaketh to them (the Jews) concerning these things, "Ye shall not fast as ye do this day," etc.; but to us he saith, "Is not this the fast that I have chosen?"' etc.; and at the end of the same chapter, 'He hath shown these things to all of us, that we should not run as proselytes to the Jewish law.' This would be singular language to address to persons who were Jews by birth, but perfectly suited to Gentile converts. In chap. xiii he says, 'Let us inquire whether the covenant be with us or with them (the Jews); and concludes with quoting the promise to Abraham (with a slight verbal difference), 'Behold, I have made thee a father of the nations which without circumcision believe in the Lord'—a passage which is totally irrelevant to Jewish Christians. For other similar passages, see Jones On the Canon, pt. iii, chap. xxxix" (Kittó, Cycloped. a. s. v.). Dr. Schaff remarks of the epistle, as a whole, that "it has many good ideas and valuable testimonies, such as that in favor of the observance of the Christian Sabbath. But it goes to extremes in opposition to Judaism, and indulges in all sorts of artificial, sometimes absurd, allegorical fancies. . . . It is an unsound application of the true thought, that the old is passed away, and that all is made new by Christ. Compare especially ch. iv" (Schaff, History of the Christian Church, § 121). BARNABAS, GOSPEL OF. A spurious gospel, attributed to Barnabas, exists in Arabic, and has been translated into Italian, Spanish, and English. It was probably forged by some heretical Christians, and has since been interpolated by the Mohammedans, in order to support the pretensions of their prophet. Dr. White has given copious extracts from it in his Tampton Lectures, 1784; Sermon viii, p. 258, and Notes, p. 41-69. See also Sale's Koran, Prelim. Discert. sect. 4. It is placed among the apocryphal books in the Stichometry prefixed by Cotelierus to his edition of the Apostolical Constitutions (Lardner's Credibility, part ii, ch. cxlvii). It was canonized by Pope Gelasius I (Tillemont, Mémoires, etc., i, p. 1055).—Kitto, s. v. See GOSPELS, SPURIOUS.

Barnabites, a congregation of regular clerks in the Roman Catholic Church, founded in 1532 by three priests—Zacharia of Cremona, Ferrari and Merizia of Milan. From their first church, St. Paul's in Milan, they were originally called the Regular Clerks of St. Paul (Paulines), which name they exchanged for Barnabites when, in 1545, they were presented with the church of St. Barnabas in Milan. A new rule for the congregation was drawn up by the General Chapter in 1579, approved by Charles Borromeo, the protector of the order, and ratified by the pope. In addition to the three monastic vows, they take a fourth, never to exert themselves for an office within the congregation or without, and never to accept a dignity out of the congregation except by a special permission of the pope. Their houses are called colleges. The superior is chosen every third year by a General Chapter. The lay brothers have to pass through a novitiate of five years. The extension has been limited to Italy, Austria, France, and Spain. In the two latter countries they were destroyed by the Revolution, but they re-appeared in France, full of hope, in 1857. The most celebrated member of the order in modern times was Cardinal Lambruschini. The order has also, in late years, been entered by several families of the highest families, who had left the Greek Church for that of Rome, e. g. by Count Schuwaloff. They had, in 1860, 22 houses in Italy, 3 in Austria, and 1 in France. See Helyot, Ordoes Religieuses, i, 372.

Barnard, John, a Congregational minister, was born in Boston Nov. 6, 1681, and educated at Harvard, where he graduated in 1700. In 1707 he was appointed chaplain in the army, and went with Capt. in Wentworth to England in 1709. In 1736 he was obtained collegiate pastor at Marblehead, and continued to labor there until his death, Jan. 24, 1770. He published Sermons on the Conversion of the Christ in Beligion (1727); A Version of the Psalms (1752); and a number of occasional sermons.—Sprague, Annals, i, 252.

Barnes. See KALISH-BARNES.

Barnes, Daniel Henry, a Baptist minister, was born in Columbia Co., N. Y., April 25, 1785, was graduated with honor at Union College in 1809, and in 1811 became principal of the Poughkeepsie Academy, where he joined the Baptist Church, and was licensed to preach. Mr. Barnes was very successful as a teacher in Poughkeepsie, in Cincinnati, and in New York city.

Among his pupils were President Wayland, Bishop Potter of Pennsylvania, and Drs. E. Mason, W. R. Williams, and John Macaulay. He was elected president of several colleges, but declined. Mr. Barnes was a contributor to several periodicals. He was thrown from a coach and killed, Oct. 27, 1818.—Sprague, Annals, vi, 621; Fourth Ann. Report N. Y. High School.

Barnes, John, an Englishman, who entered the Benedictine order at Douai partly from fear of the Inquisition. In 1625 he published at Paris a Dissertation contra Episcopatus, which received the approbation of the faculty at Paris. In 1630 his Catholicus-Romanus Pacificus appeared at Oxford. His works gave great offence to the ultramontane party, and, at the request of Pope Urban VIII, Barnes was sent to Rome by Louis XIII in 1627. He was at once confined in the Inquisition, and, after thirty years of imprisonment, died there. In his Catholicus-Romanus Pacificus his design was to induce the pope to receive Anglicans to his communion, without requiring them to acknowledge dependence on the Holy See, until such time as a free and oecumenical council could be convoked to settle all differences.—Biog. Univ. iii, 394; Landon, Ecol. Diet. s. v.

Barnes, Robert, chaplain to Henry VIII, and one of the English Reformers, who began his career by preaching against the pride and display of Wolsey. In 1535 he was sent to Wittenberg by Henry VIII to confer with the theologians there about the king's divorce, and he imbibed Lutheran views, which, on his return to England, he began to preach. Some time after, finding himself in danger, he escaped into Germany, and there formed the acquaintance of Luther, Melancthon, and other Protestant leaders. In 1536, as the reformers were in favor with Henry VIII, he returned to England; but, preaching imprudently against Gardiner and against the royal supremacy, he incurred the king's displeasure, and was compelled to recant. Subsequently he retracted his recantation, and was tried and condemned to death by the Parliament of 1540. On the 30th of July in that year he was burnt, with William Jerome and Thomas Gerard. They all suffered with the patience and fortitude of the old martyrs. His published writings are A Treatise containing a Profession of Faith (first published in Latin, 1531);—Vite Romani Pontificum quos papa vocamus (Wittenb. 1536, with preface by Luther; also Bale, 1568, 8vo). See Burnet, History of the Reformation, i, 474, 477; Fox, Book of Martyrs; Collier, Ecol. Hist. of Eng'nd, v, 78; Hook, Ecol. Biog. i, 522.

Barnes, William, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born near Cookstown, Tyrone county, Ireland, about Easter, 1795. At an early age he came with some relatives to America, and resided for some time at Baltimore, where, at nineteen, he was converted, and was admitted into the church. Soon after, his talents attracted the attention of the Rev. S. G. Roszel, and he was called out to labor on a circuit. He was admitted into the Baltimore Conference in 1817, and for nearly fifty years preached, almost without intermission and with extraordinary success, as an itinerant minister, in Virginia, Maryland, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Delaware. Nearly forty years of this time he spent within the bounds of the Philadelphia Conference, the rest in the Baltimore and Pittsburg Conferences. His mind was active and imaginative to a rare degree, and his preaching was very original and striking; few men of his time were more popular or useful. A poetical vein was manifest in his style, and he left a number of pieces of verse in manuscript. He died suddenly November 24, 1865. Among his manuscript remains are a number of sermons and controversial writings, which are now (1866) preparing for the press. The Rev. Dr. Castle, in a discourse at the funeral of Mr. Barnes, thus spoke of him: "In the world he was not of the world. He was a chosen vessel, called of God and sanctified, and sent to bear his Master's message to his fellow-men. For this he bowed his neck to the yoke. For this he consecrated his towering intellect, the gushing feelings of a generous heart, and the energies of his whole life. Equal ability, fidelity, and perseverance, devoted to any earth-born calling, would have led to fame and fortune. But, like the Italian painter, he worked for eternity, and in eternity he receives his rich reward."—Christian Ate. and Journ., No. 2050.

Baro or Baron, PETER, was born at Etampes in France, and was educated at Bourges. Having embraced Protestantism, he came over into England in the time of Elizabeth to avoid persecution. Here he entered himself at Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1575 was made Lady Margaret professor of divinity on the recommendation of Lord Burghley. Dr. Whitaker, then professor of divinity, and several of the heads of houses, were strong Calvinists. Baro, in his lectures, opposed the doctrine of predestination, and about 1581 he was charged with heresy. From that time on he suffered many vexations and annoyances, but he held his ground until 1595, when his opponents, desiring to support their Calvinistic views by authority, drew up the nine celebrated articles known as the Lambeth Articles (q. v.), which were confirmed by Archbishop Whitgift and others. These articles Baro opposed in a sermon, whereupon he was ordered by the vice-chancellor to give in a copy of his sermon, and to abstain thenceforward from all controversy on articles of faith. His position was made so disagreeable that in 1596 he resigned his professorship and removed to London, where he died about 1600. He wrote, among other things—1. In Jonam Prophetam Prælectiones 39, etc. (London, 1579);—2. De Fide, ejusque Ortu et Natura, etc. (Ibid. 1580);—3. Summa trium Sententiarum de Prædestinatione (1613);—4. Sermons, etc. (4to);—5. De Præstantia et Dignitate Divinæ Legis (Lond. 8vo, n. d.).—Haag, La France Protestante, i, 262; Hook, *Ecol. Baro'dis (Βαρωδῖς, Vulg. Rahotis), a name inserted in the list of those "servants of Solomon" whose "sons" returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esdr. v, 34); but there is no corresponding name in the genuine list of Ezra (ii, 57) or Nehemiah (vii, 59).

Baronius or Baronio, CESAR, the eminent Roman ecclesiastical annalist, was born at Sora, in Naples, October 30th, 1538. He pursued his first studies at Veroli, and theology and jurisprudence at Naples. In 1557 he went with his father, Camillo Baronio, to Rome, where he placed himself under the direction of Philip Neri, who had, at that period, just founded the Congregation of the Oratory, whose chief pursuit was to be the study of ecclesiastical antiquity. The rules of the order, requiring a portion of each day to be given to the study and discussion of points in church history, antiquities, and biography, gave the bent to Baronius's pursuits for life. Clement VIII made him his confessor, and created him cardinal, by the title of SS. Martyrum Nerei and Achillei, 5th June, 1596. Soon after he was made librarian of the Vatican Library and member of the Congregation of Rites. On the death of Clement, and again upon the death of Leo XI, he was within a little of being elected pope; but his own strong opposition, and the opposition of the Spaniards, who could not forgive his De Monarchia Siciliæ, in which he opposed the claim of Spain to Sicily, prevented it. He died June 30th, 1607. His Annales Ecclesiastici was undertaken in obedience to the injunction of his superior, Philip Neri, to defend Rome against the Magdeburg Centuries (q. v.) For thirty years he labored at this immense work, and in 1586, in order, as it were, to try his strength, he put forth the Notes on the Roman Martyrology. This was shortly after (in 1588) followed by the first volume of the An- nals; and the rest of the work, continued down to the year 1198, appeared at different intervals. This work is distributed under the several years, so that under the head of each year are given the events of that year, in every thing in any way relating to the history of the church. Baronius himself informs us that this work was deemed necessary to oppose the Magdeburg Centuriators; and he also says that he was unwilling that the task should be given to him; and that he desired that Onufrius Panvinus should have been charged with it. Though very elaborate and learned, it is throughout a partisan work, and must be studied as such. The first edition appeared at Rome under the title Annales Ecclesiastici a Chr. nat. ad annum 1198 (Rome, 1588-1607, 12 vols. fol.). It was followed by editions at Antwerp, 1589 sq., and Paris, 1609. The edition of Mentz (1601-1605, 12 vols. fol.) was revised by Baronius himself, and designated as a standard for future editions. Many Protestant authors, as Casaubon, Basnage, Korthold, and others, wrote against him. He was defended by the Franciscan Pagi in his work Critica historico-chronologica in universos annales C. Baronii (Antw. 1705, 4 vols.; rev. edit. 1724), who, however, himself corrected many chronological errors of Baronius. The most complete edition of the Annals is by Mansi (Luca, 1738-1759, 38 vols.), which contains the Critica of Pagi printed under the corresponding passages of Baronius, the Continuation of Raynaldus, the learned Apparatus of the editor, and very valuable indexes in 3 vols. Abraham Bzovius, a Polish Dominican, published a Continuation of Baronius down to the year 1571 (Rome, 1616 sq. 8 vols.); another was published by Henry Spondanus, at Paris, in 1640, 2 vols. fol., and Lyons, 1678; but the best Continuation (from the year 1198 to 1566) is perhaps that by Odericus Raynaldus, of the Congregation of the Oratory (Rome, 1646-1663, 9 vols.). The work of Raynaldus was farther continued by Laderchi (Rome, 1728-1737, 3 vols.). The last addition to the work is that of Theiner (Rom. 1856, 3 vols. fol.), bringing the history down, in a partisan style, to 1856. The Epistole of Baronius, his Vita St. Gregorii Naz., together with a brief biography of Baronius, were published by Albericus (Rome, 1670). There are lives of Baronius in Latin by the Oratorian Barnabeus (translated into German by Fritz, Wien, 1718, an abridgment of which translation was published, Augsb. 1845), and in French by La Croze. See Dupin, Eccles. Writers, cent. xvii; Schaff, Apostolic Church, p. 56; Christian Remembrancer, xxiv, 222; Landon, Ecol. Dict. ii, 42.

Barré, Joseph, a French priest and writer, born 1698, entered early into the congregation of St. Geneviève, at Paris, and became eminent for his historical and ecclesiastical knowledge. He was made chancellor of the University of Paris, where he died, 1764. His principal works are Vindiciæ Librorum dent.-cermon. Vet. Test. (1730, 12mo);—Histoire d'Allemagne (1784, 11 vols.);—Examen des faits théologiques s. (Amst. 1744, 2 vols. 12mo).

Barré, Louis Francois Joseph de la, an industrious French scholar, was born at Tournay, March 9, 1688. At Paris he met with Banduri, who had arrived thither from Florence, and whom he assisted in the preparation of the Imperium Orientale (2 vols. fol.), and his work on Medals (Recueil de Médailles des Empereurs). Afterward De la Barré published a new edition of the Spicilegium of Luc d'Acherus (3 vols. fol. 1723), with corrections and notes. He also had a large share in the edition of Moréri's Dictionnaire Historique, published in 1725. He died in 1738. He was a member of the "Academy of Inscriptions."

Barrel (ἄρ, kad [κῆδος, carbus], a pitcher or pail), a vessel used for the keeping of flour (1 Kings xvii, 12, 14, 16; xviii, 33). The same word is in other places rendered "pitcher," as the same vessel appears to have been also used for carrying water (Gen. xxiv, 14; Judg. vii, 16; Eccl. xii, 6). It was borne on the shoulders, as is the custom in the East in the present day. See FRUMEN.

Barren (when spoken of persons, properly אִשָּׁה אֲבֵרָה, al. is. a'barah). Barrenness is, in the East, the hardest lot that can befall a woman, and was considered among the Israelites as the heaviest punishment with which the Lord could visit a female (Gen. xvi, 2; xxx, 1-23; 1 Sam. i, 6, 29; Isa. xlvii, 9; xlix, 21; Luke i, 25; Niebuhr, p. 76; Volney, ii, 359; Lane's Egyptians, i, 73). In the Talmud (Yerawoth, vi, 6) a man was barren, after ten years of childless conjugal life, to marry another woman (with or without repudiation of the first), and even a third one if the second proved also barren. Nor is it improbable that Moses himself contributed to strengthen the opinion of disgrace by the promises of the Lord of exemption from barrenness as a blessing (Exod. xxiii, 26; Deut. vii, 14). Instances of childless wives are found in Gen. xi, 30; xxv, 21; xxix, 31; Judg. xiii, 2, 3; Luke i, 7, 36. Some cases of unlawful marriages, and more especially with a brother's wife, were visited with the punishment of barrenness (Lev. xx, 20, 21); Michaelis, however (Mosaisch. Recht, v, 290), takes the word אִשָּׁה אֲבֵרָה (absterite, "childless") here in a figurative sense, implying that the children born in such an illicit marriage should not be ascribed to the real father, but to the former brother, thus depriving the second husband of the share of patrimonial inheritance which would otherwise have fallen to his lot if the first brother had died childless. The reproach attached to sterility, especially by the Hebrews, may perhaps be accounted for by the constant expectation of the Messiah, and the hope that every woman cherished that she might be the mother of the promised Seed. This constant hope seems to account for many circumstances in the Old Testament history which might otherwise appear extraordinary or exceptional (Gen. iii, 15; xxi, 6, 7; xxv, 21-23; xxvii, 13; xxviii, 11; xxxviii, 11-18; Deut. xxv, 9). This general notion of the disgrace of barrenness in a woman may early have given rise, in the patriarchal age, to the custom among barren wives of introducing to their husbands their maid-servants, and of regarding the children born in that concubinage as their own, by which they thought to cover their own disgrace of barrenness (Gen. xvi, 2; xxx, 3).—Kitto, s. v. Barri, GERALD'S DE. See GERALD'S CAMBRENSIS.

Barrington (JOHN SUETE), VISCOUNT, was born 1678, educated at Utrecht, created Viscount Barrington 1720, and died 1734. He was a friend and disciple of Locke, and greatly devoted to theological pursuits. In the year 1725 he published, in two volumes octavo, his Miscellanea Sacra, or a New Method of considering so much of the History of the Apostles as is contained in Scripture, with four Critical Essays: 1. On the Witness of the Holy Spirit; 2. On the distinction between the Apostles, Elders, and Brethren; 3. On the Time when Paul and Barnabas became Apostles; 4. On the Apostolical Decrees. In this work the author traces the methods taken by the apostles and first preachers of the Gospel for propagating Christianity, and explains, with great distinctness, the several gifts of the Spirit by which they were enabled to discharge that office. A new edition of his Theological Works was published in London in 1828 (3 vols. 8vo).—Jones, Christ. Biog. v. p. p., p. 27; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, s. v.

Barrow, Isaac, D.D., one of the most eminent of English divines, and a distinguished mathematician. He was born in London, October, 1630, and was educated at the Charter House, and at Felsted in Essex. Afterward he went to Cambridge, and became a pensioner of Trinity College in 1645. In 1649 he was elected fellow of his college; but the religious and political troubles of the time greatly checked his progress, and induced him to leave England to travel abroad. He visited France and Italy, and proceeded as far as Smyrna, in the course of which voyage he signalized himself by his courage in a combat with an Algerine pirate. At Constantinople he remained some time, and returned to England, through Germany and Holland, in 1659. He was ordained by Bishop Brownrigg, and in 1660, after the restoration, obtained the Greek chair at Cambridge. In 1662 he was made Gresham Professor of Geometry, and in 1663 Lucasian Professor of Mathematics, in which capacity he had Newton as a pupil. In 1670 he was made D.D., and in February, 1672, was nominated to the mastership of Trinity College. In his later years he gave up mathematics for divinity, feeling himself bound to this course by his ordination vows. He died in London on the 4th of May, 1677, and is buried in Westminster Abbey. His moral character was of the highest type, resting upon true religion. Tillotson says that he "came as near as is possible for human frailty to do to the perfect man of St. James."

Barrow's intellect was of the highest order. As a mathematician he was "second only to Newton," according to English writers, though this is rather too high praise. Of his numerous mathematical writings this is not the place to speak; his fame as a theologian rests chiefly upon his Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy, his Exposition of the Creed, and on his Sermons. Of the Supremacy, Tillotson remarks that "no argument of moment, nay, hardly any consideration properly belonging to the subject, has escaped Barrow's comprehensive mind. He has said enough to silence the controversy forever, and to deter all wise men, of both sides, from meddling any farther with it." See Tillotson, preface to the Theological Works of Dr. Barrow (Lond. 1683, 3 vols. fol.). In theology Barrow was an Arminian, and his writings are, in many respects, an illustration of the Arminian system, though not controversially so. "His sermons," as Le Clerc observes, "are rather treatises and dissertations than harangues, and he wrote and rewrote them three or four times. They are always cited as exact and comprehensive arguments, the produce of a grasp which could collect and of a patience which could combine all that was to be said upon the subject in question. But, in addition to this, Barrow was an original thinker. From his desire to set the whole subject before his hearers, he is often prolix, and his style is frequently redundant. But the sermons of Barrow are store-houses of thought, and they are often resorted to as store-houses by popular preachers and writers. Nor are they wanting in passages which, as examples of a somewhat redundant, but grave, powerful, and exhaustive eloquence, it would be difficult to parallel in the whole range of English pulpit literature." The best edition of his theological writings is that published at Cambridge (1859, 8 vols. 8vo); a cheaper and yet good one, with a memoir by Hamilton, London, 1828 (3 vols. 8vo), reprinted N. Y. 1846 (3 vols. 8vo). They include seventy-eight sermons on various topics; an Exposition of the Apostles' Creed, in 34 discourses; expositions of the Lord's Supper, the Decalogue, the Sacraments; the Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy; with his Opuscula Theologica, including a number of Latin dissertations, etc. See Methodist Quarterly Review, 1846, p. 165 sq.; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 130 sq.; Hook, Eccles. Biograp., i, 555.

Barrow, William, LL.D., was born in Yorkshire about 1754, and was educated at Queen's College, Oxford. In 1814 he was made prebendary of Southwell, and shortly afterward vicar of Farnsfield. In 1829 he was made archdeacon of Nottingham, which office he held till his death in 1836. He published Eight Sermons on the Bampton Lecture (Lond. 1799, 8vo);—Familiar Sermons on Doctrines and Duties (Lond. 3 vols. 8vo).—Darling, Cycl. Bibliogr., i, 185.

Bar'sabab (Βαρσαβᾶς, a Chald. patronymic), the surname of two men.

1. Of JOSEPH (q. v.), mentioned in Acts i, 23.
2. Of JUDAS (q. v.), mentioned in Acts xv, 22.

Barsumas or Barsumas, bishop of Nisibis, a zealous Nestorian of the fifth century. Having been ejected from the school of Edessa, he was made bishop of Nisibis A.D. 435, and devoted himself earnestly for nearly half a century to the establishment of Nestorianism in Persia. He founded the school of Nisibis, a prolific source of Nestorianism. He advocated the right of priests to marry, and himself married a nun. See Assemani, Bibl. Orient. III, ii, 77; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. i, 363. See NESTORIANS.

Barsumas, a Syrian archimandrite, head of the Eutychean party at the robber-council of Ephesus, A.D. 449. Among the Jacobites (q. v.) he is held as a saint and miracle-worker. See EPHESUS, ROBBER-COUNCIL OF.

Bar'tacus (Βάρτακος; Vulg. Βάρτα), the father of Apame, the concubine of King Darius (1 Esdr. iv, 29, where he is called "the admirable" [ὁ θαυμαστός]), probably an official title belonging to his rank. The Syrian version has Artak, a name which recalls that of Artabehras (Ἀρταβήρας), who is named by Herodotus (vii, 22, 117) as being in a high position in the Persian army under Xerxes, and a special favorite of that king (Simonis, Onom.; Smith's Dict. of Class. Eng. i, 369). See APAME.

Barth, CHRISTIAN GOTTLIB, D.D., an eminent German divine and philanthropist, was born at Stuttgart, July 31, 1799, obtained his academical education at the Gymnasium there, and from 1817 to 1821 studied theology at Tübingen. He early manifested strong religious feelings, and during all his life kept himself free from the prevailing rationalism. In 1824 he became pastor at Möttlingen, Württemberg, and in 1838 retired to Calw, in order to devote himself to the missionary cause, and to the production of books of practical religion, to which objects he had already given much of his attention. He had, with the flourishing missionary institute at Basle, formed the first (Calwer) missionary society in Württemberg, published a periodical, "The Calwer Mission Sheet," and was the means of exciting a wide-spread interest in the cause of missions.

From this period his life became still more active. The interests of the mission led him to travel far and near, sometimes to England, to France, and to the interior of Switzerland; and he was brought into friendly relationship with the courts of Württemberg, Baden, Bavaria, Austria, Russia, England, Prussia, etc. His house became a sojourn for persons from all parts of the world. He founded a conference of evangelical pastors and a training-school for poor children. Among his multitudinous publications of practical reading, both for adults and children, are Kinderblätter (Calw, 1836); Christ. Kinderschriften (Stuttg. 4 vols.); Christ. Gedichte (Stutt. 1836); Kirchengeschichte für Schulen und Familien (Calw, 1835); Biblische Geschichte für Schulen und Familien. The sale of these books has been unparalleled. Of the Bible History and Bible Stories more than a million copies have been published in ten or twelve languages of the Christian and heathen world. He was also a ready versifier, and wrote many hymns and short poems for children; and several of his hymns, especially those on Missions, have found their way into the later German collections of hymns. In 1838, the University of Tübingen conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Theology. His health was feeble during his later years, but he continued to work up to the last day, and was only induced to lie down about half an hour before his death, Nov. 12, 1862.—Pierer, Universal-Lexicon, s. v.; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. Supp. i, p. 168.

Barthel, JOHANN CASPAR, a German canonist, born in 1697 at Kitzingen. He studied at Würzburg with the Jesuits, and subsequently at Rome under Cardinal Lambertini, afterward Benedict XIV. In 1727 he was made professor of canon law in the University of Würzburg, of which he afterward became vice-chancellor. To intense hatred of Protestantism Barthel united a steadfast resistance to all papal claims unauthorized by law. He died in 1771, having greatly improved the teaching of the canon law, which before his time consisted simply in repeating the decretals and comments of the court of Rome. Barthel followed zealously in the path of De Marca, Thomassin, Fleury, and other great theologians of France, and reduced the canon law to a form suited to the wants and peculiar circumstances of Germany. The following are his chief works: 1. Historia Pacificationum Imperii circa Religionem consistens (Würzburg, 1736, 4to);—2. De Jure Reformandi antiquo et novo (Ibid. 1744, 4to);—3. De restitutâ canoniarum in Germaniâ electionum potestati (Ibid. 1749);—Tractatus de eo quod circa libertatem exercitâ religionis ex lege d'vina et ex lege imperii justum est (Ibid. 1764, 4to).—Landon, Ecl. Dict. ii, 47; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, iv, 645.

Bartholomew (Βαρθολομαῖος, for Chald. ܒܪܬܘܠܡܝܘܨ, i. e. son of Tobuui; the latter being a name that occurs in Josh. xv, 14, Sept. Θολομῆ and Θολομαῖ; Auth. Vers. Tobuui; 2 Sam. xiii, 37, Sept. Θολυ and Θολομαῖ). In Josephus we find Θολομαῖος, Ant. xx, 1, 1. The Θολομαῖος in Ant. xiv, 8, 1, is called Ἡρωλεμαῖος in War. i, 9, 3, not improbably by an error of the transcriber, as another person of the latter name is mentioned in the same sentence, one of the twelve apostles of Christ (Matt. x, 3; Mark iii, 18; Luke vi, 14; Acts i, 13), generally supposed to have been the same individual who in John's Gospel is called NATHANAE (q. v.). The reason of this opinion is that in the first three gospels Philip and Bartholomew are constantly named together, while Nathanael is nowhere mentioned; on the contrary, in the fourth gospel the names of Philip and Nathanael are similarly combined, but nothing is said of Bartholomew (see Assemani, Biblioth. Or. III, i, 306; ii, 4 sq.; Nahr, De Nathanael a Bartholom. non diverso, Lips. 1740). Nathanael, therefore, must be considered as his real name, while Bartholomew merely expresses his filial relation (see Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. p. 325). If so, he was a native of Cana in Galilee (John xxi, 2). Bernard and Abbot Rupert were of opinion that he was the bridegroom at the marriage of Cana. (For traditions respecting his parentage, see Cotelerius, Patr. Apost. 372). He was introduced by Philip to Jesus, who, on seeing him approach, at once pronounced that eulogy on his character which has made his name almost synonymous with sincerity, "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile" (John i, 47). A. D. 26. He was one of the disciples to whom our Lord appeared after his resurrection, at the Sea of Tiberias (John xxi, 2); he was also a witness of the ascension, and returned with the other apostles to Jerusalem (Acts i, 4, 12, 15). A. D. 29. On his character, see Niemeyer, Charakt. i, 111 sq. See APOSTLE.

Of the subsequent history of Bartholomew, or Nathanael, we have little more than vague traditions. According to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. v, 10), when Pantaenus went on a mission to the Indians (toward the close of the second century), he found among them the Gospel of Matthew, written in Hebrew, which had been left there by the Apostle Bartholomew. Jerome (De Vir. Illust. c. 36) gives a similar account, and adds that Pantaenus brought the copy of Matthew's Gospel back to Alexandria with him. See MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF. But the title of "Indians" is applied by ancient writers to so many different nations that it is difficult to determine the scene of Bartholomew's labors. Mosheim (with whom Neander agrees) is of opinion that it was a part of Arabia Felix, inhabited by Jews, to whom alone a Hebrew gospel could be of any service. Socrates (Hist. Eccles. i, 19) says that it was the India bordering on Ethiopia; and Sophronius reports that Bartholomew preached the Gospel of Christ to the inhabitants of India Felix (Ἰνδοῖς τοῖς καθ' ἑαυτοῖς ἐβασίλευσαν). This apostle is said to have suffered crucifixion with his head downward at Albanopolis, in Armenia Minor (Assemanni, Bibl. Or. III, ii, 20), or, according to the pseudo-chrysostom (Opp. viii, 622, ed. Par. nov.), in Lycæonia; according to Nicephorus, at Urbanopolis, in Cilicia (see Abdias, in Fabricius, Cod. Apoc. ii, 685 sq.; Baronius, ad Martyrol. Rom. p. 500 sq.; Perizonii Vita Apostolor. p. 127 sq.). See BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY.

A spurious GOSPEL which bears his name is in the catalogue of apocryphal books condemned by Pope Gelasius (Fabric. Cod. Apoc. N. T. i, 341 sq.).—Kitto, s. v. See GOSPELS (SPURIOUS).

Bartholomew of Edessa, a monk, probably a Syrian, but of what date is totally unknown. According to Cave, he displays considerable learning and a profound knowledge of the writings and ceremonies of the Chaldees, Arabians, and Mohammedans. He wrote, in Greek, Elenchus, or Confutatio Hæreni, in which he exposes the follies of the Koran, and the origin, life, manners, rites, and dogmas of the false prophet Mohammed. This work, in Greek, with a Latin version, is given by Le Moine at p. 302 of his Collection (Lyons, 1685).—Landon, Ecol. Diet. ii, 49.

Bartholomew of Cotton, a monk of Norwich, who flourished about 1292. He wrote a History of England, divided into three parts. Part I contains an account of the Britons; Part II treats of the Saxon and Norman kings down to the year 1292; Part III gives much information concerning the archbishops and bishops of England from 1152 to 1292, and may be found in Wharton, Anglia Sacra, i, 397. See Clarke, Succession of Sac. Lit. ii, 764; Landon, s. v.

Bartholomew of Glanville (also called Anglæus), an Englishman, of the family of the earls of Suffolk, and a Franciscan. He applied himself to the discovery of the morals hidden under the outward appearance of natural things, on which he composed a large work, entitled Opus de Proprietatibus Rerum, in nineteen books: (1.) Of God; (2.) of angels and devils; (3.) of the soul; (4.) of the body, etc. (Argent. 1188; Nuremb. 1492; Strasb. 1505; Paris, 1574). He flourished about 1360, and a volume of Sermons, printed at Strasburg in 1395, is attributed to him. See Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1390; Dupin, Ecol. Writers.

Bartholomew or Bartolomeo dos Martyres, so called from the name of the church of "Our Lady of Martyrs" at Lisbon, in which he was baptized, was one of the best men in the Romish Church of the 16th century. He was born at Lisbon in May, 1511, and assumed the habit of St. Dominic at Lisbon, 11th December, 1528. Having been for twenty years professor of philosophy and theology, his high reputation caused him to be selected as preceptor of the son of Don Louis, infant of Portugal. It was only at the positive command of Louis of Granada, as his superior, that he accepted the archbishopric of Braga (1558), and that with such reluctance as threw him upon a bed of sickness. He entered upon his see on the 4th of October, 1559, and commenced at once the execution of his design of teaching his flock by his own example and that of his household. He selected one small room out of all the magnificent apartments of the palace; he furnished it like a cell; he went to bed at eleven at night, and rose at three in the morning; his bed was hard and scanty; his body always covered with the hair-cloth; his table always poorly supplied. Of the usual attendants of great houses, such as maîtres d'hôtel, &c., he had none, contenting himself with a few necessary domestics. As soon as he had thus set his own house in order, he hastened to endeavor to do the same with the city of Braga and his diocese in general. He established schools and hospitals, and devoted himself to works of charity and mercy. As one of the delegates to the Council of Trent, he especially signalized himself there by his zeal on the subject of the reform of the cardinals. On one occasion he delivered those well-known words on this subject, "Eminentissimi Cardinales eminentissima egest reformatio," and expressed his strong condemnation of their luxurious and unfitting kind of life. He it was also who first induced the council to begin their sessions with the question of the reform of the clergy. In 1582 Pope Gregory XIII allowed him to resign his see, and he retired to a convent at Viana, where he died in 1590. His life was written by Isaac de Sacy, and his writings, among which the Simulacrum Pastorum, a guide for bishops, has had the largest circulation, were published by P. d'Inguibert at Rome, 1734-35 (2 vols. fol.), and by Fessler (Einsiedeln, 1863, 8vo).

Bartholomew's Day, I, a festival celebrated on the 24th day of August (or 25th at Rome) in the Church of Rome, and on the 11th of June in the Greek Church, in commemoration of the apostle Bartholomew.

2. The day has been rendered infamous in history in consequence of the massacre of the Protestants in France in 1572. The principal Protestants were invited to Paris, under a solemn oath of safety, to celebrate the marriage of the King of Navarre with the sister of the French king. The queen-dowager of Navarre, a zealous Protestant, died before the marriage was celebrated, not without suspicion of poison. The massacre commenced about twilight in the morning on the tolling of a bell of the church of St. Germain. Admiral Coligni was basely murdered in his own house, and then thrown out of a window, to gratify the malice of the Duke of Guise. His head was afterward cut off and sent to the king (Charles IX) and the queen-mother, the bloody Catherine de Medici; his body, after a thousand indignities offered to it, was hung up by the feet on a gibbet. The murderers then ravaged the whole city of Paris, and put to death more than ten thousand of all ranks. De Thou says, "The very streets and passages resounded with the groans of the dying and of those who were about to be murdered. The bodies of the slain were thrown out of the windows, and with them the courts and chambers of the houses were filled. The dead bodies of others were dragged through the streets; and the blood flowed down the channels in such torrents that it seemed to empty itself into the neighboring river. In short, an innumerable multitude of men, women, and children were involved in one common destruction, and all the gates and entrances to the king's palace were besmeared with blood." From Paris the massacre spread through the kingdom. The total number that fell during this massacre has been estimated by De Thou at 30,000, by Sully at 60,000, and by Perefixe, a popish historian, at 100,000. The news of this atrocious murder was received at Rome with unrestrained joy and delight; a universal jubilee was proclaimed by the pope; the guns of St. Angelo were fired, and bonfires lighted in the streets. A medal was struck in the pope's mint, with his own head on one side, and on the other a rude representation of the massacre, with an angel brandishing a sword, and bearing the inscription "Hugnotorum strages." See HUGUENOTS.

Romanist writers treat this massacre in three ways: (1.) Some, like Cayreac, De Falloux, and Rohrbacher, justify it; (2.) others affirm that the Romanists were only following the example set by Protestants; (3.) others again, like Theiner, in his new volumes of the Annales Ecclesiasticæ, attribute it to politics, not to religion. Theiner's view is refuted, and the complicity of the Roman Church, with the pope at its head, in this great crime is shown in the Christian Remem- brancer, xxiv, 245. Lingard, in his History of England, gives a favorable view of the facts for the Roman side, which is refuted in the Eliaburgh Review, vols. xlii, liii; and in Lardner, Hist. of England (Cab. Cyclopaedia, vol. iii). See Curth's Die Bartholomäusnacht (Lpz. 1814); Wachler, Die Pariser Bluthochzeit (Lpz. 1826); Audin, Hist. de la St. Barthélemy (Paris, 1829); also, Turner, Hist. of England, vol. iii, Appendix; Cobbin, *Historical View of the Ref. 2. A congregation of secular priests, who take their name from Bartholomew Holshauer, who founded the order at Salzburg, August 1st, 1640. Pope Innocent XI approved their constitutions in 1680 and 1684. This congregation was established for the purpose of forming good priests and pastors, and was governed by a chief president, whose duty it was to maintain uniformity of discipline throughout the congregation, and by diocesan presidents, who were to attend to the same thing in their respective dioceses, by watching over the curates and other ecclesiastics belonging to their institution, visiting them annually, and reporting the result of their visitations to the ordinary. Curates belonging to this institute were never placed singly in any cure; an assistant priest was almost always appointed with each curate, who was paid either out of the revenues of the parish, or by the revenues of some richer parish, likewise filled by a Bartholomite, if the former be too poor. They had many members in Germany, France, Italy, Hungary, Poland, and other countries, but have long been extinct. See Helvet, Ord. Religieux, i, 373.

Bartimæus (Βαρτιμαῖος, for the Chald. ܒܪܬܝܡܝܐ ܕܥܝܪܐ, son of Timmæ), one of the two blind beggars of Jericho who (Mark x, 46 sq.; comp. Matt. xx, 30) sat by the wayside begging as our Lord passed out of Jericho on his last journey to Jerusalem, A. D. 29. Notwithstanding that many charged him to be quiet, he continued crying, "Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy on me!" Being called, and his blindness miraculously cured, on the ground of his faith, by Jesus, he became thenceforward a believer.

Bartine, DAVID, an eminent Methodist preacher, was born in Westchester county, N. Y., Jan. 26, 1767. He was converted at twenty-one, and his piety, zeal, and talent early drew the eyes of the Church toward him as one called to preach the Gospel. His first field of labor was Salem Circuit, to which he was sent by Bishop Asbury. The next year (1793) he was received into the travelling connection, and from that time till he became supernumerary (1835) he labored without intermission, principally in New Jersey. His natural talents were of a very high order; he had a judgment clear and penetrating, powers of perception comprehensive and discriminating, a memory acute and very retentive, and an energy which insured success. In his preaching he usually addressed the understanding and the judgment, and yet often, in the application of his argument, his appeals to the heart were peculiarly eloquent and impressive. He died April 26th, 1850. —Minutes of Conf. iv, 567; N. J. Conf. Memorial, 183.

Bartoli, DANIEL, an Italian Jesuit, born at Ferrara in 1608, who entered the company in 1623, and taught rhetoric for four years. For twelve years he exercised the ministry of preaching in the principal towns of Italy, and died at Rome, January 13th, 1685. Bartoli is considered as one of the best writers of his country, and is the author of many works, all written in Italian, but of which Latin and other translations have been published. The most important of his works is the History of the Company of Jesus (Istoria della Compagnia di Gesù), in several parts, forming 6 vols. folio, viz.: (i.) "The Life and Institute of St. Ignatius" (Rome, 1650). (ii.) "The History of the Company of Jesus," Asia, Part I (Rome, 1650). (iii.) "History of Japan," Part II of Asia (Rome, 1690). (iv.) "History of China," Part III of Asia (Rome, 1661). (v.) "History of England," Part of Europe (Rome, 1667). (vi.) "History of Italy," Part I of Europe (Rome, 1673). He wrote also lives of Loyola, Caraffa, and other Jesuits, which, with the work above named, are repositories of facts as to the history of the Jesuits. His complete works were published by Marietti (Turin, 1825, 12 vols.), and a selection, under the title Descrizione geograf. e stor., by Silvestri (Milan, 1826).—Landon, Ecol. Dict. ii, 55.

Barton, Elizabeth, the "holy maid of Kent," first becomes known to us in 1525, when, while a servant at an inn at Aldington, in Kent, she began to acquire a local reputation for sanctity and miraculous endowments. She was subject to epileptic fits, and in the paroxysms vented incoherent phrases, which Richard Master, parson of Aldington, took advantage of to make people believe that she was an instrument of divine revelation. A successful prediction lent its aid to the general delusion. A child of the master of the inn happened to be ill when Elizabeth was attacked by one of her fits. On recovering, she inquired whether the child was dead. She was told that it was still living. "It will not live, I announce to you; its death has been revealed to me in a vision," was the answer. The child died, and Elizabeth was immediately regarded as one favored by Heaven with the gift of prophecy. She soon after entered the convent of St. Sepulchre's at Canterbury, and became a nun. In this new situation her revelations multiplied, and she became generally known as the "holy maid of Kent." Bishop Fisher and Archbishop Warham countenanced her pretensions. Led by her zeal, or more probably worked upon by others, she boldly prophesied in reference to the divorce of Henry VIII from Catherine and his marriage with Anne Boleyn, "that she had knowledge by revelation from heaven that God was highly displeased with our said sovereign lord, and that if he proceeded in the said divorce and separation and married again, he should no longer be king of this realm; and that, in the estimation of Almighty God, he should not be king one hour, and that he should die a villain's death." The prediction was widely diffused, and caused great popular excitement. In November, 1533, the nun, with five priests and three lay gentlemen, her accomplices, were brought before the Star Chamber, and sentenced to do public penance as impostors at St. Paul's Cross. But the nun's confession, whatever were its motives, availed her nothing. From the pillory she and her companions were led back to prison, where they lay till the following January, when they were attainted of high treason. On the 21st of April, 1534, the nun was beheaded at Tyburn, together with the five priests.—English Cyclopaedia; Burnet, History of Reformation, i, 243-249.

Barton, John B., a Methodist Episcopal minister and missionary, was born in Savannah 1806, converted 1831, entered the itinerant ministry in the Georgia Conference 1834, and was sent as missionary to Africa, where he arrived in August, 1835, and was appointed to Bassa Cove. In 1837 he returned to the United States, and married Eleanor Gilbert, of Charleston, S. C. In 1838 he went back with his family to Africa, and was stationed at Monrovia until his death, which occurred March 19, 1839. He was much loved and honored by the people among whom he labored.—Minutes of Conference, iii, 61.

Barton, Thomas, M.A., an early Episcopal minister in America, was born in Ireland 1750, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. Soon after he came to America, and after teaching two years in the Academy of Philadelphia, he went to England for ordination, and in 1755 was appointed missionary to Huntington. He extended his field of labor to Carlisle, Shippensburg, and York, and was specially interested in the Indians. He served the Church in Lancaster twenty years, travelling largely to preach at destitute points. When the Revolution broke out he refused the oath of allegiance, and had to pass to the British lines at New York. He died 1789.—Sprague, Annals, v, 169.

Baruch (Heb. Baruk', בְּרֻכָּא, blessed; Sept. Baroc'v, Josephus Βαροὺχ'ος), the name of three men.

1. The faithful friend of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. xxxii, 12; xxxvi, 4 sq.) was of a noble family of the tribe of Judah (Jer. li, 59; Bar. i, 1; Joseph. Ant. x, 6, 2; 9, 1), and generally considered to be the brother of the prophet Seraiah, both being represented as sons of Neriah; and to Baruch the prophet Jeremiah dictated all his oracles. See JEREMIAH. In the fourth year of the reign of Jehoiachin, king of Judah (B.C. 605), Baruch was directed to write all the prophecies delivered by Jeremiah up to that period, and to read them to the people, which he did from a window in the Temple upon two solemn occasions (Jer. xxxvi). He afterward read them before the counsellors of the king at a private interview, when Baruch, being asked to give an account of the manner in which the prophecy had been composed, gave an exact description of the mode in which he had taken it down from the prophet's dictation. Upon this they ordered him to leave the roll, advising that he and Jeremiah should conceal themselves. They then informed the king of what had taken place, upon which he had the roll read to him; but, after hearing a part of it, he cut it with a penknife, and notwithstanding the remonstrances of his counsellors, threw it into the fire of his winter parlor, where he was sitting. He then ordered Jeremiah and Baruch to be seized, but they could not be found. The Jews to this day commemorate the burning of this roll by an annual fast. See CALENDAR (JEWISH). Another roll was now written by Baruch from the prophet's dictation, containing all that was in the former, with some additions, the most remarkable of which is the prophecy respecting the ruin of Jehoiachin and his house as the punishment of his impious act. This roll is the prophecy of Jeremiah which we now possess. Baruch, being himself terrified at the threats contained in the prophetic roll, received the comforting assurance that he would himself be delivered from the calamities which should befall Judah and Jerusalem (Jer. xlv). During the siege of Jerusalem Baruch was selected as the depository of the deed of purchase which Jeremiah had made of the territory of Hammelech, to which deed he had been a witness (Jer. xxxii, 12 sq.). B.C. 589. His enemies accused him of influencing Jeremiah in favor of the Chaldeans (Jer. xliii, 3; comp. xxxvii, 15); and he was thrown into prison with that prophet, where he remained till the capture of Jerusalem, B.C. 588 (Joseph. Ant. x, 9, 1). By the permission of Nebuchadnezzar he remained with Jeremiah at Mas-phatha (Joseph. l. c.); but in the fourth year of Zedekiah (B.C. 595) Baruch is supposed by some to have accompanied Seraiah to Babylon, when the latter attended Zedekiah with the prophecies contained in Jeremiah, ch. i and li, which he was commanded by Jeremiah to read on the banks of the Euphrates, and then to cast the prophetic roll into the river, with a stone attached to it, to signify the everlasting ruin of Babylon (Jer. li, 61). At least Baruch, in the book which bears his name (in the Apocrypha), is said to have read these prophecies at Babylon, in the hearing of King Jehoiachin and the captive Jews, in the fifth year of the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans (see below), which must have been the same taking of it in which Jehoiachin was made prisoner; for after the other taking of Jerusalem, in the eleventh year of the reign of King Zedekiah, when the Jews, after their return from Babylon, obstinately persisted in their determination to migrate to Egypt against the remonstrances of the prophet, both Baruch and Jeremiah accompanied them to that country (Jer. xliii, 6; Joseph. Ant. x, 9, 6), from whence there is no account in Scripture of Baruch's return. The rabbins, however, allege that he died in Babylon in the twelfth year of the exile (see Calmet's Preface). Jerome, on the other hand, states, "on the authority of the Jews" (Hebraei tradunt), that Jeremiah and Baruch died in Egypt "before the desolation of the country by Nabuchodonosor" (Comm. in Is. xxx, 6, 7, p. 405). Josephus asserts that he was well skilled in the Hebrew language; and that, after the taking of Jerusalem, Nebuzaradan treated Baruch with consideration from respect to Jeremiah, whose misfortunes he had shared, and whom he had accompanied to prison and exile (Ant. x, 9, 1 and 2).—Kitto; Smith.

BARUCH, BOOK OF (APOCRYPHAL), follows next after the Book of Jeremiah in the Septuagint printed text, but in MSS. it sometimes precedes and sometimes follows Lamentations. It stands between Ecclesiasticus and the Song of the Three Children in the Engl. Auth. Vers. See APOCRYPHA.

1. Contents.—It is remarkable as the only book in the Apocrypha which is formed on the model of the Prophets; and, though it is wanting in originality, it presents a vivid reflection of the ancient prophetic fire.

The subject of the book is (1.) an exhortation to wisdom and a due observance of the law; (2.) it then introduces Jerusalem as a widow, comforting her children with the hope of a return; (3.) an answer follows in confirmation of this hope. A prologue is prefixed, stating that Baruch had read his book to Jeremiah and the people in Babylon by the river Sud (Euphrates), by which the people were brought to repentance, and sent the book with a letter and presents to Jerusalem.

It may be divided into two main parts, i-iii, 8, and iii, 9-end. The first part consists of an introduction (i, 1-14), followed by a confession and prayer (i, 15-iii, 8). The second part opens with an abrupt address to Israel (iii, 9-iv, 30), pointing out the sin of the people in neglecting the divine teaching of wisdom (iii, 9-iv, 8), and introducing a noble lament of Jerusalem over her children, through which hope still gleams (iv, 9-30). After this the tone of the book again changes suddenly, and the writer addresses Jerusalem in words of triumphant joy, and paints in the glowing colors of Isaiah the return of God's chosen people and their abiding glory (iv, 30 v, 9).

II. Text: 1. Greek.—The book at present exists in Greek, and in several translations which were made from the Greek. The two classes into which the Greek MSS. may be divided do not present any very remarkable variations (Fritzsche, Einl. § 7); but the Syro-Hexaplaric text of the Milan MS., of which a complete edition is at length announced, is said to contain references to the version of Theodotion (Eichhorn, Einl. in die Apoc. Schrift, p. 388 note), which must imply a distinct recension of the Greek, if not an independent rendering of an original Hebrew text. Of the two old Latin versions which remain, that which is incorporated in the Vulgate is generally literal; the other (Carns, Rom, 1688) is more free. The vulgar Syriac and Arabic follow the Greek text closely (Fritzsche, l. c.).

2. Hebrew.—Considerable discussion has been raised as to the original language of the book. Those who advocated its authenticity generally supposed that it was first written in Hebrew (Huet, Dereser, etc.; but Jahn is undecided: Bertholdt, Eind. 1755), and this opinion found many supporters (Bundtsen, Grünberg, Movers, Hitzig, De Wette, Eind. § 323). Others again have maintained that the Greek is the original text (Eichhorn, Eind. 388 sq.; Bertholdt, Eind. 1757; Hävernick ap. De Wette, l. c.). The truth appears to lie between these two extremes. The two divisions of the book are distinguished by marked peculiarities of style and language. The Hebrew character of the first part (i-iii, 8) is such as to mark it as a translation, and not as the work of a Hebraizing Greek: e. g. i, 14, 15, 22; ii, 1, 9, 25; iii, 8; and several obscurities seem to be mistranslations: e. g. i, 2, 8, ii, 18, 29. The second part, on the other hand, which is written with greater freedom and vigor, closely approaches the Alexandrine type. The imitations of Jeremiah and Daniel which occur throughout the first part (comp. i, 15-18 = Dan. ix, 7-10; ii, 1, 2 = Dan. ix, 12, 13; ii, 7-19 = Dan. ix, 13-18) give place to the tone and imagery of the Psalms and Isaiah. The most probable explanation of this contrast is gained by supposing that some one thoroughly conversant with the Alexandrine translation of Jeremiah, perhaps the translator himself (Hitzig, Fritzsche), found the Hebrew fragment which forms the basis of the book already attached to the writings of that prophet, and wrought it up into its present form. The peculiarities of language common to the Sept. translation of Jeremiah and the first part of Baruch seem too great to be accounted for in any other way (for instance, the use of ἀποστολή, ἀποστολή, βόμψη [βόμψη], ἀποστολή, ἀποστολή, ἀποστολή; ἐργάζεσθαι τὴν ὄνομα ἐπακαθίσταται ἐπὶ τῶν) and the great discrepancy which exists between the Hebrew and Greek texts as to the arrangement of the later chapters of Jeremiah, increases the probability of such an addition having been made to the canonical prophecies. These verbal coincidences cease to exist in the second part, or become very rare; but this also is distinguished by characteristic words: e. g. ὁ αἰώνιος ὁ ἄγιος, ἐπάγειν. At the same time, the general unity (even in language, e. g. χαριστόν) and coherence of the book in its present form point to the work of one man. (Fritzsche, Eind. § 5; Hitzig, Psalm. ii, 119; Ewald, Gesch. d. Volkes Isr. iv, 232 n.). Bertholdt appears to be quite in error (Eind. 1743, 1762) in assigning iii, 1-8 to a separate writer (De Wette, Eind. § 322). (See Siebenberger's Heb. Comm. Warsaw, 1840.)

3. The Epistle of Jeremiah, which, according to the authority of some Greek MSS., stands in the English version as the 6th chapter of Baruch, is probably the work of a later period. It consists of a rhetorical declamation against idols (comp. Jerem. x, xxix) in the form of a letter addressed by Jeremiah "to them which were to be led captive to Babylon." The letter is divided into clauses by the repetition of a common burden: they are no gods; fear them not (vv. 16, 23, 29, 63): how can a man think or say that they are gods? (vv. 40, 44, 56, 64). The condition of the text is closely analogous to that of Baruch; and the letter found the same partial reception in the Church. The author shows an intimate acquaintance with idolatrous worship; and this circumstance, combined with the purity of the Hellenistic dialect, points to Egypt as the country in which the epistle was written.—Smith, s. v.

4. A Syriac first Epistle of Baruch "to the nine and a half tribes" (comp. 4 Esdr. xiii, 40, Arab. Vers.) is found in the London and Paris Polyglots. This is made up of commonplaces of warning, encouragement, and exhortation. Fritzsche (Eind. § 8) considers it to be the production of a Syrian monk. It is not found in any other language. Whiston (A Collection of Authentic Records, etc., London, 1727, i, 1, sq., 25 sq.) endeavored to maintain its authenticity. See a full introd. by Ginsburg, in the new ed. of Kitto's Cyclop.

III. Writer.—The assumed author of the book is undoubtedly the companion of Jeremiah, but the details are inconsistent with the assumption. If Baruch be the author of this book, he must have removed from Egypt to Babylon immediately after the death of Jeremiah, inasmuch as the author of the book lived in Babylon in the fifth year after that event, unless we suppose, with Eichhorn, Arnold, and others, that the reference (Baruch i, 1) is to the fifth year from the captivity of Jehoiachim. Jahn (Introductio in Epistolam redacta, § 217, etc.) considers this latter opinion at variance with the passage in question, since the destruction of Jerusalem is there spoken of as having already taken place. De Wette (Lehrbuch der Einleitung in das A. und N. T.) ingeniously conjectures that ἔτι (year) is a mistake or correction of some transcriber for μηνί (month); and there is no question that the present reading, which mentions the year, and the day of the month, without naming the month itself, is quite unaccountable. If the reading in i, 1, be correct (comp. 2 Kings xxv, 8), it is impossible to fix "the fifth year" in such a way as to suit the contents of the book, which exhibits not only historical inaccuracies, but also evident traces of a later date than the beginning of the captivity (iii, 9 sq.; iv, 22 sq.; i, 3 sq. Comp. 2 Kings xxv, 27). Its so-called Epistle of Jeremiah, however, is confessedly more ancient than the second book of Maccabees, for it is there referred to (2 Macc. ii, 2, comp. with Baruch vi, 4) as an ancient document. In the absence of any certain data by which to fix the time of the composition of Baruch, Ewald (l. c. p. 230) assigns it to the close of the Persian period; and this may be true as far as the Hebrew portion is concerned; but the present book must be placed considerably later, probably about the time of the war of liberation (B. C. cir. 169), or somewhat earlier.

IV. Canonicity.—The book was held in little esteem among the Jews (Jerome, Prof. in Jerem. p. 834 . . . nee habetur apud Hebræos; Epiphanius, de mens. ob κενύται ἐπιστολαὶ [Baruch] πρὸς Ἑβραίους), though it is stated in the Greek text of the Apostolical Constitutions (v, 20, 1) that it was read, together with the Lamentations, "on the tenth of the month Gorpæus" (i. e. the day of Atonement). But this reference is wanting in the Syriac version (Bunsen, Anal. Ante-Nic. ii, 187), and the assertion is unsupported by any other authority. There is no trace of the use of the book in the New Testament, or in the Apostolic Fathers, or in Justin. But from the time of Irenæus it was frequently quoted both in the East and in the West, and generally as the work of Jeremiah (Irenæus, Haer. v, 35, 1, "significavit Jeremias, Bar. iv, 36-v"; Tertullian, Gnost. 8, "Hieremias, Bar. [Epist.] vi, 3"; Clement, Ped. i, 10, § 91, "ἐν τῷ βιβλίῳ, Bar. iv, 4"; id. Ped. ii, 3, § 36, "θεῖα γραφή, Bar. iii, 16, 19"; Origen, ap. Euseb. H. E. vi, 25, "ἱερατικὸν εἰς τοῖν καὶ τῷ ἐπιστολῇ [?]" Cyprian, Test. Lib. ii, 6, "apud Hieremiam, Bar. iii, 75," etc.). It was, however, "obliterated" throughout in the Sept. as deficient in the Hebrew (Cod. Chis. ap. Daniel, etc., Rome, 1772, p. xxi). On the other hand, it is contained as a separate book in the pseudo-Lodivene Catalogue, and in the Catalogues of Cyril of Jerusalem, Athanasius, and Nicephorus; but it is not specially mentioned in the Conciliar catalogues of Carthage and Hippo, probably as being included under the title Jeremiah. (Comp. Athanasii Syn. S. Script. ap. Credner, Zur Gesch. des Kan. 138; Hilary, Prolog. in Psalm. 15). It is omitted by those writers who reproduced in the main the Hebrew Canon (e. g. Melito, Gregory Nazianzen, Epiphanius). Augustine quotes the words of Baruch (iii, 16) as attributed "more commonly to Jeremiah" (de Civ. xviii, 33), and elsewhere uses them as such (Faust. xii, 43). At the Council of Trent Baruch was admitted into the Romish Canon; but the Protestant churches have unanimously placed it among the apocryphal books, though Whiston maintained its authenticity (Authent. Records, i, 1, sq.). Calmet observes that its "canonicity had been denied not only by the Protestants, but by several Catholics," among whom he instances Driedo, Lyranus, and Dionysius of Carthage. He considers that Jerome treats the book with harshness when (Preface to Jeremiah) that father observes, "I have not thought it worth while to translate the book of Baruch, which is generally joined in the Septuagint version to Jeremiah, and which is not found among the Hebrews, nor the pseud-epigraphal epistle of Jeremiah." This is the epistle forming the sixth chapter of Baruch, the genuineness of which is questioned by several who acknowledge that of the former part of the book. Most modern writers of the Roman Church, among whom are Du Pin (Canon of Scripture), Calmet (Commentary), and Allber (Hermetica Generalis), reckon this a genuine epistle of Jeremiah's. Jahn, however, after Jerome, maintains its spurious and pseud-epigraphal character. This he conceives sufficiently attested by the difference of style and its freedom from Hebraisms. He considers it to be an imitation of the Epistle of Jeremiah (ch. xxix). Grotius, Eichhorn, and most of the German writers favor the idea of a Greek original. They conceive that the writer was some unknown person in the reign of Ptolemy Lagos, who, wishing to confirm in the true religion the Jews then residing in Egypt, attributed his own ideas to Baruch the scribe. There appears, however, no reason, on this latter hypothesis, why the author should speak of the return from Babylon. Grotius conceives that the book abounds not only in Jewish, but even in Christian interpolations (see Eichhorn's Einleitung in die Apokryph. Schriften).

2. The son of Col-hozeh and father of Maaseiah, of the descendants of Perez, son of Judah (Neh. xi, 5). B.C. ante 536.

3. The son of Zabudai; he repaired (B.C. 446) that part of the walls of Jerusalem between the north-east angle of Zion and Eliashib's house (Neh. iii, 19), and joined in Nehemiah's covenant (x. 6). B.C. 410.

Barzil'laï (Heb. Barzillai, בַּרְזִילַי, of iron, i. e. strong; Sept. Βαρζιλαι, but in Ezra Βαρζελαϊ, Josephus Βαρζελαϊος, Ant. vii, 9, 8), the name of three men.

1. A Melchite, father of Adriel, which latter was the second husband of Michal, Saul's daughter (2 Sam. xxi, 8). B.C. ante 1062.

2. A wealthy old Gileadite of Rogelim, who distinguished himself by his loyalty when David fled beyond the Jordan from his son Absalom, B.C. 1023 (see Ewald, Jer. Gesch. iii, 663 sq.). He sent in a liberal supply of provisions, beds, and other conveniences for the use of the king's followers (2 Sam. xvii, 27). On the king's triumphant return, Barzil'lai attended him as far as the Jordan, but declined, by reason of his advanced age (and probably, also, from a feeling of independence), to proceed to Jerusalem and end his days at court, merely recommending (his son) Chimham as a suitable person to receive the royal favors (2 Sam. xix, 32, 39). On his death-bed David recalled to mind this kindness, and commended Barzil'lai's children to the care of Solomon (1 Kings ii, 7).

3. A priest who married a descendant of the preceding, and assumed the same name; his genealogy in consequence became so confused that his descendants, on the return from the captivity, were set aside as unfit for the priesthood (Ezra ii, 61). B.C. ante 536.

Bas'alth (Βασαλθ v. r. Βασάλθ, Vulg. Ihsalom), one of the heads of "temple-servants" whose "sons" are stated (1 Esdr. v, 31) to have returned from Babylon; evidently the ΒΑΣΑΛΘ or ΒΑΣΙΛΘ (q. v.) of the genuine texts (Ezra ii, 52; Neh. vii, 51).

Basam. See BALM.

Bas'cama (ἡ Βασκαμά, Josephus Βασκά), a place in Gilead where Jonathan Maccabæus was killed by Trypho, and from which his bones were afterward disinterred and conveyed to Modin by his brother Simon (1 Macc. xiii, 23; Joseph. Ant. xiii, 6, 6). Schwarz supposes it to be the Talmudical Ishkar (יִשְׁכָּר) or Basgar (בַּסְגָּר) "of Arabia" (Palest. p. 236, 237). The route of the Syrian murderer is given with so much confusion (see Fritzsche, in loc.) that some have even supposed the Bozkath of Judah to be meant.

Bascom, HENRY B., D.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Hancock, N. Y., May 27, 1736. He united with the Methodist Church in Western Pennsylvania in 1811, and was licensed to preach in 1813. His preaching soon began to attract attention, and before many years his fame as a pulpit orator was widely spread. In 1823 he was elected chaplain to Congress. In 1827 he was called to the presidency of Madison College, Pa., which he held till 1829, when he accepted the agency of the American Colonization Society. In 1832 he became Professor of Morals in Augusta College, and in 1842 President of Transylvania University. He edited the Quarterly Review of the M. E. Church South from 1846 to May, 1850, when he was elected bishop. Worn out with toil, he died Sept. 8, 1850. Bishop Bascom's course of labor thus embraced almost every extreme of human life. In his early career he is said to have preached in one year 400 times, travelled 5000 miles, and to have received as salary during that time, $12 10. At one period he was unquestionably the most popular pulpit orator in the United States. His sermons seemed invariably delivered memoriter, though usually long enough to occupy two hours; if he did not purposely commit them to memory, yet their frequent repetition fixed in his mind their language as well as their train of thought. They were evidently prepared with the utmost labor. The paragraphs often seemed to be separate but resplendent masses of thought, written at intervals, and without very close relations. His published Sermons (Nashville, 1848-50, 2 vols. 12mo) give no just idea of the grandeur of his pulpit orations; many of his brilliant passages seem to have been omitted in preparing the volumes for the press. Some of his other productions, in which his poetical propensities had no room to play, show that if his education had been such as to effectually discipline his imagination, his real ability would have been greatly enhanced. His most important writings, besides those prepared for the pulpit, are his "Bill of Rights," written on behalf of the "reform" movement of 1828; the "Protest of the Minority," in the memorable General Conference of 1844; the "Report on Organization," at the formation of the Methodist Episcopal Church South; and a subsequent elaborate volume in defence of the Southern Church, entitled "Methodism and Slavery." His Works, containing Sermons and Lectures, are collected in 4 vols. 12mo (Nashville, 1856). See Henkle, Life of Bascom (Nashville, 1854, 12mo); Met. Quart. Rev. 1852; Sprague, Annals, vii, 534.

Base (as a noun) is the rendering in the Auth. Vers. of two Heb. words: 1. יָסֵד, ken, the foundation or pedestal, e. g. of the laver (q. v.) in the temple-court ("foot," Exod. xxx, 18, etc.); then, the "base over the ledges" (בַּסֵּבֵלִים, basel) of the brazen sea (q. v.), in 1 Kings vii, 29, apparently explained in ver. 31 as a "work of the base" (בַּסֵּבֵלִים), perhaps a pediment-like cornice covering the joints; but the whole description is exceedingly obscure. See LEDGE. 2. הַבַּסֵּבֵלִים, mekonah', or הַבַּסֵּבֵלִים, mekunah', a foot-piece or stand upon which to place the lavers in the temple-service (1 Kings vii, 27-43, etc.). See LAVER.

Ba'shan (Heb. Bashan', בָּשָׁן, usually with the art., בְּבָשָׁן, light sandy soil; Samaritan Ver. בָּשָׁן; Targ. בָּשָׁן, Psa. lxxviii, 13, also בָּשָׁן; the latter, Buxtorf [Lex. Talm., col. 370] suggests, may have originated in the mistake of a transcriber, yet both are found in Targ. Jon., Deut. xxxiii, 22; Sept. Βασάν and Βασανίτις, Josephus [Ant. ix, 8] and Eusebius [Onomast. s. v.] Βασανίτις, a district on the east of Jordan, the modern el-Botwin or el-Beth neyeh (Abulfeda, Tib. Syr. p. 97). It is not, like Argob and other districts of Palestine, distinguished by one designation, but is sometimes spoken of as the "land of Bashan" (1 Chron. v, 11; and comp. Num. xxi, 33; xxxii, 33), and sometimes as "all Bashan" (Deut. iii, 10, 13; Josh. xii, 5; xiii, 12, 30), but most commonly without any addition. The word probably denotes the peculiar fertility of the soil; by the ancient versions, instead of using it as a proper name, a word meaning fruitful or fat is adopted. Thus, in Psa. xxii, 13, for Bashan, we find in Sept. πίονες; Aquila, λιπαροί; Symmachus, σαιστροί; and Vulg. Pinguis (Psa. lxxvii, 16), for hill of Bashan; Sept. ὄρος πῖον; Jerome (see Bochart, Hierozoicon, pt. i, col. 531), mons pinguis. The richness of the pasture-land of Bashan, and the consequent superiority of its breed of cattle, are frequently alluded to in the Scriptures. We read in Deut. xxii, 14, of "rams of the breed (Heb. sons) of Bashan." (Ezek. xxxix, 18), "Rams, lambs, bulls, goats, all of them fatlings of Bashan." The oaks of Bashan are mentioned in connection with the cedars of Lebanon (Isa. ii, 13; Zech. xi, 2). In Ezekiel's description of the wealth and magnificence of Tyre it is said, "Of the oaks of Bashan have they made their oars" (xxvii, 6). The ancient commentators on Amos iv, 1, "the king of Bashan," Jerome, Theodoret, and Cyril, speak in the strongest terms of the exuberant fertility of Bashan (Bochart, Hierozoicon, pt. i, col. 306), and modern travellers corroborate their assertions. See Burekhardt's Travels in Syria, p. 286-288; Buckingham's Travels in Palest., ii, 112-117.

The first notice of this country is in Gen. xiv, 5. Chedorlaomer and his confederates "smote the Rephaim in Ashtaroth Karnaim." Now Og, king of Bashan, dwelt in Ashtaroth, and "was of the remnant of the Rephaim" (Auth. Vers. "giants"), Joshua xii, 4. When the Israelites invaded the Promised Land, Argob, a province of Bashan, contained "sixty fenced cities, with walls, and gates, and brazen bars, besides unwalled towns a great many" (Deut. iii, 4, 5; 1 Kings iv, 13). All these were taken by the children of Israel after their conquest of the land of Sihon from Arnon to Jabkok. They "turned" from their road over Jordan and "went up by the way of Bashan"—probably very much the same as that now followed by the pilgrims of the Haj route and by the Romans before them—to Edrei, on the western edge of the Lejah. See EDREI. Here they encountered Og, king of Bashan, who "came out" probably from the natural fastnesses of Argob only to meet the entire destruction of himself, his sons, and all his people (Num. xxi, 33-35; Deut. iii, 1-3). Argob, with its 60 strongly fortified cities, evidently formed a principal portion of Bashan (Deut. iii, 4, 5), though still only a portion (ver. 13), there being besides a large number of unwalled towns (ver. 5). Its chief cities were Ashtaroth (i. e. Beeshterah, comp. Josh. xxi, 27 with 1 Chron. vi, 71), Edrei, Golan, Saleah, and possibly Mahanaim (Josh. xiii, 30). Two of these cities, viz. Golan and Beeshterah, were allotted to the Levites of the family of Gershon, the former as a "city of refuge" (Josh. xxi, 27; 1 Chron. vi, 71). The important district was bestowed on the half tribe of Manasseh (Josh. xiii, 29-31), together with "half Gilead." After the Manassites had assisted their brethren in the conquest of the country west of the Jordan, they went to their tents and to their cattle in the possession which Moses had given them in Bashan (xxii, 7, 8). It is doubtful, however, whether the limits of this tribe ever extended over the whole of this region. See MANASSEH. Solomon appointed twelve officers to furnish the monthly supplies for the royal household, and allotted the region of Argob to the son of Geber (1 Kings iv, 13). Toward the close of Jehu's reign, Hazael invaded the land of Israel, and smote the whole eastern territory, "even Gilead and Bashan" (2 Kings x, 33; Joseph. Ant. ix, 8, 1); but after his death the cities he had taken were recovered by Jehoash (Joash) (2 Kings xiii, 25), who defeated the Syrians in three battles, as Elisha had predicted (2 Kings xiii, 19; Joseph. Ant. ix, 8, 7). After this date, although the "oaks" of its forests and the wild cattle of its pastures—the "strong bulls of Bashan"—long retained their proverbial fame (Ezek. xxvii, 6; Psa. xxii, 12), and the beauty of its high downs and wide-sweeping plains could not but strike now and then the heart of a poet (Amos iv, 1; Psa. lxxviii, 15; Jer. i, 19; Mic. vii, 14), yet the country almost disappears from history; its very name seems to have given place as quickly as possible to one which had a connection with the story of the founder of the nation (Gen. xxxi, 47-8), and therefore more claim to use. Even so early as the time of the conquest, "Gilead" seems to have begun to take the first place as the designation of the country beyond the Jordan, a place which it retained afterward to the exclusion of Bashan (comp. Josh. xxii, 9, 15, 32; Judg. xx, 1; Psa. lx, 7; cviii, 8; 1 Chron. xxvii, 21; 2 Kings xv, 29). Indeed "Gilead" is most frequently used as a mere accompaniment to the name of Og, when his overthrow is alluded to in the national poetry. After the captivity the name Batanea was applied to only a part of the ancient Bashan; the three remaining sections being called Trachonitis, Auranitis, and Gaulanitis (Lightfoot's Works, x, 282). All these provinces were granted by Augustus to Herod the Great, and on his death Batanea formed a part of Philip's tetrarchy (Joseph. Jwar. ii, 6, 3; Ant. xviii, 4, 6). At his decease, A. D. 34, it was annexed by Tiberius to the province of Syria; but in A. D. 37 it was given by Caligula to Herod Agrippa, the son of Aristobulus, with the title of king (Acts xii, 1; Joseph. Ant. xviii, 6, 10). From the time of Agrippa's death, in A. D. 44, to A. D. 53, the government again reverted to the Romans, but it was then restored by Claudius to Agrippa II (Acts xxv, 13; Joseph. Ant. xx, 7, 1).

The ancient limits of Bashan are very strictly defined. It extended from the "border of Gilead" on the south to Mount Hermon on the north (Deut. iii, 3, 10, 14; Josh. xii, 5; 1 Chron. v, 23), and from the Arabah or Jordan valley on the west to Saleah and the border of the Geshurites and the Maacathites on the east (Josh. xii, 3-5; Deut. iii, 10). The sacred writers include in Bashan that part of the country eastward of the Jordan which was given to half the tribe of Manasseh, situated to the north of Gilead. Bochart incorrectly places it between the rivers Jabkok and Arnon, and speaks of it as the allotment of the tribes of Reuben and Gad (Num. xxxii, 33). Of the four post-exilian provinces, Gaulanitis, Auranitis, Trachonitis, and Batanea, all but the third have retained almost perfectly their ancient names, the modern Le-jah alone having superseded the Argob and Trachonitis of the Old and New Testaments. The province of Jaulan is the most western of the four; it abuts on the Sea of Galilee and the Lake of Merom, from the former of which it rises to a plateau nearly 3000 feet above the surface of the water. This plateau, though now almost wholly uncultivated, is of a rich soil, and its north-west portion rises into a range of hills almost everywhere clothed with oak forests (Porter, ii, 259). No less than 127 ruined villages are scattered over its surface. See GOLAN. The Hauran is to the south-east of the last named province and south of the Lejah; like Jaulan, its surface is perfectly flat, and its soil esteemed among the most fertile in Syria. It too contains an immense number of ruined towns, and also many inhabited villages. See HAUHAN. The contrast which the rocky intricacies of the Lejah present to the rich and flat plains of the Hauran and the Jaulan has already been noticed. See ANCON. The remaining district, though no doubt much smaller in extent than the ancient Bashan, still retains its name, modified by a change frequent in the Oriental languages. Aril el-Bataniyah lies on the east of the Lejah and the north of the range of Jebel Hauran or ed-Druze (Porter, ii, 57). It is a mountainous district of the most picturesque character, abounding with forests of evergreen oak, and with soil extremely rich; the surface studded with towns of very remote antiquity, deserted, it is true, but yet standing almost as perfect as the day they were built. For the boundaries and characteristics of these provinces, and the most complete researches yet published into this interesting portion of Palestine, see Porter's Damascus, vol. ii; comp. Ba'shan-ha'voth-Ja'ir (Heb. hab-Bashan' Charvoh' Yair', בַּשָּׁן חַרְוֹת יַעִיר, the Bashan of the villages of Jair; Sept. Βασάν Ἀβόθ [v. Ὀαβόθ] 'Iaio), the general name imposed by Jair, the son of Manasseh, upon the region of Argob (q. v.), conquered by him in Bashan (Deut. iii, 14), containing sixty cities, with walls and brazen gates (Josh. xiii, 31; 1 Kings iv, 13). It is elsewhere (Num. xxii, 41) called simply HAVOTH-JAIR (q. v.).

Bash'emath (Heb. Basmah', בַּסְמַח, elsewhere more correctly Anglicized "Basmath," q. v.), the name of two females.

1. A daughter of Ishmael, the last married (B. C. 1926) of the three wives of Esau (Gen. xxxvi, 3, 13), from whose son, Reuel, four tribes of the Edomites were descended. When first mentioned she is called Mahalath (Gen. xxviii, 9); while, on the other hand, the name Ba-hemath is in the narrative (Gen. xxvi, 31) given to another of Esau's wives, the daughter of Elou the Hittite. It is remarkable that all Esau's wives receive different names in the genealogical table of the Edomites (Gen. xxxvi) from those by which they have been previously mentioned in the history. Thus:

GENEALOGY. (Gen. xxxvi, 2, 3) 1. Adah, daughter of Elou, 2. Mahalath, d. of Anah, 3. Basemath, d. of Ishmael.	NARRATIVE (Gen. xxvi, 34, xxviii, 9) 2. Ba-hemath, d. of Elou, 1. Judith, d. of Beeri, 3. Mahalath, d. of Ishmael.
---	--

Whatever be the explanation of this diversity of names, there is every reason for supposing that they refer to the same persons respectively, and we may well conclude with Hengstenberg that the change of all the names cannot have arisen from accident; and, farther, that the names in the genealogical table, which is essentially an Edomitish document, are those which these women respectively bore as the wives of Esau (Hengstenberg, Auth. d. Prot., ii, 277; English transl. ii, 226). This view is confirmed by the fact that the Seirite wife, who is called Judith in the narrative, appears in the genealogical account under the name of Aholibamah (q. v.), a name which appears to have belonged to a district of Idumæa (Gen. xxxvi, 41). The only ground for hesitation or suspicion of error in the text is the occurrence of this name Bashemath both in the narrative and the genealogy, though applied to different persons. The Samaritan text seeks to remove this difficulty by reading Mahalath instead of Bashemath in the genealogy. We might with more probability suppose that this name (Bashemath) has been assigned to the wrong person in one or other of the passages; but if so, it is impossible to determine which is erroneous.—Smith, s. v. See ESAU.

2. A daughter of Solomon and wife of one of his officers (1 Kings iv, 15, A. V. "BASMATH").

Basil (from Βασίλειος, Basilius), St., "the Great," one of the most eminent of the Greek fathers, was born about the end of the year 328, probably at Neocæsarea. He began his studies at Cæsarea, in Palestine, whence he proceeded to Constantinople to hear the famous Libanius, and thence to Athens, where he contracted an intimate friendship with Gregory Nazianzen. About 355 he returned to his own country, but soon after left his home again and travelled into Libya, visiting the famous monasteries of those countries. Upon his return he was first made reader in the church of Cæsarea, and afterward ordained deacon. But about the year 358 he retired into a solitude of Pontus, where he built a monastery near that of his sister Macrina (q. v.), and with his brothers, Peter and Naucratus, and several others, he followed an ascetic life, and, drawing up a rule for his community, became the founder of the monastic life in those regions. In 364 (or 362) he was ordained priest by Eusebius, and in 369 or 370, on the death of Eusebius, was elected bishop of Cæsarea, after great opposition, which was finally overcome only by the personal efforts of the aged Gregory of Nazianzen.

But the emperor Valens soon began to persecute him because he refused to embrace the doctrine of the Arians, of which he and Gregory of Nazianzen were strenuous opponents. The death of Valens's son gave freedom of action to Basil, who devoted his efforts to bring about a reunion between the Eastern and Western churches, which had been divided upon points of faith, and in regard to Meletius and Paulinus, two bishops of Antioch. The Western churches acknowledged Paulinus for the legal bishop; Meletius was supported by the Eastern churches. But all his efforts were ineffectual, this dispute not being terminated till nine months after his death. Basil was also engaged in some contests relating to the division which the emperor had made of Cappadocia into two provinces. Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste, had been a friend of Basil, and had planted monasticism in Asia, a pursuit in which Basil fully sympathized; but Eustathius openly embraced Arianism, and Basil in 373 broke with him and wrote against him. He also wrote against Apollinaris; in fact, he took a part in most of the controversies of his age. He died Jan. 1, 379, with these words on his lips: "O Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit." Basil was a man of great piety, profound learning, and great eloquence. During the Arian controversy he was an unflinching champion of the orthodox doctrine. At first, through fear of Sabelianism, he preferred the homoianian formula; but in the strifes which followed, he was brought to clearer apprehension of the question, and acknowledged the Nicene Creed, which he ever afterward steadfastly maintained. For a statement of his view of the Trinity, see Dörner, Doctrine of the Person of Christ, Edinb. ed., Div. I, vol. ii, p. 305 sq. See also ARIANISM. The Greek Church honors him as one of its most illustrious saints, and celebrates his festival January 1st. The works of Basil were first published, with a preface of Erasmus, at Basle, 1532; a better edition, with Latin translation and notes, was published by the Jesuits Fronton le Duc and Morel (Paris, 1618, 2 vols. fol., and again 1638, 3 vols. fol.). Valuable contributions to a more correct edition were made by the Dominican Combesin, in his work Basilius Magnus, ex integro recensitus (Paris, 1679, 2 vols. 8vo). The most complete edition was prepared by the Benedictine Garnier (Paris, 1721-1730, 3 vols. folio), reprinted in the excellent Paris edition of 1839 (6 vols. royal 8vo). The contents of the Benedictine edition (1721-30, 3 vols.) are as follows: Tom. i: (1.) Homiliae in Hexaëmeron novem; (2.) Homiliae in quosdam Psalmos, viz.: 1, 7, 14 (part), 23, 29, 32, 33, 44, 45, 48, 59, 61, 104; (3.) Libri adversus Eunomium 5. Basili Epistolæ, distributed chronologically into three classes—Class 1, containing those which were written from 357 to 370, i. e. before his episcopate, to which are added some of doubtful date; Class 2, from 370 to 378; Class 3, Epistles without date, doubtful and spurious. Appendix: Sermones 24 de Moribus, per Symonem Macistrum et Logothetam, selecti ex omnibus S. Basili operibus; De Virginitate liber. A. Jahn published, as a supplement to this edition, Animadversiones in Basili M. Opera Fascic. I (Bern, 1842). The best selection from his works, containing all, indeed, that ordinary theological students need, is that of Leipzig, 1854, forming the second volume of Thilo's Bibliotheca Patrum Græcorum Dogmaticæ. His writings are divided into, (1.) polemical, (2.) liturgical, (3.) exegetical, (4.) ascetic. Among his polemical books, that on the Holy Spirit, and the five books against the Eunomians, are the most important. His liturgical writings are of great value, and some of his services are still, in abridged forms, in use in the Greek Church. Both by his example and his writings he was the substantial founder of monasticism in the East, so that it is common, though erroneous, to call all Oriental monks Basilians (q. v.). A. Jahn, in the treatise Basilius Plotinians (1831), tried to show that Basil had largely copied from Plotinus. His Liturgia Alexandrina Græca is given in Renaudot, Lit. Orient. Collectio, vol. i. For a list of his genuine writings, as well as of those thought to be spurious, see Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 370; Lardner, Works, iv. 278. Basil or Basilius, some time a physician, was ordained bishop of Ancyra by the bishops of the Eusebian party in the room of Marcellus, whom they had deposed; but Basil was himself excommunicated, and his ordination annulled, in the council of Sardica in 347, though he still retained the see. He was an opponent of the Arians, but was still considered as the head of the Semi-Arians. This opinion Basil procured to be established by a council held at Ancyra in the year 358, and subsequently defended it both at Seleucia and Constantinople against the Eudoxians and Acacians, by whom he was deposed in 360. Jerome (De Viris Illust. 89) informs us that Basil wrote a book against Marcellus, his predecessor, a treatise De Virginitate, and some other smaller pieces, of which no remains are extant. Basil is warmly commended by Theodoret for his exemplary life, which was probably the secret of his influence with the emperor Constantius; and Sozomen speaks of him as celebrated for learning and eloquence. See Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 347; Dupin, Eccles. Writers, cent. iv; Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. ii, 27; Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. bk. ii; Socrates, Hist. Eccles. bk. ii; Lardner, Works, iii, 589.

Basil, bishop of Seleucia in Isauria (not to be confounded with the Basil who was the intimate friend of Chrysostom). At the Council of Constantinople in 448, he gave his vote for the condemnation of Eutyches; but in the following year, at the robber-council of Ephesus, through fear of the threats and violence of Dioscorus, or from actual weakness and fickleness of judgment, he took precisely the opposite ground, and anathematized the doctrine of two natures in Jesus Christ. In the Council of Chalcedon, 451, Basil, together with the other leaders in the assembly at Ephesus, was deposed, but in the fourth session of the council he was restored to his dignity. He wrote Forty-three Homilies; seventeen on the Old, and twenty-six on the New Testament (Dupin reckons only forty). These were published in Greek at Heidelberg (1596, 8vo); Greek and Latin, with notes, by Dausque (Heidelb. 1604, 8vo), to, together with the Oratio in Transfigurationem Domini, in Greek and Latin. The following are supposed to be spurious: 1. A Demonstration of the Coming of Christ, against the Jews, in Latin, ed. by Turrianus (Ingolstadt, 1616, 4to); Greek, in the Heidelberg edition of the Homilies (1596). This is clearly, from its style, not the work of Basil, and is not found in any MS. of his writings. 2. Life and Miracles of St. Thecla, virgin and martyr, which, according to Caveare, is evidently the work of some Greek monk of a late age, edited by Pantinus, Antwerp (1608, Gr. and Lat.). All the above were published in Greek and Latin (Paris, 1622, fol.), with the works of Gregory Thaumaturgus. See Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 448; Dupin, Eccles. Writers, cent. v, p. 28; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Basil or Basilius, chief of the Bogomiles of the twelfth century. This sect took its rise in Bulgaria. Though it is likely that their enemies laid false charges against them, it is clear that they held many corrupt ideas and practices. From their habit of incessant praying they derived the name of Bogomili, which in the Slavonic language means "God have mercy upon us." In their notions they resembled the Manicheans and Paulicians, which last sect arose about the same time. They denied the Trinity; held that the body of Jesus was a phantom, and that Michael the archangel was incarnate. They opposed the worship of the Virgin, of the saints, and of images. They affected an appearance of extreme sanctity, and wore the monkish dress. Basilius was a physician, and had twelve principal followers, whom he designated his apostles, and also some women, who went about spreading the poison of his doctrine everywhere. When before the council called by the patriarch John IX in 1118 to examine into the matter, Basilius refused to deny his doctrine, and declared that he was willing to endure any torment, and death itself. One peculiar notion of this sect was that no torment could affect them, and that the angels would deliver them even from the fire. Basilius himself was condemned in the above-mentioned council, and burnt in this year. Several of his followers, when seized, retracted; others, among whom were some of those whom he called his apostles, were kept in prison, and died there. Several councils were held upon this subject. Basil (Sr.), Liturgy of, one of the three liturgies used in the Greek Church, the other two being those of St. Gregory and St. Chrysostom. They are read at distinct seasons of the year; that of Basil being read on the five Sundays of the Great Lent, on the Thursdays and Saturdays of the Holy Week, on the eves of Christmas and the Epiphany, and on the first day of the year.—Palmer, *Orig. Specimen of the uncial Basle Manuscript (Luke xxii, 2, 3: Καὶ ἔζητον οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ οἱ γραμματεῖς, τὸ πῶς ἀνάσωσιν αὐτόν, ἐφοβοῦντο γὰρ τὸν λαόν· ἐπέληθεν δὲ σα.)

2. A cursive MS. of the entire N. T. except the Apocalypse, numbered 1 of the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles (technically designated as K, iii, 3; formerly B, vi, 27). It was known to Erasmus, who, however, used it but little, although his associates thought highly of it. It was for a considerable time in the possession of Reuchlin, who borrowed it from the Dominican monks at Basle; the latter received it from Cardinal de Ragusio. Wetstein was the first who thoroughly examined it; he used it with great commendation at first, but afterward disparaged it. The reason for these discordant opinions is doubtless to be found in the character of the MS. itself, which differs greatly in the several portions. The Acts and Epistles contain a text of no great importance; but the text of the Gospels (now bound at the end of the vol.) is very remarkable, adhering pretty closely to the oldest class of uncials. The last has recently been collated (independently) by Tregelles and Dr. Roth. There are 38 lines in each page, elegantly and minutely written, with breathings, accents, and iota subscript, and a few illuminations. It has, apparently on good grounds, been assigned to the tenth century. Codex 118 of the Bœolian Library seems to be a copy from it.—Tregelles, ut sup. p. 208 sq.; Scrivener, p. 142.

Basilean Manuscript (Codex Basileensis), the name of two important MSS. of the Greek Test. now in the public library of Basle. See MANUSCRIPTS (BIBLICAL).

1. An uncial copy of the Four Gospels, with a few hiatus (Luke iii, 4-15; xxiv, 47-53, being wanting; while Luke i, 69-ii, 4; xii, 58-xiii, 12; xv, 5-20, are by a later hand), usually designated as E of the Gospels (technically K, iv, 35; formerly B, vi, 21). It is written in round full letters, with accents and breathings, one column only on the page, with the Ammonian sections; but, instead of the Eusebian canons, there is a kind of harmony of the Gospels noted at the foot of each page by a reference to the parallel sections in the other evangelists. This MS. appears to belong to the eighth century, and the additions of a subsequent hand seem to indicate that they were made in the ninth century. It appears that it was formerly used as a church MS. at Constantinople, and it may be considered to be one of the best specimens of what has been called the Constantinopolitan class of texts. It was presented to a monastery in Basle by Cardinal de Ragusio in the fifteenth century. Wetstein collated this MS., and this was also done (independently) by Tischendorf, Müller of Basle, and Tregelles. It has never been published in full.—Tregelles, in Horne's Introd., new ed. iv, 200; Scrivener, Introduction, p. 103 sq.

Basilian Manuscript (Codex Basilianus), an uncial copy of the whole Apocalypse (of which it is usually designated as B), found among ancient homilies of Basil and Gregory of Nyssa, and valuable from the scarcity of early MSS. of the Revelation. It derives its name from having formerly belonged to the Basilian monastery at Rome (then designated as No. 105), but it is now deposited in the Vatican library (where it is known as 2066). It was first known by a notice and fac-simile by Blanchini (Evangeliarium Quadruplex, 1748, ii, 525). Wetstein prepared a collation of it from Cardinal Quirini, but the extracts sent came too late for publication in his N. T., and proved very loose and defective. When Tischendorf was at Rome in 1843, although forbidden to collate it anew, he was permitted to make a few extracts, and improved the privilege so well as to compare the whole text with a Greek Test. He published the result in his Monumenta Sacra Inedita (1846, p. 407-432), which Tregelles, who was allowed to make a partial examination of the codex in 1845, has since somewhat corrected. Card. Mai has published it, in order to supply the text of the Apocalypse in his edition of the Cod. Vaticanus, but the work is very imperfectly done. In form this MS. is rather an octavo than a folio or quarto. The letters are of a peculiar kind, simple and unornamented, leaning a little to the right; they hold a sort of middle place between the square and the oblong character. Several of them indicate that they belong to the latest uncial fashion. The breathings and accents are by the first hand, and pretty correct. It probably belongs to the beginning of the 8th century.—Tregelles, in Horne's Basilians, monks and nuns following the rule of St. Basil the Great, first published A.D. 363. The order spread with so great rapidity that it is said to have numbered at the death of the founder about 90,000 members. In the West it established convents in Spain, Italy, Germany, and Sarmatia, and the Basilian rule, up to the time of St. Benedict, was the basis of all monastic institutions. After the separation of the Greek Church from the Roman, the Basilian order remained the only one in the Greek churches of Russia (where there are about 400 monasteries of monks with about 6000 monks, and about 110 monasteries of nuns with some 3000 nuns), Austria (which in 1849 had 44 monasteries of monks with 271 members, but no nuns), and Greece, and in the Armenian Church. In Turkey, where especially the monastic establishments of Mt. Athos (q. v.) are celebrated, all the convents of the Greek Church follow the rule of St. Basil, with the exception of those on Mts. Sinai and Lebanon.

In the Roman Church, the monks of St. Basil, formerly constituting several independent communities, were placed by Pope Gregory XIII, in 1579, under an abbot-general. They were divided into the provinces of Rome, Calabria, Sicily, Spain, Germany, and Poland, and followed partly the Greek, partly the Roman rite. A congregation of Reformed Basilians (Tardonites) was established by Matteo de la Fuente in Spain in 1557, and joined by a part of the Spanish convents. In Germany and Spain they disappeared with the other convents. In Russia, large numbers of Basilians, together with the whole body of United Greeks, separated from the Roman Church in 1839. At present only a few convents of Basilians acknowledge the jurisdiction of the pope. They are divided into four congregations: (1.) the Ruthenian, in Russia, Poland, and Hungary, with 24 houses; (2.) the Italian, the principal convent of which is that of St. Saviour at Messina, in Sicily, which still preserves the Greek rite; (3.) the French, which has its principal house at Viviers; (4.) the Melchite, in the United Greek Church of Asia Minor, which held, a few years ago, a general chapter, under the presidency of the papal delegate in Syria. According to the historians of the order, it has produced 14 popes, numerous patriarchs, cardinals, and archbishops, 1805 bishops, and 11,805 martyrs. One house of Basilians is at Toronto, Canada. Altogether there are about fifty houses with 1000 members. See Helyot, Ordres Religieux, i, 379 sq.

Basilica (from συναγωγή, one of the porches or colonnades facing the Agora at Athens), the name of an ancient secular building, afterward applied to Christian church edifices. On the overthrow of the kings at Athens, their power was divided among several archons. The remains of the old power were, however, too strong to be swept all away, and the charge of the Eleusinian mysteries, of the flower-feasts of Bacchus, and of all legal processes concerning matters of religion, and of all capital offences, was referred to the ἀρχων βασιλικός (comp. with rex sacerorum in the republic of Rome). This archon held his court in the stoa basilica. Basilicas for similar purposes were built in all the chief cities of Greece and her colonies, and later in Rome and the Roman colonial cities. They were built with as great splendor and architectural merits as the temples themselves. Those in Italy were devoted to purposes of business (like our modern bourses or exchanges), and to general legal processes. They had a central nave, separated from two side aisles by grand colonnades. This space was devoted to business. Above the side aisles were galleries for spectators and others. At the rear end was a semicircular space, separated from the main part by gratings when court was held. In Rome there were 29 (others say 22) of these basilicas.

Ancient Habit of the Nuns of St. Basil.

Ground-plan of Basilica of St. Paul, Rome.

When Christianity took possession of the Roman empire, these basilicas were taken as models for church edifices. The pagan temples were built for residences of the deities, not for holding large bodies of people; and also, being given to unholy purposes, could not be used or copied in Christian churches. The basilicas, on the other hand, had been polluted by no heathen rites, and corresponded with the traditional synagogue in much of their interior construction. Some of the basilicas were given to the Church, and devoted to sacred purposes; and the same plan of building was followed in new church edifices. The plan included a broad central nave with a pointed roof (instead of the arched roof of the classic Roman basilica or the open nave of the Grecian), and on each side were one or two side aisles, covered by a single roof. In the semicircular apse, opposite the entrance, the seats of the judges were appropriated by the bishops. In front of this, and under the round arched tribune, was the high altar over the crypt (q. v.). Beyond this were two pulpits, one on each side of the nave, for reading the Scriptures and preaching. The pillars in the colonnades separating the aisles were joined by round arches instead of beams, as in the Roman basilicas. During the basilicum period (A.D. 300 to A.D. 700-800) no towers or spires were built. In Rome the oldest basilicas are those of St. Peter, St. Paul, St. John Lateran, St. Clement, Sta. Maria in Trastevere, and St. Lawrence. Others, as Sta. Maria Maggiore, Sta. Agnes, Sta. Croce in Jerusalem, were built after the true basilicum period, as were also the present edifices of St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. John Lateran. St. Clement, and SS. Nereo and Achilleo, preserve most distinctly the features of the original basilica. Out of Rome, the best preserved ancient basilicas are those of St. Apollinari in Classe (near Ravenna), and of St. Apollinari in Ravenna. Basilican churches were built extensively in Asia Minor, other parts of Italy, and South France, and in these last two this style has ever exercised almost a controlling influence on ecclesiastical architecture. It gave also the general ground-plan and many other elements to the succeeding Romanesque, and even to the contemporary Byzantine styles. In the same general style are the churches of St. Boniface (Roman Catholic) in Munich, and of St. Jacob (Protestant) in Berlin, both built within the last twenty years. There is no prospect, however, that the style will ever be generally adopted in the erection of modern churches. See Zestermann, De Antic. et Christ. Basilicis (Brussels, 1847); Bunsen, Die Christlichen Basiliken Romas (Munich, 1843); Kugler, Geschichte der Baukunst (Stuttgart, 1859); Ferguson, Dictionary of Architecture; Bingham, *Orig. Basilides, the chief of the Egyptian Gnostics in the second century. The place of his birth is unknown; some call him a Syrian, others a Persian, others an Egyptian. According to Clemens Alex. (Strom. vii, 17) he appeared in the reign of Hadrian; Baronius and Pearson suppose him to have begun his heresy in the latter part of the first century. The probable date of his death is A.D. 125-130. He published a book which he called "the Gospel," and wrote also 24 books exegetical of the Gospel, but whether it was a comment upon his own "Gospel" or upon the four evangelists is uncertain. He left a son, Isidorus, who defended his opinions. Fragments of both Basilides and Isidorus are given in Grabe, Spicileg. sacre, ii, p. 37, 64. (Burton, Eccles. Hist. Lect. xv; Burton, Bampton Lectures, note 13.) Our knowledge of Basilides is chiefly derived from Irenæus (Adv. Her. i, 24), Epiphanius (Her. xxiv), and the newly-discovered Philos. ploumenia (bk. vii) of Hippolytus (q. v.). Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iv, 7) speaks of a refutation of Basilides by Agrippa Castor.

He taught that the supreme God, perfect in wisdom and goodness, the unbegotten and nameless Father, produced from his own substance seven sons of a most excellent nature. According to Irenæus (Adv. Her. i, 24), from the self-existent Father was born Noûs, Intelligence; from Nous, Logos, the Word; from Logos, Phôs, Prudence; from Phronesis, Sophia and Dynamis, Wisdom and Power; from Dynamis and Sophia, Powers, Principalities, and Angels, by whom the first heaven was made; from these sprung other angels and other heavens to the number of three hundred and sixty-five of each, whence are so many days in the year. The angels which uphold the lower heaven made all things in this world, and then divided it among themselves; the chief of which is the God of the Jews, who wished to bring other nations into subjection to His people, but was opposed. The self-existent Father, seeing their danger, sent his first-begotten Nous, the Christ, for the salvation of such as believed in Him; He appeared on earth as a man, and wrought miracles, but He did not suffer. The man Jesus suffered, but not in any vicarious sense; the divine justice will not allow one being to suffer for another. It seems, therefore, that the modern rationalistic views as to the expiation of Christ are derived, not from the apostles, but from the Gnostics. (See Shedd, History of Doctrines, ii, 265.) Irenæus charges Basilides with holding that Simon of Cyrene was compelled to bear Christ's cross, and was crucified for Him; that he was transformed into the likeness of Jesus, and Jesus took the form of Simon, and looked on, laughing at the folly and ignorance of the Jews; after which He ascended into heaven. But it is not certain, or even likely, that the charge is well-founded. Basilides farther taught that men ought not to confess to him who was actually crucified, but to Jesus, who was sent to destroy the works of the makers of this world. The soul only was to be saved, not the body. The prophecies are from the makers of the world; the law was given by the chief of them, who brought the people out of Egypt. It is said that the followers of Basilides partook of things offered to idols without scruple, and all kinds of lewdness were esteemed indifferent, and that they practiced magic and incantations.

One of the most marked features of the system of Basilides was his distribution of the local positions of the three hundred and sixty-five heavens, according to the theories of mathematicians, the prince of which is called Abraaxas, a name having in it the number three hundred and sixty-five. See ABRAXAS.

The system has been thus briefly stated: "Basilides placed at the head of his system an incomprehensible God, whom he called non-existent (οὐκ ὢν), and the ineffable (ἀπόφραος), the attributes of whom he made living personified powers, unfolded from his perfection; as the Spirit, Reason, Thought, Wisdom, and Power, who were the executors of his wisdom. To these he added the moral attributes, showing the activity of the Deity's almighty power, namely, Holiness and Peace. The number seven was a holy number with Basilides; besides these seven powers, in accordance with the seven days of the week, he supposed seven similar beings in every stage of the spiritual world, and that there were, like the days of the year, three hundred and sixty-five such stages or regions, which were represented by the mystical number Abraaxas, the symbol of his sect. From this emanation-world sprung the divine principles of Light, Life, Soul, and God; but there was an empire of evil, which assaulted the divine principles, and forced a union of undivine principles opposed to each, namely, Darkness to Light, Death to Life, Matter to Soul, Evil to Good. The Divine Principle, to obtain its original splendor, must undergo a process of purification before it can effect its reunion with its original source; hence arose a kind of metempsychosis, in which the soul passed through various human bodies, and even through animals, according to its desert, and this by way of punishment. Basilides also supposed the passage of the soul through various living creatures, in order to a gradual development of spiritual life. The Creator of the world he supposed to be an angel acting as an instrument under the supreme God; and to redeem human nature, and to make it fit for communion with Himself and the higher world of spirits, He sent down the highest Eon (Nous) for the fulfilment of the work of redemption, who united himself to the man Jesus at his baptism in Jordan; but the Nous did not suffer, only the man Jesus." The sect flourished for a long time, and did not become extinct till the fourth century. The newly-discovered MS. of Hippolytus (q. v.) gives quite a thorough account of the doctrines of Basilides, which is set forth by Jacobi, in Basilidis Philos. Gnostici, etc. (Berlin, 1852), and Uhlhorn, Das Basilidianische System (Götting, 1855). See also Neander, Genet. Entwicklung d. vorn. Gnostischen Syst. (Berl. 1818); *Ch. Basin (in the old editions "bason"). The following words in the original are thus rendered in the English version of the Bible. See also CUP; BOWL; DISH, etc.

1. בַּסִּין, aggon', prop. a trough for washing, a laver (Exod. xxiv, 6); rendered "golden" in Cant. vii, 2, where its shape is compared to the human navel;

"cup" in Isa. xxii, 24. In the New Test. (John xiii, 5), καπτήρ, á ewer (q. v.).

2. כִּפְרוֹר, kephor', from the etymology, a covered dish or urn, spoken of the golden and silver vessels of the sanctuary (1 Chron. xxviii, 17; Ezra i, 10; viii, 27).

3. פָּרָקִים, mizrak', a vase from which to sprinkle any thing; usually of the sacrificial bowls (and so occasionally translated); twice of wine-goblets ("bowl," Amos vi, 6; Zech. ix, 15). It seems to denote a metallic vessel. The basins for the service of the tabernacle were of brass (Exod. xxvii, 3), but those of the Temple were of gold (2 Chron. iv, 8).

4. The term of the most general signification is סִב, siph (of uncertain etymology; the Sept. renders variously), spoken of the utensils for holding the blood of victims ("bason," Exod. xlii, 22; Jer. lii, 19; "bowl," 2 Kings xii, 13), and the oil for the sacred candlestick ("bowl," 1 Kings vii, 50); also of "basons" for domestic purposes (2 Sam. xvii, 28), and specially a drinking-cup" (Zech. xii, 2). The Targum of Jonathan renders it by כַּסְפָּא, an earthenware vase, but in some of the above passages it could not have been of this material.

(a.) Between the various vessels bearing in the Auth. Vers. the names of basin, bowl, charger, cup, and dish, it is scarcely possible now to ascertain the precise distinction, as very few, if any, remains are known up to the present time, to exist of Jewish earthen or metal ware, and as the same words are variously rendered in different places. We can only conjecture their form and material from the analogy of ancient Egyptian or Assyrian specimens of works of the same kind, and from modern Oriental vessels for culinary or domestic purposes. Among the smaller vessels for the tabernacle or temple service, many must have been required to receive from the sacrificial victims the blood to be sprinkled for purification. Moses, on the occasion of the great ceremony of purification in the wilderness, put half the blood in "the basins," כַּסְפֵּי, or bowls, and afterward sprinkled it on the people (Exod. xxiv, 6, 8; xxxix, 21; Lev. i, 5; ii, 15; iii, 2, 8, 13; iv, 5, 34; viii, 23, 24; xiv, 14, 25; xvi, 15, 19; Heb. ix, 19). Among the vessels cast in metal, whether gold, silver, or brass, by Hiram for Solomon, besides the laver and great sea, mention is made of basins, bowls, and cups. Of the first (כַּסְפֵּי, marg. bowls) he is said to have made 100 (2 Chron. iv, 8; 1 Kings vii, 15, 46; comp. Exod. xxv, 29, and 1 Chron. xxviii, 14, 17). Josephus, probably with great exaggeration, reckons of κύματα and σπονδύια 20,000 in gold and 40,000 in silver, besides an equal number in each metal of κοιτίσεις, for the offerings of flour mixed with oil (Ant. viii, 3, 7 and 8; comp. Birch, Hist. of Pottery, i, 152).—Smith, s. v.

(b.) The "basin" from which our Lord washed the disciples' feet, καπτήρ, was probably deeper and larger than the hand-basin for sprinkling, כִּפְרוֹר (Jer. lii, 18), which, in the Auth. Vers. "caldrons," Vulg. labetes, is by the Syr. rendered basins for washing the feet (John xiii, 5). See WASHING (OF FEET AND HANDS).

Basire, ISAAC, D.D., a learned English divine, was born in the island of Jersey in 1607, and educated at Cambridge. He was made prebendary of Durham 1643, archdeacon of Northumberland 1644. When the rebellion broke out he sided with the king, but was afterward obliged to quit England, and he then travelled to the Levant, etc., to recommend the doctrine and constitution of the English Church to the Greeks. In the Morea he twice preached in Greek, at an assembly of the bishops and clergy, at the request of the metropolitan of Achaia. He made acquaintance with the patriarch of Antioch, visited Jerusalem, where he was respectfully received by the Latin and Greek clergy, and was allowed to visit the church of the Holy Sepulchre in the character of a priest. On his return he was honored with a chair of divinity in Transylvania, and on reaching England was restored to his preferments. He died in October, 1676. His principal works are, 1. Deo et Ecclesie Sacrum, or Sacrilege arraigned and condemned by St. Paul, Rom. ii, 22 (Lond. 1668, 8vo);—2. Distributi de Antiqua Ecclesia Britannica Libertate;—3. The ancient Liberty of the Britanvic Church (Lond. 1661, 8vo). A memoir of Basire, with his correspondence, by Dr. Darnell, was published in 1831 (Lond. 8vo).—Landon, Ecol. Diet. ii, 73.

Basket, the rendering in the Auth. Vers. of the following words:

1. סַל, sal (Sept. usually κόφινος or σπονδύς, as in the N. T.), the most general term, so called from the twigs of which it was originally made; specially used, as the Greek καροῦν (Hom. Od. iii, 412) and the Latin canistrum (Virg. Æn. i, 701), for holding bread (Gen. xl, 16 sq.; Exod. xxix, 3, 23; Lev. viii, 2, 26, 31; Num. vi, 15, 17, 19). The form of the Egyptian bread-basket is delineated in Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. iii, 226, after the specimens represented in the tomb of Rameses III. These were made of gold (comp. Hom. Od. x, 355), and we must assume that the term sal passed from its strict etymological meaning to any vessel applied to the purpose. In Judg. vi, 19, meat is served up in a sal, which could hardly have been of wicker-work. The expression "white baskets," סַלֵּי (Gen. xl, 16), is sometimes referred to the material of which the baskets were made (Symmachus, κατὰ βαίνα), or the white color of the peeled sticks, or lastly to their being "full of holes" (A. V. margin), i. e. open-work baskets. The name Sallai (Neh. xi, 8; xii, 20) seems to indicate that the manufacture of baskets was a recognised trade among the Hebrews.

Ancient Egyptian Bread-baskets of Gold.

2. סַלְסִילוֹת, salsiloth', a word of kindred origin, applied to the basket used in gathering grapes (Jer. vi, 9).

Ancient Egyptian Grape-baskets.

3. תֵּבֵנֶה, tebene, in which the first-fruits of the harvest were presented (Deut. xxvi, 2, 4). From its being coupled with the kneading-bowl (A. V. "store;" Deut. xxviii, 5, 17), we may infer that it was also used for household purposes, perhaps to bring the corn to the mill. The equivalent term in the Sept. for this and the preceding Hebrew words is κόρφαλλος, which specifically denotes a basket that tapers downward (κόρφαλος ὄνεια τὰ κάτω, Suid.), similar to the Roman corbis. This shape of basket appears to have been familiar to the Egyptians (Wilkinson, ii, 40).

4. קַלְבֵּי, kalbei, so called from its similarity to a bird-cage or trap (κόρφαλλος is used in the latter sense in Eccles. xi, 30), probably in regard to its having a lid. From the etymology, this appears to have been an interwoven basket, made of leaves or rushes. In Jer. v, 27, however, it is used for a bird-cage, which must have been of open work, and probably not unlike our own wicker bird-cages. The name is applied to fruit-baskets (Amos viii, 1, 2, where the Sept. gives ἀγγος; Symm. more correctly κάλασος, Vulg. unicuius), Egyptian examples of which are presented in figs. 2 and 4 (which contain pomegranates) of the annexed cut.

Various Forms of Ancient Egyptian Baskets. From the Monuments.

5. דב, דב, or duby, דב, used like the Greek κάλαθος (so the Sept.) for carrying figs (Jer. xxv, 1, 2), as well as on a larger scale for carrying clay to the brick-yard (Psa. lxxxix, 6; Sept. κόφινος, A. V. Vers. pots), or for holding bulky articles (2 Kings x, 7; Sept. κίσταλλα); the shape of this basket and the mode of carrying it usual among the brickmakers in Egypt is delineated in Wilkinson, ii, 49, and aptly illustrates Psa. lxxxix, 6. See BURCK. In fact, very heavy burdens were thus carried in Egypt, as corn in very large baskets from the field to the threshing-floor, and from the threshing-floor to the granaries. They were carried between two men by a pole resting on the shoulders. See AGRICULTURE. In I Sam. ii, 11; 2 Chron. xxxv, 10; Job xli, 20, however, the same word evidently means pots for boiling, and is translated accordingly.

In most places where the word basket occurs, we are doubtless to understand one made of rushes, similar both in form and material to those used by carpenters for carrying their tools. This is still the common kind of basket throughout Western Asia; and its use in ancient Egypt is shown by an actual specimen which was found in a tomb at Thebes, and which is now in the British Museum. It was, in fact, a carpenter's basket, and contained his tools (fig. 1 above). Some of the Egyptian baskets are worked ornamentally with colors (figs. 3, 5, above; also the modern examples, figs. 2, 7, below). And besides these the monuments exhibit a large variety of hand-baskets of different shapes, and so extensively employed as to show the numerous applications of basket-work in the remote times to which these representations extend. They are mostly manufactured, the stronger and larger sorts of the fibres, and the finer of the leaves of the palm-tree, and not infrequently of rushes, but more seldom of reeds. —Kütö, s. v.; Smith, s. v.

Modern Oriental Baskets.

In the N. T. baskets are described under the three following terms, κόφινος, σπινός, and σκιθάνη. The last occurs only in 2 Cor. xi, 7, in describing Paul's escape from Damascus: the word properly refers to any thing twisted like a rope (Esch. Suppl. 791), or any article woven of rope (πλέγμα τι ει σκοθιαν, Suid.); fish-baskets especially were so made (ἀπό σκοθιαν πλεγμάτων εις ἰππολοχὴν ἰχθύων, Etym. Mag.). It was evidently one of the larger and stronger description (Hackett's Illustra. of Script. p. 69). With regard to the two former words, it may be remarked that κόφινος is exclusively used in the description of the miracle of feeding the five thousand (Matt. xiv, 20; xvi, 9; Mark vi, 43; Luke ix, 17; John vi, 13), and σπινός in that of the four thousand (Matt. xv, 37; Mark viii, 8), the distinction is most definitely brought out in Mark viii, 19, 20. The σπινός is also mentioned as the means of Paul's escape (Acts ix, 25). The difference between these two kinds of baskets is not very apparent. Their construction appears to have been the same; for κόφινος is explained by Suidas as a "woven vessel" (ἀγγίον πλεκτόν), while σπινός is generally connected with sowing (σπίνα). The σπινός (Vulg. spino) seems to have been most appropriately used of the provision-basket, the Roman sportula. Pseychicus explains it as the "grain-basket" (τὸ τῶν πινῶν ἀγγος, compare also the expression εἰσπινὴ ἀπὸ σπινός, Athen. viii, 17). The κόφινος seems to have been generally larger (Etym. Mag. βαλὴ καὶ κίλον χόφινος); since, as used by the Romans (Colum. xi, 3, p. 460), it contained manure enough to make a portable hot-bed (see Smith's Diet. of Class. Ant. s. v. Copinus); in Rome itself it was constantly carried about by the Jews (quorum coplinus funanque sepelire, Juv. Sat. iii, 14; vi, 542). Gresswell (Diss. viii, pt. 4) surmises that the use of the coplinus was to sleep in, but there is little to support this. Baskets probably formed a necessary article of furniture to the Jews, who, when travelling either among the Gentiles or the Samaritans, were accustomed to carry their provisions with them in baskets, in order to avoid defilement.—Smith, s. v.

Basle (Basilea), the capital of a canton of the same name in Switzerland, with a university. In 1505 the people of Basle entered into the Swiss alliance, and, having declared themselves in favor of the Reformation, drove out John Philip, their bishop, from which time the Roman bishops of Basle made Porrentrui their residence, and the chapter was at Freiburg, in Breisgau. At present the bishops of Basle have their residence at Solothurn. The cathedral church contains the tomb of Erasmus. The University was founded in 1459 by Pope Pius II, and has a fine library. It is the seat of an active and prosperous Protestant Missionary Society. See MISSIONS. The bishop was a prince of the German empire. See SWITZERLAND.—Landon, Eccle. Diet. s. v.

BASLE, CONFESSION OF, a Calvinistic confession adopted by the Protestants of Basle in 1531. Ecolampadius, a short time before his death, introduced a short confession of faith in a speech he delivered at the opening of the synod of Basle in Sept. 1531. This short confession became the basis of the Confession of Basle, which latter was prepared, probably by Myconius (q. v.), between 1532 and 1534. It was officially promulgated Jan. 21st, 1534, and shortly after sent to Strasburg to refute some objections of the theologians of that place on the articles concerning the Eucharist (Letter of Myconius to Bullinger, Oct. 14th, 1534). The title of the oldest edition, probably printed in 1534, reads, Bekanntnus unsers heyligen christlichen glaubens, wie er die Kytel zu Basel haldt. It is accompanied by commentaries in Latin, which had their origin probably in the different changes the Confession underwent before its final adoption and publication. These commentaries are omitted in the editions after 1547. After the official adoption of the Confession, an order was issued to all citizens to assemble in the corporations, and to declare whether they were prepared to accept and uphold this Confession by all means in their power. Afterward it became a practice in the city to have the Confession read every year in the corporations on the Wednesday of Holy Week. Mülhausen adopted the same Confession, from whence it also received the name of Confessio Mühlhusana (in the same manner as the first Helvetic Confession [q. v.] received, on account of its having been prepared at Basle, the name of second Confession of Basle). It is also found in Augusti, Corpus Libror. Symbolicor. Reformatorum, p. 103 sq.; Hagenbach, Kirchliche Gesch. d. Entstehung u. d. Schicksale d. ersten Basler Confession (Basel, 1827).

BASLE, COUNCIL OF, called by Pope Martin V, and continued by Eugenius IV. It was opened on the 23d of July, 1431, by Cardinal Julian, and closed on the 16th of May, 1443, forty-five sessions in all having been held, of which the first twenty-five are acknowledged by the Gallican Church. The Ultramontanes reject it altogether, but on grounds utterly untenable. The council, in its thirtieth session, declared that "a general council is superior to a pope;" and in 1437 Eugenius transferred its sessions to Ferrara (q. v.). The council refused to obey, and continued its sessions at Basle. The principal objects for which the council was called were the reformation of the Church and the reunion of the Greek with the Roman Church. Many of its resolutions were admirable both in spirit and form; and had the council been allowed to continue its sessions, and had the pope sanctioned its proceedings, there would have ensued a great and salutary change in the Roman Church. But the power of the papacy was at stake, and the reform was suppressed. Its most important acts were as follows. In the first session (Dec. 7, 1431), the decree of the council of Constance concerning the celebration of a general council after five and after seven years, was read, together with the bull of Martin V convokeing the council, in which he named Julian president; also the letter of Eugene IV to the latter upon the subject; afterward the six objects proposed in assembling the council were enumerated: 1, The extirpation of heresy; 2, the reunion of all Christian persons with the Catholic Church; 3, to afford instruction in the true faith; 4, to appease the wars between Christian princes; 5, to reform the Church in its head and in its members; 6, to re-establish, as far as possible, the ancient discipline of the Church. It soon appeared that Pope Eugene was determined to break up the council, which took vigorous measures of defence. In the second session (Feb. 15, 1432) it was declared that the synod, being assembled in the name of the Holy Spirit, and representing the Church militant, derives its power directly from our Lord Jesus Christ, and that all persons, of whatever rank or dignity, not excepting the Roman pontiff himself, are bound to obey it; and that any person, of whatsoever rank or condition, not excepting the pope, who shall refuse to obey the laws and decrees of this or of any other general council, shall be put to penance and punished." In the third session (April 29, 1432), Pope Eugene was summoned to appear before the council within three months. In August the pope sent legates to vindicate his authority over the council; and in the eighth session (Dec. 18) it was agreed that the pope should be proceeded against canonically, in order to declare him contumacious, and to visit him with the canonical penalty; two months' delay, however, being granted him within which to revoke his bull for the dissolution of the council. On the 16th of Jan. 1433, deputies arrived from the Bohemians demanding (1) liberty to administer the Eucharist in both kinds; (2) that all mortal sin, and especially open sin, should be repressed, corrected, and punished, according to God's law; (3) that the Word of God should be preached faithfully by the bishops, and by such deacons as were fit for it; (4) that the clergy should not possess authority in temporal matters. It was afterward agreed that the clergy in Bohemia and Moravia should be allowed to give the cup to the laity; but no reconciliation was made. In April, 1433, Eugene signified his willingness to send legates to the council to preside in his name, but the council refused his conditions. In the 12th session (July 14, 1433), the pope, by a decree, was required to renounce within sixty days his design of transferring the council from Basle, upon pain of being pronounced contumacious. In return, Eugene, irritated by these proceedings, issued a bull, annulling all the decrees of the council against himself. Later in autumn, the pope, in fear of the council, supported as it was by the emperor and by France, agreed to an accommodation. He chose four cardinals to preside with Julian at the council; he revoked all the bulls which he had issued for its dissolution, and published one according to the form sent him by the council [session XIV]. It was to the effect that, although he had broken up the Council of Basle lawfully assembled, nevertheless, in order to appease the disorders which had arisen, he declared the council to have been lawfully continued from its commencement, and that it would be so to the end; that he approved of all that it had offered and decided, and that he declared the bull for its dissolution which he had issued to be null and void; thus, as Bossuet observes, setting the council above himself, since, in obedience to its order, he revoked his own decree, made with all the authority of his see. In spite of this forced yielding Eugene never ceased plotting for the dissolution of the council. In subsequent sessions earnest steps were taken toward reform; the annates and taxes (the pope's chief revenues) were abrogated; the papal authority over chapter elections was restricted; citations to Rome on minor grounds were forbidden, etc. These movements increased the hatred of the papal party, to which, at last, Cardinal Julian was won over. The proposed reunion of the Greek and Roman churches made it necessary to appoint a place of conference with the Greeks. The council proposed Basle or Avignon; the papal party demanded an Italian city. The latter, in the minority, left Basle, and Eugene called an opposition council to meet at Ferrara (q. v.) in 1437. After Julian's departure the Cardinal Archbishop of Arles presided. In the 31st session, Jan. 24, 1438, the council declared the Pope Eugene contumacious, suspended him from the exercise of all jurisdiction either temporal or spiritual, and pronounced all that he should do to be null and void. In the 34th session, June 25, 1439, sentence of deposition was pronounced against Eugene, making use of the strongest possible terms. France, England, and Germany disapproved of this sentence. On October 30, Amadeus (q. v.), duke of Savoy, was elected pope, and took the name of Felix V. Alphonso, king of Aragon, the Queen of Hungary, and the Dukes of Bavaria and Austria, recognised Felix, as also did the Universities of Germany, Paris, and Cracow; but France, England, and Scotland, while they acknowledged the authority of the Council of Basle, continued to recognise Eugene as the lawful pope. Pope Eugene dying four years after, Nicholas V was elected in his stead, and recognised by the whole Church, whereupon Felix V renounced the pontificate in 1449, and thus the schism ended. Basle, MSS. of. See BASILEAN MANUSCRIPT.

Bas'math (Heb. Basmath', בַּסְמַת, fragrant), the name of two women.

1. (Sept. Basemath.) One of the wives of Esau (Gen. xxvi, 34; xxxvi, 3, 4, 10, 13, "BASHEMATH").

2. (Sept. Basemith.) A daughter of Solomon, and wife of Ahimaz, the viceroi in Naphtali (1 Kings iv, 15). B.C. post 1014.

Basnage, the name of a French family which has produced many distinguished men. (See Haag, La France Protestante, ii, 5-15.)

1. BENJAMIN, was born at Carentan in 1580, and during fifty-one years was pastor of the church which his father had held at Carentan. He attended, as provincial deputy, nearly all the synods of the Protestant churches of France held during his lifetime. He presided over the assembly held at Rochelle in 1622, which decided on resisting the king. He also signed the project of defence under the title of "Modérateur Ajoint," and went to England to solicit aid. On the termination of hostilities, Basnage returned to France, and was appointed deputy to the synod at Charenton, 1623. The zeal with which he maintained the reformed religion rendered him an object of increasing suspicion to the court. The king, by a decree, forbade him to take part in the synod of Charenton in 1631. This synod made remonstrances against this decree so forcibly that the court yielded, and Basnage was admitted to the synod, in which he exercised great influence. He was elected president of the national synod at Alençon in 1637. He died in 1652. His principal work was a treatise on the Church (De l'état visible et invisible de l'Eglise, etc., Rochelle, 1612, 8vo). He left imperfect a work against the worship of the Virgin.

2. ANTOINE, eldest son of Benjamin, was born in 1610. He was minister at Bayeux, and during the renewed persecutions of the Protestants he was, at the age of sixty-five, placed in the prison of Havre de Grace; but his firmness remained unshaken. After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he escaped to Holland in 1685, and died in 1691 at Zutphen, in which place he had held a pastoral charge.

3. SAMUEL (de Flottenmanville), son of Antoine, was born at Bayeux in 1638. He preached at first in his native place, but escaped with his father to Holland in 1655. He died a preacher at Zutphen in 1721. His principal works were—L'Histoire de la Religion des Eglises R. reformées (Rotterdam, 1690, 2 vols. fol., republished 1699);—De Rebus Sacris et Ecclesiasticis executionibus Historico-critica (Traject, 1692, 1717, 4to);—Annals des Eglises-Ecclesiastiques annorum DCXLV a Cesare Augusto ad Pharam (Rotterdam, 1766, 3 vols. folio). Both these works contain masterly criticisms on Baroni-us.

4. JACQUES, de Beaurval, eldest son of Henri, was born at Rouen, August 8th, 1653. He was early sent to study at Saumur under Le Févre; thence he went to Geneva and Sedan, where his master was the celebrated Jurien. In 1676 he became a minister, and married in 1681 a daughter of Pierre Dumoulin. Upon the revocation of the Edict of Nantes he went to Rotterdam, and in 1691 he was appointed a minister at the Hague. Voltaire declared him fit to be minister of state for the kingdom. He died December 22d, 1723. His principal works are—1. Histoire de l'Eglise depuis Jesus-Christ jusqu'à présent (Rotterdam, 1699, 2 vols. fol.), a work in high repute;—2. Histoire de la Religion des Eglises Reformées (Ibid, 1699, 2 vols. 4to). These two works were published, together with great additions and alterations, at Rotterdam, 1721, 5 vols. 8vo; and with still greater augmentations in 1725, in 2 vols. 4to. The latter work is a reply to Bossuet's Variations:—3. Histoire des Juifs depuis Jesus-Christ jusqu'à présent (1706, 5 vols. 12mo, and 1716, in 15 vols. 12mo), a work of vast learning and research, which the Abbé Dupin reprinted anonymously at Paris, with great alterations and mutilations. This caused Basnage to publish a work in vindication of his claim to the history. There is an English translation by Taylor (Lond, 1708, fol.), made from the first edition;—4. Antiquités Judaïques (as a supplement to the treatise of Cuneus) (1713, 2 vols. 8vo);—5. Dissertation historique sur les Duels et les Ordres de Chevalerie, a curious work, reprinted with the Histoire des Ordres de Chevalerie (1720, 8vo, 4 vols.);—6. La Communion Sainte (1668, in 18mo). A seventh edition was published in 1708, with the addition of a book on the duties of those who do not communicate. This work was so much liked by others besides Protestants that it was printed at Rouen and Brussels, and used by Romanists;—7. Histoire de l'Ancien et du Nouveau Testament (Amst. 1705, 2 vols. fol.); often reprinted, and recommended by the Abbé Lenglet to readers of the Roman Communion. Basnage also reprinted in 1727 the great collection of Canisius, entitled Thesaurus Monumentorum Ecclesiasticorum et Historicorum, and he wrote various other minor works.—Biog. Univ. iii, 493; Landon, Eccle. Diet. ii, 77.

5. HENRI (de Beaurval), brother of JACQUES, was born at Rouen, August 7, 1656, and followed the profession of his father. On the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1687 he took refuge in Holland, and died there, March 29, 1710, aged 54 years. He wrote Traité de la Tolérance des Religions (1684, 12mo), and edited L'Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans, a widely-circulated journal, which was commenced in September, 1687, as a continuation of Bayle's Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, and terminated in June, 1709; it consists of 24 vols. 12mo. Basnage published in 1701 an improved edition of Furetière's Dictionnaire; the Dictionnaire de Trevoux (1704) is partly a reprint of this work, without mention of the name of either Furetière or Basnage.—Hofer, Biog. Générale, iv, 687-690.

Bass, EDWARD, D.D., Protestant Episcopal bishop of Massachusetts, was born at Dorchester, Nov. 2^d, 1726. He graduated at Harvard, 1744, and, after several years of teaching, was licensed as a Congregational minister. In 1752 he joined the Church of England, was ordained in England, and became pastor at Newburyport, Mass. In 1796 he was elected Bishop, and consecrated in 1797. His episcopal duties, with those of his parish at Newburyport, were diligently discharged until he became enfeebled by disease. He died Sept. 10, 1803.—Sprague, Annals, v, 144.

Bas'sa (Bassai v. r. Bassai), one of the Israelitish family-heads whose "sons" (to the number of 323) returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 16); evidently the BEZAI (q. v.) of the genuine texts (Ezra ii, 17; Neh. vii, 2^d).

Bassus, the name of several Romans mentioned by Josephus.

1. CECILIUS, a knight, and probably quaestor in B.C. 59 (Cicero, ad Att. ii, 9). He espoused Pompey's cause in the civil war, and, after the battle of Pharsalia (B.C. 48), fled to Tyre, of which he at length gained possession. He defended it successfully against Sextus Cæsar, the governor of Syria, whom he treacherously caused to be slain (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 11; War. i, 10, 16). He afterward established himself as pretor in Apamea (B.C. 46), which he defended against Antistius Vetus, but was finally brought to submission by Cassius, B.C. 43.—Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.

2. LUCILIUS, commander of the fleet of Vitellius B.C. 70, which he betrayed to Vespasian, by whom he was sent to quell some disturbances in Campania (Tacitus, Hist. ii, 109; iii, 12, 36, 40; iv, 3). He was the successor of Cerealis Vitellianus as Roman legate in Judaea, where he reduced the fortresses of Herodium and Machærus (Joseph. Ant. vii, 6, 1 and 4).

3. See VENTIDIUS.

Bas'tai (Βασταῖ), one of the family-heads of the temple-servants whose "sons" are said to have returned from the exile (1 Esdr. v, 31); evidently the BESAI (q. v.) of the genuine texts (Ezra ii, 49; Neh. vii, 52).

Bastard (uothus, one born out of wedlock), (i.) the rendering in the Auth. Vers. of the Heb. בְּרִיָּה (umzer', polluted), which occurs only in Deut. xxiii. 2 and Zech. ix, 6. But Michaelis (Mos. Recht, ii, § 139) reads the word with a different pointing, so as to make it a compound of two words, בַּיִת, meaning stain, defect of a stranger; implying the stain that would be cast upon the nation by granting to such a stranger the citizen-right. Some understand by it the offspring of prostitutes; but they forget that prostitutes were expressly forbidden to be tolerated by the law of Moses (Lev. xix, 29; Deut. xxiii, 17). The most probable conjecture is that which applies the term to the offspring of heathen prostitutes in the neighborhood of Palestine, since no provision was made by Moses against their toleration (Potter, Archæol. i, 354), and who were a sort of priestesses to the Syrian goddess Astarte (comp. Num. xxv, 1 sq.; Gesenius, Comment. ub. Isaias, ii, 339; IIos. iv, 14; 1 Kings xiv, 24; xv, 12; xxii, 47; 2 Kings xxiii, 7; Herodot. i, 199). That there existed such bastard offspring among the Jews is proved by the history of Jephthah (Judg. xi, 1-7), who on this account was expelled and deprived of his patrimony (Kitto). It seems (Heb. xii, 8) that natural children (vāzoi) among the Jews received little attention from the father. In the former of the above passages (Deut. xxiii, 2), illegitimate offspring in the ordinary sense (Sept. ἐκ πορνιῆς, Vulg. d. scorto natus), and so the Oriental interpreters, as also the rabbins; but so severe a curse could hardly with justice rest upon such, and there is no countenance for such a view in the Jewish custom of concubinage. See COCUBINE. In the latter passage (Zech. ix, 6; Sept. ἀλλογενής) it is doubtless used in the sense of foreigner, predicting the conquest of Ashdod by the Jews in the time of the Maccabees, or perhaps more appropriately by subsequent heathen invaders.

(ii.) Persons of illegitimate birth are incapable, by the canon law, of receiving any of the minor orders without a dispensation from the bishop; nor can they, in the Latin Church, be admitted to holy orders, or to benefices with cure of souls, except by a dispensation from the pope. However, the taking of the monastic vows enables such a one to receive holy orders without dispensation; but persons so ordained cannot be advanced to any ecclesiastical dignity without dispensation. According to the laws of the Church of England, a bastard cannot be admitted to orders without a dispensation from the queen or archbishop; and if he take a benefice, he may be deprived of it till such dispensation be obtained.—Landon, Ecl. Diet. ii, 81.

Bastholm, CHRISTOPHER, a Danish theologian, born at Copenhagen 1740, was a man of great influence in ecclesiastical affairs in Denmark. He wrote several works (in a rationalistic vein) of great learning, e. g. De Natürliche Zelgion (Copenh. 1784);—Jüdische Geschichte (Copenh. 1777-82, 3 parts);—Hist.-philos. Un- tersuchungen üb. die relig. u. philos. Meinungen d. ältesten Völker (Copenh. 1802).—Herzog, Real-Encyclop. i, 718.

Bastinado (or beating) has always been of universal application as a punishment of minor offences in the East, and especially in Egypt. It appears to be designated by the Heb. phrase מַסְרֵי מַסוּר', she'bet musor', "rod of correction" (Prov. xxii, 15). See ROD. The punishment of beating with sticks or rods, termed "scourging" (Levit. xix, 20) and "chastising" (Deut. xxii, 18), was very common among the Jews, and is ordained in the law for a variety of offences. Thus stripes, the rod, etc., frequently occur for punishment of any kind (Prov. x, 13; xxvi, 3). The dignity or high standing of the person who had rendered himself liable to this punishment could not excuse him from its being inflicted. He was extended upon the ground, and blows not exceeding forty were applied upon his back in the presence of the judge (Deut. xxv, 2, 3). This punishment is very frequently practised in the East at the present day, with this difference, however, that the blows were formerly inflicted on the back, but now on the soles of the feet. China has aptly been said to be governed by the stick. In Persia, also, the stick is in continual action. Men of all ranks and ages are continually liable to be beaten, and it is by no means a rare occurrence for the highest and most confidential persons in the state, in a moment of displeasure or caprice in their royal master, to be handed over to the beaters of carpets, who thrash them with their sticks as if they were dogs (Pict. Bible, note on Exod. vi, 14). Among the ancient Egyptians, in military as well as civil cases, minor offences were generally punished with the stick—a mode of chastisement still greatly in vogue among the modern inhabitants of the valley of the Nile, and held in such esteem by them that, convinced of (or perhaps by) its efficacy, they relate "its descent from heaven as a blessing to mankind." If an Egyptian of the present day has a government debt or tax to pay, he stoutly persists in his inability to obtain the money till he has withstood a certain number of blows, and considers himself compelled to produce it; and the ancient inhabitants, if not under the rule of their native princes, at least in the time of the Roman emperors, gloried equally in the obstinacy they evinced, and the difficulty the governors of the country experienced in extorting from them what they were bound to pay; whence Ammianus Marcellinus tells us, "an Egyptian blushes if he cannot show numerous marks on his body that evince his endeavors to evade the duties." The bastinado was inflicted on both sexes, as with the Jews. Men and boys were laid prostrate on the ground, and frequently held by the hands and feet while the chastisement was administered; but women, as they sat, received the stripes on their back, which was also inflicted by the hand of a man. Nor was it unusual for the superintendents to stimulate laborers to their work by the persuasive powers of the stick, whether engaged in the field or in handicraft employments; and boys were sometimes beaten without the ceremony of prostration, the hands being tied behind their back while the punishment was applied. It does not, however, appear to have been from any respect to the person that this less usual method was adopted; nor is it probable that any class of the community enjoyed a peculiar privilege on these occasions, as among the modern Moslems, who, extending their respect for the Prophet to his distant descendants of the thirty-sixth and ensuing generations, scruple to administer the stick to a sherief until he has been politely furnished with a mat on which to prostrate his guilty person. Among other amusing privileges in modern Egypt is that conceded to the grandees, or officers of high rank. Ordinary culprits are punished by the hand of persons usually employed on such occasions; but a bey, or the governor of a district, can only receive his chastisement from the hand of a pacha, and the aristocratic duboss (mace) is substituted for the vulgar stick. This is no trifling privilege: it becomes fully impressed upon the sufferer, and renders him, long after, sensible of the peculiar honor he has enjoyed; nor can any one doubt that an iron mace, in form not very unlike a chocolate-mill, is a distinguished mode of punishing men who are proud of their rank (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i, 210 sq. abridgm.). See FLAGELLATION.

The punishment of tympanism, τυμπανισμός, or beating upon the tympanum, was practised by Antiochus toward the Jews (2 Macc. vi, 19, 28; comp. ver. 30; Auth. Vers. "torment"), and is referred to by Paul (Heb. xi, 35; Auth. Vers. "tortured"). The "tympanum" was a wooden frame, probably so called from resembling a drum or timbrel, on which the sufferer was fastened, and then beaten to death with sticks. See CORPORAL INFLECTIONS.

Baston, GUILLAUME-ANDRÉ-RÉNÉ, a French Romanist divine, was born at Rouen, Nov. 29, 1741. After completing his studies, he became professor of theology at Rouen, emigrated during the Revolution, and on his return became grand-vicar of Rouen. In 1813 he was made bishop of Séez, but had to give up his see on the return of the Bourbons. He died at St. Laurent, Sept. 26, 1825. Among his published works are Cours de Théologie (Paris, 1773-1784); Les Entrées du Pape Gangulelli (1777, 12mo); Première journée d. M. Voltaire dans l'entre-Monde (1779, 12mo); L'Église d. France contre M. le Moine (2 vols. 8vo, 1821-1824). —Hofer, Biog. Générale, iv, 726.

Bastwick, JOHN, M.D., was born at Writtle, Essex, 1593, and studied at Cambridge. He took his degree of M.D. at Padua, and settled at Colchester, as physician, in 1621. During the rest of his life he seems to have devoted all his leisure time to theological study and controversy. His first publication was Elenchus relig. papisticæ, in qua probatur in que Apostolicam, in que Catholicam, in que necque Romanam esse (Leyden, 1624). His next was Flagellum Pontificum et Episcoporum (Lond. 1635, and again 1611). This work greatly offended the bishops; he was fined £1000, forbidden to practice medicine, and imprisoned. In prison he wrote Apologitica ad Presules (1638, 8vo), and The New Litany, in which he sharply censured the bishops. This made matters worse, and he was condemned to a fine of £5000, to the pillory, and to lose his ears. He was kept in a prison in the Scilly Islands till 1640, when the Commonwealth Parliament released him. He afterward wrote several bitter pamphlets against Independency, such as Independency not God's Ordinance (Lond. 1645); Routing of the Army of Sectaries (1646). He died about 1650 (?). —Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographica, i, 196; Hofer, Biog. Générale, iv, 726; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 139.

Bat (𐤁𐤏𐤁𐤏, atalphé; Sept. wakrepié; Syriac Vers. peacock) occurs in Lev. xi, 19; Deut. xiv, 18; Isa. ii, 20; and Baruch vi, 22. In Hebrew the word implies "flying in the dark," which, taken in connection with the sentence, "Moreover, the bat and every creeping thing that flieth is unclean unto you; they shall not be eaten," is so clear, that there cannot be a mistake respecting the order of animals meant, though to modern zoology neither the species, the genus, nor even the family is thereby manifested; the injunction merely prohibits eating bats, and may likewise include some tribes of insects. At first sight, animals so diminutive, lean, and repugnant to the senses must appear scarcely to have required the legislator's attention, but the fact evidently shows that there were at the time men or women who ate animals classed with bats, a practice still in vogue in the great Australasian islands, where the frugivorous Pteropi of the harpy or goblin family, by seamen denominated flying-dogs, and erroneously vampires, are caught and eaten; but where the insectivorous true bats, such as the genera common in Europe, are rejected. Some of the species of harpies are of the bulk of a rat, with from three to four feet of expanse between the tips of the wings; they have a fierce dog-like head, and are nearly all marked with a space of rufous hair from the forehead over the neck and along the back (Kitto). For a description of the various kinds of bats, see the Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. Chiroptera.

In the foregoing enumeration of unclean animals, the bat is reckoned among the birds, and such appears to be the most obvious classification; but modern naturalists have shown that it has no real affinity with birds. It is now included in the class of mammiferous quadrupeds, characterized by having the tegumentary membrane extended over the bones of the extremities in such a manner as to constitute wings capable of sustaining and conveying them through the air. The name of Chiroptera, or hand-winged, has therefore been bestowed on this order. It comprises a great number of genera, species, and varieties; they are all either purely insectivorous or insecti-frugivorous, having exceedingly sharp cutting and acutely tuberculated jaw teeth, and the whole race is nocturnal. They vary in size from that of the smallest common mouse up to that of the vampire, or gigantic ternate bat, whose body is as large as that of a squirrel. The smaller species are abundantly distributed over the globe; the larger seem to be confined to warm and hot regions, where they exist in great numbers, and are very destructive to the fruits. The purely insectivorous species render great service to mankind by the destruction of vast numbers of insects, which they pursue with great eagerness in the morning and evening twilight. During the daytime they remain suspended by their hinder hooked claws in the lofts of barns, in hollow or thickly-leaved trees, etc. As winter approaches, in cold climates, they seek shelter in caverns, vaults, ruinous and deserted buildings, and similar retreats, where they cling together in large clusters, and remain in a torpid condition until the returning spring recalls them to active exertions. In the texts of Scripture, where allusion is made to caverns and dark places, true Vespertilionidae, or insect-eating bats, similar to the European, are clearly designated.

Common Bat.

The well-known habits of the bat afford a forcible illustration of a portion of the fearful picture drawn by Isaiah (ii, 20) of the day when the Lord shall arise "to shake terribly the earth:" "A man shall cast his idols of silver and his idols of gold to the moles and to the bats," or, in other words, carry his idols into the dark caverns, old ruins, or desolate places, to which he himself shall flee for refuge; and so shall give them up, and relinquish them to the filthy animals that frequent such places, and have taken possession of them as their proper habitation. Bats are very common in the East (Kitto, Pict. Bible, note on Isa. ii, 20). Layard (Nineveh and Babylon, p. 307) describes his visit to a cavern on the banks of the Khabour swarming with bats. "Flying toward the light," he adds, "these noisome beasts compelled us to retreat. They clung to our clothes, and our hands could scarcely prevent them settling on our faces. The rustling of their wings was like the noise of a great wind, and an abominable stench arose from the recesses of the cave." They are also found delineated upon the Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, i, 232, 234, abridgm.). Sev-

Batchelder, George W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Philadelphia, June 15, 1836. He was educated at the Pennington Seminary, N. J., and afterward was engaged as classical teacher at Casewille, Pa., and New Egypt, N. J. In 1857 he entered the itinerant ministry, and was appointed to Princeton, N. J. Here his preaching made an extraordinary impression, and Princeton College conferred upon him the degree of A.M. His next appointment was State Street, Trenton, and his last Bayard Street, N. Brunswick. He died of consumption at Princeton, March 30, 1865. He was a young man of rare promise, of deep piety, of fine culture, and of extraordinary eloquence.—Minutes of Conferences, 1864, p. 20.

Batchelder, William, born at Peston, March 25, 1768, was a Baptist minister of considerable note. His parents dying when he was but 13, he began a roving life, in the course of which he had many remarkable adventures; among others was the being elected captain, or master of a ship which had lost its officers, before he was 16. Becoming connected with the Baptist Church, after some years spent in preaching, he was, in 1796, ordained pastor of a church at Berwick, which place he chose, it is said, "as the least attractive, where the greatest good could be done." In 1805 Mr. Batchelder removed to Haverhill, where he labored till his death, April 8, 1818, which was caused by over-exertion in raising funds for Waterville College. Mr. Batchelder was a man of fine presence and of great popularity.—Sprague, Annals, vi, 319.

Bate, James, an English divine, was born 1763, educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and in 1781 became rector of Deptford. He died 1775, having published A Rationale of the Liberal Doctrine of Original Sin (Lond. 1766, 8vo), with a number of occasional sermons.—Darling, Cycl. Bibl. i, 197.

Bate, Julius, brother of James, born about 1711, and educated at Jesus College, Cambridge. He became rector of Sutton, and died 1771. He was an intimate friend of Hutchinson, whose ethical principles he imbibed and defended. He wrote An Inquiry into the Similitudes of God in O. T. (Lond. 1756, 8vo);—The Integrity of the Hebrew Text vindicated against Kennicott (Lond. 1754, 8vo);—A New Translation of the Pentateuch, with Notes (Lond. 1773, 4to), "so literal as to be nearly unintelligible" (Monthly Rev.); with several controversial essays against Warburton, and minor tracts.—Darling, s. v.; Allibone, s. v.

Bateman, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Maryland 1775, converted in 1800, entered the itinerant ministry in the Philadelphia Conference in 1806, located in 1814, re-entered in 1817, and preached until his death in 1830. As a man he was amiable, urbane, and generous; as a Christian, gentle, candid, and full of charity; as a preacher, sound, earnest, and warm; and as a presiding elder, discreet, firm, and wise. His life was useful and loving, and his death triumphant.—Minutes of Conferences, ii, 118.

Bates, Lewis, an American Methodist minister, died in Taunton, Mass., March 24, 1865, aged 85 years. He was a descendant in the seventh generation of John Rogers, the martyr. At the age of thirteen he was converted, and in 1801 he, with two others, joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in Springfield, Vt., thus originating the church in that place, and on December 5, 1802, he consecrated himself to the ministry. In 1804 he was admitted on trial in the New York

Conference; in 1306 he was admitted into full connection in the New England Conference, and ordained deacon by Bishop Asbury, and appointed to Tuffenborough, which was set off from the New York Conference. In 1807 he was at Scarborough and Livermore, Me.; in 1808, ordained elder, and stationed for the third time at Tuffenborough; in 1809, Pembroke; 1810, Barnard, Vt.; 1811, 1812, Salisbury and Greenland Circuit. In 1813 he located. In 1817 he was readmitted to the New England Conference, and sent to Vershire Circuit, Vt.; 1818, 1819, Landaff, N. H.; 1820, New London Circuit. In 1821 he was appointed to Norwich; 1822, Warwick, R. I.; 1823, 1824, Barnstable, Mass.; 1825, 1826, Wellfleet; 1827, 1828, Salem, N. H.; 1829, Easton and Stoughton; 1830, Easton and Bridgewater; 1831, Bristol, R. I.; 1832, Mansfield; 1833, 1834, East Weymouth; 1835, Saugus; 1836, 1837, Pembroke; 1838, 1839, Scituate Harbor; 1840, N. W. Bridgewater, etc.; 1841, Taunton First Church; 1842, Nantucket; 1843, Falmouth; 1844, S. Dartmouth; 1845, Pembroke; 1846, 1847, West Sandwich; 1848, Hull and Cohasset; 1849, Chilmark, Martha's Vineyard. This was his last appointment from the Conference. In 1850 he asked a superannuated relation, and located in Taunton, where he remained till his death, beloved and respected by all who knew him. His ministry was every where effective, and many were converted to God through his labors; among them several who became preachers of the Gospel. He was sixty-one years a preacher, forty-two of which were spent as an itinerant, moving almost yearly, most of the time with a large family. During the years he was superannuated, whenever his health would admit he was active in visiting the churches, preaching, and attending prayer and class-meetings.—Christian Advocate, May 18, 1865; Miner's, 1865, p. 43.

Bates, William, D.D., a learned Nonconformist, was born in 1625, place unknown. He was educated at Cambridge, where he was admitted D.D. in 1660. Soon after the Restoration he was appointed chaplain to Charles II, and was also, for some time, minister of St. Dun-ston's, from whence he was ejected by the Act of Uniformity. He was one of the commissioners at the Savoy Conference in 1660 for reviewing the Liturgy, and assisted in drawing up the exceptions against the Book of Common Prayer. He was likewise chosen on the part of the Nonconformist ministers, together with Dr. Jacomb and Mr. Baxter, to manage the dispute with Dr. Pearson, afterward bishop of Chester, Dr. Gunning, afterward bishop of Ely, and Dr. Sparrow, afterward bishop of Norwich. The object of this conference was to persuade the dissidents to fall in with the requirements of the Church of England in regard to its rituals and ceremonies. But to the reasonings of Gunning, who seemed disposed to forward a reconciliation between the Church of England and Rome, Dr. Bates urged that, on the very same grounds on which they imposed the crucifix and surplice, they might bring in holy water, and all the trumpery of popery. Dr. Bates was on intimate terms with Lord-keeper Bridgman, Lord-chancellor Finch, the Earl of Nottingham, and Archbishop Tillotson. He was offered the deanery of Lichfield and Coventry at the Restoration, but he declined the offer; and, according to Dr. Calamy, he might have been afterward raised to any bishopric in the kingdom, could he have conformed. He resided for the latter part of his life at Hackney, where he died 19th July, 1699. According to Calamy, "he was generally reputed one of the best orators of the day, and was well versed in the polite arts of learning, which so seasoned his conversation as to render it highly entertaining to the more sensible part of mankind. His apprehension was quick and clear, and his reasoning faculty acute, prompt, and expert. His judgment was penetrating and solid, stable and firm. His memory was singularly tenacious, and scarcely impaired at the period of his death. His language was always neat and fine, but unaffected. His method in all his discourses would bear the test of the severest scrutiny." Dr. Bates was one of the best theological writers of his time; his Harmony of the Divine Attributes in the Work of Man's Redemption is still deservedly popular, and, in fact, all his writings are in demand. They are collected in his Whole Works, with a Memoir, by Farmer (Lond. 1815, 4 vols. 8vo).—Jones, Christ. Biog. p. 30; Allitone, Dict. of Authors, i, 141.

Bath. See BATHE.

Bath (Heb. and Chald. id., בַּת , Sept. $\chi\alpha\iota\mu\acute{\alpha}\zeta$, $\kappa\alpha\theta\acute{\alpha}\lambda\eta$; occurs 1 Kings vii, 26, 38; 2 Chron. ii, 10; iv, 5; Isa. v, 10; Ezek. xlv, 10, 14; Ezra vii, 22), a Hebrew measure for liquids, as wine and oil, equal to the EPHAI for things dry (Ezek. as above), each being the tenth part of a HOMER (Ezek. as above). In Luke xvi, 6, the Greek form $\beta\acute{\alpha}\tau\alpha\omicron\varsigma$ occurs, where it is rendered "measure." According to Josephus ($\beta\acute{\alpha}\tau\alpha\omicron\varsigma$), it contained 72 sextarii (Ant. viii, 2, 9). Its ordinary capacity appears to have been 8 galls, 3 qts. See MEASURES.

Bath (Bathonia) and Wells (Wellia, Fontana, anciently Tal npton), a diocese of the Church of England, combining the two ancient sees of Bath and Wells, which were united in the beginning of the twelfth century. The episcopal residence and chapter are now at Wells; the chapter consists of the dean, four canons residentiary, a precentor, treasurer, three archdeacons, a sub-dean, forty-four canons non-resident, and two minor canons. The united dioceses, which contain the whole county of Somerset except Bedminster and Abbots-Leigh, contain four hundred and forty-seven benefices. The present bishop is Lord Auckland, appointed in 1854.

Bathe (in Heb. בָּתַל , rachats', Gr. $\lambda\acute{o}\upsilon\omega$). The bath is in the East, on account of the hot climate and abundant dust, constantly necessary for the preservation of health, especially the prevention of cutaneous disorders; hence it was among the Hebrews one of the first purificative duties (Neh. iv, 23), and in certain cases of (Levitical) uncleanness it was positively prescribed by the Mosaic law (Lev. xiv, 8 sq.; xv, 5, 13, 18; xvii, 16; xxii, 6; Num. xix, 19; Deut. xxiii, 11), being treated as a part of religion, as with the ancient Egyptians (Herod. ii, 37) and modern Mohammedans (Niebuhr, Reisen, ii, 47; Beschr. p. 39). The Jews bathed not only in streams (Lev. xv, 13; 2 Kings v, 10; on Exod. ii, 5, comp. St. Irwin's Trac. p. 272 sq.), but also in the houses, the court-yard of which always contained a bath (2 Sam. xi, 2; Susan, ver. 15); and in later times, as among the Greeks and Romans (Potter, Gr. Archaeol. ii, 651 sq.; Adam's Rom. Antiq. ii, 214 sq.; comp. Fabric. Bibliogr. Antiq. p. 1006), there were likewise public baths (Talmud בֵּית הַבְּתוּלָה) in the cities of Judaea (Josephus, Ant. xix, 7, 5; Mishna, Nebur. v, 5; comp. Mikraoth, vi, 15; Sheb'uth, 8, 5; Baba Bathra, iv, 6), as in the East at present there universally are (see the descriptions in Mariti, i, 125; Arvieux, ii, 42; Troilo, p. 672; Russell, i, 172 sq.;

Fig. 1. The lady, seated on a mat or carpet. 2, An attendant holding a flower and supporting her; 3, Rubs her arm with the hand, as in the modern Turkish bath; 4, Pours water over her; 5, Takes care of her clothes and ornaments.

D'Ohsson, i, 264 sq.; Lane, Mol. Egypt. ch. xvi), and palaces had bathing-rooms (Joseph, Ant. xiv, 15, 13). In places of a mixed population the Jews resorted to the heathen baths (Mishna, Abod t Sara, iii, 4; see CIRCUMCISION, and comp. Orth. Lex. Rabb. p. 78). Besides water, persons (females) sometimes used bran for ceremonial cleansing (Mishna, Psch, ii, 7). In like manner, the modern Arabs, in the failure of water, universally perform their lustrations by rubbing themselves with sand, a usage that has been thought (Rossmüller, Morgenl. iii, 228 sq.) to explain Naaman the Syrian's request of some of the sacred soil of Palestine (2 Kings v, 17).—Winer, i, 130. The ceremonial law also prescribed bathing after mourning, which always implied defilement (e. g. Ruth iii, 3; 2 Sam. xii, 20). The high-priest at his inauguration (Lev. xiii, 6) and on the day of atonement, once before each solemn act of propitiation (xvi, 4, 24), was also to bathe. This the rabbins have multiplied into ten times on that day. Maimon. (Const. de Vas's Sanct. v, 3) gives rules for the strict privacy of the high-priest in bathing. There were bath-rooms in the later Temple over the chambers Abtines and Happarah for the priests' use (Lightfoot, Descr. of Temp. 24). With sanitary bathing anointing was customarily joined; the climate making both these essential alike to health and pleasure, to which luxury added the use of perfume (Susan. 17; Jud. x, 3; Esth. ii, 12). The "pools," such as that of Siloam and Hezekiah's (Neh. iii, 15, 16; 2 Kings xx, 20; Isa. xxvii, 11; John i, 7), often sheltered by porticoes (John v, 2), are the first indications we have of public bathing accommodation. Ever since the time of Jason (Prideaux, ii, 168) the Greek usages of the bath probably prevailed, and an allusion in Josephus (Λουσόμενος στρατιωτικώτερον, War. i, 17, 7) seems to imply the use of the bath (hence, no doubt, a public one, as in Rome) by legionary soldiers. We read also of a castle luxuriously provided with a volume of water in its court, and of a Herodian palace with spacious pools adjoining, in which the guests continued swimming, etc., in very hot weather from noon till dark (Joseph. Ant. xii, 4, 11; xv, 3, 3). The hot baths of Thierias (Pliny, v, 15), or more strictly of Emmanus (Euseb. Onomast. Aithp. query Aithp? Bonfrerius) near it, and of Callirhoc, near the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, were much resorted to (Reland, i, 46; Joseph. Ant. xviii, 2; xvii, 6, 5; War. i, 33, 5; Amm. Marcell. xiv, 8; Stanley, p. 375, 295). The parallel customs of ancient Egypt, Greece, and Rome are too well known to need special allusion. (See Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant. s. v. Balneæ; Laurie, Roman or Turkish Bath, Edinb. 1864.)—Smith, s. v. See WATER.

Bather, EDWARD, A. M., an English divine, born in 1779, educated at Oriel College, Oxford; became vicar of Meole Brace 1804, and afterward archdeacon of Salop. Died in 1847. He published Sermons, chiefly practical (Lond. 3 vols. 8vo, 1840), which are praised in the British Critic (iii, 164).

Bath-Gallim (בַּת־גַּלִּים), "daughter of Gallim," Isa. x, 30). See GALLIM.

Bath-Kol (בַּת־קוֹל, daughter of the voice), a rabbinical name for a supposed oracular voice, which Jewish writers regard as inferior in authority to the direct revelation that the O. T. prophets enjoyed (Vitringa, Observ. Sacr. ii, 338), although the Targum and Midrash affirm that it was the actual medium of divine communication to Abraham, Moses, David, Nebuchadnezzar, etc. (Reland, Ant. Sacr. pt. ii, ch. ix). Neither are the Jewish authorities agreed as to what the Bath-Kol itself was, many maintaining that it was merely the recho of the divine utterance (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v. קוֹל). Some scholars have incorrectly rendered the term "daughter-voice," daughter's voice (Horne, Introd. iv, 149; Jennings, Jewish Antiq. bk. i, ch. vi). It has been supposed that Josephus alludes to the Bath-Kol in the annunciation to Hyrcanus that his sons had conquered Antiochus (Ant. xiii, 10, 3), and the awful warning voice in the Temple prior to its destruction (War. v, 5, 3); but these and other instances seem to fall short of the dignity required. Prideaux, however, classes them all with the heathen species of divination called Sortes Virgilianæ (Connection, ii, 354), and Lightfoot even considers them to be either Jewish fables or devices of the devil (Hor. Heb. ad Matt. iii, 17). Yet instances of voices from heaven very analogous occur in the history of the early Christian Church, as that which was instrumental in making Alexander bishop of Jerusalem, and that which exhorted Polycarp to be of good courage (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. vi, 11; iv, 15). See DANZ, De filia vocis (Jen. 1716; also in Meuschen's Nor. Test. ex Tabulae illustr. p. 351-378); Häner, De בַּת־קוֹל (Jen. 1673); Metzler, De vocis filia (Jen. 1673).

Bathra. See MISHNA.

Bath-rab'bim (Heb. Bath-rabbim, בַּת־רַבִּימַי, daughter of many; Sept. translates literally Ἐνγαριῶν πολλῶν), the name of one of the gates of the ancient city of Heshbon, by (בַּת־רַבִּימַי) which were two "pools," to which Solomon likens the eyes of his beloved (Cant. vii, 4 [5]). The "Gate of Bath-rabbinim" at Heshbon would, according to the Oriental custom, be the gate pointing to a town of that name. The only place in this neighborhood at all resembling Bath-rabbinim in sound is Bablah (Amman), but the one tank of which we gain any intelligence as remaining at Heshbon is on the opposite (S.) side of the town to Amman (Forster, Handbook, p. 298).—Smith, s. v.

Bath-sheba (Heb. Bath-She'ba, בַּת־שֶׁבַע, daughter of the oath, or of seven [sc. years]; Sept. Βησαβέε, Josephus Βεσσαβή; also בַּת־שֶׁבַע, Bath-She'ā, another form of the same name; Sept. as before; 1 Chron. iii, 5; in ch. ii, 3, this form is translated "daughter of Shua" in the English version), daughter of Eliam (2 Sam. xi, 3) or Ammiel (1 Chron. iii, 5), the granddaughter of Ahithophel (2 Sam. xxiii, 34), and wife of Uriah. She was seduced by King David during the absence of her husband, who was then engaged at the siege of Rabbah (2 Sam. xi, 4, 5; Psa. li, 2). B. C. 1035. The child thus born in adultery became ill and died (2 Sam. xii, 15-18). After the lapse of the period of mourning for her husband, who was slain by the contrivance of David (xi, 15), she was legally married to the king (xi, 27), and bore him Solomon (xii, 24; 1 Kings i, 11, ii, 13; comp. Matt. i, 6). It is probable that the enmity of Ahithophel toward David was increased, if not caused, by the dishonor brought by him upon his family in the person of Bath-sheba. The other children of Bath-sheba were Shimea (or Shammuah), Shobab, and Nathan, named in 2 Sam. v, 14; 1 Chron. iii, 5. When, in David's old age, Adonijah, an elder son by Hagith, attempted to set aside in his own favor the succession promised to Solomon, Bath-sheba was employed by Nathan to inform the king of the conspiracy (1 Kings i, 11, 15, 23). After the accession of Solomon, she, as queen-mother, requested permission of her son for Adonijah (q. v.) to take in marriage Abishag (q. v.) the Shunamite. B. C. 1015. This permission was refused, and became the occasion of the execution of Adonijah (1 Kings ii, 24, 25). See DAVID.

Bath-sheba is said by Jewish tradition to have composed and recited Prov. xxxi by way of admonition or reproof to her son Solomon on his marriage with Pharaoh's daughter (Calmet, Dict. s. v.; Corn. a Lapid, on Prov. xxxi). The rabbins describe her as a woman of vast information and a highly-cultivated mind, to whose education Solomon owed much of his wisdom and reputation, and even a great part of the practical philosophy embodied in his Proverbs (q. v.).

A place is still shown at Jerusalem, called "the Pool of Bath-sheba," as being the spot where she was seen bathing by David, but it is an insignificant pit, evidently destitute of any claim to antiquity (Biblioth. Sacra, 1843, p. 33).—Kitté, s. v.; Smith, s. v.

Bath'-shuā, a variation of the name of BATH-SHEUA (q. v.), mother of Solomon, occurring only in 1 Chr. iii, 5. It is perhaps worth notice that Shua was a Canaanite name (comp. 1 Chr. ii, 3, and Gen. xxxviii, 2, 12, where "Baths-hua" is really the name of Judah's wife), while Bath-sheba's original husband was a Hittite.

Bathurst, Henry, LL.D., bishop of Norwich, England, was born in 1741, and was educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford. He was made canon of Christ Church, Oxford, 1775; and bishop of Norwich, 1805. He died in London, 1837. His publications were few, consisting of Charges to his clergy, occasional Sermons, and a Letter to Wilberforce, 1818. His Memoirs, by Archdeacon Bathurst, appeared in 1837, 2 vols., 8vo; with Supplement in 1842, 8vo.—Darling, Cyc. Bib. i, 202; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 141.

Bathurst, Ralph, an English physician and divine, was born in Northampton, 1620. Having studied physic, he was made a naval surgeon under Cromwell; but after the return of Charles II he gave himself to divinity, and was appointed chaplain to the king. In 1661 he was elected president of Trinity College; in 1670, dean of Wells; in 1673, vice-chancellor of the University of Oxford; in 1688, president of the Royal Society. In 1691 he refused the see of Bristol; died in 1704. He published Prælectiones de Respiratione, 1654; News from the Deal (an account of Anne Green, executed in 1650, and restored to life), 1651, 4to; and several Latin poems.—Warton, Life of Bathurst, 1761, 8vo; New Gen. Biog. Dict. ii, 84.

Bath-zachari'as (Βαθζαχαρία v. r. Josephus Βαζαχαρία; for the Heb. בִּזְחָרְיָהוּ Beth-zachariah), a place named only in 1 Macc. vi, 32, 33, to which Judas Maccabæus marched from Jerusalem, and where he encamped for the relief of Bethsur (Bethzur) when the latter was besieged by Antiochus Emperor. The two places were seventy stadia apart (Joseph. Ant. xii, 9, 4), and the approaches to Bath-zacharias were intricate and confined (Joseph. War. i, 1, 5; and compare the passage cited above, from which it is evident that Josephus knew the spot). This description is met in every respect by the modern Beit-Sakrieh, which has been discovered by Robinson at nine miles north of Beit-Sur, "on an almost isolated promontory or tell, jutting out between two deep valleys, and connected with the high ground south by a low neck between the heads of the valleys, the neck forming the only place of access to what must have been an almost impregnable position" (Later Researches, p. 283, 284). The place lies in the entangled country west of the Hebron road, between four and five miles south of Hebron.—Smith, s. v. See BETHZUR.

Batman, STEPHEN, an English divine and poet, was born at Bruton, Somerset, in 1537, studied at Cambridge, became chaplain to Abp. Parker, and died in 1587. He published The Travayld Pilgrim, "an allegorico-theological romance" of human life (1569, 4to); A Crystal Glass of Christian Reformation (1569, 4to); Joyful News out of Helvetia, declaring the fall of the Popes Dignity (1570, 8vo); Treatise against Usury (1575, 8vo); Golden Book of the Leaden Gods (1577); The Doom, warning all men to Judgment (1581, 8vo).—*Rose, Biog. Battelle, GORDON, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Newport, Ohio, Nov. 14, 1814. He entered Marietta College in 1833, and graduated at Allegheny College in 1840. In 1842 he was licensed to preach; and from 1843 to 1851 he was head of an academy at Clarksburg, Va. Meanwhile he had been ordained deacon in 1847, and elder in 1849. From 1851 to 1869 he labored efficiently as preacher and presiding elder. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1856 and 1869. His influence in Western Virginia was very great, and on the breaking out of the rebellion in 1861, he was called to serve as visitor to the military camps. He was a member of the Convention which framed the Constitution of West Virginia, and to him, more largely than to any other man, is due the abolition of slavery in that region. In November, 1861, he was chosen chaplain of the 1st Va. Regiment, and continued in the service till his death of typhoid fever, Jan. 7, 1862.—Minutes of Conferences, 1863, p. 34.

Battering-ram (כָּר, kar, a lamb, Ezek. iv, 2; xxi, 22; and so Josephus, καρὸς, War. iii, 7, 19, where the instrument is described; but Sept. in the above passages distinctively βελόστασις; Targ. and Kimchi, כְּרִיבִי כְּרִיבִי), a military engine for forcing a breach in walls (comp. 1 Macc. xiii, 48), of very high antiquity, being in use by the Babylonians (Ezek. i, c.), and apparently still earlier by the Israelites in the siege of Abel-Beth-Maachah (2 Sam. xx, 15); it may have been one of the "engines" of war employed by Uzziah, king of Judah (2 Chron. xxvi, 15). This machine was a long beam of strong wood, usually oak. One end was made of iron, shaped like a ram's head, and when driven repeatedly and with great force against the wall of a city or fortification, either pierced it or battered it down (see Diad. Sic. xii, 28; Pliny, vii, 57, p. 416, ed. Harl.; Vitruv. x, 19 [13], 2). There were three kinds of battering-rams: (1.) One that was held in suspension, like a scale-beam, by means of cables or chains in a frame of strong timber. This must have been easy to work and of great power, as a very heavy body suspended in the air requires no great strength to move it with much force. (2.) In another kind of ram, the mighty instrument acted upon rollers, and its power appears to have been very great, although it must have been worked with more labor than the preceding. (3.) There was another ram, which was not suspended or mounted on rollers, but borne and worked by manual strength. The machine was generally covered by a movable shed or roof, which protected the men by whom it was worked. It has been calculated, that the momentum of a battering-ram 28 inches in diameter, 180 feet long, with a head of a ton and a half, weighing 41,112 pounds, and worked by a thousand men, would only be equal to a point-blank shot from a thirty-six pounder. The ram was used by Nebuchadnezzar against Jerusalem, and also by Titus, with terrible force, in the final destruction of that city (Ezek. and Josephus, ut sup.). It was a favorite method of attack by the Romans (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Aries), and no less so with the Babylonians (Layard's Nineveh, ii, 274). Battle (properly מִלְחָמָה, milchamah, πόλεμος). Though the Hebrews in their mode of conducting warlike operations varied somewhat in the course of ages, and are elsewhere shown to have been swayed by the practice of greater and more military nations, still, from the period when the institution of royalty gave rise to an organized system, it was a maxim to spare the soldiers all unnecessary fatigue before an engagement, and to supply them liberally with food. Their arms were enjoined to be in the best order, and when drawn up for battle they formed a line of solid squares of a hundred men, each square being ten deep, and with sufficient interval between to allow of facility in movements, and the slingers to pass through. The archers may have occupied the two flanks, or formed in the rear, according to the intentions of the commander on the occasion; but the slingers were always stationed in the rear until they were ordered forward to impede a hostile approach, or to commence the engagement, somewhat in the manner of modern skirmishers. Meantime, while the trumpets waited to sound the last signal, the king, or his representative, appeared in his sacred dress (rendered in our version "the beauty of holiness"), except when he wished to remain unknown, as at Megiddo (2 Chron. xxxv, 22); and proceeded to make the final dispositions, in the middle of his chosen braves, attended by priests, who, by their exhortations, animated the ranks within hearing. It was now, we may suppose, when the enemy was at hand, that the slingers would be ordered to pass between the intervals of the line of solid squares, open their order, and with shouts, let fly their stone or leaden missiles, until, by the gradual approach of the opposing fronts, they would be hemmed in, and be recalled to the rear or to cover a flank. Then would come the signal to charge, and the great shout of battle; the heavy infantry, receiving the order to attack, would, under cover of their shields and levelled spears, press direct upon the front of the enemy; the rear ranks might then, if so armed, cast their second darts, and the archers from the rear shoot high, so as to pitch the arrows over their own main line of spearmen into the dense masses beyond them. If the enemy broke through the intervals, we may imagine that a line of charioteers in reserve, breaking from their position, might in part charge among the disordered ranks of the foe, drive them back, and facilitate the restoration of the oppressed masses, or, wheeling round a flank, fall upon the enemy, or be encountered by a similar manœuvre, and perhaps repulsed. The king, meanwhile, surrounded by his princes, posted close to the rear of his line of battle, and in the middle of the showered missiles, would watch the enemy and remedy every disorder. In this position it was that several of the sovereigns of Judah were slain (2 Chron. xviii, 33, and xxxv, 23), and that such an enormous waste of human life took place; for the shock of two hostile lines of masses, at least ten in depth, advancing under the confidence of breastplate and shield, when once engaged hand to hand, had difficulties of no ordinary nature to retreat; because the hindmost ranks, not feeling personally the first slaughter, would not, and the foremost could not, fall back; neither could the commanders disengage the line without a certainty of being defeated. The fate of the day was therefore no longer within the control of the chief, and nothing but obstinate valor was left to decide the victory. Hence, from the stubborn character of the Jews, battles fought among themselves were particularly sanguinary, such, for example, as that in which Jeroboam, king of Israel, was defeated by Abijah of Judah (2 Chron. xiii, 3, 17), where, if there be no error of copyists, there was a greater slaughter than in ten such battles as that of Leipsic, although on that occasion three hundred and fifty thousand combatants were engaged for three successive days, provided with all the implements of modern destruction in full activity. Under such circumstances, defeat led to irretrievable confusion; and where either party possessed superiority in cavalry and chariots of war, it would be materially increased; but where the infantry alone had principally to pursue a broken enemy, that force, laden with shields, and preserving order, could overtake very few who chose to abandon their defensive armor, unless they were hemmed in by the locality. Sometimes a part of the army was posted in ambush, but this manœuvre was most commonly practised against the garrisons of cities (Josh. viii, 12; Judg. xx, 38). In the case of Abraham (Gen. xiv, 16), when he led a small body of his own people suddenly collected, and fell upon the guard of the captives, released them, and recovered the booty, it was a surprise, not an ambush; nor is it necessary to suppose that he fell in with the main army of the enemy. At a later period, there is no doubt that the Hebrew armies, in imitation of the Romans, formed into more than one line of masses; but there is ample evidence that they always possessed more stubborn valor than discipline. —Kitto, s. v. Battle-axe (מַטְרֵן, mappets, breaker in pieces; Sept. and Vulg. render as a verb, διασκοπιζειν, collidis), a mallet or heavy war-club (Jer. li, 20; comp. the cognate מַטְרֵן, mappets, "mallet," Prov. xxv, 18). The ancient Egyptian battle-axes were of two kinds, both answering to this description, being adapted to inflict a severe blow by the weight no less than to cut with the edge. Each was a broad-axe with a semi-circular blade, that of the one being usually in two segments both attached to the handle as a back; and that of the other projecting beyond the handle, with a large ball attached to give it momentum (see figs. 12 and 7 in the first series of cuts under the art. ARMOR, and compare Wilkinson's Anc. Eg. i, 362, 363, abridgm.). See AXE; MAUL.

Battle-bow (קֶשֶׁת מִלְחָמָה, ke'sheth milchamah, bow of battle) occurs in Zech. ix, 10; x, 4, for the war-bow used in fighting. See ARMOR.

Among the Egyptians, on commencing the attack in the open field, at a signal made by sound of trumpet, the archers drawn up in line first discharged a shower of arrows on the enemy's front, and a considerable mass of chariots advanced to the charge; the heavy infantry, armed with spears or clubs, and covered with their shields, moved forward at the same time in close array, flanked by chariots and cavalry, and pressed upon the centre and wings of the enemy, the archers still galling the hostile columns with their arrows, and endeavoring to create disorder in their ranks (Wilkinson, i, 405, abridgmn.). See BATTLE.

Battlement (بَتْمَلْت, maskh'k, a bay; Sept. παράσις), a balustrade or wall surrounding the flat roofs of Oriental houses [see HOUSE], required by special enactment as a protection against accidents (Dout. xxii, 8). In Jer. v, 19, for בַּתְּמֹלֶת, nishothk', Umbels; Sept. ἐπαρτηγύματα, the parapet of a city wall; and so for ἐπαλξίς in Ezech. ix, 13.

Bauer, GEORG LORENZ, a distinguished German theologian in the second half of the eighteenth century, was born Aug. 14th, 1755, at Hiltboldstein, near Nürnberg; became in 1787 rector at Nürnberg, in 1789 Professor of Eloquence, Oriental Languages, and Ethics at the University of Altdorf, and in 1805 Professor of Eccegetical Theology and Oriental Literature at Heidelberg. He was also made a Church councillor by the government of B. den. He died Jan. 12th, 1816. Among his numerous writings, the following are the most important: Einleitung in die Schriften des Alten Testaments (Nürnberg, 3d ed. 1806);—Hermeneutica sacra V. T. (Leipzig, 1797);—Biblische Theologie des Neuen Test. (Leipzig, 1803-1805);—Lehrbuch der Hebräischen Altkämmer (2d ed. by Rosenmüller, Leipzig, 1835). He also continued Schulz's Scholia in V. T. (Nürnberg, 1790-94, vol. iv to viii) and Glasius's Theologia Sacra (Leipzig, 1793-97).

Baumgarten, SIEGMUND JACOB, an eminent German theologian, was born March 14, 1706, at Wollmirstädt. His early education was conducted by his father, James B., pastor at Wollmirstädt. He then studied at Halle, and, after filling several minor offices, was made professor of theology at Halle, 1734. His lectures were very popular, and he secured a still wider reputation by his writings. Educated in the school of Spener and Franke, he retained the forms of orthodoxy, but imbibed Wolff's philosophy, and taught in a far more scientific spirit than had characterized the pietistic school. He is regarded in Germany as the forerunner of rationalism, which, indeed, found its first free exponent among theologians in his disciple Semler. He died 1757. His writings, some of which are posthumous, are chiefly historical and exegetical; among these are Entwickel. d. Ausgung d. heil. Schrift. (Halle, 1742, 8vo);—Ausgung d. Briefe Pauli (Halle, 1749, 1767);—Lehrb. d. Glaubenslehre, ed. Semler (Halle, 1759, 6 v., 3 v. 1s., 1to);—Begriff d. d. d. Streitg. Leben, ed. Semler (Halle, 1771, 8vo);—Theolog. Gedanken (Halle, 1742-59, 7 vols., 8vo);—Geschichte d. Religionsparteien (Halle, 1755, 8vo);—Breviarium historicum Christi, in usum schol. (Halle, 1754, 8vo). Semler wrote a sketch of the life of Baumgarten, which contains a full list of his writings (Halle, 1758, 8vo).—Herzog, Real-Encyclop. i, 749; Kahnis, German. Protestantism, p. 115; Hurst, Hist. of Rationalism, ch. iv.

Baumgarten-Crusius, LUDWIG FRIEDRICH OTTO, an eminent German theologian, was born July 31, 1788, at Merselberg. He studied at the University of Leipsic, and in 1812 became professor extraordinarius of theology at Jena, after which his rise was steady. After a life of unwearied activity, both as lecturer and writer on various branches of theological science, he died suddenly, May 31, 1843, leaving a great reputation for talent, breadth of view, and industry. His principal works are Einleitung in das Stud. d. Dogmatik (Leipzig, 1820, 8vo);—Christliche Sittenlehre (Leipzig, 1826, 8vo);—Grundzüge d. Bibl. Theologie (Jena, 1828, 8vo);—Genüssen-freiheit, Rationalismus, etc. (Berlin, 1830, 8vo);—Lehrbuch d. christl. Dogmengeschichte (Jena, 1832, 8vo);—Compendium d. Dogmengeschichte (Leipzig, 1840; revised and finished by Hase, Jena, 1846, 2 vols., 8vo); also, posthumous, Exegetische Schriften zum N. T. (Jena, 1844-48, 3 vols., 8vo, covering the Synoptical Gospels, with Rom., Gal., Eph., Col., Phil., Thess.); and Theologische Auslegung d. Johannischen Schriften (Jena, 1843-1845, 2 vols., 8vo).—Herzog, Real-Encyclop. i, 741.

Baur, FERDINAND CHRISTIAN, a German theologian of marked influence on the German theology of the nineteenth century, was born June 21st, 1792; became, in 1817, Professor at the Theological Seminary of Blaubeuern, and in 1826 Professor of Evangelical Theology at the University of Tübingen. He died at Tübingen Dec. 3d, 1860. Baur is the author of numerous works on systematic and historic theology. At first he was regarded as a follower of Neander and Schleiermacher. But he afterward embraced Hegelianism, developed it into Pantheism, and for many years devoted the powers of his great intellect to the subversion of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. He went, step by step, farther from the positive Christian faith into Gnostic idealism, and in a series of writings endeavored to give an entirely new form to the representation of primitive Christianity. On his death-bed, the Pantheist, who had looked upon the idea of a personal God with contempt, prayed, "Lord, grant me a peaceful end." Baur is the founder of the so-called Tübingen school of theology, which farther developed his views, and gained a sad notoriety by its attacks on the authenticity of the books of the New Testament. Among his works on the New Testament, the following are the most important: Die sogenannten Pastoral Briefe des Apostels Paulus (Stuttg. 1835), in which he denies the authenticity of all Pauline epistles except those to the Galatians, Corinthians, and Romans:—Paulus, der Apostel Jesu Christi (Stuttg. 1845);—Kritische Untersuchungen über die kanon. Evangelien (Tüb. 1847), in which, in particular, the authenticity of the Gospel of John is attacked:—Das Marcus Evangelium nach seinem Ursprung und Charakter (Tüb. 1851). "In these and other works of a similar nature, Baur maintains that we must extend our notions of the time within which the canonical writings were composed to a period considerably post-apostolic, and which can only be determined approximately by a careful investigation of the motives which apparently actuated their authors." Another class of his works treat of the history of Christian doctrines and the history of the ancient church. Here belong: Das Monichische Religionsystem (Tüb. 1831; one of his best works):—Apollonius von Tyana und Christus (Tüb. 1823):—Die christliche Gnosis oder die christliche Religionsphilosophie (Tüb. 1835) (The Christian Gnosis, or the Christian Philosophy of Religion), a work which makes the Christian Gnosis of the 2d and 3d centuries the starting-point of a long series of religio-philosophical productions traceable uninterruptedly down through Middle-age mysticism and theosophy to Schelling, Hegel, and Schleiermacher:—Über den Ursprung des Episcopats in der christlichen Kirche (Tüb. 1838):—Die christliche Lehre von der Versöhnung (Tüb. 1839):—Die christliche Lehre von der Dreieinigkeit und Menschwerdung Gottes (Tüb. 1841–43, 3 vols.):—Die Epochen der kirchlichen Geschichtsschreibung (Tüb. 1852):—Das Christenthum und die christliche Kirche der drei ersten Jahrhunderte (Tüb. 1853; 2d edit. 1860):—Die christliche Kirche vom Anfange des vierten bis zum Ende des sechsten Jahrhunderts (Tüb. 1859):—Lehrbuch der christl. Dogmengeschichte (Tüb. 2d ed. 1858). Against the famous Symbolism of Möhler, he wrote, Der Gegensatz des Katholicismus und Protestantismus (Tüb. 2d ed. 1836), and Erwiderung gegen Möhler's neueste Polemik (Tüb. 1834). On the results of the works of the Tübingen school in general, he wrote an epistle to Dr. Hase of Jena, An Dr. K. Hase (Tüb. 1855), and Die Tübingen Schule (Tüb. 1859). Professor Baur left behind him several works on the church history of the Middle Ages and of modern times nearly completed, and they have been published by his son, F. F. Baur, and Prof. E. Zeller, viz.: Die christliche Kirche des Mittelalters in den Hauptmomenten ihrer Entwicklung (ed. by F. F. Baur, Tüb. 1861); Kirchengeschichte des 19ten Jahrhunderts (edit. by E. Zeller, Tüb. 1862); Kirchengeschichte der neuern Zeit von der Reformation bis zum Ende des 18ten Jahrhunderts (ed. by F. F. Baur, Tüb. 1863). Together with the two volumes published by Prof. Baur himself on the history of the Christian Church, from its beginning to the end of the 6th century, these three posthumous works constitute a complete course of historical works, extending over the entire history of the Christian Church. His latest volumes of church history gave great offence by his severe criticism on the different schools of German theology since Schleiermacher. Another work left by Professor Baur and published by his son is a course of Lectures on the Theology of the New Testament (Vorlesungen über neutestamentliche Theologie, Leipzig, 1864), in which the author more than in any of his other works develops his views of the teaching of Jesus, and of the doctrinal difference which he assumes to have existed between the different apostles. The latest of these posthumous issues is Vorlesungen über die Christliche Dogmengeschichte (part I of vol. i, Leipzig, 1865). The work will consist of three volumes, the first of which will embrace the doctrines of the ancient Church, the second those of the Church of the Middle Ages, and the third those of the Church of modern times. Part I extends over the period from the apostolical age to the Synod of Nice. In point of extent and completeness this work of Baur will take rank among the foremost works in this department of German theology.—Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, Supplem. vol. i; Fisher, Essays on the Supernatural Origin of Christianity, 131–285; Ilgen's Zeitschrift, 1866, 131; Chambers's Encyclopædia, i, 759. Bausset, LOUIS FRANÇOIS DE, a French cardinal, born at Pondicherry Dec. 14, 1748, died June 21, 1824. Having finished his theological studies in the seminary of Saint Sulpice, he obtained an appointment in the diocese of Frejus. In 1770 he was deputed to the assembly of the clergy, and in 1784 consecrated bishop of Alais. He was sent by the Estates of Languedoc to the two assemblies of notables in 1787 and 1788. In 1791 he adhered to the protest of the French bishops against the civil constitution of the French clergy. Soon after he emigrated, but in 1792 he returned to Paris, where he was put in prison. Being set free on the 9th of Thermidor, he devoted himself entirely to literature. In 1806 he obtained a canonry at the chapter of St. Denis. Abbé Emery having handed over to him all the manuscripts of Fénelon, he undertook to write the history of Fénelon. This work (Histoire de Fénelon, 1808–9, 3 vols. 8vo) established the editor's literary reputation, and in 1810 procured for him the second decennial prize. Bausset compiled on the same plan the Histoire de Bossuet (Paris, 4 vols. 8vo, 1814), which, however, did not meet with an equally favorable reception. When the Council of the University of Paris was reorganized, Bausset was appointed a member. On the return of Louis XVIII he was appointed president of this council, but this position he lost during the "Hundred Days." After the second restoration he entered the Chamber of Peers; in 1816 he became a member of the French Academy; in 1817 he received the cardinal's hat, and was minister of state. Besides the histories of Fénelon and Bossuet, Bausset wrote biographical essays on the Cardinal of Boisgelin (1804); on Abbé Legeis-Duval (1820); on Archbishop Talleyrand, of Paris (1821); and on the Duke of Richelieu, the latter of which was read in the Chamber of Peers by the Duke of Pastoret on June 8, 1822. Against the civil constitution of the clergy he compiled, in 1796, conjointly with Abbé Emery, a pamphlet entitled Réflexions sur la Déclaration exigée des Ministres du culte par la loi du 7 Vendémiaire an IV. In 1797, this pamphlet, with additions, was again published under the title Exposé du principe sur le Serment de Liberté et d'Égalité, et sur la déclaration, etc. See Hoefer, Biographie Générale, iv, 834; M. de Villeuve, Notice historique sur le Cardinal de Bausset (Marseille, 1824); G., Notice sur Bausset (Marseille, 1824, 8vo); De Quélen, Discours sur Bausset.

Bavaria, a kingdom in South Germany. Its area in 1864 was 29,637 square miles, and its population 4,807,440. In consequence of the war with Prussia in 1866, Bavaria had to cede to that power a district containing about 33,000 inhabitants. See GERMANY.

1. Church History.—As the Romans had numerous settlements near the Danube, Christianity was introduced into that part of the modern Bavaria earlier than into most of the other German countries. In the second century, a certain Bishop Lucius, of Rhatia, is said to have preached at Augsburg and Ratislon. In 304 St. Afra suffered martyrdom at Augsburg, which shows the existence of a Christian congregation at that city. Under the rule of the Christian emperors Christianity soon gained the ascendancy, but pagans were found as late as the second half of the fifth century. In the middle of the fifth century, St. Valentin, an itinerant bishop of the two Rhetias, is known to have preached and labored as a missionary at Passau, and to have been driven away by the pagans and Arians. About the same time St. Severin (454-482), a zealous combatant against Arianism, preached at Passau and Kunzing. The people to whom he preached were, according to the testimony of his disciple and biographer Eugippius, nearly all Catholics; but the tribes of the Alemanni, Herulians, and others, which, after the death of Attila, roamed through the Danubian countries, were either pagans or Arians. Severin established, in many of the places where he worked as a missionary, monasteries. Another part of Bavaria, which belonged to the Roman province of Noricum, early had a centre of missionary operations in the celebrated convent of Lorch. St. Maximilian, probably an itinerant bishop, who died about 288, and St. Florian, a Roman officer, who suffered martyrdom in 304, are among those of whose lives and deaths we have some information. Among the missionaries who, in the seventh and eighth centuries, labored there, were Boniface, Rupert, Emmeran, Sturm, Corbinian, and Willibald. In the eighth century, Passau, Freising, Würzburg, Regensburg, Augsburg, Eichstätt, and Neuburg had bishops, at the head of the church was the archbishop of Salzburg. A large number of rich cloisters arose. The Reformation found early adherents. Many priests, and also the diet, declared themselves in favor of it. But after Luther had been put under the ban at the Diet of Worms in 1521, the Duke of Bavaria was foremost among the princes of Germany in opposing and persecuting it, and a number of clergymen and laymen were put to death. The dukes remained ever after, in the councils of the German princes, the foremost champions of the Roman Church. In 1549 the Jesuits were called to Bavaria, though the number of Protestants was still so great that the diet demanded again, in 1553, "the introduction of their pure doctrine." The dukes, in order to suppress Protestantism more effectually, demanded from every officer of the state a confession of faith. In 1609 Duke Maximilian founded the "Catholic League," whose influence was so disastrous to the Protestant interests in Southern Germany. A better era for Protestantism and for religious liberty commenced under Maximilian Francis I, who took from the Jesuits the censorship of books, reformed the convents, and improved the educational system. At the close of the 18th century Maximilian Joseph II and his minister Montgelas introduced religious toleration and suppressed a large number of convents. At this time Bavaria received a number of possessions which, from the beginning of the Reformation, had been wholly or prominently Protestant. Among these were the margraviates of Anspach and Bairouth, and the free cities of Nürnberg, Nördlingen, Augsburg, and others. The constitution of 1818 gave to the Protestants equal rights with the Roman Catholics. The year before the king had concluded a concordat with the pope, by which the Roman Catholic Church was divided into 2 archbishoprics and 6 bishoprics. See CONCORDAT. Under the reign of Louis I (1825-1849) the ultramontane party made many attempts to curtail the constitutional rights of Protestants, and were partly successful under the ministry of Abel (1837 to 1847). The Protestants complained especially of a decree by which all soldiers, without distinction of religion, were ordered to kneel before the Host. Their remonstrances against this decree were repeatedly supported by the Chamber of Representatives, but rejected by the Upper Chamber (Reichsrath). In 1848 the controversy was ended by a compromise, a military salutation of the Host being substituted for kneeling. The ultramontane party lost the favor of the king when the ministry resisted the demand for conferring the rank of nobility upon Lola Montez, and nine of the professors of Munich, who were regarded as leaders of the party (Dollinger, Philips, Hofer, Lassaulx, etc.), were removed. The successor of Louis, Maximilian II (1849-1861), never favored the schemes of the ultramontane party. In 1856 a great excitement sprang up in the Lutheran Church in consequence of several decrees of the supreme consistory concerning changes in the liturgy, mode of confession, catechism, hymn-books, etc., in which a large number of the laity feared Romanizing tendencies, and the supreme consistory had to allay the excitement by concessions and compromises. Against the German Catholic and Free congregations the government was for many years very severe. At the beginning of the movement the government instructed the police to treat it as high treason. Some rights were granted to them in 1848 and 1849, but revoked in 1851. In the Palatinate a union between the Lutheran and Reformed Church was introduced in 1818. Then Rationalism prevailed among the clergy; subsequently the evangelical party gained the ascendancy, and introduced orthodox books (catechism, hymn-book, etc.) instead of the former rationalistic ones. In 1860 the government removed, however, the orthodox heads of the Church (among whom was the celebrated theologian, Dr. Ebrard), and the Church of the Palatinate came again under the influence of the Liberal (Rationalistic) party. At the General Synod held in 1863 the Liberals had a five-sixths majority, and a revised Church Constitution proposed by them was adopted by all save six votes. At the annual meeting of the Liberal Protestant Association ("Protestantischer Verein"), it was reported that the association counted 18 000 members.

II, Ecclesiastical Statistics.—The Roman Catholic Church has 2 archbishoprics (Munich and Bamberg) and 6 bishoprics (Passau, Augsburg, Regensburg, Würzburg, Eichstätt, and Spire). The diocesan chapters consist of 1 provost, 1 dean, and 8 or 10 canons. The king nominates all the archbishops, bishops, and deans; the pope appoints the provosts. Convents are very numerous: there were, in 1856, 63 convents of monks with 951 members 40 convents of nuns with 882 persons, besides 45 houses of sisters of mercy, and 65 houses of poor school-sisters. The Jesuits have not been admitted. Theological faculties are connected with the universities of Munich and Würzburg, and every diocese has a theological seminary. Many of the state colleges are under the management of religious orders, especially of the Benedictines. There is still among the clergy a school which is strongly opposed to ultramontanism, and has friendly dispositions for all evangelical Protestants (see SAILER), but it is decreasing in number and influence. But, though less conciliatory toward Protestants, the Roman Catholic scholars continued to be too liberal for Rome. When, in 1863, Dr. Dollinger and Dr. Hanelberg called a meeting of Roman Catholic scholars of Germany, their conduct was censured by the pope on the ground that such meetings should only be called by the bishops. Two other members of the same faculty, Dr. Frohschammer, a writer on philosophical subjects, and Dr. Pichler, the author of the best Roman Catholic work on the history of the Eastern Church, had their works put on the Index. Dr. Frohschammer refused to submit, and openly defied the authority of the Congregation of the Index. The two archbishops and one bishop are members of the Upper Chamber (Reichsrath), and the lower clergy elects eleven members of the Chamber of Deputies. Romanist newspapers and journals are not very numerous, yet among them is one of the most important periodicals of the Roman Catholic Church, the Historisch-Politische Blätter, founded by Gorres and Philips. Among the Roman Catholic theologians and scholars of Bavaria in the nineteenth century, Dollinger, Haneberg, Franz von Baader (q. v.), and Görres (q. v.), are best known. The Roman Catholics form about two thirds of the total population, numbering about 3,300,000 souls, while the number of Protestants amounts to about 1,320,000.

The king, though a Roman Catholic, is regarded as the supreme bishop of the Protestant Church. He exercises the episcopal power through a supreme consistory at Munich, which consists of a president, four clerical and one lay councillor. Subordinate to it are two Lutheran provincial consistories, at Anspach and Baireuth, consisting of one director, two clerical and one lay councillors, and one consistory of the United Evangelical Church at Spire. The district of the former comprises the seven provinces on the other side of the Rhine, and contains 27 deaneries and 1036 parishes, of which seven are Reformed. The district of the latter is the Palatinate, with fourteen dioceses. In all the three consistorial districts the diocesan synods meet annually. The laity is represented at them, but not by deputies of their choice. The ecclesiastical boards select them from a number presented by the clergy or by the presbyteries. Every fourth year a general synod meets in each of the three districts. The two Lutheran general synods of Anspach and Baireuth were united into one in 1849 and 1853, but in 1857, the government, fearing excitement in discussion, ordered them again, contrary to the general wish of the Church, to be held separately. A theological faculty is connected with the University of Erlangen. The present faculty (1869) is known for its attachment to High Lutheran principles, and publishes one of the leading theological magazines of Germany, the Zeitschrift für Protestantismus und Kirche. The Palatinate has a few old Lutheran congregations. The highest court for the adjudication of the marriage affairs of Protestants is a commission (senate) of Protestant members of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Bamberg. The president of the supreme consistory of Munich is a member of the Upper Chamber of the Diet, and the lower clergy elect five deputies for the House of Representatives. Among the great Protestant theologians and scholars of the present century we mention Harless, Hofmann, Thomasius, Delitzsch, Schubert.—Buchner, Geschichte von Bayern aus den Quellen (Regensb. 1820-1855, 10 vols.); Zschokke, Bair. Geschichte (Aarau, 2d ed. 1821, 4 vols.); Matthes, Kirchliche Chronik.

Baxter, George Addison, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian divine, was born in Virginia in 1771, and educated at Liberty Hall, Lexington, of which institution he became principal in 1799. Having been licensed to preach two years before, he also became pastor of the Presbyterian congregation at the same place, which post he filled for over thirty years. He continued his connection with Liberty Hall, afterward Washington College, until 1829, and received the degree of D.D. in 1812. In 1832 he became Professor of Theology in the Union Theological Seminary, and there labored until his death in 1841. Dr. Baxter was the author of various sermons and essays.—Sprague, Annals, iv, 192.

Baxter, Richard, a celebrated Nonconformist divine, born at Rowton, in Shropshire, Nov. 12th, 1615, of pious and excellent parents. His early education was obtained under indifferent masters, so that he never in after life became an accurate scholar, although his unrivalled industry and talent made him a widely-learned man. Though not a graduate of either university, he was ordained by Mornborough, bishop of Worcester, and in 1640 became vicar of Kidderminster. He devoted himself to his work, and his labors were eminently successful. Not satisfied with correcting the more flagrant offences of the inhabitants, he visited them at their houses, gave them religious instruction in private, and became their friend as well as their pastor. By these means he wrought a complete change in the habits of the people. His preaching was acceptable to all ranks. Wherever he went, large audiences attended him; and, notwithstanding his feeble health, he preached three or four times a week. During the civil wars Baxter held a position by which he was connected with both the opposite parties in the state, and yet was the partisan of neither. His attachment to monarchy was well known; but the undisguised respect paid by him to the character of some of the Puritans made him and others, who were sincerely attached to the crown, objects of jealousy and persecution. During an ebullition of party excitement Baxter spent a few days in the Parliamentary army, and was preaching within sound of the cannon of the battle at Edge Hill. Not considering it safe to return to Kidderminster, he retired to Coventry, where he lived two years, preaching regularly. After the battle of Naseby in 1645, he passed a night on a visit to some friends in Cromwell's army, a circumstance which led to the chaplaincy of Colonel Whalley's regiment being offered to him, which, after consulting his friends at Coventry, he accepted. In this capacity he was present at the taking of Bridgewater, the sieges of Exeter, Bristol, and Worcester, by Colonels Whalley and Rainsborough. He lost no opportunity of moderating the temper of the champions of the Commonwealth, and of restraining them within the bounds of reason; but as it was known that the check proceeded from one who was unfriendly to the ulterior objects of the party, his interference was coolly received. After his recovery from an illness which compelled him to leave the army, we find him again at Kidderminster, exerting himself to moderate conflicting opinions. The conduct of Cromwell at this crisis exceedingly perplexed that class of men of whom Baxter might be regarded as the type. For the sake of peace they yielded to an authority which they condemned as a usurpation, but nothing could purchase their approbation of the measures by which it had been attained and was supported. In open conference Baxter did not scruple to denounce Cromwell and his adherents as guilty of treason and rebellion, though he afterward doubted if he was right in opposing him so strongly (see Baxter's Penitent Confessions, quoted in Orme). The reputation of Baxter rendered his countenance to the new order of things highly desirable, and accordingly no pains were spared to procure it. The protector invited him to an interview, and endeavored to reconcile him to the political changes that had taken place; but the preacher was unconvinced by his arguments, and boldly told him that "the honest people of the land took their ancient monarchy to be a blessing and not an evil." In the disputes which prevailed about this time on the subject of episcopal ordination, Baxter took the side of the Presbyterians in denying its necessity. With them, too, he agreed in matters of discipline and church government. He dissented from them in their condemnation of episcopacy as unlawful. On their great principle, namely, the sufficiency of the Scriptures to determine all points of faith and conduct, he wavered for some time, but ultimately adopted it in its full extent. Occupying as he did this middle ground between the Episcopalians and the Presbyterians, it was not very obvious with which of the two parties he was to be classed. Had all impositions and restraints been removed, there is every reason to suppose that he would have preferred a moderate episcopacy to any other form of church government; but the measures of the prelatical party were so grievous to the conscience that he had no choice between sacrificing his opinions or quitting their communion. He was, however, compelled to quit the army in 1657, in consequence of a sudden and dangerous illness, and returned to Worcester. From that place he went to London to have medical advice. He was advised to visit Tunbridge Wells; and after continuing at that place some time, and finding his health improved, he visited London just before the deposition of Cromwell, and preached to the Parliament the day previous to its voting the restoration of the king. He preached occasionally about the city of London, having a license from Bishop Sheldon. He was one of the Tuesday lecturers at Pinner's Hall, and also had a Friday lecture at Fetter Lane. In 1662 he preached his farewell sermon at Blackfriars', and afterward retired to Acton in Middlesex. In 1676 he built a meeting-house in Oxendon Street, and, when he had but once preached there, the congregation was disturbed, and Mr. Sedden, then preaching for him, was sent to the Gatehouse, instead of Baxter, where he continued three months. In 1682 Baxter was seized, by a warrant, for coming within five miles of a corporation, and his goods and books were sold as a penalty for five sermons he had preached. Owing to the bad state of his health, he was not at that time imprisoned, through the kindness of Mr. Thomas Cox, who went to five justices of the peace and made oath that Baxter was in a bad state of health, and that such imprisonment would most likely cause his death. In 1685 he was sent to the King's Bench by a warrant from the Lord Chief Justice Jeffries for some passages in his Paraphrase on the New Testament; but, having obtained from King James, through the good offices of Lord Powis, a pardon, he retired to Charter-house Yard, occasionally preached to large and devoted congregations, and at length died, December 8th, 1691, and was interred in Christ Church.

Baxter's intellect was rather acute than profound. He was one of the most successful preachers and pastors the Christian Church has seen. His mind was rich, discursive, and imaginative; qualities which fitted him admirably, in conjunction with his deep and ardent piety, to write books of devotional and practical religion. His Saint's Rest abounds in eloquent and powerful writing; perhaps no book except Kempis and Pilgrim's Progress has been more widely read or more generally useful.

Baxter's theology was of no school, but, on the whole, eclectic and undecided. In his Methodus Theologicæ et Cæteræ et Rebus optatione he sets forth a modified scheme of the Calvinistic doctrine of election. But the real author of the scheme, at least in a systematized form, was Camero, who taught divinity at Sumner, and it was unfolded and defended by his disciple Amyraldus, whom Curocleus refuted. See AMYRALDUS; CAMERO. Baxter says, in his preface to his Saint's Rest, "The middle way which Camero, Crocius, Martinus, Amyraldus, Davenant, with all the divines of Britain and Bremen in the Synod of Dort, go, I think is nearest the truth of any that I know who have written on these points."

(1.) Baxter first differs from the majority of Calvinists, though not from all, in his statement of the doctrine of satisfaction: "Christ's sufferings were not a fulfilling of the law's threatening (though he bore its curse notwithstanding), but a satisfaction for our not fulfilling the precept, and to prevent God's fulfilling the threatening on us. Christ paid not, therefore, the idem, but the consequens, or equivalens; not the very debt which we owed and the law required, but the ratum (else it were not strictly satisfaction, which is redditis æquivalentis [the rendering of an equivalent]); and (it being improperly called the paying of a debt, but properly a suffering for the guilty) the idem is nothing but supplicium obsequens [the punishment of the guilty individual]. In criminals, dominus solvit simul alind solvere [when another suffers, it is another thing also that is suffered]. The law knoweth no vicarius pæner [substitute in punishment]; though the law-maker may admit it, as he is above law; else there were no place for procurator, if the procurator's debt be paid and the law not relaxed, but fulfilled. Christ did neither obey nor suffer in any man's stead, by a strict, proper representation of his person in point of law, so as that the law should take it as done or suffered by the party himself; but only as a third person, as a mediator, he voluntarily bore what else the sinner should have borne. To assert the contrary (especially as to particular persons considered in actual sin) is to overthrow all Scripture theology, and to introduce all Antinomianism; to overthrow all possibility of pardon, and assert justification before we sinned or were born, and to make ourselves to have satisfied God. Therefore, we must not say that Christ died nostro loco [in our stead], so as to personate us, or represent our persons in law sense, but only to bear what else we must have borne."

(2.) This system explicitly asserts that Christ made a satisfaction by his death equally for the sins of every man; and thus Baxter essentially differs both from the higher Calvinists, and also from the Sublapsarians, who, though they may allow that the reprobate derive some benefits from Christ's death, so that there is a vague sense in which he may be said to have died for all men, yet they, of course, deny to such the benefits of Christ's satisfaction or atonement which Baxter contends for: "Neither the law, whose curse Christ bore, nor God, as the legislator to be satisfied, did distinguish between men as elect and reprobate, or as believers and unbelievers, de presenti vel de futuro [with regard to the present or the future]; and to impose upon Christ, or require from him satisfaction for the sins of one sort more than of another, but for mankind in general. God the Father, and Christ the Mediator, now dealth with no man upon the more rigorous terms of the first law (obey perfectly and live, else thou shalt die), but giveth to all much mercy, which, according to the tenor of that violated law, they could not receive, and calleth them to repentance in order to their receiving further mercy offered them. And accordingly he will not judge any at last according to the mere law of works, but as they have obeyed or not obeyed his conditions or terms of grace. It was not the sins of the elect only, but of all mankind fallen, which lay upon Christ satisfying; and to assert the contrary injuriously diminisheth the honor of his sufferings, and hath other desperate ill consequences."

(3.) The benefits derived to all men equally, from the satisfaction of Christ, he thus states: "All mankind, inmediatly upon Christ's satisfaction, are redeemed and delivered from that legal necessity of perishing which they were under (not by remitting sin or punishment directly to them, but by giving up God's jus puniendi [right of punishing] into the hands of the Redeemer; nor by giving any right directly to them, but per meram resultantiam [by mere consequence] this happy change is made for them in their relation, upon the said remitting of God's right and advantage of justice against them), and they are given up to the Redeemer as their owner and ruler, to be dealt with upon terms of mercy which have a tendency to their recovery. God the Father and Christ the Mediator hath freely, without any prerequisite condition on man's part, enacted a law of grace of universal extent in regard of its tenor, by which he giveth, as a deed or gift, Christ himself, with all his following benefits which he bestoweth (as benefactor and legislator); and this to all alike, without excluding any, upon condition they believe and accept the offer. By this law, testament, or covenant, all men are conditionally pardoned, justified, and reconciled to God already, and no man absolutely; nor doth it make a difference, nor take notice of any, till men's performance or non-performance of the condition makes a difference. In the new law Christ hath truly given himself with a conditional pardon, justification, and conditional right to salvation, to all men in the world, without exception."

ing himself to all alike in the conditional covenant, yet he never properly intended or purposed the actual justifying and saving of all, nor of any but those that come to be justified and saved; he did not, therefore, die for all, nor for any that perish, with a degree of resolution to save them, much less did he die for all alike, as to this intent. Christ hath given faith to none by his law or testament, though he hath revealed that to some he will, as benefactor and Dominus Absolutus [absolute Lord], give that grace which shall infallibly produce it; and God hath given some to Christ that he might prevail with them accordingly; yet this is no giving it to the person, nor hath he in himself ever the more title to it, nor can any lay claim to it as their due. It belongeth not to Christ as satisfier, nor yet as legislator, to make wicked refusers to become willing, and receive him and the benefits which he offers; therefore he may do all for them that is fore-expressed, though he cure not their unbelief. Faith is a fruit of the death of Christ (and so is all the good which we do enjoy), but not directly, as it is satisfaction to justice; but only remotely, as it proceedeth from that jus dominii [right of dominion] which Christ has received to send the Spirit in what measure and TO WHOM HE WILL, and to succeed it accordingly; and as it is necessary to the attainment of the farther ends of his death in the certain gathering and saving of THE ELECT."

(5) Thus the whole theory amounts to this, that, although a conditional salvation has been purchased by Christ for all men, and is offered to them, and all legal difficulties are removed out of the way of their pardon as sinners by the atonement, yet Christ hath not purchased for any man the gift of FAITH, or the power of performing the condition of salvation required; but gives this to some, and does not give it to others, by virtue of that absolute dominion over men which he has purchased for himself, so that, as the Calvinists refer the decree of election to the sovereignty of the Father, Baxter refers it to the sovereignty of the Son; one makes the decree of reprobation to issue from the Creator and Judge, the other from the Redeemer himself. The Baxterian theory, with modifications, is adopted by many of the English and American Congregationalists, New School Presbyterians, and United Presbyterians of Scotland.

Baxter's chief English works are, 1. A Narration of his own Life and Times;—2. The Saint's Everlasting Rest;—3. A Paraphrase on the New Testament;—4. A Call to the Unconverted (of which twenty thousand copies were sold in one year, and which has been translated into every European language);—5. Lying Thoughts;—6. The Poor Man's Family Book;—7. The Reformed Pastor. He also wrote several books in Latin; among them—1. Epistola de generali omnium Protestantium unione adversus Populum;—2. Dissertatio de baptismo Infantum e Scriptura demonstrato;—3. Catechismus Quakerianus;—4. De Regimine Ecclesie;—5. De Republica Sancta (against the Oceana of Harrington);—6. De Universali Redemptione, contra Calvinum et Bezaum;—7. Historia Conciliorum, etc. etc. In all, he is said to have composed one hundred and forty-five works in folio, and sixty-three in 4to, besides a multitude of more trifling writings. The list prefixed to Orme's Life of Baxter includes 168 treatises. His Practical Works were reprinted in 1850 (London, 23 vols. 8vo); his controversial writings have never been fully collected, and many of them are very scarce. His fame chiefly rests on his popular works, and on his Methodus Theologorum and Catholic Theology, in which his peculiar views are embodied. Baxter left behind him a Narrative of the most Memorable Passages of his Life and Times, which was published in a folio volume after his death (1696) by Sylvester, under the title Reliquie Baxterianae. It is here that we find that review of his religious opinions written in the latter part of his life, which Coleridge speaks of as one of the most remarkable pieces of writing that have come down to us. See Fisher's articles in Bibl. Sacra, ix, 135, 300; and reprint of Baxter's End of Controversy in *Bibl. Bay (בַּי, lashon', tongue; Sept. λογία) is spoken of the cove or estuary of the Dead Sea, at the mouth of the Jordan (Josh. xv, 5; xviii, 19), and also of the southern extremity of the same sea (xv, 2), forming the boundary points of the tribe of Judah. De Sauley, however, contends (Narrative, i, 250) that by this term are represented, respectively, the two extreme points of the peninsula jutting into the lake on the opposite shore, which he states still bears the corresponding Arabic name Lissan. But this would confine the territory of Judah to very narrow limits on the east, and the points in question are expressly stated to be portions of the sea (and not of the land, as the analogy of our phrases "tongue of land," etc., would lead us to suppose), one of them being in fact located at the very entrance of the Jordan. Moreover, the same term (in the original) is used with reference to the forked mouths of the Nile ("the tongue of the Egyptian Sea," Isa. xi, 15) as affording an impediment to travellers from the East. See DEAD SEA.

Bay is the color assigned in the English version to one of the span of horses in the vision of Zechariah (vi, 3, 7). The original has בַּיִם, amutsim', strong (Sept. ψαφοί), and evidently means fleet or swift. In ver. 7 it appears to be a corruption for בַּיִם, adamim', red, as in ver. 2.

Bay-tree (בַּיִם, erach', notice; Sept. αἰ κίεος τοῦ Λιβάνου, apparently by mistake for בַּיִם) occurs only once in Scripture as the name of a tree, namely, in Psa. xxxvii, 35; "I have seen the wicked in great power, spreading himself like a green bay-tree;" where some suppose it to indicate a specific tree, as the laurel; and others, supported by the Sept. and Vulg. the cedar of Lebanon. It is by some considered to mean an evergreen tree, and by others a green tree that grows in its native soil, or that has not suffered by transplanting, as such a tree spreads itself luxuriantly (so Gesenius, Theol. Heb. s. v. in accordance with the etymology). Others, again, as the unknown author of the sixth Greek edition, who is quoted by Celsus (i, 194), consider the word as referring to the "indigenous man" in the sense of self-sufficiency; and this opinion is adopted by Celsus himself, who states that recent interpreters have adopted the laurel or bay-tree for no other reason than because it is an evergreen. Sir Thomas Browne, indeed, says, "As the sense of the text is sufficiently answered by this, we are unwilling to exclude that noble plant from the honor of having its name in Scripture." Isidore de Barrière, on the contrary, concludes that the laurel is not mentioned in Scripture because it has been profaned by Gentile fables. But the abuse of a thing should not prevent its proper use; and if such a principle had been acted on, we should not have found in Scripture mention of any trees or plants employed by the Gentiles in their superstitious ceremonies, as the vine, the olive, and the cedar.—Kitto. Bayer, THEOPHILUS SIEGFRIED, was born in 1694 at Königsberg, where he acquired his first knowledge of the Oriental languages under Abraham Wolf. In 1726 he was called to St. Petersburg to fill the chair of Greek and Roman antiquities. He died Feb. 21, 1738. Among his numerous works are the following—1. Historia congregationis Cardinalium de Propaganda

Fid (Petersburg, 1721, 4to; a satire against the Church of Rome):—2. Vindiciae verborum Christi. Eñ, Eñ, Luma Sbaethmá (1717, 4to):—3. Historia Regni Græcorum Buctroni, etc. (1737); and many works relating to Chinese and Oriental literature.—Biog. Univ. iii, 603.

Bayle, PETER, was born at Carlat, formerly in the Comté de Foix. November 18th, 1647, his father being a Protestant minister. At the age of nineteen he was sent to the college at Pay-Laurens, where he studied from 1666 to 1669 with an ardor that permanently injured his health. Subsequently he was sent to Toulouse, where he put himself under the philosophical course of the Jesuits. The end of this was his conversion from Protestantism, but for a time only. In August, 1670, he made a secret abjuration of Catholicism, and went to Geneva, where he formed an acquaintance with many eminent men, and especially contracted a close friendship with James Basnage and Minutoli. At Geneva and in the Pays de Vaud he lived four years, supporting himself by private tuition. In 1674 he removed first to Rouen, and soon after to Paris. The treasures of the public libraries, and the easy access to literary society, rendered that city agreeable to him above all other places. He corresponded freely on literary subjects with his friend Basnage, then studying theology in the Protestant University of Sedan, who showed the letters to the theological professor, M. Jurien. By these, and by the recommendations of Basnage, Jurien was induced to propose Bayle to fill the chair of philosophy at Sedan, to which, after a public disputation, he was elected, November 2, 1675. For five years he seems to have been almost entirely occupied by the duties of his office. In the spring of 1681, however, he found time to write his celebrated letter on comets, in consequence of the appearance of the remarkable comet of 1680, which had excited great alarm among the superstitious. In 1681 the college at Sedan was arbitrarily suppressed by order of the king, and Bayle went to Rotterdam, where, in 1684, he was called to fill the same chair. Here he published his Critique générale de l'Histoire du Calvinisme de M. de Meibourg, a work admired for its ability by both Catholics and Huguenots, but nevertheless burnt by the hands of the hangman at Paris. About this time a work appeared called L'avis aux Réfugiés, a satirical work, which treated the Protestants with very little delicacy. This book Jurien (who had written unsuccessfully in opposition to the Critique générale above mentioned, and had, in consequence, imbibed a bitter hatred against Bayle) attributed to him; and although Bayle, in more than one Apologie, denied the imputation, succeeded so far in raising a belief that Bayle was the author, that in 1693 he was removed from his professorship at Rotterdam. Having now entire leisure, he commenced his great work, the Dictionnaire Historique et Critique, the first edition of which was published in 2 vols. fol. in 1696, and the second, much enlarged, in 1702. This edition, and that of 1720 (both in 6 vols. fol.), are esteemed the best. The last edition was published at Paris 1820, 23, 16 vols. The English edition of 1735, edited, with additions, by Birch and others for the London book-sellers, is more valuable than even the original work. This work was undertaken principally to rectify the mistakes and supply the omissions of Moréri, but gave great and just offence in many parts from the looseness of its language, its bold leaning toward Manichæism, and the captious sophistries which obscure the plainest truths and infuse doubts into the mind of the reader. Besides Jurien, two new enemies appeared on this occasion, Jaquelot and Leclerc, who both attacked Bayle's supposed infidelity. His controversy with them lasted until near the period of his death, which happened on the 28th of September, 1706, in his fifty-ninth year. Among his other works are, 1. Commentaire sur ces paroles de l'Evangile: C'entrains-les d'entrer (1684):—2. La Cabale chionérique (1691):—3.

Réponses aux Questions d'un Provincial (5 vols. 12mo, 1702, 1704):—4. Janua Celorum Reservata:—5. Selected Letters (best ed. 3 vols. 1725):—6. Entretiens de Maxime et de Thémiste; ou, Réponse à M. Leclerc (1706):—7. Opuscules, etc. His life was written by Des Maizeaux, in 2 vols. 12mo, 1722, and by Feneberg (Angsb. 1838). See Haag, La France Protestante, ii, 60-63; Rev. des deux Mondes, Dec. 1835; Landon, Eccle. Dict. i, 98.

Bayley, SOLOMON, a colored preacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Liberia. He was born a slave in Delaware, and, after cruel hardships, gained his freedom. He emigrated to Liberia about 1832, and, at the organization of the Conference in 1834, was returned supernumerary. He died at Monrovia in great peace on Oct., 1839. "Father Bayley was a good preacher. His language was good, his doctrine sound, and his manner forcible; his conversation was a blessing, and his reward is on high."—Mott, Sketches of Persons of Color; Minutes of Conferences, iii, 62.

Bayly, LEWIS, a Welsh prelate, was born at Caermarthen, and educated at Oxford. In 1616 he was consecrated bishop of Bangor. He died in 1632. He is worthy of mention for his Practice of Piety, one of the most popular religious works of the 17th and 18th centuries. It reached its 51st edition in 1714.

Bazaar, an Oriental "market-place." In the earlier times of the Jewish history it appears that the markets were held near the gates of towns, sometimes within, sometimes without, where the different kinds of goods were exposed for sale, either in the open air or in tents. See MARKET. But we learn from Josephus that in the time of our Saviour the markets, at least in cities, had become such as they now are in the East. These establishments are usually situated in the centre of the towns, and do not by any means answer to our notion of "a market"—which is usually appropriated to the sale of articles of food—for in these bazaars all the shops and warehouses of the town are collected, and all the trade of the city carried on, of whatever description it may be. In these also are the workshops of those who expose for sale the products of their skill or labor, such as shoe-makers, cap-makers, basket-makers, smiths, etc.; but every trade has its distinct place to which it is generally confined. Hence one passes along between rows of shops exhibiting the same kinds of commodities, and sometimes extending to the length of a moderate street. Other rows make a similar display of commodities of other sorts. The bazaar itself consists of a series of avenues or streets, with an arched or some other roof, to afford protection from the sun and rain. These avenues are lined by the shops, which are generally raised two or three feet above the ground upon a platform of masonry, which also usually forms a bench in front of the whole line. The shops are in general very small, and entirely open in front, where the dealer sits with great quietness and patience till a customer is attracted by the display of his wares. No one lives in the bazaar: the shops are closed toward evening with shutters, and the bazaar itself is closed with strong gates, after the shopkeepers have departed to their several homes in the town. It sometimes happens that a part of the bazaar consists of an open place or square, around which are shops under an arcade. When this occurs the shops are generally those of fruiterers, green-grocers, and other dealers in vegetable produce, the frequent renewals of whose bulky stock renders it undesirable that their shops should be placed in the thronged and narrow avenues. In these bazaars business begins very early in the morning—as soon as it is light. During the day it seems to be the place in which all the activities of the town are concentrated, and presents a scene remarkably in contrast with the characteristic solitude and quietness of the streets, which seem exhausted of their population to supply the teeming concourse which it offers. And this is partly true; for the market is the resort not only of the busy, but of the idle and the curious—of those who seek discussion, or information, or excitement, or who desire “to be seen of men;” and where, consequently, the exterior aspect of Oriental life and manners is seen in all its length, and breadth, and fulness.—Kitto, Pict. Bible, note on Mark vii, 32. See MERCHANT.

Baz'lith or Baz'lûth (Heb. Batslith' or Batsluth', בַּצְלִית׃ or בַּצְלִיּוֹת׃, nakedness; Sept. Βαζαλιθός), the head of one of the families of Nethinim that returned to Jerusalem from the exile (Ezra ii, 52; Neh. vii, 54). B.C. 536.

Bdellium (בְּדֵלְיִם, bedolach) occurs but twice in the Scriptures—in Gen. ii, 12, as a product of the land of Havilah, and Num. xi, 7, where the manna is likened to it and to hoar-frost on the ground. In the Sept. it is considered as a precious stone, and translated (Gen.) by ἀβραξ, and (Num.) by κρυσταλλός; while Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, and the Vulgate render it bdellium, a transparent aromatic gum from a tree. Of this opinion also is Josephus (Ant. iii, 1, 6), where he describes the manna—ὑποὶ τῶν ἀρωματιστῶν βέλλης, i. e. similar to the aromatic bdellium (Num. xi, 7). See MASSA. Reland supposes it to be a crystal, while Wahl and Hartmann render it beryl (reading בְּרִיָּת׃). The Jewish rabbins, however, followed by a host of their Arabian translators, and to whom Bochart (Hieroz. iii, 533 sq.) and Gesenius (Theaur. i, 181) accede, translate bdolach by pearl, and consider Havilah (q. v.) as the part of Arabia, near Catipha and Bahrein, on the Persian Gulf, where the pearls are found.

Those who regard bdolach as some kind of precious stone rest their argument on the fact that it is placed (Gen. ii, 12) by the side of “the onyx-stone” (שֹׁהַם, shoham), which is a gem occurring several times in the Scriptures, and that they are both mentioned as belonging to the productions of the land Havilah. But if this meaning were intended, the reading ought to be, “there is the stone of the onyx and of the bdellium,” and not “there is the bdellium and the stone of the onyx,” expressly excluding bdolach from the mineral kingdom. Those who translate bdolach by “pearl” refer to the later Jewish and Arabian ex-pouderers of the Bible, whose authority, if not strengthened by valid arguments, is but of little weight. It is, moreover, more than probable that the pearl was as yet unknown in the time of Moses, or he would certainly not have excluded it from the costly contributions to the tabernacle, the priestly dresses, or even the Urim and Thummim, while its fellow shoham, though of less value, was variously used among the sacred ornaments (Exod. xxv, 7; xxxv, 9, 27; xxxviii, 20; xxxix, 15). Nor do we find any mention of pearl in the times of David and Solomon. It is true that Luther translates בְּדֵלְיִם׃, pernitum (Prov. iii, 15; viii, 11; x, 25; xxxi, 10), by pearls, but this is not borne out by Lament. iv, 7, where it is indicated as having a red color. The only passage in the Old Test. where the pearl really occurs under its true Arabic name is in Esth. i, 6 (דָּר, dar); and in the N. T. it is very frequently mentioned under the Greek name μαργαρίτη. See PEARL. It is therefore most probable that the Hebrew bdolach is the aromatic gum bdellium, which issues from a tree growing in Arabia, Meha, and the Indies. Dioscorides (i, 80) informs us that it was called πέλεκυος or βόλλυρος, and Pliny (xii, 19), that it bore the names of brochum, malachium, and mallicom. The frequent interchange of letters brings the form very near to that of the Hebrew word; nor is the similarity of name in the Hebrew and Greek, in the case of natural productions, less conclusive of the nature of the article, since the Greeks probably retained the ancient Oriental names of productions coming from the East. Pliny's description of the tree from which the bdellium is taken makes Kämpfer's assertion (Amen. Ezot. p. 668) highly probable, that it is the sort of palm-tree (borassus glaberrimis, Linn. ci. 6, 3, Trigynia) so frequently met with on the Persian coast and in Arabia Felix.

The term bdellium, however, is applied to two gummy-resinous substances. One of them is the Indian bdellium, or falsa myrrh (perhaps the bdellium of the Scriptures), which is obtained from Amur's (balsamedendron?) Commiphora. Dr. Roxburgh (Flor. Ind. ii, 215) says that the trunk of the tree is covered with a light-colored pellicle, as in the common birch, which peels off from time to time, exposing to view a smooth green coat, which, in succession, supplies other similar exfoliations. This tree diffuses a grateful fragrance, like that of the finest myrrh, to a considerable distance around. Dr. Royle (Illust. p. 176) was informed that this species yielded bdellium; and, in confirmation of this statement, we may add that many of the specimens of this bdellium in the British Museum have a yellow pellicle adhering to them, precisely like that of the common birch, and that some of the pieces are perforated by spiny branches, another character serving to recognise the origin of the bdellium. Indian bdellium has considerable resemblance to myrrh. Many of the pieces have hairs adhering to them. The other kind of bdellium is called African bdellium, and is obtained from Hondolba Africana (Richard and Guillemin, Fl. de Senegal). It is a natural production of Senegal, and is called by the natives, who make tooth-picks of its spines, n'about. It consists of rounded or oval tears, from one to two inches in diameter, of a dull and waxy fracture, which, in the course of time, become opaque, and are covered externally by a white or yellowish dust. It has a feeble but peculiar odor, and a bitter taste. Pelletier (Ann. de Chim. lxxx, 39) found it to consist of resin, 59.0; soluble gum, 9.2; bassorin, 39.6; volatile oil and loss, 1.2. Resin of bellium (African bellium?) consists, according to Johnstone, of carbon, 40; hydrogen, 51; oxygen, 5. See Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v.—Kitto, s. v.

Beach, Abraham, D.D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Cheshire, Conn., 1719, graduated at Yale College 1757, passed from the Congregational to the Protestant Episcopal Church, and was ordained by the Bishop of London 1767. His first service was as missionary at Piscataqua, N. J., where he served up to the Revolution, when his church was shut up on account of the troubles of the time. In 1784 he was appointed assistant minister at Trinity Church, N. Y. In 1789 he was made D.D. by Columbia College. In 1813 he resigned his charge and retired to his farm on the Karitan, where he died, Sept. 11, 1828. He was a strict Episcopalian, and in 1783 opposed Dr. (afterward Bishop) White's proposal to organize the Church and ordain ministers without a consecrated bishop.—Sprague, Annals, v, 265.

Beach, John, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in 1709, and graduated at Yale College in 1721. For several years he served in the Congregational Church at Newtown, Conn., but in 1732 conformed to the Church of England, and was ordained by the Bishop of London in that year. He served as missionary at Newtown and Reading for 50 years, and died March 8, 1782. He published several tracts in favor of the Church of England, and a number of occasional sermons.—Sprague, Annals, v, 84.

Beacon (בֵּית־עֵד, to'ra), Isa. xxx, 17, in the margin in that place, and in the text in chap. xxiii, 23, and Ezek. xxvii, 5, rendered "mast." It probably signifies a pole used as a standard or "ensign" (מַעֲבָד, me), which was set up on the tops of mountains as a signal for the assembling of the people, sometimes on the invasion of an enemy, and sometimes after a defeat (Isa. v, 26; xi, 12; xviii, 3; lxii, 10). See BANNER.

Beads. Strings of beads are used in the Roman Church on which to count the number of paters or aves recited. They are generally supposed to have been invented by Peter the Hermit. The Saxon word bed means a prayer; it is the past participle of bidlan, avere, to bid. Bead-roll was a list of those to be prayed for in the Church, and a bedsman one who prayed for another. From this use beads obtained their name.—Berlier, s. v. Chapelet. See ROSARY.

Beale, Oliver, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Bridgewater, Mass., Oct. 13, 1777, converted 1800, and entered the itinerant ministry at Lynn, Mass., 1801. After filling several of the most important stations, he was presiding elder from 1806 to 1818; and during the next ten years, while effective, he was missionary at Piscataquis, and also presiding elder. He was made "sup-ramante" in 1833, and died at Baltimore Dec. 30, 1836. He was a devoted and successful minister, "and did more to plant Methodism in Maine than any other man" (Rev. T. Merritt), and, during his long and faithful service, became well known to the Church as a wise man and discreet counsellor. He was five times a delegate to the General Conference. Minutes of Conferences, ii, 493.

Beäll'ah (Heb. Be'alyah, בְּעֵלְיָהוּ, whose lord is Je-ehovah; remarkable as containing the names of both Baal and Jah; Sept. Baal'ah), one of David's thirty Benjamite heroes of the sling during his sojourn at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii, 5). B.C. 1034.

Be'äloth (Heb. Be'äloth, בְּעֵלוֹתַי, the plur. fem. of Baal, signifying prob. cities; Sept. Baalōw v. r. Balōw and Balmanāy), the name of two places.

1. A town in the southern part of Judah (i. e. in Simeon), mentioned in connection with Telem and Hazor (Josh. xv, 24); evidently different from either of the two places called Baalath (ver. 9, 29), but probably the same as the BAALATH-BEER (q. v.) of chap. xix, 8. Schwarz (Pa'est. p. 190) thinks it is a "Kulat de-Baal situated 7½ English miles S.E. of Telem and N.W. of Zapha;" but no such names appear on any modern map, and the region indicated is entirely south of the bounds of Palestine.

2. A district of Asher, of which Baanah ben-Hushai was Solomon's commissariat (1 Kings iv, 16, where the Auth. Vers. renders incorrectly "in Aloth," Sept. in Baalōw, Vulg. in Baloth); apparently "adjacent cities," i. e. the sea-coast, where the river Belcus (Βήλεος, Joseph. War. ii, x, 2) may be a trace of the name. See BELUS. Schwarz (Pa'est. p. 237) unnecessarily identifies it with Baal-gad or Laish.

Beam, the rendering in the Auth. Vers. of the following words: בֵּרֶךְ, é'reg, a web, Judg. xvi, 14; "shuttle," Job ii, 6; מַעֲוֵר, ma'ur, a yoke, hence a weaver's frame, or its principal beam, 1 Sam. xvii, 7; 2 Sam. xxi, 19; 1 Chron. xi, 23; xx, 5; גֵּב, geb, a board, 1 Kings vi, 9; סָבֵב, kaplūs, a cross-beam or girder (Sept. κιάθραος), Habak. ii, 11; מַעֲבָד, tselā, a rib, hence a joint, 1 Kings vii, 3; "board," vi, 15, 16; "plank," vi, 15; קֶרֶבֶת, karab, a cross-piece or rafter, 2 Kings vi, 2, 5; 2 Chron. iii, 7; Cant. i, 17; מַעֲבָד, ab, a projecting step, or architectural ornament like a moulding, answering for a threshold, 1 Kings vii, 6; "thick plank," Ezek. xli, 25; כֶּרֶתוֹחַ, kerthoch, hewed sticks of timber, 1 Kings vi, 36; vii, 2, 12; קֶרֶבֶת (in Pie), to jt beams, hence to frame, Neh. iii, 3, 6; Psa. civ, 3; of no Heb. word (being supplied in italics) in 1 Kings vi, 6; כֹּסֶקֶס, a stick of wood for building purposes, Matt. vii, 3, 4, 5; Luke vi, 41, 42. In these last passages, Lightfoot shows that the expressions of our Lord were a common proverb among the Jews, having reference to the greater sins of one prone to censure the small faults of another. The "note," κιάφος, may be understood as any very small dry particle, which, by lodging in the eye, causes distress and pain, and is here given as the emblem of lesser faults in opposition to a beam for the greater, as also in the parallel proverb, "Strain [out] a gnat and swallow a camel" (Matt. xxiii, 24).

Bean (בִּישָׁ, pol; Sept. κιάφος) occurs first in 2 Sam. xvii, 28, where beans are described as being brought to David, as well as wheat, barley, lentils, etc., as is the custom at the present day in many parts of the East when a traveller arrives at a village. So in Ezek. iv, 9, the prophet is directed to take wheat, barley, beans, lentils, etc. and make bread thereof. This meaning of the Heb. word is confirmed by the Arabic ful, which is applied to the bean in modern times, as ascertained by Forskal in Egypt, and as we find in old Arabic works. The common bean, or at least one of its varieties, we find noticed by Hippocrates and Theophrastus under the names of κιάφος ἑλληνικός, or "Greek bean," to distinguish it from κιάφος αἰγύπτιος, the "Egyptian bean," or bean of Pythagoras, which was no doubt the large farinaceous seed of Nelumbium speciosum (Theophr. Plant. iv, 9; Athen. iii, 73; comp. Link, Urech. i, 224; Billerbeck, Flor. Class. p. 139). Beans were employed as articles of diet by the ancients, as they are by the moderns, and are considered to give rise to flatulence, but otherwise to be wholesome and nutritious (comp. Fliny, xviii, 36). Beans are cultivated over a great part of the Old World, from the north of Europe to the south of India; in the latter, however, forming the cold-weather cultivation, with wheat, peas, &c. They are extensively cultivated in Egypt and Arabia. In Egypt they are sown in November, and reaped in the middle of February (three and a half months in the ground); but in Syria they may be had throughout the spring. The stalks are cut down with the scythe, and these are afterward cut and crushed to fit them for the food of camels, oxen, and goats. The beans themselves, when sent to market, are often deprived of their skins. Basnago reports it as the sentiment of some of the rabbins that beans were not lawful to the priests, on account of their being considered the appropriate food of mourning and affliction; but he does not refer to the authority; and neither in the sacred books nor in the Mishna (see Shebilth, ii, 5) can be found any traces of the notion to which he alludes (see Orth. Lec. Rab., p. 223). So far from attaching any sort of impurity to this legume, it is described as among the first-fruit offerings; and several other articles in the latter collection prove that the Hebrews had beans largely in use after they had passed them through the mill (Kitto, Phys. Hist. of Palest., p. cccxix). The paintings on the monuments of Egypt show that the bean was cultivated in that country in very early times (comp. Strabo, xv, 822), although Herodotus states (ii, 37; comp. Diog. Laert. viii, 34) that beans were held in abhorrence by the Egyptian priesthood, and that they were never eaten by the people (but see Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i, 23 abridgm.); but as they were cultivated, it is probable that they formed an article of diet with the poorer classes (comp. Horace, Sat. ii, 3, 182; ii, 6, 63); and beans with rice, and dhourra bread, are the chief articles of food at this day among the Fellah population. They are usually eaten steeped in oil. Those now cultivated in Syria and Palestine are the white horse-bean and the kidney-bean, called by the natives mash.—Kitto, s. v. Pod.

Be'an, CHILDREN OF (בְּנֵי בְאֵן; Josephus, viti roũ Bēavon, Ant. xii, 8, 1), a tribe apparently of predatory Bedouin habits, retreating into "towers" (πύργους) when not plundering, and who were destroyed by Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac. v, 4). The name has been supposed to be identical with BEON (Num. xxxii, 2); but this is a mere conjecture, as it is very difficult to tell from the context whether the residence of this people was on the east or west of Jordan.

Bear (בְּרִיָּה or בְּרִיָּה, dob, in Arabic dub, in Persian deeb and dob; Greek ἄρκτος) is noticed in 1 Sam. xvii, 34, 36, 37; 2 Sam. xvii, 8; 2 Kings ii, 24; Prov. xvii, 12; xxviii, 15; Isa. xi, 7; lix, 11; Lam. iii, 10; Hos. xliii, 8; Amos, v, 19; Dan. vii, 5; Wisd. xi, 17; Eccles. xlvii, 2; Rev. xiii, 2. Although some moderns have fended his flock from the attacks of a bear (1 Sam. xvii, 34, 35, 36), and bears destroyed the youths who mocked the prophet (2 Kings ii, 24). Its hostility to cattle is implied in Isa. xi, 7—its roaring in Isa. lix, 11—its habit of ranging far and wide for food in Prov. xxviii, 15—its lying in wait for its prey in Lam. iii, 10; and from 2 Kings ii, 24, we may infer that it would attack men. See ELISHA.

The genus Ursus is the largest of all the plantigrade carnassiers, and with the faculty of subsisting on fruit or honey unites a greater or less propensity, according to the species, to slaughter and animal food. To a silent and ferocious disposition it joins immense strength, little vulnerability, considerable sagacity, and the power of climbing trees. The brown bear, Ursus arctos, is the most sanguinary of the species of the Old Continent, and Ursus Syriacus, or the bear of Palestine, is one very nearly allied to it, differing only in its stature being proportionably lower and longer, the head and tail more prolonged, and the color a dull buff or light bay, often clouded, like the Pyrenean variety, with darker brown (Forskal, Descr. Anim. iv, 5, No. 21). On the back there is a ridge of long semierect hairs running from the neck to the tail. It is yet found in the elevated woody parts of Lebanon (Kitto, Phys. Hist. of Palest., p. cccly). In the time of the first Crusades these beasts were still numerous and of considerable ferocity; for during the siege of Antioch, Godfrey of Bouillon, according to Math. Paris, slew one in defence of a poor woodcutter, and was himself dangerously wounded in the encounter. See Penny Cyclopædia, s. v.

The sacred writers frequently associate this formidable animal with the king of the forest, as being equally dangerous and destructive; and it is thus that the prophet Amos sets before his countrymen the succession of calamities which, under the just judgment of God, was to befall them, declaring that the removal of one would but leave another equally grievous (v, 18, 19). Solomon, who had closely studied the character of the several individuals of the animal kingdom, compares an unprincipled and wicked ruler to these creatures (Prov. xxviii, 15). To the fury of the female bear when robbed of her young there are several striking allusions in Scripture (2 Sam. xvii, 8; Prov. xvii, 12). The Divine threatening in consequence of the numerous and aggravated iniquities of the kingdom of Israel, as uttered by the prophet Hosea, is thus forcibly expressed: "I will meet them as a bear bereaved of her whelps" (xiii, 8; see Jerome in loc.), which was fulfilled by the invasion of the Assyrians and the complete subversion of the kingdom of Israel. "The she-bear is said to be even more fierce and terrible than the male, especially after she has cubbed, and her furious passions are never more fiercely exhibited than when she is deprived of her young. When she returns to her den and misses the object of her love and care, she becomes almost frantic with rage. Disregarding every consideration of danger to herself, she attacks with great ferocity every animal that comes in her way, and in the bitterness of her heart will dare to attack even a band of armed men. The Russians of Kamtschatka never venture to fire on a young bear when the mother is near; for if the cub drop, she becomes enraged to a degree little short of madness, and if she get sight of the enemy will only quit her revenge with her life. A more desperate attempt can scarcely be performed than to carry off her young in her absence. Her scent enables her to track the plunderer; and unless he has reached some place of safety before the infuriated animal overtake him, his only safety is in dropping one of the cubs and continuing his flight; for the mother, attentive to its safety, carries it home to her den before she renews the pursuit" (Cook's Voyages, iii, 307).

In the vision of Daniel, where the four great monarchies of antiquity are symbolized by different beasts denied the existence of bears in Syria and Africa, there cannot be a doubt of the fact, and of a species of the genus Ursus being meant in the Hebrew texts above noted (Thomson, Laud and Book, ii, 373). David deof prey, whose qualities resembled the character of these several states, the Medo-Persian empire is represented by a bear, which raised itself up on one side, and had between its teeth three ribs, and they said thus unto it, "Arise, devour much flesh" (vii, 5). All the four monarchies agreed in their fierceness and rapacity; but there were several striking differences in the subordinate features of their character and their mode of operation, which is clearly intimated by the different character of their symbolical representatives. The Persian monarchy is represented by a bear to denote its cruelty and greediness after blood. Bochart has enumerated several points of resemblance between the character of the Medo-Persians and the disposition of the bear (Hieroz. i, 806 sq.). The variety of the Asiatic bear which inhabits the Himalayas is especially ferocious, and it is probable that the same species among the mountains of Armenia is the animal here referred to. The bear with seven heads and ten horns (Rev. xiii, 2) is described as having the feet of a bear. The bear's feet are his best weapons, with which he fights, either striking or embracing his antagonist in order to squeeze him to death, or to trample him under foot.

Beard (עָבָר, zahav; Gr. παργον). The customs of nations in respect to this part of the human countenance have differed and still continue to differ so widely that it is not easy with those who treat the beard as an incumbrance to conceive properly the importance attached to it in other ages and countries.

1. The ancient nations in general agreed with the modern inhabitants of the East in attaching a great value to the possession of a beard. The total absence of it, or a sparse and stunted sprinkling of hair upon the chin, is thought by the Orientals to be as great a deformity to the features as the want of a nose would appear to us; while, on the contrary, a long and bushy beard, flowing down in luxuriant profusion to the breast, is considered not only a most graceful ornament to the person, but as contributing in no small degree to respectability and dignity of character. So much, indeed, is the possession of this venerable badge associated with notions of honor and importance, that it is almost constantly introduced, in the way either of allusion or appeal, into the language of familiar and daily life. In short, this hairy appendage of the chin is most highly prized as the attribute of manly dignity; and hence the energy of Ezekiel's language when, describing the severity of the Divine judgments upon the Jews, he intimates that, although that people had been as dear to God and as fondly cherished by him as the beard was by them, the razor, i. e. the agents of his angry providence, in righteous retribution for their long-continued sins, would destroy their existence as a nation (Ezek. v, 1-5). With this knowledge of the extraordinary respect and value which have in all ages been attached to the beard in the East, we are prepared to expect that a corresponding care would be taken to preserve and improve its appearance; and, accordingly, to dress and anoint it with oil and perfume was, with the better classes at least, an indispensable part of their daily toilet (Psa. cxxxiii, 2). In many cases it was dyed with variegated colors, by a tedious and troublesome operation, described by Morier (Journ. p. 247), which, in consequence of the action of the air, requires to be repeated once every fortnight, and which, as that writer informs us, has been from time immemorial a universal practice in Persia. That the ancient Assyrians took equally nice care of their beard and hair is evident from the representations found everywhere upon the monuments discovered by Botta and Layard. From the history of Mephiboseth (2 Sam. xix, 24), it seems probable that the grandees in ancient Palestine "triumphed their beards" with the same fastidious care and by the same elaborate process; while the allowing these to remain in a foul and dishevelled state, or to cut them off, was one among the many features of sordid negligence in their personal appearance by which they gave outward indications of deep and overwhelming sorrow (Isa. xv, 2; Jer. xli, 5; comp. Herod. ii, 36; Suet. Caligula, 5; Theocrit. xiv, 3). The custom was and is to shave or pluck it and the hair out in mourning (Isa. i, 6; Jer. xlviii, 37; Ezra ix, 3; Bar. vi, 31). David resented the treatment of his ambassadors by Hanun (2 Sam. x, 4) as the last outrage which enmity could inflict (comp. Lucian, Cynic, 14). The dishonor done by David to his beard of letting his spittle fall on it (1 Sam. xxi, 13) seems at once to have convinced Achish of his being insane, as no man in health of body and mind would thus defile what was esteemed so honorable. It was customary for men to kiss one another's beards when they saluted, for the original of 2 Sam. xx, 9, literally translated, would read, "And Joab held in his right hand the beard of Amasa, that he might give it a kiss;" indeed, in the East, it is generally considered an insult to touch the beard except to kiss it (comp. Homer, Iliad, i, 501; x, 454 sq.). Among the Arabs, kissing the beard is an act of respect; D'Arvieux observes (Coutumes des Arabes, ch. 7) that "the women kiss their husbands' beards, and the children their fathers', when they go to salute them" (see Harmer, Obs. ii, 77, 83; iii, 179; Bohlen, Indien, ii, 171; Deyling, Obs. ii, 14; Lakemacher, Obs. x, 145; Tavernier, ii, 100; Niebuhr, Beschr. p. 317; Kitto, Pict. Bible, notes on 1 Sam. xxxi, 13; 2 Sam. x, 4; xix, 24; xx, 9; 1 Chron. xix, 4; Volney, ii, 118; Burekhardt, Arabia, p. 61; Lane, Mod. Egyptians, i, 322). See HARR.

The Egyptians, on the contrary, sedulously, for the most part, shaved the hair of the face and head, and compelled their slaves to do the like. Herodotus (i, 36) mentions it as a peculiarity of the Egyptians that they let the beard grow in mourning, being at all other times shaved. Hence Joseph, when released from prison, "shaved his beard" to appear before Pharaoh (Gen. xli, 14). Egyptians of low caste or mean condition are represented sometimes, in the spirit of caricature apparently, with beards of slovenly growth (Wilkinson, ii, 127). The enemies of the Egyptians, including probably many of the nations of Canaan, Syria, Armenia, etc., are represented nearly always bearded. The most singular custom of the Egyptians was that of tying a false beard upon the chin, which was made of plaited hair, and of a peculiar form, according to the person by whom it was worn. Private individuals had a small beard, scarcely two inches long; that of a king was of considerable length, square at the bottom; and the figures of gods were distinguished by its turning up at the end (Wilkinson, iii, 362). No man ventured to assume, or affix to his image, the beard of a deity; but after their death, it was permitted to substitute this divine emblem on the statues of kings, and all other persons who were judged worthy of admittance to the Elysium of futurity, in consequence of their having assumed the character of Osiris, to whom the gods of the pure returned on quitting their earthly abode. The form of the beard, therefore, readily distinguishes the figures of gods and kings in the sacred subjects of the temples; and the allegorical connection between the sphinx and the monarch is pointed out by its having the kingly beard, as well as the crown and other symbols of royalty (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. suppl. plate 77, pt. ii).

From the above facts, it is clear that the Israelites maintained their beard and the ideas connected with it during their abode among the Egyptians, who were to a shaven people. This is not unimportant as one of the indications which evince that, whatever they learned of good or evil in that country, they preserved the appearance and habits of a separate people. As the Egyptians shaved their beards off entirely, the injunction in Lev. xix, 27, against shaving "the corners of the beard" must have been levelled against the practices of some other bearded nation. The prohibition is usually understood to apply against rounding the corners of the beard where it joins the hair; and the reason is supposed to have been to counteract a superstition of certain Arabian tribes, who, by shaving off or rounding away the beard where it joined the hair of the head, devoted themselves to a certain deity who held among them the place which Bacchus did among the Greeks (Herodot. iii, 8; comp. Jer. ix, 26; xxv, 23; xlix, 32). The consequence seems to have been altogether to prevent the Jews from shaving off the edges of their beards. The effect of this prohibition in establishing a distinction of the Jews from other nations cannot be understood unless we contemplate the extravagant diversity in which the beard was and is treated by the nations of the East. See CORNER. The removal of the beard was a part of the ceremonial treatment proper to a leper (Lev. xiv, 9). There is no evidence that the Jews compelled their slaves to wear beards otherwise than they wore their own; although the Romans, when they adopted the fashion of shaving, compelled their slaves to cherish their hair and beard, and let them slave when manumitted (Liv. xxxiv, 52; xlv, 44).—Kitto; Smith; Winer.

In 2 Sam. xix, 24, the term rendered "beard" is in the original שֵׁפָתַי, sofham', and signifies the mustache (being elsewhere rendered "upper lip"), which, like the beard, was carefully preserved.

II. The 44th canon of the council of Carthage, A.D. 398, according to the most probable reading, forbids clergymen to suffer the hair of their heads to grow too long, and at the same time forbids to shave the beard.

Chericus nec comam nutriat nec barbam radat. According to Gregory VII, the Western clergy have not worn beards since the first introduction of Christianity; but Bingham shows this to be incorrect.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. vi, ch. iv, § 15.

Beard, THOMAS, the "protomartyr of Methodism," was one of Mr. Wesley's first assistants. In 1744, during the fierce persecutions waged against the Methodists, he was torn from his family and sent away as a soldier. He maintained a brave spirit under his sufferings, but his health failed. He was sent to the hospital at Newcastle in 1774, "where," says Wesley, "he still praised God continually." His fever became worse, and he was bled, but his arm festored, mortified, and had to be amputated. A few days later he died. Charles Wesley wrote the hymn Soldier of Christ, adieu! as a tribute to the memory of Beard.—Wesley, Works, iii, 317; Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, i, 210; Atmore, Memorial, p. 46.

Beasley, FREDERICK, D.D., was born in 1777, near Edenton, N. C. After graduating at Princeton, 1797, he remained there three years as tutor, studying theology at the same time. In 1801 he was ordained deacon, in 1802 priest; in 1803 he became pastor of St. John's, Elizabethtown; in the same year he was transferred to St. Peter's, Albany, and in 1809 to St. Paul's, Baltimore. In 1813 he became provost of the University of Pennsylvania, which office he filled with eminent fidelity and dignity until 1828. He served St. Michael's, Trenton, from 1829 to 1836, when he retired to Elizabethtown, where he died, Nov. 1, 1845. His principal writings are, American Dialogues of the Deed (1815).—Search of Truth in the Science of the Human Mind (vol. i, 8vo, 1822; vol. ii left in MS.). He also published a number of pamphlets and sermons, and was a frequent contributor to the periodicals of the time.—Sprague, Annals, v, 479.

Beast, the translation of בְּהֵמָה, behemah', dumb animals, quadrupeds, the most usual term; also of בְּהֵמָה בְּעִיר', grazing animals, flocks or herds, Exod. xxii, 5; Num. xx, 4, 8, 11; Psa. lxxviii, 48; once beasts of burden, Gen. xlv, 17; בְּהֵמָה, chayy', Chaldee בְּהֵמָה, chayy', a wild beast, frequently occurring; בְּהֵמָה נֶפֶשׁ, ne'phesh, creature or soul, only once in the phrase "beast for beast," Levit. xxiv, 18; בְּהֵמָה, te'bach, slaughter, once only for edible beasts, Prov. ix, 2; and בְּהֵמָה קִירְאוֹת, kirkaroth', "swift beasts," i. e. dromedaries, Isa. ix, 20 [see CATTLE]; in the New Test. properly ζῷον, an animal; θηρίον, a wild beast, often; κτηνός, a domestic animal, as property, for merchandise, Rev. xviii, 13; for food, 1 Cor. xv, 39; or for service, Luke x, 34; Acts xxiii, 24; and σφάγιον, an animal for sacrifice, a victim, Acts vii, 42. In the Bible, this word, when used in contradistinction to man (Psa. xxxvi, 6), denotes a brute creature generally; when in contradistinction to creeping things (Lev. xi, 2-7; xxvii, 26), it has reference to four-footed animals; and when to wild mammalia, as in Gen. i, 25, it means domesticated cattle. טַיִם, בְּהֵמָה ("wild beasts," Isa. xiii, 21; xxxiv, 14; Jer. xl, 39), denotes wild animals of the upland wilderness. אֲנִימָה, בְּהֵמָה ("doleful creatures," Isa. xiii, 21), may, perhaps, with more propriety be considered as "poisonous and offensive reptiles." שְׂעִירִים, בְּהֵמָה, shaggy ones, is a general term for apes—not satyrs (Isa. xiii, 21; xxxiv, 14; much less "devils," 2 Chron. xi, 15), a pagan poetical creation unfit for Scriptural language; it includes שְׂמִימָה, בְּהֵמָה ("devils," Deut. xxxii, 17; Psa. cvi, 57), as a species. See APE. TANNIM, בְּהֵמָה, are monsters of the deep and of the wilderness—boas, serpents, crocodiles, dolphins, and sharks. See ANIMAL.

The zoology of Scripture may, in a general sense, be said to embrace the whole range of animated nature; but, after the first brief notice of the creation of animals recorded in Genesis, it is limited more particularly to the animals found in Egypt, Arabia, Palestine, Syria, and the countries eastward, in some cases to those beyond the Euphrates. It comprehends mammalia, birds, reptiles, fishes, and invertebrate animals. See each animal in its alphabetical order. Thus, in animated nature, beginning with the lowest organized in the watery element, we have first וְדוֹגְוֹת , SNUBRTS , "the moving creature that hath life," animalcula, crustacea, insecta, etc.; second, וְדוֹגְוֹת , TANINIM , fishes and amphibia, including the huge tenants of the waters, whether they also frequent the land or not, crocodiles, python-serpents, and perhaps even those which are now considered as of a more ancient zoology than the present system, the great Saurians of geology; and third, it appears, birds, וְעוֹפֹת , OPI , "flying creatures" (Gen. i, 20); and, still advancing (cetaceans, pinnipeds, whales, and seals being excluded), we have quadrupeds, forming three other divisions or orders: (1st.) cattle, וְבְהֵמַת , BEHEMAN , embracing the ruminant herbivora, generally gregarious and capable of domesticity; (2d.) wild beasts, וְחַיַּיִם , CHAYAY , carnivora, including all beasts of prey; and (3d.) reptiles, וְרֵמִים , REMES , minor quadrupeds, such as creep by means of many feet, or glide along the surface of the soil, serpents, annelides, etc.; finally, we have man, וְאָדָם , ADAM , standing alone in intellectual supremacy. The classification of Moses, as it may be drawn from Deuteronomy, appears to be confined to Vertebrata alone, or animals having a spine and ribs, although the fourth class might include others. Taking man as one, it forms five classes: (1st.) Man; (2d.) Beasts; (3d.) Birds; (4th.) Reptiles; (5th.) Fishes. It is the same as that in Leviticus xi, where beasts are further distinguished into those with solid hoofs, the solidopes of systematists, and those with cloven feet (bisulei), or ruminantia. But the passage specially refers to animals that might be lawfully eaten because they were clean, and to others prohibited because they were declared unclean, although some of them, according to the common belief of the time, might ruminate: for the Scriptures were not intended to embrace anatomical disquisitions aiming at the advancement of human science, but to convey moral and religious truth without disturbing the received opinions of the time on questions having little or no relation to their main object. The Scriptures, therefore, contain no minute details on natural history, and notice only a small proportion of the animals inhabiting the regions alluded to. Notwithstanding the subsequent progress of science, the observation of Dr. Adam Clarke is still in a great measure true, that "of a few animals and vegetables we are comparatively certain, but of the great majority we know almost nothing. Guessing and conjecture are endless, and they have on these subjects been already sufficiently employed. What learning—deep, solid, extensive learning and judgment could do, has already been done by the incomparable Bechart in his Herzoiwaen. The learned reader may consult this work, and, while he gains much general information, will have to regret that he can apply so little of it to the main and great question." The chief cause of this is doubtless the general want of a personal and exact knowledge of natural history on the part of those who have discussed these questions (Kitto). See ZOOLOGY.

The Mosaic regulations respecting domestic animals exhibit a great superiority over the enactments of other ancient nations (for those of the Aroopagus, see Quintil. Instit. v, 9, 13; for those of the Zend-avesta, see Rhode, Beil. S. g., p. 438, 441, 445), and contain the following directions: 1. Beasts of labor must have rest on the Sabbath (Exod. xx, 10; xxiii, 12), and in the sabbatical year cattle were allowed to roam free and eat whatever grew in the untilled fields (Exod. xxiii, 11; Lev. xxv, 7). See SABBATH. 2. No animal could be castrated (Lev. xxii, 24); for that this is the sense of the passage (which Le Clerc combats) is evident not only from the interpretation of Josephus (Ant. v, 8, 10), but also from the invariable practice of the Jews themselves. See OX. The scruples that may have led to the dis-use of mutilated beasts of burden are enumerated by Michaelis (Mos. Rechts, iii, 161 sq.). The prohibition itself must have greatly subserved a higher and different object, namely, the prevention of eunuchs; but its principal ground is certainly a religious, or, at least, a humane one (see Hottinger, Leg. s. Hebr. p. 374 sq.). 3. Animals of different kinds were not to be allowed to mix in breeding, nor even to be yoked together to the plough (Lev. xix, 19; Deut. xx, 16). See DIVERSE. 4. Oxen in threshing were not to be muzzled, or prevented from eating the provender on the floor (Deut. xxv, 4; 1 Cor. ix, 9). See THRASHING. 5. No (domestic) animal should be killed on the same day with its young (Lev. xxii, 28), as this would imply barbarity (see Jonathan's Targum in loc.; Philo, Opp. ii, 398). The Jews appear to have understood this enactment to apply to the slaughtering (וְשֵׁחַט) of animals for ordinary use as well as for sacrifice (Mishna, Chollin, ch. v). Respecting the ancient law referred to in Exod. xxiii, 19, see VICTUALS. (Comp. generally Schwabe, in the Kirchenzeit. 1834, No. 20). Other precepts seem not to have had the force of civil statutes, but to have been merely injunctions of compassion (e. g. Exod. xxiii, 5; Deut. xxii, 4, 6, 7). The sense of the former of these last prescriptions is not very clear in the original (see Rosenmüller in loc.), as the Jews apply it to all beasts of burden as well as the ass (see Josephus, Ant. iv, 8, 30; comp. Philo, Opp. ii, 39). Deut. vi, 7 sq., however, appears to be analogous to the other regulations under this class (Winer, ii, 610). See FOWL.

The word "beast" is sometimes used figuratively for brutal, savage men. Hence the phrase, "I fought with wild beasts at Ephesus," alluding to the infuriated multitude, who may have demanded that Paul should be thus exposed in the amphitheatre to fight as a gladiator (1 Cor. xv, 32; Acts xix, 29). A similar use of the word occurs in Psa. xxii, 12, 16; Eccl. iii, 18; Isa. xi, 6-8; and in 2 Pet. ii, 12; Jude 10, to denote a class of wicked men. A wild beast is the symbol of a tyrannical, usurping power or monarchy, that destroys its neighbors or subjects, and preys upon all about it. The four beasts in Dan. vii, 3, 17, 23, represent four kings or kingdoms (Ezek. xxxiv, 28; Jer. xii, 9). Wild beasts are generally, in the Scriptures, to be understood of enemies, whose malice and power are to be judged of in proportion to the nature and magnitude of the wild beasts by which they are represented; similar comparisons occur in profane authors (Psa. lxxiv, 14). In like manner the King of Egypt is compared to the crocodile (Psa. lxxvii, 31). The rising of a beast signifies the rise of some new dominion or government; the rising of a wild beast, the rise of a tyrannical government; and the rising out of the sea, that it should owe its origin to the commotions of the people. So the waters are interpreted by the angel (Rev. xvii, 15). In the visions of Daniel, the four great beasts, the symbols of the four great monarchies, are represented rising out of the sea in a storm: "I saw in my vision by night, and behold, the four winds of the heaven strove upon the great sea, and four great beasts came up from the sea" (Dan. vii, 2, 3). In various passages of the Revelation (iv, 6, etc.) this word is improperly used by our translators to designate the living creatures (וְחַיִּים) that symbolize the providential agencies of the Almighty, as in the vision of Ezekiel (ch. i). The "beast" elsewhere spoken of with such denunciatory emphasis in that book doubtless denotes the heathen political power of persecuting Rome. See Weyns's Symbol. D. d. s. v.

Beatification, an act by which, in the Romish Church, the pope declares a person blessed after death. It is to be distinguished from canonization (q. v.), in which the pope professes to determine authoritatively on the state of the person canonized; but when he beatifies he only gives permission that religious honors not proceeding so far as worship should be paid to the deceased. The day of their office cannot be made a festival of obligation. Before the time of Pope Alexander VII beatification was performed in the church of his order if the person to be beatified was a monk; and in the case of others, in the church of their country, if there was one at Rome. Alexander, however, ordered that the ceremony should in future be always in the basilica of the Vatican; and the first so solemnized was the beatification of Francis de Sales, January 8, 1662. At present the custom is not to demand the beatification of any one until fifty years after his death. See Lambertini (afterward Benedict XIV), De Sacrorum Dei Beatificatione et Beatorum Canonizatione, lib. i, cap. 24, 39. —Farrar, Ecol. D ct. s. v.; Christ. Examiner, Jan. 1855, art. vii.

Beatitudes, the name frequently given to the first clauses of our Saviour's Sermon on the Mount (q. v.), beginning with the phrase "Blessed," etc. (Matt. v. 3-11). The present "Mount of the Beatitudes" on which they are said to have been delivered is the hill called Kurus Hattin, or "Horns of Hattin," on the road from Nazareth to Tiberias—a not unlikely position (Hackett, Illustr. of Script., p. 313).

Beaton, Beatoun, or Bethune, CARDINAL DAVID, archbishop of St. Andrew's, notorious as a persecutor, was born in 1494, and educated at the University of Glasgow. He studied the canon law at Paris. In 1523 he was made abbot of Arbroath, and in 1525 lord privy seal. His life was now devoted to politics, which he endeavored to make subservient to the uses of the Papal Church. In 1537 he was promoted to the see of St. Andrew's, and in 1538 was made cardinal by Pope Paul III. In 1543 he obtained the great seal of Scotland, and was also made legate a latere by the pope, thus combining civil and ecclesiastical dominion in his own person. In the beginning of 1545 he held a visitation of his diocese, and had great numbers brought before him, under the act which had passed the Parliament in 1542-43, forbidding the lieges to argue or dispute concerning the sense of the Holy Scriptures. Convictions were quickly obtained; and of those convicted, five men were hanged and one woman drowned; some were imprisoned, and others were banished. He next proceeded to Edinburgh, and there called a council for the affairs of the Church; and hearing that George Wishart, an eminent reformer, was at the house of Cockburn of Ormiston, Beaton caused Wishart to be apprehended, carried over to St. Andrew's, and shut up in the tower there. The cardinal called a convention of the clergy at St. Andrew's, at which Wishart was condemned for heresy, and adjudged to be burnt—a sentence which was passed and put in force by the cardinal and his clergy, in defiance of the regent, and without the aid of the civil power. The cardinal afterward proceeded to the abbey of Arbroath, to the marriage of his eldest daughter by Mrs. Marion Ogilvy of the house of Airly, with whom he had long lived in concubinage, and there gave her in marriage to the eldest son of the Earl of Crawford, and with her 4000 merks of dowry. He then returned to St. Andrew's, where, on Saturday, May 29, 1546, he was put to death in his own chamber by a party of Reformers, headed by Norman Leslie, heir of the noble house of Rothes, who, we find, had on the 24th of April, 1545, given the cardinal a bond of "manrent" (or admission of feudal homage and fealty), and who had a personal quarrel with the cardinal. The death of Cardinal Beaton was fatal to the ecclesiastical oligarchy which under him trampled alike on law and liberty. Three works of the cardinal's are named: De Legationibus Suis, De Primatu Petri, and Epistolae ad Diversos. See Engl. Cyclopaedia; Burnet, Hist. of Engl. Reformation, i, 491-540; Hetherington, Church of Scotland, i, 42-52.

Beatrix or Beatrice, St., sister of Simplicius and Faustinus, who were beheaded in 303, and their bodies thrown into the Tiber. Beatrix rescued the bodies from the water and buried them, for which she was condemned; but for seven months she escaped the fury of her persecutors. She was eventually arrested and strangled in prison. The Roman Church honors these martyrs on the 29th of July.—Landon, Ecol. Dict., ii, 105; Butler, Lives of Saints, July 29.

Beattie, JAMES, poet and moralist, was the son of a small farmer, and was born at Laurencekirk, in Kincardineshire, 5th December, 1735. After pursuing his studies with brilliant success at Marischal College, Aberdeen, he was appointed usher to the Grammar School of that city, 1758, where he enjoyed the society of many distinguished men, by whose aid he was appointed professor of moral philosophy in Marischal College in 1760. In the same year he made his first public appearance as a poet in a volume of original poems and translations. With these poems he was afterward dissatisfied, and he endeavored to suppress them. His Essay on Truth, written avowedly to confute Hume, and published in 1770, became highly popular, and procured him the degree of LL.D. from the University of Oxford, and a private interview and a pension from George III. Solicitations were also made to him to enter the Church of England; but he declined, in the fear that his motives might be misrepresented. In the same year he gave to the world the first book of the Minstrel, and the second book in 1774. This work gained him reputation as a poet. He subsequently produced Dissertations, Moral and Critical (1783, 4to; 1787, 2 vols. 8vo);—Evidences of the Christian Religion (1786; 4th ed. 1795, 2 vols. 12mo);—Elements of Moral Science (3d ed. with Index, 1817, 2 vols. 8vo); and An Account of the Life and Writings of his eldest Son. He died at Aberdeen, Aug. 18, 1803. His Life and Letters, by Sir William Forbes, appeared in 1807 (3 vols. 8vo). It is honorable to Beattie that, long before the abolition of the slave-trade was brought before Parliament, he was active in protesting against that iniquitous traffic; and he introduced the subject into his academic course, with the express hope that such of his pupils as might be called to reside in the West Indies would recollect the lessons of humanity which he inculcated. Of his writings, the Minstrel is that which probably is now most read. It is not a work of any very high order of genius; but it exhibits a strong feeling for the beauties of nature; and it will probably long continue to hold an honorable place in the collections of minor poetry. Beattie's metaphysical writings have the reputation of being clear, lively, and attractive, but not profound. The Essay on Truth was much read and admired at the time of its publication.—Engl. Cyclopaedia, s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 147.

Beauchamp, WILLIAM, an early and distinguished Methodist Episcopal minister. He was born in Kent County, Del., April 26th, 1772; joined the M. E. Church about 1788. In 1790 he taught a school at Monomahela, Va., began to preach in 1791, and in 1793 he travelled under the presiding elder. In 1794 he joined the itinerancy; and in 1797 he was stationed in New York, and in 1798 in Boston. In 1801 he located, from ill health, and married Mrs. Russel, "one of the most excellent of women." In 1807 he settled on the Little Kenawha, Va. Here he preached with great success until 1815, when he removed to Chillicothe, Ohio, to act as editor of the Western Christian Monitor, which he conducted "with conspicuous ability," preaching meantime "with eminent success." In 1817 he removed to Mount Carmel, Ill., and engaged in founding a settlement, in every detail of which, civil, economical, and mechanical, his genius was pre-eminent. He was pastor, teacher, lawyer, and engineer. In 1822 he re-entered the itinerancy, in the Missouri Conference; "in 1823, was appointed presiding elder on Indiana District," then embracing nearly the whole state. In 1824 he was a delegate to the General Conference at Baltimore, "and lacked but two votes of an election to the episcopacy" by that body. He died at Paoli, Orange County, Ind., Oct. 7th, 1821. By diligent study, often pursued by torch-light in his frontier life, he made himself master of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. "His preaching was chaste and dignified, logical, and sometimes of overpowering force." He possessed a great and organizing mind, and a peculiar and almost universal genius, and, with adequate advantages for study, would certainly have influenced widely the history of this country. His Essays on the Truth of the Christian Religion is "a work of decided merit." His Letters on the Itinerancy, with a memoir by Bishop Soule, were published after his death, and he left several fine MSS., which remain unpublished.—Minutes of Conferences, i, 474; Methodist Magazine, 1825; Stevens, Memorials of Methodism, i, ch. xxix; Sprague, Annals, vii, 235.

Beaumont, JOSEPH, M.D., one of the most eminent preachers in the Methodist Church of England, was the son of the Rev. John Beaumont, and was born at Castle Donington, March 19, 1794. He received his education at Kingswood school, and was there converted to God. After some years spent in the study of medicine, he determined to enter the ministry; and though his way would have been opened into the Established Church by the kindness of friends, he preferred to remain with the Wesleyan Methodists, and was received on trial by the Conference of 1813. He was soon recognised as a preacher of more than common promise. An impediment in his speech appeared likely to hinder his success, but by great resolution he surmounted it, and became a fluent and effective speaker. His preaching was characterized by brilliancy of illustration, by repeated bursts of impassioned eloquence, and an earnestness of manner and delivery often amounting to impetuosity. For many years he was one of the most popular pulpit and platform speakers in Great Britain. His last appointment was Hull, where he died suddenly in the pulpit, January 21, 1855. A number of his occasional sermons and speeches are published; a specimen of them will be found in the English Pulpit, 1819, p. 123. His Life, written by his son, appeared in 1856.—Wesleyan Minutes (Lond., 1855); Louisa Rev., July, 1856, p. 564.

Beausobre, ISAAC DE, born at Niort, March 8th, 1659, of an ancient family, originally of Limousin. His parents were Protestants, and educated him at Saumur. In 1683 he was ordained minister at Châtillon-sur-Indre, in Poitou. The French government caused his church to be sealed up, and Beausobre was held enough to break the seal, for which he was compelled to flee; and at Rotterdam he became chaplain to the Princess of Anhalt. In 1693 he published his Defence of the Doctrine of the Reformers (Défense de la doctrine des Réformés, sur la Prédestination, etc.), in which he treats the Lutherans with some severity, and defends the Synod of Dort. In 1694 he went to Berlin, where he received many appointments, and was charged, together with L'Enfant, with the work of translating the N. T. The new version, with ample prefaces and notes, appeared at Amsterdam in 1718 (2 vols., 4to), and again in 1741, with emendations. The Epistles of St. Paul were the only part of the work which fell to the share of Beausobre. The notes are tinged with Socinianism. He labored during a large portion of his life at a History of the Reformation, from the Council of Basle to the period of the publication of the Confession of Augsburg, and it was this undertaking which drew from him his Critical History of Manichæism (Histoire Critique du Manichéisme, Amst. 1724-39, 2 vols., 4to), of which vol. ii was posthumous. The work is written with vast ability, and shows that many of those who are charged with Manichæism in the Middle Ages by the Papists are falsely charged. The Protestant congregations of Utrecht, Hamburg, and the Savoy, at London, endeavored to induce Beausobre to become their pastor, but the King of Prussia valued him too highly to permit him to leave Berlin. His Sermons on the Resurrection of Lazarus were translated by Cotes (Lond. 1822, 8vo). He died June 6th, 1738. He left, besides the works above mentioned, Remarques critiques et philologiques sur le N. T. (Hague 1742, 2 vols., 4to);—Histoire critique du Culte des Morts parmi les Chrétiens et les Païens;—A Supplément à L'Enfant's History of the Hussites (Lausanne, 1745, 4to);—A History of the Reformation, from 1517 to 1630 (Berlin, 1785, 4 vols., 8vo).—Landon, *Ecl. Beautiful Gate (ἡ οὐαία πύλη), the name of one of the gates of the Temple (Acts iii, 2). It was the entrance to the Court of the Women, immediately opposite the Gate of Shushan, the eastern portal through the outer wall into Solomon's Porch (see Strong's Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels, App. II, p. 433, and Map.) It is evidently the same described by Josephus as immensely massive, and covered with plates of Corinthian bronze (Jut. xv, 11, 5; War, v, 5, 3; vi, 5, 3). (See Jour. Soc. Lit., Oct. 1867.) See TEMPLE.

Beauty (represented by numerous Hebrew terms, which in our version are frequently rendered by "comeliness," etc.). The Song of Solomon, particularly the sixth and seventh chapters, gives us some idea of what were then the notions of beauty in an Eastern bride, and by comparing these statements with modern Oriental opinions, we may perceive many points of agreement. Roberts says, "A handsome Hindoo female is compared to the sacred city of Seed-ambaram. Her skin is of the color of gold; her hands, nails, and soles of the feet are of a reddish hue; her limbs must be smooth, and her gait like the stately swan. Her feet are small, like the beautiful lotus; her waist as slender as the lightning; her arms are short, and her fingers resemble the five petals of the kantha flower; her breasts are like the young cocconut, and her neck is as the trunk of the arca-tree. Her mouth is like the ambal flower, and her lips as coral; her teeth are like beautiful pearls; her nose is high and lifted up, like that of the chameleon (when raised to sniff the wind); her eyes are like the sting of a wasp and the Karungu-valley flower; her brows are like the bow, and nicely separated; and her hair is as the black cloud." Corpulency and staleness of manner are qualities which the Orientals admire in their women; particularly corpulency, which is well known to be one of the most distinguishing marks of beauty in the East. Niebuhr says that plumpness is thought so desirable in the East, that women, in order to become so, swallow every morning and every evening three insects of a species of tenbriones, fried in butter. Upon this principle is founded the compliment of Solomon (Cant. i, 9), and Theocritus, in his epithalamium for the celebrated Queen Helen, describes her as plump and large, and compares her to the horse in the chariots of Thessaly. The Arab women whom Mr. Wood saw among the ruins of Palmyra were well shaped, and, although very swarthy, yet had good features. Zenobia, the celebrated queen of that renowned city, was reckoned eminently beautiful, and the description we have of her person answers to that character; her complexion was of a dark brown, her eyes black and sparkling, and of an uncommon fire; her countenance animated and sprightly in a very high degree; her person graceful and stately; her teeth white as pearl; her voice clear and strong. Females of distinction in Palestine, and even farther east, are not only beautiful and well shaped, but in consequence of being kept from the rays of the sun, are very fair, and the Scripture bears the same testimony of Sarah, of Rebekah, and of Rachel; that they were "beautiful and well-favored." The women of the poorer classes, however, are extremely brown and swarthy in their complexions, from being much exposed to the heat of the sun. It is on this account that the prophet Jeremiah, when he would describe a beautiful woman, represents her as one that keeps at home, because those who are desirous to preserve their beauty go very little abroad. Stateliness of the body has always been held in great estimation in Eastern courts, nor do they think any one capable of great services or actions to whom nature has not vouchsafed to give a beautiful form and aspect. It still is and has always been the custom of the Eastern nations to choose such for their principal officers, or to wait on princes and great personages (Dan. i, 4). Sir Paul Rycant observes that "the youths that are designed for the great offices of the Turkish empire must be of admirable features and looks, well shaped in their bodies, and without any defects of nature; for it is conceived that a corrupt and sordid soul can scarce inhabit a serene and ingenious aspect; and I have observed not only in the seraglio, but also in the courts of great men, their personal attendants have been of comely lusty youths, well habited, deporting themselves with singular modesty and respect in the presence of their masters; so that when a pacha aga-spahi travels, he is always attended with a comely equipage, followed by flourishing youths, well mounted."

Beb'āy, the name of one or two men, and a place. 1. (Heb. Bebay', בֵּבַי, from the Pehlvi bab, father; Sept. βαβαῖ, βηβῖ, βαβῖ, and βηβῖ), the head of one of the families that returned from Babylon with Zerubabel (B.C. 536) to the number of 623 (Ezra ii, 11; 1 Esdr. v, 13), or 628 by a different mode of reckoning (Neh. vii, 16), of whom his son Zechariah, with 28 males, returned (B.C. 459) under Ezra (Ezra viii, 11; 1 Esdr. viii, 37). Several other of his sons are mentioned in chap. x, 28. He (if the same) subscribed to the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Ezra x, 15). B.C. 410. Four of this family had taken foreign wives (Ezra x, 28; 1 Esdr. ix, 29).

2. (Alex. Bybai, Vat. omits; Vulg. omits). A place named only in Judith xv, 4. It is, perhaps, a mere repetition of the name CHOBAI (q. v.), occurring next to it.

Be'cher (Heb. Be'ker, בְּכֵר, perh. first-born, but, according to Gesenius, a young camel; so Simonis, Oonast, p. 399), the name of one or two men.

1. (Sept. Βαχόρ and Βαχόρ). The second son of Benjamin, according to the list both in Gen. xli, 21, and 1 Chr. vii, 6; but omitted in the list of the sons of Benjamin in 1 Chr. viii, 1, 2, as the text now stands, unless, as seems, on the whole, most probable, he is there called NOLAH, the fourth son. There is also good reason to identify him with the Ir of 1 Chr. vii, 12. B.C. 1856. No one, however, can look at the Hebrew text of 1 Chr. viii, 1 (בְּכֵרֵי הַיְלִידִים אֲחֵי בְּכֵרֵי הַיְלִידִים אֲחֵי בְּכֵרֵי הַיְלִידִים), without at least suspecting that בְּכֵרֵי, his first-born, is a corruption of בְּכֵר, Becher, and that the suffix י is a corruption of י, and belongs to the following בְּכֵרֵי, so that the genuine sense, in that case, would be, Benjamin's begot Bela, Becher, and Ashbel, in exact agreement with Gen. xli, 21. The enumeration, the second, the third, etc., must then have been added since the corruption of the text. There is, however, another view which may be taken, viz., that 1 Chr. viii, 1, is right, and that in Gen. xli, 21, and 1 Chr. vii, 8, בְּכֵר, as a proper name, is a corruption of בְּכֵר, first-born, and so that Benjamin had no son of the name of Becher. In favor of this view, it may be said that the position of Becher, immediately following Bela the first-born in both passages, is just the position it would be in if it meant "first-born;" that Becher is a singular name to give to a second or fourth son; and that the discrepancy between Gen. xli, 21, where Ashbel is the third son, and 1 Chr. viii, 1, where he is expressly called the second, and the omission of Ashbel in 1 Chr. vii, 6, would all be accounted for on the supposition of בְּכֵר having been accidentally taken for a proper name instead of in the sense of "first-born." It may be added farther that, in 1 Chr. viii, 38, the same confusion has arisen in the case of the sons of Azel, of whom the second is in the Auth. Vers. called Bocheru, in Heb. בֹּכְרוֹ, but which in the Sept. is rendered πρωτότοκος αὐτοῦ, another name, 'Asú, being added to make up the six sons of Azel. And that the Sept. is right in the rendering is made highly probable by the very same form being repeated in ver. 30, "And the sons of Eshel his brother were Ulam his first-born (בְּכֵרֵי עֶשֶׂל), Jehush the second," etc. The support, too, which Becher, as a proper name, derives from the occurrence of the same name in Num. xxvi, 35, is somewhat weakened by the fact that Bered (q. v.) seems to be substituted for Becher in 1 Chr. vii, 23, and that the latter is omitted altogether in the Sept. version of Num. xxvi, 35. Moreover, which is perhaps the strongest argument of all, in the enumeration of the Benjamite families in Num. xxvi, 38, there is no mention of Becher or the Becherites, but Ashbel and the Ashbelites immediately follow Bela and the Bela-ites. This last supposition, however, is decidedly negatived by the mention (1 Chron. vii, 8) of the distinctive sons of Becher as an individual. Becher was one of Benjamin's five sons that came down to Egypt with Jacob, being one of the fourteen descendants of Rachel who settled in Egypt. See JACOB.

As regards the posterity of Becher, we find nevertheless the singular fact of there being no family named after him at the numbering of the Israelites in the plains of Moab, as related in Num. xxvi. But the no less singular circumstance of there being a Becher, and a family of Becherites, among the sons of Ephraim (ver. 35) has been thought to suggest an explanation. The slaughter of the sons of Ephraim by the men of Gath, who came to steal their cattle out of the land of Goshen, in that border affray related in 1 Chron. vii, 21, had sadly thinned the house of Ephraim of its males. The daughters of Ephraim must therefore have sought husbands in other tribes, and in many cases must have been heiresses. It is therefore possible that Becher, or his heir and head of his house, married an Ephraimitish heiress, a daughter of Shubelach (1 Chron. vii, 29, 21), and that his house was thus reckoned in the tribe of Ephraim, just as Jair, the son of Segub, was reckoned in the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. ii, 22; Num. xxxii, 40, 41). The time when Becher first appears among the Ephraimites, viz., just before the entering into the promised land, when the people were numbered by genealogies for the express purpose of dividing the inheritance equitably among the tribes, is evidently highly favorable to this view. (See Num. xxvi, 52-56; xxvii.) The junior branches of Becher's family would of course continue in the tribe of Benjamin. Their names, as given in 1 Chron. vii, 8, were Zemira, Joash, Eli ezer, Elioanai, Omri, Jerimoth, and Abiah; other branches possessed the fields around Anathoth and Alameth (called Alameth vi, 60, and Almon Josh. xxi, 18). As the most important of them, being ancestor to King Saul, and his great captain Abner (1 Sam. xiv, 50), the last named, Abiah, was literally Becher's son, it would seem that the rest (with others not there named) were likewise. See JACOB. The generations appear to have been as follows: Becher—Abiah; then (after a long interval, see SALT) Abiah (1 Sam. ix, 1)—Bechorath—Zeror—Abiel (Jehiel, 1 Chron. ix, 35)—Ner—Kish—Saul. Abner was another son of Ner, brother therefore to Kish, and uncle to Saul. Abiel or Jehiel seems to have been the first of his house who settled at Gibeon or Gibeah (1 Chron. viii, 29; ix, 35), which perhaps he acquired by his marriage with Maachah, and which became thenceforth the seat of his family, and was called afterward Gibeah of Saul (1 Sam. xii, 4; Isa. x, 29). From 1 Chron. viii, 6, it would seem that before this, Gibeon, or Geba, had been possessed by the sons of Ehad (called Abihud ver. 3) and other sons of Bela. Another remarkable descendant of Becher was Sheba, the son of Bichi, a Benjaminite, who headed the formidable rebellion against David described in 2 Sam. xx; and another, probably Shimei, the son of Gera of Bahurim, who cursed David as he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. xvi, 5), since he is said to be "a man of the family of the house of Saul." But if so, Gera must be a different person from the Gera of Gen. xlii, 21 and 1 Chron. viii, 3. Perhaps therefore בְּחֹרָתִי is used in the wider sense of tribe, as Josh. vii, 17, and so the passage may only mean that Shimei was a Benjaminite.

A third solution of both the above difficulties is to transfer from the 35th verse to the 34th of Num. xvi the clause, "Of Becher the family of the Bachrites," inserting it in its natural place between Bela and his family and Ashbel and his family; the 38th verse would then stand thus: "The sons of Benjamin, after their families: of Bela, the family of the B-Elates; of Becher, the family of the Bachrites; of Ashbel, the family of the Ashbelites," etc. This conjectural emendation is in part confirmed by the reading of the Sept. Thus, in the case before us, we have the tribe of Benjamin described (1) as it was about the time when Jacob went down into Egypt, or rather at his death; (2) as it was just before the entrance into Canaan; (3) as it was in the days of David; and (4) as it was eleven generations after Jonathan and David, i. e. in Hezekiah's reign.—Smith. See GENEALOGY.

2. (Sept. omits.) The second son of Ephraim; his posterity were called BACHRITES (Num. xxvi, 35). In 1 Chron. vii, 29, Brod seems to have been his nephew rather than the same person, as the margin supposes. B.C. post 1874. There is some reason, however, for identifying him with the preceding (see above).

Becho'rath (Heb. Bechorath', בְּחֹרָתִי, first-born; Sept. Βεχωρίθ; v. r. Βεχίο), the son of Abiah, and the great-grandfather of Ner, the grandfather of King Saul (1 Sam. ix, 1). B.C. long ante 1093.

Becker (or BECKER), Balthasar, was born Mar. 20, 1634, in Friesland, and became a minister at Amsterdam. He was a zealous Cartesian, and was charged with Socinianism. His reputation chiefly rests upon a work in Dutch, entitled De Bevoorrede Wereld, "The Enchanted World" (Amst. 1691-93), which undertakes to show that the devil never inspires men with evil thoughts, nor tempts them, and that men have never been possessed with devils, etc. His views of demoniacal possession, etc., are in substance those of the modern Rationalists, of whom he was a forerunner in other doctrines as well as in this. The Consistory of Amsterdam deposed him in 1692. The above work was translated into French (1 vols. Amst. 1694), into German (by Schwager, Amst. 1695, now ed. by Semler, Leipzig, 1781 sq. 3 vols.), and into English. Becker died June 11, 1698. See Life by Schwabe (Kopnh. 1780); Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cont. xvii, pt. ii, ch. ii, § 25; Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, § 225; Landon, Ecol. Dict. ii, 116; Hurst, Hist. of Rationalism, 317.

Becker, Karl Ludwig, D.D., a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born in Anhalt-Coethen, Germany, Nov. 17th, 1756. He pursued his preparatory studies in a gymnasium near his native place, and at eighteen entered the University of Halle, where he studied four years. Thence he went to Bremen, where he spent fourteen years as a candidate theologice, preaching occasionally for the pastors of that city, and devoting part of his time to preparing young men for the universities. While at Bremen he published An Exposition of the 53d Chapter of Isaiah, a Treatise on the best Mode of Converting the Jews, and two volumes of Sermons—all able works. In 1793 he emigrated to America, bearing with him the most flattering testimonials from the ministerium of Bremen. He immediately received a call from several German Reformed congregations in Northampton County, Penn. In March, 1795, he became pastor of the German Reformed congregation in Lancaster, Penn. In 1806 he took charge of the church in Second Street, Baltimore, Md. In 1810 he published a volume of Sermons, which was well received. He died suddenly, July 12th, 1818. There being in Dr. Becker's time as yet no theological seminary in the German Reformed Church in America, many of its ministers pursued their theological studies with him. He possessed a strong mind, and was thoroughly educated. Ardent and impulsive, he was frequently "caught up," while preaching, into an overwhelming strain of impassioned eloquence and tender feeling, swaying the congregation as the wind moves a forest. He wrote and preached only in the German language.

Becker, Jacob Christian, D.D., a German Reformed minister, son of Dr. C. L. Becker, of Baltimore, Md. He was born Jan. 14th, 1790. He studied theology with his father, and was licensed in 1818. He labored as pastor about three years in Manchester, Md., and the rest of his life in Northampton County, Penn. In 1829 he was elected by the synod of the German Reformed Church as Professor of Theology in its seminary, which call he declined, preferring to remain a pastor. Many German Reformed ministers studied with him. He was a learned man and an eloquent preacher. He died August 18th, 1858.

Becket, THOMAS A (properly THOMAS BECKET, as he was not of noble birth), was the son of a London tradesman, and was born in London in 1117. He received a collegiate education at Oxford, completed by the study of the civil and canon law at Bologna, under the patronage of Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, and was early carried to preferment by his undoubted abilities, aided by a handsome person and refined manners, but still more by the jealousy which divided the civil and ecclesiastical powers at that time. On his return from Italy, Becket was appointed archdeacon of Canterbury by his patron, and soon after the accession of Henry II in 1154, was raised to the dignity of high chancellor, doubtless by the influence of the prelate favoring his own ambition. At this time, it should be remarked, the power of the popes had risen to an arrogant height, and the dispute about investitures, the subjection of the clergy to lay jurisdiction in criminal matters, and various alleged abuses on either side, were subjects of continual and bitter strife between the Church and the crowned heads of Europe. It is not likely that Becket was ever undecided in his own views on any of these subjects, or on the part he was destined to play in the politics of the period; but it is easy to imagine that each party would see the means of advancing its own pretensions in the splendid abilities, the acknowledged purity of life, and the courtly manners of the young churchman. As chancellor he served the king so faithfully, and was so pleasant a companion to him, both in his business and in his pleasures, that he had his thorough confidence and affection. On the death of Theobald in 1162, the king was urgent for his elevation to the see of Canterbury; but many of the bishops opposed it, on account of Becket's devotion to the king. But, once consecrated, it devolved upon him to decide whether he would serve the Church or the state, and he declared for the former without hesitation. The king and his late minister were equally matched for their inflexibility, quickness of resolution, undaunted courage, and statesmanlike abilities; and both were influenced, farther than their own consciences extended, by the spirit of the age. Three years of strife led to the council of Clarendon, convoked by Henry in 1164, when Becket yielded to the entreaties or menaces of the barons, and signed the famous "Constitutions of Clarendon" [see CLARENDON], by which the differences between the Church and state were regulated. These articles, which were, in reality, nothing but a formal statement of the ancient usages of England, not only rendered the state supreme in all that concerned the general government of the nation, but virtually separated England from Rome, so far as the temporal authority of the pope was concerned. The pope, therefore, refused to ratify them, and Becket, seeing his opportunity, and really repenting of the compliance that had been wrung from him, refused to perform his office in the Church, and endeavored to leave the kingdom, in which, at last, he succeeded, only to draw down the vengeance of Henry upon his connections. The progress of the quarrel belongs rather to the history of the times than a single life. Becket remained in exile six years, and, matters being in some measure accommodated, returned to England in 1170, shortly after the coronation of the king's son, which had been designed by Henry as a means of securing the succession. Becket's refusal to remove the censures with which the agents in this transaction had been visited, his haughty contempt of the crown, and the sentences of excommunication which he continued to fulminate from the altar of Canterbury cathedral, provoked anew the indignation of the king. It is idle to judge the actions of men in those iron times by the formulas of the present day. The question, stripped of all disguise, was simply this: whether the pope or Henry Plantagenet was henceforth to be king in England; whether the em a law or the ancient usages should govern the realm. The Norman lords resolved the matter in their own rude way, when at length four of them left the royal presence in hot anger, after hearing of some fresh indignity, and determined on bringing the controversy to a bloody close. Becket was murdered during the celebration of the vesper service on the 29th of December, 1170. He was canonized by Alexander III in 1174. The pope excommunicated the murderers and their accomplices, and the king, who was generally looked upon as implicated, purchased absolution by conceding to Rome the freedom of its judicial proceedings, and by doing penance at the grave of Becket. Becket soon became one of the most popular English saints, and his shrine the richest in England. Four centuries later Henry VIII, 1538, had proceedings instituted against him for treason, his bones burned, and the gold and jewels which adorned his shrine carried to the royal treasury. His life may be found in all the English histories, which give various views of his character, according to the ecclesiastical views of the writers. In 1859 Prof. Hippeau, of Caen, published La Vie de Saint Thomas le Martyr, par Garnier de Pont Saint Mayence, a poem of the 12th century, now issued for the first time. The introduction by the editor is full of interest.—Rich. s. v.; Giles, Life and Letters of Th. à Becket (Lond. 1846, 2 vols. 8vo); Opera, ed. Becon, THOMAS, D.D., prebend of Canterbury, was born 1511 or 1512, place unknown. He graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, 1530, was ordained 1538, and obtained the vicarage of Brensett, Kent. He had imbibed the principles of the Reformation from Stafford and Latimer at Cambridge, but was cautious in expressing his views, publishing under the name of Theodore Basil. Nevertheless, he was imprisoned, and in 1541 recanted at Paul's Cross, and burned his books. On the accession of Edward VI he was made rector of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, 1547, and chaplain to Crammer. He was again imprisoned in Queen Mary's time, but escaped in 1554 and went to Strasburgh. His writings were denounced in a royal proclamation of 1555. On the accession of Elizabeth he was restored to his old rectory, but the strong Protestant principles which he professed hindered his advancement under a government which persecuted Puritanism. He died at Canterbury, 1563 (or 1567?). He was a very voluminous writer in the Reformation controversy, and his vigor, earnestness, and erudition have kept his books in demand. They were collected in 3 vols. fol. (Lond. 1563-4), and have been recently reprinted by the Parker Society (Camb. 1843-4, 2 vols. 8vo), with a sketch of Becon's life.—Prieston Rev. v, 504.

Bec'tileth, THE PLAIN OF (τὸ πεῖθον Βακτριάθ v. r. Βεκρέλιθ = Heb. בַּעַתְלָה בֵּית, house of slaughter), mentioned in Judith ii, 21, as lying between Nineveh and Cilicia. The name has been compared with Bactella (Βακταίαλλη), a town of Syria named by Ptolemy (lxix, 35) as situated in Castiotis (v, 15); Bactali in the Peutinger Tables, which place it 21 miles from Antioch (comp. the Itin. Antonin.). The most important plain in this direction is the Bekaa, or valley lying between the two chains of Lebanon; and it is possible that Bec'tileth is a corruption of that well-known name, if, indeed, it be a historical name at all. See Mannert, Alt. Geog. VI, i, 456.—Smith, s. v.

Bed, properly מִטָּה, mittah, κλίνη, either for rest at night, Exod. viii, 3; 1 Sam. xix, 13, 15, 16; 1 Kings xvii, 19; 2 Kings iv, 10, 21; xi, 2; 2 Chron. xxii, 11; Psa. vi, 6; Prov. xxvi, 14; Mark iv, 21; Luke viii, 16; xvii, 34; or during illness, Gen. xlvii, 31; xlviii, 2; xlix, 33; 1 Sam. xxviii, 23; 2 Kings i, 4, 6, 16; iv, 32; Mark vii, 30; Rev. ii, 22; often simply a sofa for ease and quiet, 1 Sam. xxviii, 23; Esther vii, 8; Amos iii, 12; vi, 4; once a sofa for pleasure, Cant. iii, 7; in the New Test. frequently a mere couch, consisting of a litter and coverlet, Matt. ix, 2, 6; Luke v, 18; Acts v, 15 (for which more properly the diminutive κλινίον, "couch," Luke v, 19, 24; or κράββατος, frequently occurring, usually "bed," once "couch," Acts v, 15; and once in the sense of a more permanent sick-bed, Acts ix, 33); used also for ber for dead bodies, 2 Sam. iii, 31; and specially of the triclina, or dinner-bed, Esther i, 6; Ezek. xxiii, 41; "table," Mark vii, 4. Another term of frequent occurrence is מִשְׁכָּב, mishkab, κοίτη, which almost always has the signification of marriage-bed, or some analogous idea (except in the Chaldee equivalent, מִשְׁכָּב of Dan.), and is often translated by terms expressive of that sense. To these may be added the poetic מִשְׁכָּב, mitsab, Job xvii, 13; Psa. lxxiii, 6; cxxxii, 3; signifying the same as the preceding in Gen. xlix, 4; 1 Chron. v, 1; and "chamber" in prose, 1 Kings vi, 5, 6, 10; also מִשְׁכָּב, mitsab, Isa. xxviii, 20; and, finally, מִשְׁכָּב, mitsab, signifying, as the derivation shows, a canopied bed of more imposing style, for whatever purpose, Job vii, 13; Psa. xli, 3; cxxxii, 2 (in the original); Prov. vi, 16; Cant. i, 16; "couch" in Psa. vi, 6; Amos iii, 12; vi, 4; and properly rendered "bedstead" in Deut. iii, 11. In this last-named passage a coffin is thought by some to be meant. See GIANT.

We may distinguish in the Jewish bed the following principal parts: 1. The bedstead was not always necessary, the divan, or platform along the side or end of an Oriental room, sufficing as a support for the bedding. See BEDCHAMBER. Yet some slight and portable frame seems implied among the senses of the word בִּדְדָן, mittah', which is used for a "litter" (2 Sam. iii, 31), and for the ordinary bed (2 Kings iv, 10), for the litter on which a sick person might be carried (1 Sam. xix, 15), for Jacob's bed of sickness (Gen. xlvii, 14), and for the couch on which guests reclined at a banquet (Esth. i, 6). See COUCH. Thus it seems the comprehensive and generic term. The proper word for a bedstead appears to be בִּדְדָן, eres, used Deut. iii, 11, to describe that on which lay the giant Og, whose vast bulk and weight required one of iron. See BEDSTEAD. 2. The substratum or bottom portion of the bed itself was limited to a mere mat, or one or more quilts. 3. Over this a quilt finer than those used for the under part of the bed. In summer, a thin blanket, or the outer garment worn by day (1 Sam. xix, 13), sufficed. This latter, in the case of a poor person, often formed the entire bedding, and that without a bedstead. Hence the law provided that it should not be kept in pledge after sunset, that the poor man might not lack his needful covering (Deut. xxiv, 13). 4. The bed-clothes. The only material mentioned for this is that which occurs 1 Sam. xix, 13, and the word used is of doubtful meaning, but seems to signify some fabric woven or plaited of goat's hair. It is clear, however, that it was something hastily adopted to serve as a pillow, and is not decisive of the ordinary use. 5. In Ezra xiii, 18, occurs the word כִּפְתָּיִם, ke'zeth (Sept. πικροειδῶν), which seems to be the proper term. Such pillows are common to this day in the East, formed of sheep's fleece or goat's skin, with a stuffing of cotton, etc. We read of a "pillow," also, in the boat in which our Lord lay asleep (Mark iv, 38) as he crossed the lake. The flock of stone, such as Jacob used, covered, perhaps, with a garment, was not unusual among the poorer folk, shepherds, etc. See PILLOW. 6. The ornamental portions, and those which luxury added, were pillars and a canopy (Judith xiii, 9); ivory carvings, gold and silver (Joseph, Ant. xii, 2, 11), and probably mosaic work, purple and fine linen, are also mentioned as constituting parts of beds (Esth. i, 6; Cant. iii, 9, 10), where the word בִּדְדָן, appayon' (Sept. φασίαι), seems to mean "a litter" (Prov. vii, 16, 17; Amos xi, 4). So also are perfumes. —Smith, s. v. See SLEEP.

Be'dad (Heb. Bedad', בְּדָד, sparation, otherwise for בְּדָדָד, son of Adad; Sept. Βαβὰδ), the father of Hadad, a king in Edom (Gen. xxxvi, 35; 1 Chr. i, 46). B.C. ante 1493.

Be'dan (Heb. Bedan', בְּדָן, signif. doubtful; see below), the name of two men.

1. In 1 Sam. xii, 11, we read that the Lord sent as deliverers of Israel Jerubbaal, Bedan, Jephthah, Samson. Three of these we know to have been judges of Israel, but we nowhere find Bedan among the number. The Targum understands it of Samson, and so Jerome and the generality of interpreters; but this interpretation goes on the supposition that the name should be rendered in Dan, i. e. one in Dan, or of the tribe of Dan, as Samson was. In this sense, as Kimchi observes, it would have the same force as Ben-Dan, a son of Dan, a Danite. Such an intermixture of proper names and appellatives, however, is very doubtful; and it is to be noted that Bedan is mentioned before Jephthah, whereas Samson was after him. The Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic have Barak, which many think the preferable reading (con. p. Heb. xi, 32). Others think there was an actual judge of this name not mentioned in the O. T.; but this view is subversive of the whole history, and disconcerted by the parallel account of Josephus. See JUDGE. A man of the name of Bedan occurs, however, among the posterity of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii, 17), and Junius, followed by some others, thinks that the judge Jair is meant, and that he is here called Bedan to distinguish him from the more ancient Jair, the son of Manasseh. The order in which the judges are here named is not at variance with this view (Num. xxxii, 41; Judg. x, 3, 4); but surely, if Jair had been really intended, he might have been called by that name without any danger of his being, in this text (where he is called a deliverer of Israel, and placed among the judges), confounded with the more ancient Jair. It is therefore most probable that Bedan is a contracted form for the name of the judge ABDON (q. v.).

2. (Sept. Ba'dan.) The son of Ullam, the great-grandson of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii, 17). B.C. post 1856. See the foregoing.

Bedchamber (בֵּית הַמִּטָּה, room of the beds, 2 Kings xi, 2; 2 Chron. xxii, 11; elsewhere בֵּית הַנִּשְׁנָה, sleeping-room, Exod. viii, 3; 2 Sam. iv, 7; 2 Kings vi, 12; Eccles. x, 20). Bedrooms in the East consist of an apartment furnished with a divan, or dais, which is a slightly elevated platform at the upper end, and often along the sides of the room. On this are laid the mattresses on which the Western Asiatics sit cross-legged in the daytime, with large cushions against the wall to support the back. At night the light bedding is usually laid out upon this divan, and thus beds for many persons are easily formed. The bedding is removed in the morning, and deposited in recesses in the room made for the purpose. This is a sort of general sleeping-room for the males of the family and for guests, none but the master having access to the inner parts of the house, where alone there are proper and distinct bedchambers. In these the bedding is either laid on the carpeted floor, or placed on a low frame or bedstead. This difference between the public and private sleeping-room, which the arrangement of an Eastern household renders necessary, seems to explain the difficulties which have perplexed readers of travels, who, finding mention only of the more public dormitory, the divan, have been led to conclude that there was no other or different one. See DIVAN.

Josephus (Ant. xii, 4, 11) mentions the bedchambers in the Arabian palace of Hircanus. The ordinary furniture of a bedchamber in private life is given in 2 Kings iv, 10. The "bedchamber" in the Temple where Josiah was hidden was probably a store-chamber for keeping beds, not a mere bedroom, and thus better adapted to conceal the fugitives (2 Kings xi, 2; 2 Chr. xxii, 11). The position of the bedchamber in the most remote and secret parts of the palace seems marked in Exod. viii, 3; 2 Kings vi, 12. See Bed.

Be'de, "The Venerable," one of the most eminent fathers of the English Church, was born in the county of Durham, in the year 672 (673, Collier). His early years were spent in the monastery of St. Paul at Jarrow, and his later education was received in that of St. Peter at Wearmouth. In these two monasteries, which were not above five miles apart, he spent his life, under the rule of Benedict and Ceolfride, who was the first abbot of Jarrow, and who, after the death of Benedict, presided over both houses. At nineteen years of age he was made deacon, and was ordained to the priesthood, as he himself tells us, at thirty years of age, by John of Beverley, Bishop of Hagustald (Hexham). Pope Sergius I invited him to Rome to assist him with his advice; but Bede, it appears, excused himself, and spent the whole of his tranquil life in his monastery, improving himself in all the learning of his age, but directing his more particular attention to the compilation of an Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation (Historia Ecclesiastica, etc.), the materials for which he obtained partly from chronicles, partly from annals preserved in contemporary convents, and partly from the information of prelates with whom he was acquainted. Making allowance for the introduction of legendary matter, which was the fault of the age, few works have supported their credit so long, or been so generally consulted as authentic sources. Bede published this history about the year 731, when, as he informs us, he was in his fifty-ninth year, but before this he had written many other books on various subjects, a catalogue of which he subjoined to his history. So great was his reputation, that it was said of him, "hominem, in extremo orbis angulo natum, universum orbem suo ingenio pertrinxisse." He had a multitude of scholars, and passed his life in study, in teaching others, and in prayer, thinking, like his master, John of Beverley, that the chief business of a monk was to make himself of use to others. In the year 735, shortly before Easter, he was seized by a slight attack of inflammation of the lungs, which continued to grow worse until the 26th of May (Ascension-day). He was continually active to the last, and particularly anxious about two works: one his translation of John's Gospel into the Saxon language, the other some passages which he was extracting from the works of St. Isidore. The day before his death he grew much worse, and his feet began to swell, yet he passed the night as usual, and continued dictating to the person who acted as his amanuensis, who, observing his weakness, said, "There remains now only one chapter, but it seems difficult to you to speak." To which he answered, "It is easy: take your pen, mend it, and write quickly." About nine o'clock he sent for some of his brethren, priests of the monastery, to divide among them some incense and other things of little value which he had preserved in a chest. While he was speaking, the young man, Wilberch, who wrote for him, said, "Master, there is but one sentence wanting;" upon which he bid him write quick, and soon after the scribe said, "Now it is finished." To which he replied, "Thou hast said the truth—consummatum est. Take up my head; I wish to sit opposite to the place where I have been accustomed to pray, and where now sitting I may yet invoke my Father." Being thus seated, according to his desire, upon the floor of his cell, he said, "Glorify to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost;" and as he pronounced the last word he expired (Neander, Light in Dark Places, 162). He died, according to the best opinion, May 26th, 735, though the exact date has been contested.

The first catalogue of Bede's works, as we have before observed, we have from himself, at the end of his Ecclesiastical History, which contains all he had written before the year 731. This we find copied by Leland, who also mentions some other pieces he had met with of Bede's, and points out likewise several that passed under Bede's name, though, in Leland's judgment, spurious (Leland, D. Script. Brit. ed. Hall, Oxford, 1709, i, 115). Bale, in the first edition of his work on British writers (4to, Gippesw. 1548, fol. 50), mentions ninety-six treatises written by Bede, and in his last edition (fol. 1559, p. 91) swells these to one hundred and forty-five tracts; and declares at the close of both catalogues that there were numberless pieces besides of Bede's which he had not seen. The following is the catalogue of his writings given by Cave: 1. De Rerum Naturâ liber:—2. De Temporum Ratione:—3. De Sæc. Etatibus Mundi (separately, at Paris, 1507; Cologne, 1537):—4. De temporibus ad intellectum supputacionem temporum S. Scripturæ:—5. Sententia ex Cicerone et Aristotele:—6. De Proverbiis:—7. De substantiâ democritorum:—8. Philosophia lib. IV.:—9. De Paschate sive Equinoctio liber:—10. Epistola de divinatione mortis et vitæ:—11. De Arca Noe:—12. De linguæ gælicæ:—13. Oracula Sibyllæ:—14. Historia Ecclesiasticæ Gentis Anglorum libri V., a primo Juv. Cesaris in Britanniam adventu ad ann. 731 pertinetes (Antwerp, 1550; Heideberg, 1587; Cologne, 1601, 8vo; Cambridge, 1644; Paris, with the notes of Chifflet, 1681, 4to):—15. Vita S. Cuthberti:—16. Vita SS. Felicis, Vedasti, Columbani, Attalæ, Patricii, Eustasii, Bertoldi, Arnolphi (or Arnoldi), Burgundiforæ. Of these, however, three are wrongly attributed to Bede: the life of St. Patrick is by Probus; that of St. Columbanus by Jonas; and that of St. Arnolphi, of Metz, by Paul the Deacon:—17. Carmina de Justiciæ martyrio (St. Justin beheaded at Paris under Diocletian):—18. Martyrologium. Composed, as he states, by himself, but altered and interpolated in subsequent times. See the Preface of the Bollandists, ad Januar. cap. 4, and Prolog. ad Mensur Mart. tom. ii, sec. 5. The corrupted Martyrology was given separately at Antwerp in 1564, 12mo:—19. De situ Hierosolæ, et locorum sanctorum:—20. Interpretatio nominum Hebræorum et Græcorum in S. Script. occurrence:—21. Excerpta et Collectanea. Unworthy altogether, in the opinion of Cave and Dupin, of Bede:—22. In Hæcæmeron, taken from Sts. Basil, Ambrose, and Augustine:—23. In Pentateuchum et libros Regum:—24. In Samuelem:—25. In Esdræ, Tobiam, Job (not by Bede, but by Philip of Syda, the presbyter), Proverbia, et Cantica:—26. De Tabernaculo, ac vasis et vestibus ejus:—27. Commentaria in IV Evangelia et Acta Apost.:—28. De nominibus locorum quæ in Actis Apost. leguntur:—29. Commentaria in Epp. Catholicas et Apocalypsin:—30. Retractationes et Questiones in Acta Apost.:—31. Commentaria in omnes Epist. S. Pauli; a work almost entirely compiled from St. Augustine. (The most probable opinion is that this is a work of Florus, a deacon of Lyons, whose name it bears in three or four MSS. It is, however, certain [from himself] that Bede wrote such a commentary as the present, and Mabillon states that he found in two MSS., each eight hundred years old, A Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, taken from St. Augustine, and attributed to Bede, but quite different from this which goes under his name. There can, therefore, be little doubt that the latter is the genuine work of Bede, and this of Florus):—32. Homilie de Tempore, viz., 33 for the summer, 32 for the summer festivals, 15 for the winter, 22 for Lent, 16 for the winter festivals, and various sermons to the people (Cologne, 1534):—33. Lib. de muliere forti, i. e. the Church:—34. De Officiis liber:—35. Sciëntiæ sive Locî Communes:—36. Fragmenta in libros Sapientiales et Psalterii versus:—37. De Temp. Solomonis:—38. Questiones in Octateuchum et IV libros Regum:—39. Questiones varie:—40. Commentaria in Psalmos:—41. Vocabularium Psalterii Ebraicæ:—42. De Diapsalmodia collectio:—43. Sermo in id., "Dominus de celo prospexit":—44. Commentaria in Boethii Libros de Trinitate:—45. De septem verbis Christi:—46. Meditationes Passionis Christi, per septem horas diæ:—47. De Remedis Peccatorum (his Penitential):—48. Canabula grammaticæ artis Donati:—49. De octo partibus Orationis:—50. De Arte Metricâ:—51. De Orthographiâ:—52. De schematibus S. Scripturæ:—53. De tropis S. Scripturæ; and various works relating to arithmetic, astronomy, etc. etc. All these works were collected and published at Paris, in 3 vols. fol., 1545, and again in 1554, in 8 vols.; also at Basle in 1563; at Cologne in 1612; and again in 1688, in 4 vols. fol. The Cologne edition of 1612 is very faulty. There is also a pretty complete edition in Migne, Patrol. græc. Cursus, vols. 90-96 (Paris, 1850, 6 vols., 8vo.). An edition of the historical and theological works (edited by J. A. Giles, LL.D.) was published at London in 1842-3, in 12 vols., 8vo. The best edition of the Latin text of the Historia Eclesiastica is that of Stevenson (London, 1838, 8vo.), which gives also a Life of Bede (English version by Giles, London, 1840 and 1847, 8vo.). Besides the above, we have—54. Acta S. Cuthberti, attributed to Bede, and published by Canisius, Ant. Lect. v. 692 (or ii, 4, nov. ed.):—55. Aristotelis Axiomata composita (London, 1592, 8vo.; Paris, 1604):—56. Hymns. Edited by Casander, with Scholia, among the works of that writer, 1616:—57. Epistola apologetica ad Plerimum Monachum:—58. Epistola ad Egbertum, Ebor. Antistitem:—59. Vita F. Abbatum Priorum Worcesteriensium et Gervasium, mentioned by William of Malmsbury, lib. i, cap. 3. The last three works were published by Sir James Ware at Dublin, 1664, 8vo.:—60. Epistola ad Albinum (abbot of St. Peter's at Canterbury), given by Mabillon in the first volume of his Analeceta:—61. Martyrologium, in heroic verse, given by D'Achery, Spicil. ii, 23. Many works of Bede still remain in MS.; a list is given by Cave. See Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 71; Dupin, Hist. Eccl. Writers, ii, 28; Landon, Ecl. Dict. ii, 118; Gehele, De Bedæ vita et Scriptis (1838); Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 154; North American Rev. July, 1861, art. iii; Biog. Univ. iv, 38; Engl. Cyclopædia, s. v.

Bede'iah (Heb. Bedeyah', בֵּדְיָהּ, for בֵּדְיָהּ, i. q. "Oladiah," servant of Jehovah; Sept. Baicia), one of the family of Bani, who divorced his foreign wife on the return from Babylon (Ezra x, 35). B.C. 458.

Bedell, derived by Spelman, Vossius, and others from Sax. Bēdd, which signifies a crier; thus bishops, in many old Saxon MSS., are called the "Bedells of God," præcones Dei. The name is now applied in England almost exclusively to the bedells of the universities, who carry the mace before the chancellor or vice-chancellor. Martene says that the inferior apparitors, who cited persons to court, were also called bedells.—Landon, Ecl. Dict. ii, 121.

Bedell, Gregory T., D.D., a distinguished minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born on Staten Island, Oct. 28, 1793, and graduated at Columbia College 1817. After studying theology under Dr. Hooper of Trinity, he was ordained by Bishop Hobart in 1814. His first charge was at Hudson, N. Y., where he remained from 1815 to 1818, when he removed to Fayetteville, N. C. Finding the climate unfavorable, he removed to Philadelphia in 1822, and a new church (St. Andrew's) was organized, of which he remained the faithful and devoted pastor until his death in 1834. In 1830 he was made D.D. at Dickinson College. His zeal devoured his strength; no labor seemed too great, if he could win souls; and his memory is precious among Christians of all churches in Philadelphia. He wrote a number of small religious books, and was, for several years, editor of the "Episcopal Recorder." His Sermons (Phil. 1835, 2 vols., 8vo.) were edited by Dr. Tyng, with a sketch of his life.—Sprague, Annals, v, 599; see also Tyng, Memoir of the Rev. G. T. Bedell (Phil. 1836, 2d ed.); Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 154.

Bedell, William, an Irish prelate, was born at Nottley, Essex, 1579, and educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge, where he became B.D. 1599. His first preferment was St. Edmundsbury, Suffolk, which he left in 1604 to become chaplain to Sir Henry Wotton, ambassador at Venice. At Venice he spent 8 years, and was intimate with De Dominis (q. v.) and Father Paul Sarpi (q. v.); and, on returning to England, he translated Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent into Latin. In 1627 he was appointed provost of Trinity College, Dublin, and in 1629 bishop of Kilmore and Ardagh. He set himself to reform abuses, and gave an example by relinquishing one of his dioceses (Ardagh). Through his labors many Romanists, including priests, were converted; and he had the Bible and Prayer-book translated into Irish. In 1641 he was imprisoned by the rebels, and died from his sufferings, Feb. 6. His Life, with the Letters between Wadlesworth and Bedell, was published by Bishop Burnet (London, 1685, 8vo.). See Coleridge, Works, v, 313.

Bedford, ARTHUR, an Oriental scholar of some note, was born in Gloucestershire 1668. He studied at Brazenose College, Oxford, where he passed A.M. in 1691. In 1692 he became vicar of Temple Church, Bristol, and in 1724 he was chosen chaplain to the Haberdashers' Hospital, London, where he died in 1745. Among his works are, 1. Evil and Danger of Stage-plays (London, 1706, 8vo.);—2. The Temple Music (London, 1706, 8vo.);—3. The Great Abuse of Music (8vo.);—4. An Essay on Singing David's Psalms (8vo.);—5. Animadversions on Sir Isaac Newton's Chronology (London, 1728, 8vo.);—6. A Sermon at St. Botolph's, Aldgate, against Stage-plays (1730, 8vo.);—7. Scripture Chronology (London, 1730, fol.);—8. Eight Sermons on the Doctrine of the Trinity (London, 1740, 8vo.);—9. The Doctrine of Justification by Faith stated (1741, 8vo.).—Hook, Ecl. Biog. ii, 217.

Bedstead (בֵּדְיָהּ, éres, Deut. iii, 11; elsewhere "couch," "hed"). The couches of the Jews for repose and for the use of the sick were usually perhaps simply the standing and fixed divans such as those on which the Western Asiatics commonly make their beds at night. The divan is probably meant in 2 Kings i, 4; xxi, 2; Psa. cxxxii, 4; Amos iii, 12 (Hackett's Illustra. of Script. p. 58-60). The most common bedstead in Egypt and Arabia is framed rudely of palm-sticks such as was used in Ancient Egypt. In Palestine, Syria, and Persia, where timber is more plentiful, a bed-frame of similar shape is made of boards. This kind of bedstead is also used upon the house-tops during the season in which people sleep there. It is more than likely that Og's bedstead was of this description (Deut. iii, 11). In the times in which he lived the palm-tree was more common in Palestine than at present, and the bedsteads in ordinary use were probably formed of palm-sticks. They would therefore be incapable of sustaining any undue weight without being disjointed and bent awry, and this would dictate the necessity of making that destined to sustain the vast bulk of Og rather of rods of iron than of the mid-ribs of the palm-fronds. These bedsteads are also of a length seldom more than a few inches beyond the average human stature (commonly six feet three inches), and hence the propriety with which the length of Og's bedstead is stated to convey an idea of his stature—a fact which has perplexed those who supposed there was no other bedstead than the divan, seeing that the length of the divan has no determinate reference to the stature of the persons reposing on it. There are traces of a kind of portable couch (1 Sam. xix, 15), which appears to have served as a sofa for sitting on in the daytime (1 Sam. xxviii, 3; Ezek. xxiii, 41; Amos vi, 4); and there is now the less reason to doubt that the ancient Hebrews enjoyed this convenience. Such couches were capable of receiving those ornaments of ivory which are mentioned in Amos vi, 4, which of itself shows that the Hebrews had something of the kind, forming an ornamental article of furniture. A bed with a tester is mentioned in Judith xvi, 23, which, in connection with other indications, and the frequent mention of rich tapestries hung upon and about a bed for luxuriousness and ornament, proves that such beds as are still used by royal and distinguished personages were not unknown under the Hebrew monarchy (comp. Esth. i, 6; Prov. vii, 16 sq.; Ezek. xxiii, 41). There is but little distinction of the bed from sitting furniture among the Orientals; the same article being used for nightly rest and during the day. This applies both to the divan and bedstead in all its forms, except perhaps the litter. There was also a garden-watcher's bed, מְנוּחָה, menukah, rendered variously in the Auth. Ver. "cottage" and "lodge," which seems to have been slung like a hammock, perhaps from the trees (Isa. i, 8; xxiv, 20).—KITTO. See BED; CANOPY.

Bee (דְּבוֹרָה, deborah, Gr. μέλισσα), a gregarious insect, of the family Apidae, order Hymenoptera, species Apis mellifica, commonly called the honey-bee, one of the most generally-diffused creatures on the globe. Its instincts, its industry, and the valuable product of its labors, have attracted for it universal attention from the remotest times. A prodigious number of books have been written, periodical publications have appeared, and even learned societies have been founded, with a view to promote the knowledge of the bee, and increase its usefulness to man. Poets and moralists of every age have derived from it some of their most beautiful and striking illustrations.

The following is a mere outline of the facts ascertained by Swammerdam, Maraldi, Reaumur, Schirach, Bonnet, and Huber:—Its anatomy and physiology, comprehending the antennæ, or factors, by which it exercises at least all the human senses; the eye, full of lenses, and studded with hairs to ward off the pollen or dust of flowers, and the three additional eyes on the top of the head, giving a defensive vision upward from the cups of flowers; the double stomach, the upper performing the office of the crop in birds, and regurgitating the honey, and the lower secreting the wax into various sacklets; the baskets on the thighs for carrying the pollen; the hooked feet; the union of chemical and mechanical perfection in the sting; its organs of progressive motion; its immense muscular strength:—the different sorts of bees inhabiting a hive, and composing the most perfect form of insect society, from the stately venerated queen-regnant, the mother of the whole population and their leader in migrations, down to the drone, each distinguished by its peculiar form and occupations:—the rapidity of their multiplication; the various transitions from the egg to the perfect insect; the amazing deviations from the usual laws of the animal economy; the means by which the loss of a queen is repaired, amounting to the literal creation of another; their architecture (taught by the great Geometrician, who "made all things by number, weight, and measure"), upon the principles of the most refined geometrical problem; their streets, magazines, royal apartments, houses for the citizens; their care of the young, consultations and precautions in sending forth a new colony; their military progress, fortifications, and discipline; their attachment to the hive and the common interest, yet patience under private wrongs; the subdivision of labor, by which thousands of individuals co-operate without confusion in the construction of magnificent public works; the uses they serve, as the promoting of the fructification of flowers; the amazing number and precision of their instincts, and the capability of modifying these by circumstances, so far as to raise a doubt whether they be not endowed with a portion, at least, of intelligence resembling that of man.

The bee is first mentioned in Deut. i, 44, where Moses alludes to the irresistible vengeance with which bees pursue their enemies. A similar reference to their fury in swarms is contained in Psa. cxviii, 12. The powerlessness of man under the united attacks of these insects is well attested. Pliny relates that bees were so troublesome in some parts of Crete that the inhabitants were compelled to forsake their homes, and Elian records that some places in Scythia were formerly inaccessible on account of the swarms of bees with which they were infested. Mr. Park (Travels, ii, 37) relates that at Doofroo, some of the people, being in search of honey, unfortunately disturbed a swarm of bees, which came out in great numbers, attacked both men and beasts, obliged them to fly in all directions, so that he feared an end had been put to his journey, and that one ass died the same night, and another the next morning. Even in England the stings of two exasperated hives have been known to kill a horse in a few minutes.

In Judg. xiv, 5-8, it is related that Samson, aided by supernatural strength, rent a young lion that warred against him as he would have rent a kid, and that "after a time," as he returned to take his wife, he turned aside to see the carcase of the lion, "and, behold, there was a swarm of bees and honey in the carcase of the lion." It has been hastily concluded that this narrative favors the mistaken notion of the ancients, possibly derived from misunderstanding this very account, that bees might be engendered in the dead bodies of animals (Virgil, Georg. iv), and ancient authors are quoted to testify to the aversion of bees to flesh, unpleasant smells, and filthy places. But it may readily be perceived that it is not said that the bees were bred in the body of the lion. Again, the frequently-recurring phrase "after a time," literally "after sufficient," introduced into the text, proves that at least sufficient time had elapsed for all the flesh of the animal to have been removed by birds and beasts of prey, ants, etc. The Syriac version translates "the bony carcase." Bochart remarks that the Hebrew phrase sometimes signifies a whole year, and in this passage it would seem likely to have this meaning, because such was the length of time which usually elapsed between espousal and marriage (see ver. 7). He refers to Gen. iv, 3; xxiv, 55; Lev. xxv, 29, 30; Judg. xi, 4; comp. with ver. 49; 1 Sam. i, 3; comp. with ver. 7, 20; and 1 Sam. ii, 19; and 1 Sam. xxvii, 7. The circumstance that "honey" was found in the carcase as well as bees shows that sufficient time had elapsed since their possession of it for all the flesh to be removed. Nor is such an abode for bees, probably in the skull or thorax, more unsuitable than a hollow in a rock, or in a tree, or in the ground, in which we know they often reside, or those clay nests which they build for themselves in Brazil. Nor is the fact without parallel. Herodotus (v, 14) relates that a swarm of bees took up their abode in the skull of one Silius, an ancient invader of Cyprus, which they filled with honey-combs, after the inhabitants had suspended it over the gate of their city. A similar story is told by Aldrovandus (De Insectis, i, 119) of some bees that inhabited and built their combs in a human skeleton in a tomb in a church at Verona. In Eccles. xi, 3, the production of honey by bees, and its use as food, are also mentioned. Bees must have been very common in Palestine to justify the title given to it of a land flowing with milk and honey. They are still abundant there (Shaw, Trav. p. 292 sq.; Oudemann, Natural, vi, 136), and mentioned in the Talmud (Cholin, xvi, 7; Sabb. xxiv, 3). See Philo, Cyp. ii, 63; Bochart, iii, 752. See HONEY.

The reference to the bee in Isa. vii, 18, has been misunderstood: "The Lord shall hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost parts of the river of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria." Here the fly and the bee are no doubt personifications of those inveterate enemies of Israel, the Egyptians and Assyrians, whom the Lord threatened to excite against his disobedient people. But the hissing for them has been interpreted, even by modern writers of eminence, as involving "an allusion to the practice of calling out the bees from their hives, by a hissing or whistling sound, to their labor in the fields, and summoning them to return when the heavens begin to lower, or the shades of evening to fall" (Dr. Harris's Natural History of the Bible, London, 1825). No one has offered any proof of the existence of such a custom, and the idea will itself seem sufficiently strange to all who are acquainted with the habits of bees. The true allusion is, no doubt, to the custom of the people of the East, and even of many parts of Europe, of calling the attention of any one in the street, etc., by a significant hiss, or rather hiss, as Lowth translates the word both here and in Isa. v, 26, but which is generally done in this country by a short significant hem! or other exclamation. Hissing, or rather hissing, is in use among us for setting a dog on any object. Hence the sense of the threatening is, I will direct the hostile attention of the Egyptians and Assyrians against you.—Kitto.

In the Septuagint version there is an allusion to the bee, immediately after that of the ant (Prov. vi, 8), which may be thus rendered—"Or go to the bee, and learn how industrious she is, and what a magnificent work she produces; whose labors kings and common people use for their health. And she is desired and praised by all. And though weak in strength, yet prizing wisdom, she prevails." This passage is not now found in any Hebrew copy, and Jerome informs us that it was wanting in his time. Neither is it contained in any other version except the Arabic. It is nevertheless quoted by many ancient writers, as Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. i; Origen, in Nam. Hom. 27, and in Isai. Hom. 2; Basil, Hexameron, Hom. 8; Amrose, v, 21; Jerome, in Ezek. iii; Theodoret, De Prædicatione, Orat. 5; Antiochus, Abbas Sabbæ, Hom. 36; and John Damascenus, ii, 89. It would seem that it was in the Heb. copy used by the Greek translators. The ant and the bee are mentioned together by many writers, because of their similar habits of industry and economy. For the natural history and habits of the bee, see the Penny Cyclopædia, s. v. See SWARM.

Beecham, JONAS, D.D., an eminent English Methodist minister, was born in Lincolnshire, 1787. Converted at an early age, he united with the Methodists, and thereby lost the patronage of some friends who designed to educate him for the ministry in the Established Church. In 1815 he entered the Wesleyan ministry, and for sixteen years he labored in circuits with growing usefulness and esteem. His studious habits enabled him early to lay deep foundations in theological knowledge, and his fidelity in his work was equal to the breadth of his acquirements. In 1831 he was appointed one of the general secretaries of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, and in this highly responsible office he continued to labor, with the entire confidence of the Church, up to the time of his death. In administering foreign missions he combined largeness of views with careful attention to detail; and it is not too much to say that the wonderful success of the Methodist missions during the last quarter of a century is due largely to his skill and diligence. In 1855 he visited the eastern provinces of British North America, and died April 22, 1856. He wrote many of the missionary reports, and also An Essay on the Constitution of Wesleyan Methodism (Lond. 1850, 8vo). —Wesleyan Messenger (Lond. 1856), p. 30; Wesleyan Magazine, July, 1856.

Beecher, JACOB, a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born near Petersburg, Adams Co., Penn., May 2d, 1799, and studied first at an academy in Hagerstown, Md., and afterward in Jefferson College, Cannonsburg, Penn.; pursued his theological studies first at Princeton Seminary, and afterward continued them, in connection with the German language, in the newly-established Theological Seminary of the German Reformed Church, then located at Carlisle, Penn. He was licensed and ordained in 1826. He immediately took charge of the German Reformed Church of Shepherdstown, Va., together with several affiliated congregations. His health was always feeble. With the hope of improving it, he spent the winter of 1830-31 in the South, in the service of the American Sunday School Union. He died July 15th, 1831. Though his life and the period of his labors were brief, such were his piety and zeal that few ministers are more sacredly remembered in the German Reformed Church. He preached both in the German and English languages.

Beecher, Lyman, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister, was born at New Haven, Conn., October 12th, 1775. His father, David Beecher, was a blacksmith, "whose strong, positive character, whose many eccentricities, and whose great dark eyes gave him a celebrity in all the country round. As a boy he was placed with his uncle, Lot Benton, to learn farming, but it was soon found that his bent did not lie that way, and he was sent to Yale College, where he graduated A.B. in 1797. During his college career he earned no distinction by scholarly acquirements, but was early noticed as a remarkably vigorous and original thinker and reasoner. In a debate on baptism, started among the students, he took the Baptist side, 'because,' as he said, 'no one else would take it.' He studied theology with Dr. Dwight for one year, and was licensed to preach by the New Haven West Association in 1798. In 1799 he was ordained, and installed as pastor at East Hampton, Long Island, where he remained eleven years, at a salary of $300 a year. In 1810 he removed to Litchfield, Conn., then the seat of a famous law-school, in which many of the statesmen of the last generation were trained. Here he spent sixteen years of indefatigable pastoral labor, and here, too, he wrote his famous 'Six Sermons on Intemperance,' which were suggested by the sudden downfall of two of his most intimate friends. In 1826 he accepted a call to the Hanover Street Church, Boston, where he spent six years of immense activity and popularity, distinguished also by the boldness and success with which he opposed Dr. Channing and grappled Unitarianism, which has never since been as dominant in Boston as before. In 1832 he accepted the presidency of Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, in which service, and that of the Second Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, he remained during twenty eventful years. In 1833 seventy students withdrew from the seminary on account of a stupid rule, adopted by the trustees in Dr. Beecher's absence, with regard to the discussion of slavery, and this secession laid the foundation of Oberlin College. Oddly enough, Dr. Beecher, himself an abolitionist, and the father of Abolitionists, was now the head of an institution stigmatized as 'proslavery.' The doctrinal views of Dr. Beecher had always been moderately Calvinistic, and he was charged by some of the stronger Calvinists with heresy. A trial ensued, ending in 1835, by the adoption of resolutions to which Dr. Beecher assented; but the controversy went on until at last the Presbyterian Church (q. v.) was rent in twain by it. In 1852 Dr. Beecher resigned the presidency of the seminary and returned to Boston. His declining years were spent in Brooklyn, where he died Jan. 10th, 1863. He was three times married, and was the father of thirteen children, of whom several have risen to eminence: Edward, Henry Ward, Charles, and Thomas as preachers, and Catharine and Harriet (Mrs. Stowe, the author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin") as writers. He had a vigorous organization, both physical and mental, and was equally noted for boldness and kindness. As an orator, he was one of the most peculiar, brilliant, and effective of his day. By nature he was a strong reasoner, yet he reasoned rather in the style of an advocate, aiming at a point, than of a judge or a statesman, aiming to cover a whole field of discussion. He spoke and wrote always for some immediate purpose." Albert Barnes states that "no oratory he ever heard equalled Beecher's in his grand flights." Dr. Noah Porter (New Englander, xxiii, 354) characterizes Dr. Beecher as follows: "As a preacher, Dr. Beecher was deservedly eminent. But it would be a mistake to account him a ranter, or a fervid declaimer, or an energetic exhorter, or a devout rhapsodist. He was a thinker and a reasoner. His own sturdy and thoughtful intellect could be satisfied with no aliment less substantial than solid reasoning and sound common sense, and he could not bring himself to present to other minds any material different from that which he required for himself. But reasoning in a sermon for the sake of its ingenuity, or speculation for mere speculation's sake, his own soul abhorred. He must needs bring every argument to its practical conclusion, and then press it upon the conscience and the heart with all the power which fervor, and energy, and tact could furnish. Plain language, apt illustrations, and fervent appeals, were the investments with which his nice sense of adaptation and his apostolical love of souls led him to clothe his reasonings. He did not trust exclusively or chiefly to his extemporaneous power, rare and serviceable as this might be. On many single discourses he bestowed the labor of weeks, and the felicity and choiceness of the language, as well as the arrangement and power of the thoughts, testify to the value of the labor and time expended. Some of his ablest occasional discourses will never cease to be models of the noblest kind of pulpit eloquence. As a reformer he was enterprising, bold, and judicious. The secret of his power and success lay in his firm faith in the power of truth as adapted to change the moral convictions of men, and thus to reform the sentiments and practices of society, and, as designed in the purposes of God, to accomplish great revolutions by means of its faithful proclamation. His policy was bold, because he believed in God. He was enterprising, because he was assured that the cause was not his own. He was judicious, because his heart was set upon the work to be accomplished, and not upon any traditional ways of procedure on the one side, or any novel devices on the other. Hence he was inventive and docile; skilful by his quiet discernment to judge when the old methods were outworn, and fertile to devise those untried expedients which were best fitted to the ends which he believed could and should be accomplished. He was all things to all men, in the good sense of the phrase, because the apostolic feeling was eminent in him, that by any means he might save some. But in all his reforming movements his public spirit was conspicuous in a large-hearted sympathy with the public interests, and an intense personal concern for the Church, his country, and his race. This led him, when in an obscure parish on the farthest extremity of Long Island, to lay upon his own soul the responsibility for the practice of duelling, and to sound the trumpet note which rung throughout the land. This induced him to sympathize with the feeble churches in the thinly-peopled and decaying towns of Connecticut, and to lay the duty of sisterly sympathy and aid upon the wealthier parishes. This moved him to see and feel the wasting desolations of intemperance, not in this or that family or social circle in Litchfield alone, but to make this family and circle the image of thousands of families and communities throughout the country, till the word of the Lord was a fire in his bones, and he could not but lift his voice in the appalling ing energy of a commissioned prophet. The prevalence of dangerous error depressed and vexed his spirit till it found relief in plans, and protests, and movements which were felt through New England. As a theologian he was thoroughly practical, and his views of theology were moulded by a constant reference to its manifest adaptation to the great end for which a revelation was given to man." His autobiography and life, edited by the Rev. Charles Beecher, appeared in 1861 5 (N. Y. 2 vols. 12mo). His writings, chiefly sermons, temperance essays, lectures, and review articles, were collected substantially, and published under his own supervision, in the Works of Lyman Beecher, D.D. (Boston, 1852, 3 vols. 8vo; vol. i, Lectures on Political Atheism; vol. ii, Sermons; vol. iii, Views in Theology).—Wilson, Presbyterian Almanac, 1861; Amer. Theological Journal, Feb. 1863; Autobiography of Dr. Lyman Beecher (N. Y. 1864-5, 2 vols. 12mo); Bibliotheca Sacra, April, 1852; New Englander, April, 1864.

Beēli'ada (Heb. Beelgādā', בְּעִלְיָאָדָא, whom Daal knows; Sept. 'Ελαάδ' v. r. Βελλαάδ.), one of David's sons, born in Jerusalem (1 Chron. xiv. 7). B.C. post 1045. In the parallel lists (1 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chron. iii. 8) he is called by the equivalent name ELLADA, El being, perhaps, originally in the name rather than Beel. See BAAL-.

Beēl'sarus (Βεελαραρος), one of the chief Israelites ("guides") that returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Esdr. v. 8); evidently the BELSARUS (q. v.) of the genuine texts (Ezra ii, 2; Neh. vii. 7).

Beēl'teth'mus (Βεελαθημος v. r. Βεελαθημόθ, Vulg. Balthomus, given as the name of an officer of Alexander residing in Palestine (1 Esdr. ii, 16, 25); evidently a corruption of בְּעִלְיָאָדָא, lord of judgment, A. V. "chancellor;" the title of Rehūm, the name immediately before it (Ezra iv, 8).

Beēl'zebub (Βεελαζεβουβ, BEELZEBUB) is the name assigned (Matt. x. 25; xii, 24; Mark iii, 24; Luke xi, 15 sq.) to the prince of the demons. It is remarkable that, amid all the demonology of the Talmud and rabbinical writers, this name should be exclusively confined to the New Testament. There is no doubt that the reading Beelzebub is the one which has the support of almost every critical authority; and the Beelzebub of the Peshito (if indeed it is not a corruption, as Michaelis thinks, Suppl. p. 205), and of the Vulgate, and of some modern versions, has probably been accommodated to the name of the Philistine god BAAL-ZEBUB (q. v.). Some of those who consider the latter to have been a reverential title for that god believe that Beelzebub is a willful corruption of it, in order to make it contemptible. It is a fact that the Jews are very fond of turning words into ridicule by such changes of letters as will convert them into words of contemptible signification (e. g. Sychar, Beth-aven). Of this usage Lightfoot gives many instances (Hor. Heb. ad Matth. xii, 21). Beelzebub, then, is considered to mean בְּעִלְיָאָדָא, i. q. dang-god. Some connect the term with בְּעִלְיָאָדָא, habitation, thus making Beelzebub δαίμων κατοικήσας (Matt. x, 25), the lord of the dwelling, whether as the "prince of the power of the air" (Eph. ii, 2), or as the prince of the lower world (Paulus, quoted by Olshausen, Comment. in Matt. x, 25), or as inhabiting human bodies (Schleusner, Lez. s. v.), or as occupying a mansion in the seventh heaven, like Saturn in Oriental mythology (Movers, Phoen. i, 200). Hug supposes that the idy, under which Baalzebub was represented, was the Scarabaeus pilularius, or dung-hill beetle, in which case Baalzebub and Beelzebub might be used indifferently. — Kitto, s. v; Smith, s. v. Beē'cr (Heb. Be'ar, בְּעָר, a well), a local proper name, denoting, whether by itself or in composition, BEER-, the presence of an artificial well of water. See WELL. It was thus distinguished from the frequent prefix EX- (q. v.), which designated a natural spring. There were two places known by this name simply. See the compounds in their alphabetical order.

1. (With the art., בְּעָרָא; Sept. ὁ φρέαρ.) A place in the desert, on the confines of Moab, where the Hebrew princes, by the direction of Moses, dug a well with their staves, being the forty-fourth station of the Hebrews in their wanderings from Egypt to Canaan (Num. xxi, 16-18). It seems to have been situated in the south part of the plain Ard Ramadan, not very far north-east of Dibon. See EXODE. The "wilderness" (בְּעָרָא), which is named as their next starting-point in the last clause of ver. 18, may be that before spoken of in 13, or it may be a copyist's mistake for בְּעָרָא. So the Sept., who read καὶ ἀπὸ φρέατος—"and from the well," i. e. "from Beer." Probably the same place is called more fully Beer-elim in Isa. xv, 8. (See Ortlieb, De fonte baculis fesso, Lpz. 1718.)

According to the tradition of the Targumists—a tradition in part adopted by the apostle Paul (1 Cor. x, 4), this was one of the appearances, the last before the entrance into the Holy Land, of the water which had "followed" the people, from its first arrival at Rephidim, through their wanderings. The water, so the tradition appears to have run, was granted for the sake of Miriam, her merit being that, at the peril of her life, she had watched the ark in which lay the infant Moses. It followed the march over mountains and into valleys, encircling the entire camp, and furnishing water to every man at his own tent door. This it did till her death (Num. xx, 1), at which time it disappeared for a season, apparently rendering a special act necessary on each future occasion for its evocation. The striking of the rock at Kadesh (Num. xx, 11) was the first of these; the digging of the well at Beer by the staves of the princes, the second. Miriam's well at last found a home in a gulf or recess in the sea of Galilee, where at certain seasons its water flowed, and was resorted to for healing purposes (Targums of Onkelos and Pseudo-Jon., Num. xx, 1; xxi, 18, and also the quotations in Lightfoot on John v, 4).—Smith, s. v.

2. (Sept. Vat. Baijo; the Alex. entirely alters the passage—καὶ ἐπιποθήσῃ ἐν ὄρεσιν καὶ ἐργυρεῖ ἐν Παράδῃ; Vulg. in Bera.) A town in the tribe of Judah, to which Jotham fled for fear of Abimelech (Judg. ix, 21). Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Βηρά, Bera) place Beer in the great plain eight Roman miles north of Eleutheropolis; perhaps the well near Deir Dubban. By many this place is identified with BEEROTH (q. v.).

Beō'ra (Heb. Be'ra', בְּעָרָא, a Chaldaizing form = the well; Sept. Βεραά), the last son of Zophai, a descendant of Asher (1 Chron. vii, 37). B.C. long post 1612.

Beō'rah (Heb. Be'rah', בְּעָרָא, i. q. Beera, the well; Sept. Βεραά v. r. Βερα), the son of Baal, a prince (שָׂרֵי) of the tribe of Reuben, carried into captivity by the Assyrian Tiglath-Pileser (1 Chron. v, 6). B.C. cir. 738.

Beēr-e'lim (Heb. Be'ar E'im', בְּעָרַיִם, well of heroes; Sept. τὸ φρέαρ τοῦ Ἀδαιμ; Vulg. puteus Elim), a spot named in Isa. xv, 8, as on the "border of Moab," apparently the south, Egla'im being at the north end of the Dead Sea. The name points to the well dug by the chiefs of Israel on their approach to the promised land, close by the "border of Moab" (Num. xxi, 16; comp. ver. 13), and such is the suggestion of Gesenius (Jesur. p. 533). See BEER simply. Beer-Elim was probably chosen by the prophet out of other places on the boundary on account of the similarity between the sound of the name and that of בְּעָרָא—"the howling," which was to reach even to that remote point (Ewald, Proph. p. 233).—Smith, s. v.

Be'eri (Heb. Be'eri, בְּעֵרִי, fontanus, according to Gesen.; enlightener, according to Fürst; Sept. Beip in Gen., Beipos in Hos.), the name of two men.

1. The father of Judith, one of the wives of Esau (Gen. xxvi, 34). B. C. ante 1963. See ESAU. Judith, daughter of Beeri, is the same person that is called in the genealogical table (Gen. xxxv, 2) Abolibamah, daughter of Anah, and consequently Beeri and Anah must be the same person. See ABOLIBAMAH. Yet Beeri is spoken of as a Hittite, while Anah is called a Horite and also a Hivite. See ANAH. It is agreed on all hands that the name Horite (חֹרִי) signifies one who dwells in a hole or cave, a Troglodyte; and it seems in the highest degree probable that the inhabitants of Mount Seir were so designated because they inhabited the numerous caverns of that mountainous region. The name, therefore, does not designate them according to their race, but merely according to their mode of life, to whatever race they might belong. Of their race we know nothing, except, indeed, what the conjunction of these two names in reference to the same individual may teach us; and from this case we may fairly conclude that these Troglodytes or Horites belonged in part, at least, to the widely-extended Canaanitish tribe of the Hittites. On this supposition the difficulty vanishes, and each of the accounts gives us just the information we might expect. In the narrative, where the stress is laid on Esau's wife being of the race of Canaan, her father is called a Hittite; while in the genealogy, where the stress is on Esau's connection by marriage with the previous occupants of Mount Seir, he is most naturally and properly described under the more precise term Horite.—Smith, s. v. See HORITE; HIVITE; HITTITE.

2. The father of the prophet Hosea (Hos. i, 1). B. C. ante 725.

Be'er-lahai-roi (Heb. Be'er Lachay' Roi, בְּעַרְלַחַיִּי רֹאִי, signifying, according to the explanation in the text where it first occurs, well of [to] life of vision [or, of the living and seeing God], i. e. survivorship after beholding the theophany; but, according to the natural derivation, well of the cheek-bone [rock] of vision; Sept. in Gen. xvi, 14, ὄψαρος ὀρίων ἕϊρον, in Gen. xxiv, 62, τὸ ὄψαρος τῆς ὀπίσσω; Vulg. puteus viventis et videntis me), a well, or rather a living spring (A. V. "fountain," comp. ver. 7), between Kadesh and Be'ed, in the wilderness, "in the way to Shur," and therefore in the "south country" (Gen. xxiv, 62), which seems to have been so named by Hagar because God saw her (רָאָה) there (Gen. xvi, 14). From the fact of this etymology not being in agreement with the formation of the name (more legitimately, בְּעַרְלַחַיִּי רֹאִי), it has been suggested (Gesenius, Thes. p. 175) that the origin of the name is LEH (q. v.) (Judg. xv, 9, 19), the scene of Samson's adventure, which was not far from this neighborhood. By this well Isaac dwelt both before and after the death of his father (Gen. xxiv, 62; xxv, 11). In both these passages the name is given in the A. V. as "the well Lahai-roi." Mr. Rowland announces the discovery of the well Lahai-roi at Mople or Molahi, a station on the road to Beersheba, ten hours south of Rubeihel, near which is a hole or cavern bearing the name of Be't Hayir (Williams, Holy City, i, 465); but this requires confirmation. This well is possibly the same with that by which the life of Ishmael was preserved on a subsequent occasion (Gen. xxi, 19), but which, according to the Moslems, is the well Zem-zem at Mecca.—Smith.

Be'er'roth (Heb. Be'er'roth, בְּעֵרְרוֹת, wells; Sept. Bepōrōs, Bepōrōs, Bepōrōs), one of the four cities of the Hivites who deluded Joshua into a treaty of peace with them, the other three being Gibeon, Chephirah, and Kirjath-jearim (Josh. ix, 17). Beeroth was with the rest of these towns allotted to Benjamin (Josh. xviii, 25), in whose possession it continued at the time of David, the murderers of Ishbosheth being named as belonging to it (2 Sam. iv, 2). From the notice in this place (ver. 2, 3), it would appear that the original inhabitants had been forced from the town, and had taken refuge at Gittaim (Neh. xi, 34), possibly a Philistine city. Beeroth is once more named with Chephirah and Kirjath-jearim in the list of those who returned from Babylon (Ezra ii, 25; Neh. vii, 29; 1 Esdr. v, 19). Besides Bannah and Rechab, the murderers of Ishbosheth, with their father Rimmon, we find Nahari "the Beerothite" (2 Sam. xxiii, 37), or "the Berothite" (1 Chron. xi, 39), one of the "mighty men" of David's guard.—Smith, s. v. See also BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN.

The name of Beeroth is the plural of BEER, and it has therefore been taken by many for the same place. Eusebius and Jerome, however, both distinguish it from Beer (Oriens, s. v. Bepōrōs), although there has been much misunderstanding; of their language respecting it (see Reiland, Palest. p. 618, 619). The former says that it could be seen in passing from Jerusalem to Nicopolis, at the seventh mile; a description that to this day is true of a place still bearing the corresponding name of el-Bireh, which, since Maundrell's time, has been identified with this locality (Journey, March 25). According to Robinson (Researches, ii, 132), the traveller in that direction sees el-Bireh on his right after a little more than two hours from Jerusalem. Jerome, on the other hand, apparently misconceiving Eusebius as meaning that Beeroth was on the road, from which he says it is visible, changes "Nicopolis" to "Neapolis," which still leaves the distance and direction sufficiently exact. Bireh is mentioned under the name of Bira by Brocard (vii, 278), in whose time it was held by the Templars. By the Crusaders and the later ecclesiastics it was erroneously confounded with the ancient Michmash. Bireh is situated on the ridge, running from east to west, which bounds the northern prospect, as beheld from Jerusalem and its vicinity, and may be seen from a great distance north and south. It is now a large village, with a population of 700 Moslems. The houses are low, and many of them half underground. Many large stones and various substructions evince the antiquity of the site; and there are remains of a fine old church of the time of the Crusades (Richter, Wallfahrten, p. 54). According to modern local tradition it was the place at which the parents of "the child Jesus" discovered that he was not among their "company" (Luke ii, 43-45); and it is a fact that the spring of el-Bireh is even to this day the customary resting-place for caravans going northward, at the end of the first day's journey from Jerusalem (Stanley, Palest. p. 215; Lord Nugent, ii, 112).

Be'er'roth-be'nè-Ja'akan (Heb. Be'er'roth' Beney' Yaakan, בְּעֵרְרוֹת בְּנֵי יָאָקָן, wells of the sons of Jaakan; Sept. Bepōrōs vōr Yaakip), a place through which the Israelites twice passed in the desert, being their twenty-seventh and thirty-third station on the way from Egypt to Canaan (Num. xxxiii, 31, 32; Deut. x, 6). See EXODE. From a comparison of these passages (in the former of which it is called simply BENE-JAAKAN, and in the latter partly translated "Beeroth of the children of Jaakan"), it appears to have been situated in the valley of the Arabah, not far from Mount Hor (Mosera or Moseroth), in the direction of Kadesh-Barnea, and may therefore have well represented the tract including the modern fountains in that region, called Ain el-Ghamr, Ain el-Weitch, el-Hufeiry, el-Buweiridh, etc., lying within a short distance of each other. Jaakan (or ARAK) was a descendant of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi, 27; 1 Chr. i, 42), and the territory designated by the name of his children may therefore naturally be sought in this vicinity (see Browne's Ordo Sacrorenm, p. 270). Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii, 583) inclines to identify this place with Moseroth, on account of the statement of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.) that Beeroth Bene Jaakan was extant in their day ten Roman miles from Petra, on the top of the mountain—probably a conjectural tradition. Schwarz's confusion of Wady and Jebel Araf es-Nakob in the interior of the desert et-Tih with this place, under the name of Anuka (Pal. St. p. 213), is unworthy of farther notice.

Beë'rothite (Heb. Be'rothi', בְּרוֹתִי; Sept. Βηροθιαι v. r. Βηροθιαίοι), an inhabitant of BEEROTH (q. v.) of Benjamin (2 Sam. iv, 2; xxiii, 37).

Beer's-sheba (Heb. Be'er' She'ba, בְּעֵר שֶׁבַע, in pause Be'er' Shi'ba, בְּעֵר שֶׁבַע, we'lof swearing, or well of seven; Sept. in Gen. ὄψαρον τοῦ ὀψαροῦ or τοῦ ὀψαρον; in Josh. and later books, Βηροθβέ; Josephus, Ant. i, 12, 1, Βηροθβαι, which he immediately interprets by ὄψαρον ὀψαρον), the name of one of the oldest places in Palestine, and which formed the southern limit of the country. There are two accounts of the origin of the name. According to the first, the well was dug by Abraham, and the name given, because there he and Abimelech, the king of the Philistines, "swore" (בְּעֵר) both of them (Gen. xxi, 31). But the compact was ratified by the setting apart of "seven ewe lambs" and as the Hebrew word for "seven" is שֶׁבַע, Shebet, it is equally possible that this is the meaning of the name. The other narrative ascribes the origin of the name to an occurrence almost precisely similar, in which both Abimelech, the king of the Philistines, and Phicol, his chief captain, are again concerned, with the difference that the person on the Hebrew side of the transaction is Isaac instead of Abraham (Gen. xxvi, 31-33). Here there is no reference to the "seven" lambs, and we are left to infer the derivation of Shebeah (שֶׁבַע, Shebah', not "Shebah," as in the Auth. Vers.) from the mention of the "swearing" (בְּעֵר) in ver. 31. These two accounts, however, appear to be adjusted by the statement in ver. 18 that this was one of the wells originally dug by Abraham, to which Isaac, on reopening them, assigned the same names given them by his father.

Beer-sheba appears to have been a favorite abode of both these patriarchs. After the digging of the well Abraham planted a "grove" (עֵשֶׂב, E'shel') as a place for the worship of Jehovah, such as constituted the temples of those early times; and here he lived until the sacrifice of Isaac, and for a long time afterward (xxi, 33; xxii, 1, 19). This seems to imply the growth of the place into a considerable town. Here also Isaac was dwelling at the time of the transference of the birthright from Esau to Jacob (xxvi, 33; xxviii, 10), and from the patriarchal encampment round the wells of his grandfather Jacob set forth on the journey to Mesopotamia which changed the course of his whole life. Jacob does not appear to have revisited the place until he made it one of the stages of his journey down to Egypt. He then halted there to offer sacrifice to "the God of his father," doubtless under the sacred grove of Abraham. From this time till the conquest of the country we only catch a momentary glimpse of Beer-sheba in the lists of the "cities" in the extreme south of Judah (xxv, 28) given to the tribe of Simeon (xix, 2; 1 Chr. iv, 28). Samuel's sons were appointed deputy judges for the southernmost districts in Beer-sheba (1 Sam. viii, 2), its distance no doubt precluding its being among the number of the "holy cities" (Sept.), to which he himself went in circuit every year (vii, 16). By the times of the monarchy it had become recognised as the most southerly place of the country. Its position, as the place of arrival and departure for the caravans trading between Palestine and the countries lie-ing in that direction, would naturally lead to the formation of a town round the wells of the patriarchs, and the great Egyptian trade begun by Solomon must have increased its importance. Hither Joab's census extended (2 Sam. xxiv, 7; 1 Chr. xxi, 2), and here Elijah bade farewell to his confidential servant (1 Kings xix, 3) before taking his journey across the desert to Sinai (1 Kings xix, 3). From Dan to Beersheba (Judg. xx, 1, etc.), or from Beersheba to Dan (1 Chr. xxi, 2; comp. 2 Sam. xxiv, 2), now became the established formula for the whole of the Promised Land; just as "from Gela to Beersheba" (2 Kings xxiii, 8), or "from Beersheba to Mount Ephraim" (2 Chr. xix, 4), was that for the southern kingdom after the disruption. After the return from the captivity the formula is narrowed still more, and becomes "from Beersheba to the Valley of Hinnom" (Neh. xi, 30). One of the wives of Ahaziah, king of Judah, Zibiah, mother of Joash, was a native of Beersheba (2 Kings xii, 1; 2 Chr. xxiv, 1). From the incidental references of Amos, we find that, like Bethel and Gilgal, the place was, in the time of Uzziah, the seat of an idolatrous worship, apparently connected in some intimate manner with the northern kingdom (Amos v, 5; viii, 14). But the allusions are so slight that nothing can be gathered from them, except that, in the latter of the two passages quoted above, we have perhaps preserved a form of words or an adjuration used by the worshippers, "Live the 'way' of Beersheba!" After this, with the mere mention that Beersheba and the villages round it ("daughters") were re-inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi, 30), the name dies entirely out of the Bible records. In the New Testament it is not once mentioned; nor is it referred to as then existing by any writer earlier than Eusebius and Jerome, in the fourth century, who describe it as a large village (Onomast. κόμη μεγάλη, vicus grandis), and the seat of a Roman garrison. The latter elsewhere (Quest. ad Gen. xvii, 30) calls it a "town" (oppidum). In the centuries before and after the Moslem conquest it is mentioned among the episcopal cities of Palestine (Reiland, Palast. p. 620), but none of its bishops are anywhere named. The site seems to have been almost forgotten (see De Vitriaco, Gesta Dei per Francos, p. 1070) till the fourteenth century, when Sir John Maundeville, Rudolf de Suchem, and William de Baldensel recognised the name at a place which they passed on their route from Sinai to Hebron. It was then uninhabited, but some of the churches were still standing. From that time till the recent visit of Dr. Robinson the place remained unvisited and unknown, except for the slight notice obtained by Setzen from the Arabs (Zach's Monatl. Corresp. xvii, 143). Dr. Robinson gives a clear idea of the southernmost district of Palestine, in which is Beersheba, and with which the book of Genesis has connected so many interesting associations. Coming from the south, he emerged from the desert by a long and gradual ascent over swelling hills scantily covered with grass. The summit of this ascent afforded a view over a broad barren tract, bounded on the horizon by the mountains of Judah south of Hebron: "We now felt that the desert was at an end. Descending gradually, we came out upon an open undulating country; the shrubs ceased, or nearly so; green grass was seen along the lesser water-courses, and almost greensward; while the gentle hills, covered in ordinary seasons with grass and rich pasture, were now burnt over with drought. In three quarters of an hour we reached Wady es-Seba, a wide water-course or bed of a torrent, running here W.S.W., upon whose northern side, close upon the bank, are two deep wells, still called Lir es-Seba, the ancient Beersheba. We had entered the borders of Palestine!" (Researches, i, 301). There are at present on the spot two principal wells, and five smaller ones. The former, apparently the only ones seen by Robinson, lie just a hundred yards apart, and are so placed as to be visible from a considerable distance (Bonar, Laul of Prom. p. 1). The larger of the two, which lies to the east, is, according to the careful measurements of Dr. Robinson, 12½ feet diam., and at the time of his visit (Apr. 12) was 44½ feet to the surface of the water; the masonry which encloses the well reaches downward for 28½ feet. The other well is 5 feet diam., and was 42 feet to the water. The curb-stones round the mouth of both wells are worn into deep grooves by the action of the ropes of so many centuries, and "look as if filled or fluted all round." Round the larger well there are nine, and round the smaller five large stone troughs, some much worn and broken, others nearly entire, lying at a distance of 10 or 12 feet from the edge of the well. There were formerly ten of these troughs at the larger well. The circle around is carpeted with a sward of fine short grass, with crocuses and lilies (Bonar, p. 5, 6, 7). The water is excellent, the best, as Dr. Robinson emphatically records, which he had tasted since leaving Sinai. The five lesser wells, apparently the only ones seen by Van de Velde, are, according to his account and the casual notice of Bonar, in a group in the bed of the wady, not on its north bank, and at a great distance from the other two. No ruins are at first visible; but, on examination, foundations of former dwellings have been traced, dispersed loosely over the low hills, to the north of the wells, and in the hollows between. They seem to have been built chiefly of round stones, although some of the stones are squared and some hewn, suggesting the idea of a small straggling city. There are no trees or shrubs near the spot. The site of the wells is nearly midway between the southern end of the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean at Raphaea, or twenty-seven miles south-east from Gaza, and about the same distance south by west from Hebron (20 Roman miles in the Onomast.; comp. Josephus, Ant. viii, 13, 7). Its present Arabic name, Dir es-Saba, means "well of the seven," which some take to be the signification also of Beersheba, in allusion to the seven ewe-lambs which Abraham gave to Abimelech in token of the oath between them. There is no ground for rendering it by "seven wells," as some have done.—Smith, s. v.; Kitto, s. v. See SHEBAH.

Beesh'terah (Heb. Beesh'terah', בְּעֵשְׂתֵּרָה, prob. house of Ashtaré; Sept. ἡ Βοσσηά v. r. Βεθθαία; Vulg. Bosra), one of the two Levitical cities allotted to the sons of Gershon, out of the tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan (Josh. xxi, 27). In the parallel list (1 Chron. vi, 71) it appears to be identical with ASHTAROTH (q. v.). In fact, the name is merely a contracted form of Beth-Ashtaroth, the "temple of Ashtoreth" (Gesenius, Thes. p. 196; comp. 175).—Smith, s. v.

Beetle (כְּנֵפֶיז chargo', q. d. "leaper") occurs only in Lev. xi, 22, where it is mentioned as one of four fly-like creeping things, that go upon all four, which have legs above their feet to leap withal upon the earth, which the Israelites were permitted to eat. The other three are the locust, the bald locust, and the grasshopper, respectively rendered by the Sept. βροχίλος, ἀράκη, and ἀκρίε, while they translate chargo by ὀροπάχη (q. d. "serpent-fighter"), which Suidas explains as being a wingless locust (εἶδος ἀκρίδος, ἢ ἔχον πρῶτά). Pliny (xi, 29) and Aristotle (Hist. Anim. ix, 6) mention locusts that are serpent-destroyers. This Heb. word cannot mean the beetle. No species of scarabeus was ever used as food by the Jews, or perhaps any other nation. Nor does any known species answer to the generic description given in the preceding verse: "This ye may eat of every winged creeper which goeth upon four (feet); that which hath joints at the upper part of its hind legs, to leap with them upon the earth" (comp. Niebuhr, Descríp. de l'Arabie, Copenhagen, 1773, p. 33). Hence it is plain that the chargo is some winged creeper, which has at least four feet, which leaps with its two hind jointed legs, and which we might expect, from the permission, to find actually used as food. This description agrees exactly with the locust-tribe of insects, which are well known to have been eaten by the common people in the East from the earliest times to the present day. This conclusion is also favored by the derivation of the word, which signifies to gallop like the English grasshopper and French sauterelle. Although no known variety of locust answers the above description of Pliny and Aristotle, and, indeed, the existence of any such species is denied by Cuvier (Grand-saque's ed. of Pliny, Par. 1828, p. 451, note), yet a sort of ichneumon locust is found in the genus Truxalis (fiere or cruel), inhabiting Africa and China, and comprehending many species, which hunts and preys upon insects. It is also called the Truxalis nasutus, or long-nosed. May not, then, this winged, leaping, insectivorous locust, and its various species, be "the chargo, after its kind," and the ὀροπάχη of the Septuagint? or might the name have arisen from the similarity of shape and color, which is striking, between the Truxalis nasutus and the ichneumon; just as the locust generally is, at this time, called carabotte by the Italians, on account of its resemblance in shape to the horse? We know that the ancients indulged in tracing the many resemblances of the several parts of locusts to those of other animals (Bochart, Hieroz. pt. ii, lib. iv, c. 5, p. 475). It may be observed that it is no objection to the former and more probable supposition, that a creature which lives upon other insects should be allowed as food to the Jews, contrary to the general principle of the Mosaic law in regard to birds and quadrupeds, this having been unquestionably the case with regard to many species of fishes coming within the regulation of having "fins and scales," and known to exist in Palestine at the present time—as the perch, carp, barbel, etc. (Kitto's Physical History of Palestine, article Fishes). The fact that the chargo is never made the means of the divine chastisements (for which purpose a locust preying upon insects could scarcely be used), concurs with this speculation.—Kitto; Smith. See LOCUST.

The beetle, however, was very common in Egypt, and is the species called by Linnaeus Blatta Egypticus, thought by many to be mentioned in Exod. viii, 21, etc., under the name כְּנֵפֶיז, arb', where the A. V. renders it "swarms of flies." See FLY. Beetles are, by naturalists, styled coleopterous insects, from their horny upper wings, or elytra; the species are exceedingly numerous, differing greatly in size and color, and being found in almost every country. The order of Coleoptera is divided into many families, of which the scarabæidæ and blattæ, or common beetles and cock-chafers, are known to every one. These creatures, like many others in the insect world, deposit their eggs in the ground, where they are hatched, and the appearance of their progeny rising from the earth is by some writers supposed to have suggested to the Egyptian priesthood the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. Certain it is that beetles were very common in Egypt, and one of them, thence styled by naturalists Scarabæus sacer, was an object of worship; and this fact gives strength to the conjecture that this creature is meant in Exod. viii, as the sacred character of the object would naturally render its employment as a plague doubly terrible. Besides its being worshipped as a divinity, stones cut in the form of the beetle served as talismans among the Egyptians.

The under surface was filled with figures cut in intaglio of solar, lunar, and astral symbols and characters. They were held, according to Pliny, to inspire the soldier with courage, and to protect his person in the day of battle, and also to defend children from the malign influence of the evil eye. There is little reason to doubt that the Hebrews learned the use of these things in Egypt, but they were prohibited by the Mosiac law. The Gnostics, among other Egyptian superstitions, adopted this notion regarding the beetle, and gods of gnostic origin are extant in this form, especially symbolical of Isis (q. v.).

Beeve (בַּקָּר, bakar', horned animals, Lev. xxii, 19, 21; Num. xxxi, 28, 30, 33, 38, 44; elsewhere rendered "ox," "bullock," "herd," etc.; in Arabic, al-bakar'), cattle, herds, applicable to all Ruminantia, the camels alone excepted; but more particularly to the Bovide and the genera of the larger antelopes. See OX; BULL; DEER; GOAT; ANTELOPE, etc.

Beg (בָּקַשׁ, bakush', so rendered Psa. xxxvii, 25, elsewhere "seek," etc.; בְּשָׂא, shai', Psa. cix, 10; Prov. xx, 4; elsewhere "ask," etc.; παραισιω, Luke xvi, 3; προσκαρτεω, Mark x, 46; Luke xviii, 35; John ix, 8), Beggar (בְּיָתוֹם, elyon', 1 Sam. ii, 8; πτωχός, Luke xvi, 20, 22; Gal. iv, 9; both terms elsewhere "poor," etc.). The laws of Moses furnish abundant evidence that great inequality of condition existed in his time among the Hebrews, for recommendations to the rich to be liberal to their poorer brethren are frequently met with (Exod. xxiii, 11; Deut. xv, 11), but no mention is made of persons who lived as mendicants. The poor were allowed to glean in the fields, and to gather whatever the land produced in the year in which it was not tilled (Lev. xix, 10; xxv, 5, 6; Deut. xxiv, 19). They were also invited to feasts (Deut. xii, 12; xiv, 29; xxvi, 12). The Hebrew could not be an absolute pauper. His land was inalienable, except for a certain term, when it reverted to him or his posterity. And if this resource was insufficient, he could pledge the services of himself or his family for a valuable sum. Those who were indigent through bodily infirmity were usually taken care of by their kindred. See POOR. In the song of Hannah (1 Sam. ii, 8), however, beggars are spoken of, and such a fate is predicted to the posterity of the wicked, while it shall never befall the seed of the righteous, in the Psalm (xxxvii, 35; cix, 10); so that the practice was probably then not uncommon. In the New Testament, also, we read of beggars that were blind, diseased, and maimed, who lay at the doors of the rich, by the waysides, and also before the gate of the Temple (Mark x, 16; Luke xvi, 29, 21; Acts iii, 2). But we have no reason to suppose that there existed in the time of Christ that class of persons called vagrant beggars, who present their supplications for alms from door to door, and who are found at the present day in the East, although less frequently than in the countries of Europe. That the custom of seeking alms by sounding a trumpet or horn, which prevails among a class of Mohammedan monastics, called koh-ul-ar or karnadal, prevailed also in the time of Christ, has been by some inferred from the peculiar construction of the original in Matt. vi, 2. There is one thing characteristic of those Orientals who follow the vocation of mendicants which is worthy of being mentioned; they do not appeal to the pity or to the almsgiving spirit, but to the justice of their benefactors (Job xxii, 7; xxxi, 16; Prov. iii, 27, 28). Roberts, in his Orient. Illustrations, p. 564, says on Luke xvi, 3 ("I cannot dig; to beg I am ashamed"), "How often are we reminded of this passage by beggars when we tell them to work. They can scarcely believe their ears; and the religious mendicants, who swarm in every part of the East, look upon you with the most sovereign contempt when you give them such advice. 'I work! why, I never have done such a thing; I am not able.'" See ALMS.

Beghards or Beguards, a religious association in the Roman Church, which formed itself, in the 13th century, in the Netherlands, Germany, and France, after the example of the Beguines (q. v.), whom they closely imitated in their mode of life and the arrangement of their establishments. They supported themselves mostly by weaving, but became neither so numerous nor so popular as the Beguines. More generally than the Beguines they associated with the heretical Fraticelli (q. v.), and the "Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit." They were suppressed by the council of Vienna in 1311. Most of them joined the third orders of St. Francis or St. Dominic, but yet retained for a long time their name and their mode of life. For a time they found a protector in the Emperor Louis, but new decrees were issued against them by Charles IV (1367) and Pope Urban V (1369). In 1467 they became, by taking the usual solemn vows, a monastic association, which gradually united with several congregations of the Franciscan order. Their last convents and the name itself were abolished by Pope Innocent X in 1659.

The name Beghards was commonly given in the 13th and 14th centuries (just as "Pietist" and "Methodist" were afterward used) to persons who opposed or revolted from the worldly tendencies of the Roman Church. The Waldenses, Wickliffites, and Lollards, in France and England, were so named. See NEANDER, Ch. Hist., iv, 303; Mosheim, De Beghards, et Beguin. (Lips. 1790); Mosheim, Ch. Hist., cent. xiii, pt. ii, ch. ii, § 40. Other treatises on these orders have been written by Beier (Jen. 1710), Bruhns (Lub. 1719), Gotze (ib. 1719), Houston (Antw. 1628). See BEGAINES; BEGUE.

Beginning (רֵאשִׁית, "in the beginning," literally at the head, Gen. i, 1; Sept. and New Test. iv. ἀρχή), besides its ordinary import, was with the Hebrews an idiomatic form of expression for eternity, q. d. originally. In this sense it is employed alike by Moses and (in its Greek form) by the evangelist John (i, 1). See CREATION.

Our Lord is also emphatically styled the Beginning

(Αογι) both by Paul and John (Col. i, 18; Rev. i, 8; iii, 14), and it is worthy of remark that the Greek philosophers expressed the First Cause of all things by the same word. See LOGOS.

Bègue, LAMBERT, a French heretic, lived toward the close of the 12th century. Man, he said, is able to attain to the highest degree of perfection, and may then accord to his body all he wants. He also denied the adoration of the consecrated wafer. He is also said to have preached against the corrupt life of the clergy. See BEGHARDS and BEGUINES.—Hoefcr, Biographie Générale, v. 157.

Beguinaige (Beguinarum domus), the residence of a society of BEGUINES (q. v.).

Beguines, a female association in the Roman Church. The origin of both the name and the association is doubtful. A Belgian writer in the beginning of the 13th century derives it from a priest of Liege, Lambert le Bègue. Later some beguinages traced their origin to St. Begga, daughter of Pippin of Landen, though without historical grounds. Other writers have derived the name from begun, to beg, though the Beguines have never been mendicants. A document found in the 17th century at Yilverde dates the establishment of a beguinage at 1056, and seems to overthrow the hypothesis of priest Lambert being their founder; but more thorough investigations have proved it to be spurious. The pretended higher age of some German beguinages rests on their being confounded with similar institutions.

The Beguines, whose number at the beginning of the thirteenth century amounted to about 1500, spread rapidly over the Netherlands, France, and Germany. There were often as many as 2000 sisters in their beguinages (beguinages, beguinarie), occupying in couples a small separate house. A hospital and church form the central points of the beguinage. The Beguines support themselves, and also furnish the chest of the community, and the support of the priests, the officers, and the hospitals, by their own industry. The president of a beguinage is called magistra, and is assisted by curators or tutors, usually mendicant friars. The vows are simple, viz., chastity and obedience to the statutes; and any beguine can be freed by leaving the community, after which she is at liberty to marry. As to dress, each beguinage chooses its particular color, brown, gray, or blue, with a white veil over the head. Black has become their general color, and to their former habit is added a cap in the shape of an inverted shell, with a long black tassel. The association made itself useful by receiving wretched females, by nursing the sick, and by educating poor children. In Germany they were therefore called salu-women. Like all the monastic orders, their community was invaded by great disorders, and the synod of Fritzar in 1244 forbade to receive any sister before her fortieth year of age. Many were also drawn into the heresies of the Fraticelli, and the whole community had to atone for it by continued persecution. Clement V, on the council of Vienna, in 1311, decreed by two bulls the suppression of the Beguines and Beghards infected with heresy; but John XXII explained these bulls as referring merely to the heretical Beghards and Beguines, and interfered in favor of the orthodox Beguines in Germany (1318) and Italy (1326). The Reformation put an end to nearly all the beguinages in Germany and Switzerland; but all the larger towns of Belgium except Brussels have still beguinages, the largest of which is that at Ghent, which in 1857 counted about 700 inmates.—Mosheim, De Bechardis et Beguinibus (Lipsie, 1790); Hallmann, Geschichte des Ursprunges der Belgischen Beguinen (Berlin, 1843). See BEGHARDS.

Behead (כָּרַעַת, araph', applied to an animal, to break the neck, Deut. xxi. 6; like πελεκίζω, Rev. xx, 4; and properly שָׁחַתְתִּי הַיָּמִינִים, attakifalim), to take off the head, 2 Sam. iv, 7; Matt. xiv, 10; Mark vi, 16, 27; Luke ix, 9), a method of taking away life, known and practised among the Egyptians (Gen. xl. 17-19). This mode of punishment, therefore, must have been known to the Hebrews, and there occur indubitable instances of it in the time of the early Hebrew kings (2 Sam. iv, 8; xx. 21, 22; 2 Kings x, 6-8). It appears, in the later periods of the Jewish history, that Herod and his descendants, in a number of instances, ordered decapitation (Matt. xiv, 8-12; Acts xii, 2). The apostle Paul is said to have suffered martyrdom by beheading, as it was not lawful to put a Roman citizen to death by scourging or crucifixion. See PUNISHMENT.

Behem. See BÖHEIM.

Behemôth (Heb. behemot', בְּהֵמוֹתַי, Job xl, 15; Sept. Σημία; in Coptic, according to Jaldenski, Polemout) is regarded as the plural of בְּהֵמָה, behemah' (usually rendered "beast" or "cattle"); but commentators are by no means agreed as to its true meaning. Among those who adopt elephant are Frusius, Grotius, Schultens, Michaelis, etc., while among the advocates of hippopotamus are Bochart (Hieroz. ii, 754 sq.), Ludolf (Hist. Ethiop. i, 11), and Gesenius (Thes. Heb. p. 183). The arguments of the last in favor of his own view may be summed up thus: (1.) The general purpose and plan of Jehovah's two discourses with Job require that the animal which in this second discourse is classed with the crocodile should be an amphibious, not a terrestrial animal, the first discourse (xxxviii, xxxix) having been limited to land-animals and birds. (2.) The crocodile and hippopotamus, being both natives of Egypt and Ethiopia, are constantly mentioned together by the ancient writers (see Herod. ii, 69-71; Diod. i, 35; Plin. xxviii, 8). (3.) It seems certain that an amphibious animal is meant from the contrast between ver. 15, 20, 21, 22, and ver. 23, 24, in which the argument seems to be, "Though he feedeth upon grass," etc., like other animals, yet he liveth and delighteth in the waters, and nets are set for him there as for fish, which by his great strength he pierces through. (4.) The mention of his tail in ver. 17 does not agree with the elephant, nor can בָּזָז, as some have thought, signify the trunk of that animal; and (5.), though בְּהֵמוֹתַי may be the plural "majestatis" of בְּהֵמָה, beast, yet it is probably an Egyptian word signifying sea-serp., put into a Semitic form, and used as a singular.

The following is a close translation of the poetical passage in Job (xl, 15-24) describing the animal in question:

Lo, now, Behemoth that I have made [like] with thee!
Grass like the [meat-]cattle will he eat.
Lo! now, his strength [is] in his loins,
Even his force in [the] sinews of his belly.
He can curve his tail [only] like a cedar:
The tendons of his haunches must I interlace:
His bones [are as] tubes of copper,
His frame like a welding of iron.
He [is] the master-piece of God!
His Maker [only] can supply his sword [i. e. tail-].
For produce will [the] mountains bear for him;
Even [though] all [the] animals of the field may spurn
Heathen [the] houses will he lie. [there]
In [the] covert of [the] reedy marsh:
Lotuses shall entwine him his shade,
O-lives of [the] brook shall enclose him,

Beguine of Amsterdam.

Lo! [the] river may swell—he will not start;
 He will be bold, although a Jordan should rush to his mouth.
 In his [very] eyes should [one] take him,
 Through [the] snare—would [his] nose pierce.

“But in some respects this description is more applicable to the elephant, while in others it is equally so to both animals. Hence the term behemoth, taken intensively (for in some places it is admitted to designate cattle in general), may be assumed to be a poetical personification of the great Pachydermata, or even Herbivora, wherein the idea of hippopotamus is predominant. This view accounts for the ascription to it of characters not truly applicable to one species; for instance, the tail is likened to a cedar (provided צֵדָי really denotes the tail, which the context makes very doubtful; see Zeddel, Beitr. z. Bibl. Zoolog'e), which is only admissible in the case of the elephant; again, “the mountains bring him forth food;” “he trusteth that he can draw up Jordan,” a river which elephants alone could reach; “his nose pierceth through snares,” certainly more indicative of that animal’s proboscis, with its extraordinary delicacy of scent and touch, ever cautiously applied, than of the obtuse perceptions of the river-horse. Finally, the elephant is far more dangerous as an enemy than the hippopotamus, which numerous pictorial sculptures on the monuments of Egypt represent as fearlessly speared by a single hunter standing on his float of log and reeds. Yet, although the elephant is scarcely less fond of water, the description referring to manners, such as lying under the shade of willows, among reeds, in fens, etc., is more directly characteristic of the hippopotamus. The book of Job appears, from many internal indications, to have been written in Asia, and is full of knowledge, although that knowledge is not expressed according to the precise technicalities of modern science; it offers pictures in magnificent outline, without condescending to minute and labored details. Considered in this light, the expression in Psa. I, 10, “For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle (behemoth) upon a thousand hills,” acquires a grandeur and force far surpassing those furnished by the mere idea of cattle of various kinds. If, then, we take this plural noun in the sense here briefly indicated, we may, in like manner, consider the LEVIATHAN (q. v.) its counterpart, a similarly generalized term, with the idea of crocodile most prominent; and as this name indicates a twisting animal, and, as appears from various texts, evidently includes the great pythons, cetacea, and sharks of the surrounding seas and deserts, it conveys a more sublime conception than if limited to the crocodile, an animal familiar to every Egyptian, and well known even in Palestine.”—Kitto, s. v. See HIPPOPOTAMUS.

Behistún or Bisutun (Lat. Eagistans; Persian, Baghistan, Place of Gardens), a ruined town of the Persian province of Irak-Ajemi, 21 miles east of Kirmanshah, lat. 34° 18' N., long. 47° 30' E. Behistún is chiefly celebrated for a remarkable mountain, which on one side rises almost perpendicularly to the height of 1700 feet, and which was in ancient times sacred to Jupiter or to Ormuzd. According to Diodorus, Seniramis, on her march from Babylon to Ecbatana, in Media Magna, encamped near this rock, and, having cut away and polished the lower part of it, had her own likeness and those of a hundred of her guards engraved on it. She further, according to the same historian, caused the following inscription in Assyrian letters to be cut in the rock: “Seniramis having piled up one upon the other the trappings of the beasts of burden which accompanied her, ascended by these means from the plain to the top of the rock.” No trace of these inscriptions is now to be found, and Sir Henry Rawlinson accounts for their absence by the supposition that they were destroyed “by Khusráú Parvis when he was preparing to form of this long scarped surface the back wall of his palace.” Diodorus also mentions that Alexander the Great, on his way to Ecbatana from Susa, visited Behistun. But the rock is especially interesting for its cuneiform inscriptions (q. v.), which within recent years have been successfully deciphered by Sir H. Rawlinson. The principal inscription of Behistun, executed by the command of Darius, is on the north extremity of the rock, at an elevation of 300 feet from the ground, where it could not have been engraved without the aid of scaffolding, and can now only be reached by the adventurous antiquary at considerable risk to his life. The labor of polishing the face of the rock, so as to fit it to receive the inscriptions, must have been very great. In places where the stone was defective, pieces were fitted in and fastened with molten lead with such extreme nicety that only a careful scrutiny can detect the artifice. “But the real wonder of the work,” says Sir H. Rawlinson, “consists in the inscriptions. For extent, for beauty of execution, for uniformity and correctness, they are perhaps unequalled in the world. After the engraving of the rock had been accomplished, a coating of silicious varnish had been laid on, to give a clearness of outline to each individual letter, and to protect the surface against the action of the elements. This varnish is of infinitely greater hardness than the limestone rock beneath it." Washed down in some places by the rain of twenty-three centuries, it lies in consistent flakes like thin layers of lava on the foot-ledge; in others, where time has honey-combed the rock beneath, it adheres to the broken surface, still showing with sufficient distinctness the forms of the characters. The inscriptions—which are in the three forms of cuneiform writing, Persian, Babylonian, and Median—set forth the hereditary right of Darius to the throne of Persia, tracing his genealogy, through eight generations, up to the Achæmenes; they then enumerate the provinces of his empire, and recount his triumphs over the various rebels who rose against him during the first four years of his reign. The monarch himself is represented on the tablet with a bow in hand, and his foot upon the prostrate figure of a man, while nine rebels, chained together by the neck, stand humbly before him; behind him are two of his own warriors, and above him, another figure [see cut] The Persian inscriptions which Sir H. Rawlinson has translated are contained in the five main columns numbered in cut 1, 2, 3, 4, 5. The first column contains 19 paragraphs, and 96 lines. Each paragraph after the first, which commences, "I am Darius the Great King," begins with, "Says Darius the King." The second column has the same number of lines in 16 paragraphs; the third, 92 lines and 14 paragraphs; the fourth has also 92 lines and 18 paragraphs; and the fifth, which appears to be a supplementary column, 35 lines. A transcription, in Roman characters, of the Persian part, with a translation in English, is given in Rawlinson's Herodotus, ii, 490 sq. The second, fourth, and fifth columns are much injured. Sir H. Rawlinson fixes the epoch of the sculpture at 515 B.C. See Jour. of Asiatic Society, vol. x; Norris, Behistun Inscription.

Bel (Heb. id. בֵּל, contracted from בְּלַיִם, the Aramaic form of בְּלַיִם; Sept. Bil and Billog) is the name under which the national god of the Babylonians is cursorily mentioned in Isa. xlvi, 1; Jer. l, 2; li, 44. The only passages in the (apocryphal) Bible which contain any farther notice of this deity are Bar. vi, 49, and the addition to the book of Daniel, in the Sept., xiv, 1, sq., where we read of meat and drink being daily offered to him, according to a usage occurring in classical idolatry, and termed Lectisternia (Jer. li, 44?). But a particular account of the pyramidal temple of Bel, at Babylon, is given by Herodotus, i, 181-183. See BABEL. It is there also stated that the sacrifices of this god consisted of adult cattle (πρόβατα), of their young, when sucking (which last class were the only victims offered up on the golden altar), and of incense. The custom of providing him with Lectisternia may be inferred from the table placed before the statue, but it is not expressly mentioned. Diodorus (ii, 9) gives a similar account of this temple; but adds that there were large golden statues of Zeus, Hera, and Ilæa on its summit, with a table, common to them all, before them. Gesenius, in order to support his own theory, endeavors to show that this statue of Zeus must have been that of Saturn, while that of Rhea represented the sun. Hitzig, however, in his note to Isa. xvii, 8, more justly observes that Hera is the female counterpart to Zeus-Bel, that she is called so solely because it was the name of the chief Greek goddess, and that she and Bel are the moon and sun. He refers for confirmation to Berosus (p. 50, ed. Richter), who states that the wife of Bel was called Omora, which means moon; and to Ammian, Marcell, xxiii, 3, for a statement that the moon was, in later times, zealously worshipped in Mesopotamia. The classical writers generally call this Babylonian deity by their names, Zeus and Jupiter (Herod. and Diod. l. c.; Plin. Hist. Nat. vi, 30), by which they assuredly did not mean the planet of that name, but merely the chief god of their religious system. Cicero, however (De Nat. Deor. iii, 16), recognises Hercules in the Belus of India, which is a loose term for Babylonia. This favors the identity of Bel and Melkart. See BAAL. The following engraving, taken from a Babylonian cylinder, represents, according to Münster, the sun-god and one of his priests. The triangle on the top of one of the pillars, the star with eight rays, and the half moon, are all significant symbols. See CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS.

Ancient Worship of Bel.

BEL AND THE DRAGON, HISTORY OF, an apocryphal and uncanonical book of Scripture. See APOCRYPHA. It was always rejected by the Jewish Church, and is extant neither in the Hebrew nor the Chaldee Language. Jerome gives it no better title than that of "the fable" of Bel and the Dragon; nor has it obtained more credit with posterity, except with the divines of the Council of Trent, who determined that it should form part of the canonical Scriptures. The design of this fiction is to render idolatry ridiculous, and to exalt the true God; but the author has destroyed the illusion of his fiction by transporting to Babylon the worship of animals, which was never practised in that country. This book forms the fourteenth chapter of Daniel in the Latin Vulgate; in the Greek it was called the prophecy of Habakkuk, the son of Jesus, of the tribe of Levi; but this is evidently erroneous, for that prophet lived before the time of Nebuchadnezzar, and the events pretended to have taken place in this fable are assigned to the time of Cyrus. There are two Greek texts of this fragment; that of the Septuagint, and that found in Theodotion's Greek version of Daniel. The former is the most ancient, and has been translated into Syriac. The Latin and Arabic versions, together with another Syriac translation, have been made from the text of Theodotion.—Davidson, in Horne's Introd. new ed. i, 639. See DANIEL (APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS TO).

Be'la (Heb. id. בֵּלָא, a thing swallowed), the name of one place and three men.

1. (Sept. Balôia.) A small city on the shore of the Dead Sea, not far from Sodom, afterward called ZOAR, to which Lot retreated from the destruction of the cities of the plain, it being the only one of the five that was spared at his intercession (Gen. xix, 20, 30). It lay at the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, on the frontier of Moab and Palestine (Jerome on Isa. xv), and on the route to Egypt, the connection in which it is found (Isa. xv, 5; Jer. xlviii, 34; Gen. xiii, 10). We first read of Bela in Gen. xiv, 2, 8, where it is named with Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zebhoim, as forming a confederacy under their respective kings, in the vale of Siddim, to resist the supremacy of the King of Shinar and his associates. It is singular that the King of Bela is the only one of the five whose name is not given, and this suggests the probability of Bela having been his own name, as well as the name of his city, which may have been so called from him. The tradition of the Jews was that it was called Bela from having been repeatedly ingulfed by earthquakes; and in the passage Jer. xlviii, 34, "From Zoar even unto Horonaim (have they uttered their voice) as an hoifer of three years old," and Isa. xv, 5, they absurdly fancied an allusion to its destruction by three earthquakes (Jerome, Quæst. Heb. in Gen. xiv). There is nothing improbable in itself in the supposed allusion to the swallowing up of the city by an earthquake, which עֲבָרָה exactly expresses (Num. xvi, 30); but the repeated occurrence of עֲבָרָה and words compounded with it, as names of men, rather favors the notion of the city having been called Bela from the name of its founder. This is rendered yet more probable by Bela being the name of an Edomitish king in Gen. xxxvi, 32. For further information, see De Sauley's Narrative, i, 457-481, and Stanley's Palestine, p. 285.—Smith, s. v. See ZOAR.

2. (Sept. Βαλᾶ, Βαλᾶ.) The eldest son of Benjamin, according to Gen. xlii, 21 (where the name is Anglicized "Belah"): Num. xxvi, 38; 1 Chron. vii, 6; viii, 1, and head of the family of the BELAITES, B.C. post 1856. The houses of his family, according to 1 Chron. viii, 3-5, were Addur, Gera, Abihud (read Abihud), Abishua, Naaman, Aboah, Shupham, and Huram. The exploit of Ehud, the son of Gera, who shared the peculiarity of so many of his Benjaminite brethren in being left-handed (Judg. xx, 16), in slaying Eglon, the king of Moab, and delivering Israel from the Moabitish yoke, is related at length, Judg. iii, 14-30. It is perhaps worth noticing that as we have Husham by the side of Bela among the kings of Edom, Gen. xxxvi, 34, so also by the side of Bela, son of Benjamin, we have the Benjaminite family of Hushim (1 Chron. vii, 12), sprung apparently from a foreign man of that name, whom a Benjaminite took to wife in the land of Moab (1 Chron. viii, 8-11). See BECHER.

3. (Sept. Βαλᾶ.) A king of Edom before the institution of royalty among the Israelites; he was a son of Bosor, and his native city was Dinhabah (Gen. xxxvi, 32, 33; 1 Chron. i, 43). B.C. perhaps cir. 1618. Bernard Hyde, following some Jewish commentators (Simon, Oriental, p. 112, note), identifies this Bela with Balaam, the son of Bosor; but the evidence from the name does not seem to prove more than identity of family and race. There is scarcely any thing to guide us as to the age of Bosor, or Bosor, the founder of the house from which Bela and Balaam sprung. As regards the name of Bela's royal or native city Dinhabah, which Furst and Gesenius render "the place of plumb or," it may be suggested whether it may not possibly be a form of עֲבָרָה, the Chaldee for gold, after the analogy of the frequent Chaldee resolution of the g into au. There are several names of places and persons in Idumea which point to gold as found there: as DIZABAN, Dent, i, 1, "place of gold;" MIZABAR, "waters of gold," or "gold-streams," Gen. xxxvi, 39. Compare Behbeis, the ancient name of the Tiber, famous for its yellow waters. If this derivation for Dinhabah be true, its Chaldee form would not be difficult to account for, and would supply an additional evidence of the early conquests of the Chaldees in the direction of Idumea. The name of Bela's ancestor Bosor is of a decidedly Chaldee or Aramaean form, like Peor, Pethor, Rehob, and others; and we are expressly told that Balaam, the son of Bosor, dwelt in Pethor, which is by the river of the land of the children of his people, i. e. the river Euphrates; and he himself describes his home as being in Aram (Num. xxii, 5; xxiii, 7). Saul again, who reigned over Edom after Samsah, came from Rehoboth by the river Euphrates (Gen. xxxvi, 37). We read in Job's time of the Chaldeans making incursions into the land of Uz, and carrying off the camels, and slaying Job's servants (Job i, 17). In the time of Abraham we have the King of Shinar apparently extending his empire so as to make the kings on the borders of the Dead Sea his tributaries, and with his confederates extending his conquests into the very country which was afterward the land of Edom (Gen. xiv, 6). Putting all this together, we may conclude with some confidence that Bela, the son of Bosor, who reigned over Edom, was a Chaldee by birth, and reigned in Edom by conquest. He may have been contemporary with Moses and Balaam, Hadad, of which name there were two kings (Gen. xxxvi, 35, 39), is probably another instance of an Aramaean king of Edom, as we find the name Ben-hadad as that of the kings of Syria or Aram in later history (1 Kings xx). Compare also the name of Hadad-ezer, king of Zobah, in the neighborhood of the Euphrates (2 Sam. viii, 3, etc.).—Smith, s. v. See EDOM; CHALDEAN.

4. (Sept. Βαλᾶ.) A son of Azzaz, a Reubenite (1 Chron. v, 8). B.C. post 1618. It is remarkable that his country too was "in Aroer, even unto Nebo and Baal-meon; and eastward he inhabiteth unto the entering in of the wilderness from the river Euphrates" (8, 9).

Be'lah, a less correct mode of Anglicizing (Gen. xlii, 21) the name of BELA (q. v.), the son of Benjamin.

Be'laïte (Heb. with the art. h, h Be-lai', בְּעֵלָיִתַי; Sept. ὁ Βαλαίτης), the patronymic of the descendants of BELA (q. v.), the son of Benjamin (Num. xxvi, 38).

Belgic Confession (Confessio Belgica), a confession of faith framed by Guido de Bres, of Brabant, and others, about A.D. 1561 in French, and based on Calvinistic principles. It was translated into the vernacular in 1563, and was received as a symbolical book by the synods of Antwerp in 1566, of Dort in 1571, 1576, 1579, 1581, and 1619; and recognised by that of the Hague in 1651. The copy recognised by the synod of Middelburg in 1581 is an abridgment of the original by Festus Hommius, which afterward became the rule of the Synod of Dort. Both have the same number of articles, and differ only in form, not in spirit. The shorter form is given by Augusti, Corpus Libror. Symbolicor. (Elberf. 1827, 8vo); the longer in Niemeyer, Coll. Confessionum (Leips. 1840, 8vo). See CONFESIONS.

1. Church History.—Christianity is said to have been introduced into Belgium as early as A.D. 42, through Eucharis, one of the seventy disciples; but Maternus (died 120) is generally honored as the apostle of Belgium, through the whole extent of which he planted Christian churches. During the Crusades the Belgian nobility distinguished themselves by their zeal (see GODFREY of Bouillon). In the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, Belgium was the chief seat of the reformatory movements within the Roman Catholic Church, and produced several religious communities, whose discipline and life formed, by their more Biblical and spiritual character, a favorable contrast to the gross superstitions of the majority of monastic institutions. To these belonged the Beghards and Beguines, the Lollards, and especially the Frater Communitas Vitae (Brethren of the Common Life). The Reformation of the sixteenth century was opposed by the University of Louvain, and later also by Erasmus, but found many adherents among the people; and its first martyrs, John Esch and Henry Vos, who were burned at Brussels July 1, 1523, were Belgians. The Inquisition introduced by Philip I was unable to crush out the Reformation, and led to the revolution of the seven northern provinces. See HOLLAND. In the southern provinces the predominance of the Roman Church was secured by Alexander of Parma, and fortified by the Jesuits. Jansenism (q. v.) arose in Belgium, but did not long survive, as a distinct organization, the first condemnatory decrees of the pope. The edict of toleration (Oct. 13, 1781), by which Joseph II restrained the spiritual authority of the pope, declared marriage a civil contract, and suppressed all monastic societies, merging them into one "Fraternity of Charity," met with a violent opposition. The states were against him and refused to pay taxes, and the emperor had to make important concessions. The union of Belgium with Holland after the overthrow of the Napoleonic rule greatly dissatisfied the Roman Catholic party, which united with the Liberal opposition for the overthrow of the Dutch rule and the establishment of an independent kingdom of Belgium (1830). The new Constitution, a compromise between the two parties, gave to the Roman Catholic party the greatest independence of the state and a liberal support, but compelled it, on the other hand, to consent to the establishment of an unlimited liberty of religion. The subsequent history of Belgium is a strife of these parties especially with regard to the support which the state is to give to the Church in questions of both an ecclesiastical and political nature (education, charitable institutions, etc.). The "Catholic" party is numerically stronger than in any other European Parliament. Among its distinguished men belong De Merode, Count de Theux, Dechamps, Malou, Dedecker. It split, however, into two subdivisions, one of which, the more ultramontane, wished to overthrow the compromise with the Liberals and put an end to religious toleration, while the other, the Constitutional, declared themselves for a faithful adherence to the Constitution. This latter view is by far the most prevailing.

II. Ecclesiastical Statistics.—The total population of Belgium was, at December 31, 1858, 4,623,089. In 1846 the non-Catholic population was stated as 10,323 (of a total population of 4,337,196), among whom were 6678 Protestants, Lutherans, and Reformed, 790 Anglicans, 1336 Jews, 1013 promiscuous, and 600 of no religious persuasion. Since, the number of Protestants has increased more rapidly than that of the Roman Catholics, and a number of Protestant congregations have been formed, consisting entirely of converts from the Roman Catholic Church (one in Brussels alone counts more than one thousand converts). Helfferich (see below, the literature on Belgium) estimated the Protestant population in 1848 at about 25,000, which statement may have been a little too high, though there can be no doubt that the Protestant population at present amounts to over 20,000 souls. There are two different nationalities in Belgium, the Flemish (German) and Walloon (French). The Roman Catholic Church has her strong-hold among the former. Of the four universities, one, Louvain, is Free Catholic, established and controlled entirely by the bishops; one, Brussels, is Liberal and anti-Catholic; two, Ghent and Liège, are state universities, in which, therefore, professors of both parties are to be found. There is one archbishop at Mechlin, and five bishops (Bruges, Namur, Tournay, Liège, and Ghent). There are six larger and six smaller seminaries for the training of the clergy. The appropriations made for all religious denominations acknowledged by the state amounted in 1859 to 4,051,912 fr. 75 cts. The religious orders are very numerous, and many of them, especially the Jesuits, very rich. The Jesuits at Brussels continue the greatest literary work ever undertaken by the order, the Acta Sancti Annæ (q. v.). The religious orders conduct a large number of boarding-schools, and the primary instruction is almost everywhere in their hands (in particular, in the hands of the Brothers of the Christian Schools). The number of the members of the religious associations was, in 1856, 11,853, viz., 25,37 men and 12,330 women, and it is rapidly increasing. The leading periodicals of the Roman Catholics are, Revue Catholique de Louvain; Precis historiques et Littéraires, a semi-monthly, published by the Jesuits in Brussels; the Journal Historique et Littéraire, a monthly, published at Liège by Kersten. The most influential among the many political organs of the Catholic party is the Journal de Bruxelles.

The large body of Protestants is the Protestant Union, which is recognised and supported by the state, and in 1851 embraced fourteen congregations, two of which, Mary Hoofbeke, near Ghent, and Dour, in Hennegau, date from the time of the Reformation. The number of preachers in 1859 was sixteen. The annual synod consists of all the preachers and two or three lay delegates of every congregation. The Evangelical Society (Société Évangélique Belge), which formed itself in Brussels in 1835, after the model of the evangelical societies of Paris and Geneva, has established a considerable number of congregations, which increase annually. It had, in 1864, 20 churches and stations, 13 pastors and evangelists, 12 schools attended by 675 children, and a membership of from 6000 to 7000. The Episcopal Church of England has four congregations, the Lutherans one, at Brussels, in which city there are also two independent religious associations. The Bible Society had distributed (up to 1859) about two hundred thousand copies of the Bible.

Bel'ial stands often, in the Auth. Vers. (after the Vulg.), as a proper name for the Heb. word בְּלִיָּא (Belija' al, Sept. usually translates λογός, παρρησία, etc.), in accordance with 2 Cor. vi, 15. This is particularly the case where it is connected with the expressions מֵן, man of, or מֵן, son of; in other instances it is translated by "wicked," or some equivalent term (Deut. xv, 9; Psa. xli, 8; ci, 3; Prov. vi, 12; xvi, 27; xix, 28; Nah. i, 11, 15). There can be no question, however, that the word is not to be regarded as a proper name in the O. T.; its meaning is worthlessness, and hence recklessness, lawless &c. Its etymology is uncertain: the first part, בְּלִיָּא, = without; the second part has been variously connected with בְּלִיָּא, yoke, as in the Vulg. (Judg. xix, 22), in the sense of unbridled, rebellious; with בְּלִיָּא, to ascend, as = without ascent, that is, of the lowest condition; and lastly with בְּלִיָּא, to be useful, as = without usefulness, that is, good for nothing (Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 209). The latter appears to be the most probable, not only in regard to sense, but also as explaining the unusual fusion of the two words, the ב at the end of the one and at the beginning of the other leading to a crasis, originally in the pronunciation, and afterward in the writing. The expression son of man of Belial must be understood as meaning simply a worthless, lawless fellow (Sept. παρρησιος). It occurs frequently in this sense in the historical books (Judg. xix, 22; xx, 13; 1 Sam. i, 16; ii, 12; x, 27; xxv, 17, 25; xxx, 22; 2 Sam. xvi, 7; xx, 1; 1 Kings xxi, 10; 2 Chr. xiii, 7), and only once in the earlier books (Deut. xiii, 13). The adjunct מֵן is occasionally omitted, as in 2 Sam. xxiii, 6, and Job xxxiv, 18, where בְּלִיָּא stands by itself, as a term of reproach. The later Hebrews used ḥaká and mupe in a similar manner (Matt. v, 22); the latter is perhaps the most analogous; in 1 Sam. xxv, 15, Nabal (בְּלִיָּא = mupe) is described as a man of Belial, as though the terms were equivalent.

In the N. T. the term appears (in the best MSS.) in the form Belíaa, and not Belíaa, as given in the Auth. Vers. (so in the Test. XII Patr. p. 539, 587, 619, etc.) The change of λ into ρ was common; we have an instance even in Biblical Hebrew, Mazzaroth (Job xxxviii, 32) for mazzaloth (2 Kings xxiii, 5); in Chaldee we meet with Ḥāḥā for Ḥāḥā, and various other instances; the same change occurred in the Doric dialect (ḥānos for ḥānos), with which the Alexandrine writers were most familiar. The term, as used in 2 Cor. vi, 15, is generally understood as an appellative of Satan, as the personification of all that was bad; Bengel (Gnomon, in loc.) explains it of Antichrist, as more strictly the opposite of Christ. By some it is here explained as referring to a daemon (Castell, Lex. s. v. Beliar), or Satan himself (comp. Ephes. ii, 2); but in the O. T. it never has this meaning (Michaelis, Suppl. p. 1119).—Smith, s. v.

Belief, in its general acceptance, denotes a persuasion or an assent of the mind to the truth of any proposition. "In this sense belief does not relate to any particular kind of means or arguments, but may be produced by any means whatever: thus we are said to believe our senses, to believe our reason, to believe a witness. Belief, in a more restricted sense, denotes that kind of assent which is grounded only on the authority or testimony of some person. In this sense belief stands opposed to knowledge and science. We do not say that we believe snow to be white, but that we know it is white.

In the original structure of our mental constitution, a firm foundation has been laid for the perception of truth. We set out in our intellectual career with believing, and that, too, on the strongest of all evidence, so far as we are concerned—the evidence of consciousness. Dr. Reid, in his Inquiry into the Human Mind, seems to think that we have been endowed with two original principles—a principle of veracity and a principle of credulity—both of which he regards as original instincts. The first of these is a propensity to speak and to use the signs of language, so as to convey our real sentiments. "When I reflect upon my actions most attentively," says Dr. Reid, "I am not conscious that, in speaking truth, I am influenced on ordinary occasions by any motive, moral or political. I find that truth is always at the door of my lips, and goes forth spontaneously if not held back. It requires neither good nor bad intention to bring it forth, but only that I be artless and undesigning. There may, indeed, be temptations to falsehood which would be too strong for the natural principle of veracity, unaided by the principles of honor and virtue; but, where there is no such temptation, we speak truth by instinct." That there is such an original tendency both to speak the truth and to believe, we readily admit; and it is the possession of such a principle which fits us for appreciating evidence and feeling the force of argument. If by the word instinct be meant an original principle of our nature, we are not disposed to object to the use of the expression by Dr. Reid in speaking of our tendency to believe; but there seems to be no necessity for the assertion of two original principles, the one leading us to speak, and the other to believe the truth. It is enough, surely, that we set out at first with a tendency to believe dogmatically and firmly, and are thus far unacquainted with doubt or error. If such be the original framework of our constitution, truth will ever, while we retain our nature, be our native element, and therefore always more familiar to us than falsehood. There may be temptations to forget this characteristic element of nature, and to transgress the boundary of truth; but in doing so we are violating the original law of our mental structure, and the moment that the unnatural pressure is removed, the mind will return to its former tendency to speak truth rather than falsehood. Thus formed, we are prepared to believe, in the first instance, every thing indiscriminately; but when reluctantly compelled to admit the existence of falsehood, we do not, because we cannot, part with the original tendency to believe. Hesitation and doubt are introduced, not so, however, as to destroy our nature; but, still retaining our partiality for the truth, we come precisely into that situation which is the best fitted for balancing probabilities, and weighing the evidence for and against any statement which is presented to us. We still incline decidedly toward the truth, and yet we are aware of the existence of falsehood, and to some extent, therefore, guarded against it. There is no necessity, however, for an original principle of credulity in opposition to that of veracity. It is sufficient that truth is the rule, falsehood the exception; and if the inclination preponderates in favor of the rule, we require no more than a simple knowledge that there are exceptions. Thus it is that man has been provided by his Creator with a standard by means of which he may judge of the truth and reality of things. And while, therefore, we define belief to be the agreement or disagreement of objects and qualities with this state of things, it must be borne in mind that the primary laws of consciousness, the ultimate conditions of thought, are the means according to which this agreement or disagreement is ascertained. The standard of truth lies deep in the constitution of man, and if he fails to judge rightly in reference to any statement, the error is to be found, not in the standard, but in a perverse misapplication of the standard. And herein lies the difference in the opinions of men. They are each of them provided with an unerring standard in so far as they are concerned. They do not, because they cannot disbelieve the primary laws of thought or self-consciousness; but in the application of these they commence a system of error, and therefore of doubt, leading at length to disbelief. The original belief is certain, because the standard is certain on which it is grounded; and could all other facts and events be brought back to the same standard, the judgment, as to their truth or falsehood, would, so far as we are concerned, be unerring. Now the great desire for which, in every case of doubt or disputation, evidence and arguments of every kind are adduced is, that the appeal may be carried through a variety of different steps to this, the highest, the purest, the most certain of all earthly tribunals—the reason, not of an individual man, but of humanity. This is the common platform on which men of all characters, of all sects, of all opinions, may meet in cordial agreement. The principles are the common property of the race in general; they are the conditions in virtue of which they assert their position in the world as rational and intelligent creatures. Without such common principles all evidence would be powerless, all argument unavailing. Without an original standard of truth in his own breast, this world would have become a state of universal scepticism; nay, rather, for such a state of things is impossible, there would have been no ground for either belief or doubt, affirmation or denial" (Gardner, Cyclopaedia). On the relation of the will to belief we cite the following from Hopkins (Lowell Lectures, 1844). "It is true within certain limitations, and under certain conditions, and with respect to certain kinds of truth, that we are not voluntary in our belief; but then these conditions and limitations are such as entirely to sever from this truth any consequence that we are not perfectly ready to admit. We admit that belief is in no case directly dependent on the will; that in some cases it is entirely independent of it; but he must be exceedingly bigoted, or unobservant of what passes around him, who should affirm that the will has no influence. The influence of the will here is analogous to its influence in many other cases. It is as great as it is over the objects which we see. It does not depend upon the will of any man, if he turns his eyes in a particular direction, whether he shall see a tree there. If the tree be there he must see it, and is compelled to believe in its existence; but it was entirely within his power not to turn his eyes in that direction, and thus to remain unconvinced, on the highest of all evidence, of the existence of the tree, and unimpressed by its beauty and proportion. It is not by his will directly that man has any control over his thoughts. It is not by willing a thought into the mind that he can call it there, and yet we all know that, through attention and habits of association, the subjects of our thoughts are to a great extent directed by the will. It is precisely so in respect to belief; and he who denies this, denies the value of candor, and the influence of party spirit, and prejudice, and interest on the mind. So great is this influence, however, that a keen observer of human nature, and one who will not be suspected of leaning unduly to the doctrine I now advocate, has supposed it to extend even to our belief of mathematical truth. 'Men,' says Hobbes, 'appeal from custom to reason, and from reason to custom, as it serves their turn, receding from custom when their interest requires it, and setting themselves against reason as oft as reason is against them, which is the cause that the doctrine of right and wrong is perpetually disputed both by the pen and the sword; whereas the doctrine of lines and figures is not so, because men care not, in that subject, what is truth, as it is a thing that crosses no man's ambition, or profit, or lust. For, I doubt not, if it had been a thing contrary to any man's right of dominion, or to the interest of men who have dominion, that the three angles of a triangle should be equal to two angles of a square, that doctrine should have been, if not disputed yet by the burning of all books of geometry, suppressed, as far as he whom it concerned was able.' 'This,' says Hallam, from whose work I make the quotation, 'does not exaggerate the pertinacity of mankind in resisting the evidence of truth when it thwarts the interests or passions of any particular sect or community.' Let a man who hears the forty-seventh proposition of Euclid announced for the first time trace the steps of the demonstration, and he must believe it to be true; but let him know that as soon as he does perceive the evidence of that proposition, so as to believe it on that ground, he shall lose his right eye, and he will never trace the evidence, or come to that belief which results from the force of the only proper evidence. You may tell him it is true, but he will reply that he does not know—he does not see it to be so. So far, then, from finding in this law of belief, the law by which it is necessitated on condition of a certain amount of evidence perceived by the mind, an excuse for any who do not receive the evidence of the Christian religion, it is in this very law that I find the ground of their condemnation. Certainly, if God has provided evidence as convincing as that for the forty-seventh proposition of Euclid, so that all men have to do is to examine it with candor, then they must be without excuse if they do not believe. This, I suppose, God has done. He asks no one to believe except on the ground of evidence, and such evidence as ought to command assent. Let a man examine this evidence with entire candor, laying aside all regard for consequences or results, simply according to the laws of evidence, and then, if he is not convinced, I believe God will so far forth acquit him in the great day of judgment. But if God has given man such evidence that a fair, and full, and perfectly candid examination is all that is needed to necessitate belief, then, if men do not believe, it will be in this very law that we shall find the ground of their condemnation. The difficulty will not lie in their mental constitution as related to evidence, nor in the want of evidence, but in that moral condition, that state of the heart, or the will, which prevented a proper examination. 'There seems,' says Butler, 'no possible reason to be given why we may not be in a state of moral probation with regard to the exercise of our understanding upon the subject of religion, as we are with regard to our behavior in common affairs. The former is a thing as much within our power and choice as the latter.'" On the relations of Belief to Faith, see FAITH.

Believers. In the early Church this term (πιστοί, phibés) was applied strictly to the believing or baptized laity, in contradistinction to the clergy or the catechumens. They had many titles, honors, and privileges, which raised them above the catechumens. They were called "the illuminated," "the initiated," "the perfect," "the favorites of heaven." They alone could partake of the Lord's Supper, the catechumens being previously dismissed; they joined in all the prayers of the Church; they alone used the Lord's Prayer; the catechumens were not allowed to say "Our Father;" and they were auditors of all discourses made in the church.—Bingham, Orig. Echs., bk. i, ch. 3 and 4.

Bellknop, JEREMY, D.D. was born at Boston, June 4, 1744, and graduated at Harvard in 1762. In 1767 he was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church at Dover, N.H., where he labored for over 20 years. In 1787 he became pastor at Boston, where he died, June 20, 1799. He was one of the founders of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and devoted much of his time to the promotion of its objects. Among his writings are the History of New Hampshire (1784-1792, 3 vols.); American Biography (1794-1798, 2 vols.); and a number of political and religious tracts, besides occasional sermons.—Allen, Biog. Dict., s. v.

Bell (𐤁𐤏𐤂𐤀, práimon', something struck; Sept. βῆσκος; Vulg. tinianubulum; Exod. xxviii, 33, 34; xxxix, 25, 26; also 𐤁𐤏𐤂𐤀𐤁, met'sillah', tinkling; Sept. χαίρα; Zech. xiv, 20).

1. The first bells known in history are those small golden bells which were attached to the lower part of the blue robe (the robe of the ephod) which formed part of the dress of the high-priest in his sacerdotal ministrations (Exod. xxviii, 33, 34; comp. Echus. xlv, 11). They were there placed alternately with the pomegranate-shaped knobs, one of these being between every two of the bells. The number of these bells is not mentioned in Scripture; but tradition states that there were sixty-six (Clem. Alex. Stromata, p. 563), or, according to the Jews, seventy-two (Jarchi, in loc.) We need not seek any other reason for this rather singular use of bells than that which is assigned: "His sound shall be heard when he goeth into the holy place before the Lord, and when he cometh out, that he die not" (Exod. xxviii, 35); by which we may understand that the sound of the bells manifested that he was properly arrayed in the robes of ceremony which he was required to wear when he entered the presence-chamber of the Great King; and that as no minister can enter the presence of an earthly potentate abruptly and unannounced, so he (whom no human being could introduce) was to have his entrance harbingered by the sound of the bells he wore. This sound, heard outside, also notified to the people the time in which he was engaged in his sacred ministrations, and during which they remained in prayer (Luke i, 9, 10). No doubt they answered the same purpose as the bells used by the Brahmins in the Hindoo ceremonies, and by the Roman Catholics during the celebration of mass (comp. Luke i, 21). To this day bells are frequently attached, for the sake of their pleasant sound, to the anklets of women. See ANKLET. The little girls of Cairo wear strings of them round their feet (Lane, Mod. Egypt. ii, 370), and at Koojar Mungo Park saw a dance "in which many performers assisted, all of whom were provided with little bells fastened to their legs and arms."

"BELLS OF THE HORSES" are mentioned in Zech. xiv, 20, and may have been such as were attached to the bridles or foreheads, or to belts around the necks of horses trained for war, that they might thereby be accustomed to noise and tumult, and not by their alarm expose the riders to danger in actual warfare. Hence a person who had not been tried or trained up by any thing was by the Greeks called ἀκωκώτιστος, "one not used to the noise of a bell," by a metaphor taken from horses. The mules employed in the funeral pomp of Alexander had at each jaw a golden bell. It does not appear, however, that this was a use of horse-bells with which the Jews were familiar. The Heb. word is almost the same as 𐤁𐤏𐤂𐤀𐤁, met'sil' yim, "a pair of cymbals;" and as they are supposed to be inscribed with the words "Holiness unto the Lord," it is more probable that they are not bells, but "concave or flat pieces of brass, which were sometimes attached to horses for the sake of ornament" (Jahn, Bibl. Arch. § 96). Indeed, they were probably the same as the 𐤁𐤏𐤂𐤀𐤁, saharonim', "ornaments;" Sept. μυρρίσκει (Isa. iii, 18; Judg. viii, 21), lunulo of gold, silver, or brass used as ornaments, and hung by the Arabians round the necks of their camels, as we still see them in England in the harness of horses. They were not only ornamental, but useful, as their tinkling tended to enliven the animals; and in the caravans they thus served the purpose of our modern sheep-bells. The laden animals, being without riders, have bells hung from their necks, that they may be kept together in traversing by night the open plains and deserts, by paths and roads unconfined by fences and boundaries, that they may be cheered by the sound of the bells, and that, if any horse strays, its place may be known by the sound of its bell, while the general sound from the caravan enables the traveller who has strayed or lingered to find and regain his party, even in the night (Rosenmüller, Morgenl. iv, 441). That the same motto, Holliness to the Lord, which was upon the mitre of the high-priest, should, in the happy days foretold by the prophet, be inscribed even upon the bells of the horses, manifestly signifies that all things, from the highest to the lowest, should in those days be sanctified to God (Hackett's Illustra. of Script. p. 77).—Kitto. See BRIDLE.

It is remarkable that there is no appearance of bells of any kind on the Egyptian monuments. Quite a number of bronze bells, with iron tongues, were discovered, however, among the Assyrian ruins in a cal-dron at Nimroud by Mr. Layard, and are now in the British Museum. They vary in size from about 2 to 3 inches in height, and 1 to 2 inches in diameter, and in shape do not differ materially from those now in use among us (see Layard's Babylon and Nineveh, p. 150).

Bells were not introduced into the Christian Church till a comparatively late period. Several inventions were common before the introduction of bells. In Egypt they seem to have used trumpets, in imitation of the Jews; and the same custom prevailed in Palestine in the sixth century. In some monasteries they took the office by turns of going about to every one's cell, and calling the monks to their devotions by the sound of a hammer; this instrument was called the night signal and awakening instrument. Paulinus, the bishop of Nola, in Campania, who died A.D. 431, is usually regarded as the inventor of bells; and hence the terms nola and campana are supposed to be derived. There is reason, however, to believe that this is a mistake, as it is remarkable that no mention of bells is made in his epistles, in his poems, or in the account of his life, which was compiled from his own works and the panegyrics of his contemporaries. The word campana is probably derived from as Campanum, mentioned by Pliny, the metal preferred for bells. The use of bells was not known in the Eastern Church till the year 865, when Ursus Patrisiaucus made a present of some to Michael, the Greek emperor, who first built a tower in the church of Sancta Sophia in which to hang them. It is generally thought that Sabinianus, who succeeded Gregory the Great in 604, introduced them into the Latin Church, and applied them to ecclesiastical purposes. Baronius speaks of the use of the Tintinnabula in the earliest ages of the Church (Ann. A.D. 58 and 64), and Giraldus Cambrensis says that portable bells were used in England in the time of SS. Germanus and Lupus, i. e. about 430. From all which it appears that small portable bells were in use in the Church in very ancient times, and that the large church-bells were not introduced until a later period. Certain it is, however, that there were bells in the church of St. Stephen, at Sens, in 610, the ringing of which frightened away the besieging army of King Clothaire II, which knew not what they were. Yet Bede, in his Ecclesiastical History (lib. iv, c. 25), at about 670, says, "audivit subito in aere notum campanæ sonum quo ad orationes excitari solebant." A form of speaking which would imply that they were at that period in general use; and Staveler refers to Spelman's Council, tom. i, fol. 62, 64, where it is stated that Oudoceus, bishop, or archbishop, of Llandaff, about A.D. 550, took down the bells and crosses of his church as part of a sentence of excommunication. Ingulphus relates how Turketul, abbot of Croyland, who died about 870, gave one notable great bell to the abbey-church, which he called Gumblic, and afterward all of Egelric gave six more, named Bartholomæus, Lettelmanns, Terketul, Tatwya, Pega, and Boga; and he adds, "Non erat tunc tanta consonantia campanarum in tota Anglia." (See Maitland, Dark Ages, p. 251.) Proofs exist that bells were common in France as early as the seventh and eighth centuries. During the reign of Charlemagne they became common in France and Germany. Bells were first hung in towers separate from the church (campanili); later, the tower was joined to the church. In Italy, Greece, the Ionian Isles, and Sweden, the towers are yet usually separate. As early as the eighth century bells were dedicated with religious ceremonies very similar to those used in baptism. They were sprinkled with holy water; exorcism was spoken over them, to free them from the power of evil spirits; a name was given them (as early as the tenth century); a blessing was pronounced; and they were anointed. Later, their ringing was supposed to drive away evil spirits, pestilence, and thunder-storms. Being thus made objects of religious faith and affection, they were ornamented in the highest style of the sculptor's art with scenes from the Bible and other religious subjects. The largest bells are: the one at Moscow, 48,000 lbs.; at Toulouse, 66,000 lbs.; at Vienna, 40,000 lbs.; Paris, 38,000 lbs.; Westminster Abbey, 37,000 lbs. The usual composition of bells is four parts of copper and one of tin. The proportions are sometimes varied, and lead and zinc added. Legends of large parts of silver in certain bells, as at Rouen, have been found by chemical analysis to be fabulous. Strength of tone in bells depends upon the weight of metal, depth of tone upon the shape. By varying these chimes are produced. (See Thiers, Des Cloches (Paris); Harzen, Die Glockgiesserei (Weimar, 1854); Otto, Glockenkunde (Leipzig, 1857); Chrysaender, Historische Nachrichten von Kirchenglocken).

THE BLESSING OF BELLS in the Romish Church is a most extraordinary piece of superstition. They are said to be consecrated to God, that he may bestow upon them the power, not of striking the ear only, but also of touching the heart. When a bell is to be blessed, it is hung up in a place where there is room to walk round it. Beforehand, a holy-water pot, another for salt, napkins, a vessel of oil, incense, myrrh, cotton, a basin and ewer, and a crumb of bread, are prepared. There is then a procession from the vestry, and the officiating priest, having seated himself near the bell, instructs the people in the holiness of the action he is going to perform, and then sings the Miserere. Next, he blesses some salt and water, and offers a prayer that the bell may acquire the virtue of guarding Christians from the stratagems of Satan, of breaking the force of tempests, and raising devotion in the heart, etc. He then mixes salt and water, and, crossing the bells thrice, in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, pronounces over each, "God be with you." This being done, he dips the aspersionum, or sprinkler, in the holy water, and with it washes the bell; during this ablution psalms are sung. After this, a vessel, containing what they call oil for the infirm, is opened by the dean, into which the officiating priest dips the thumb of his right hand, and applies it to the middle of the bell, signing it with the sign of the cross. The twenty-eighth psalm being then sung, the bell is marked with seven other crosses, during which the priest honors the bell with a sort of baptism, consecrating it in the name of the Trinity, and naming some particular saint, who stands godfather to the bell, and from that time it bears his name. It is then perfumed with incense and myrrh, which, in a prayer used on the occasion, is called the dear of the Holy Ghost. For the full forms, see Migne, Liturgie Catholique, p. 368; Boissoneau, Diet. des Cérémonies, i. 886. The practice of consecrating and baptizing bells is a modern invention. Baronius refers the origin to the time of John XIII, A.D. 968, who consecrated the great bell of the Lateran Church, and gave it the name of John. The practice, however, appears to have prevailed at an earlier period; for in the capitulars of Charles the Great it is censured and prohibited. The rituals of the Romanists tell us that the consecration of bells is designed to represent that of pastors; that the ablution, followed by unction, expresses the sanctification acquired by baptism; the seven crosses show that pastors should exceed the rest of Christians in the graces of the Holy Ghost; and that as the smoke of the perfume rises in the bell, and fills it, so a pastor, adorned with the fulness of God's spirit, receives the perfume of the vows and prayers of the faithful.

The TOLLING of bells at funerals is an old practice. It was a superstitious notion that evil spirits were hovering round to make a prey of departing souls, and that the tolling of bells struck them with terror. In the Council of Cologne it is said, "Let bells be blessed, as the trumpets of the church militant, by which the people are assembled to hear the word of God, the clergy to announce his mercy by day, and his truth in their nocturnal vigils; that by their sound the faithful may be invited to prayers, and that the spirit of devotion in them may be increased." The fathers have also maintained that demons, affrighted by the sound of bells calling Christians to prayer, would flee away, and when they fled the persons of the faithful would be secure; that the destruction of lightnings and whirlwinds would be averted, and the spirits of the storm defeated. Durand says, in his Rationale of the Roman Church, "that for expiring persons bells must be tolled, that people may put up their prayers. This must be done twice for a woman and thrice for a man; for an ecclesiastic as many times as he had orders; and at the conclusion a peal of all the bells must be given, to distinguish the quality of the persons for whom the people are to offer up their prayers." The uses of bells, according to the Romish idea, are summed up in the following distich, often inscribed on bells:

Deus hoc bellum; postquam fuerit, festinat honorari."

"I praise the true God; I call the people; I assemble the clergy; I lament the dead; I drive away infection; I honor the festivals." The following are the names, kinds, and offices of bells used in churches and "religious houses": 1. Squilla or scilla, a little bell hung in the refectory, near the abbot's seat, which he rang to signify the end of the repast. It was also used to procure silence when there was too much noise. 2. Cymbalum, used in the cloister. 3. Nona, in the choir. 4. Campana, in the Campanile (q. v.); perhaps used when there was only one church-bell. 5. Signum, in the church-tower. The Campana sancta, vulgarly called in the country the "Sance-bell," was rung when the priest said the Sanctus, sanctus, sanctus, Dominus Deus Sabaoth. Matthew Paris says that it was forbidden to ring the bells during a period of mourning; and the Church of Rome retains to this day the custom of not suffering the bells to sound during the period from Good Friday to Easter Day. For an amusing paper on "Bells," see Southey's Doctor, vol. i.—Bergier, s. v. "Cloche;" Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. viii, ch. vii, § 15; Martene, De Ant. Eccles. Litibus, t. ii; Landon, Eccles. Dictionary, s. v. "Bells;" Coleman, Ancient Christianity, ch. xiii, § 9; Quarterly Review (Lond.), Oct. 1854, art. ii.

Bell, Andrew, D.D., inventor of what is called the Lancasterian School System, was born at St. Andrew's, 1752, and educated at the University there. Taking orders in the Church of England, he was appointed chaplain at Fort St. George, and minister of St. Mary's church at Madras. Here he commenced instructing gratuitously the orphan children of the military asylum, and made the first attempt at the system of mutual instruction. On his return to England he published in London, in 1797, An Experiment made at the Male Asylum at Madras, suggesting a System by which a School or Family may teach itself and the superintendance of the Master or Parent. The pamphlet attracted but little attention until, in the following year, Joseph Lancaster opened a school in Southwark for poor children, supported by subscription, and conducted upon this system. It was so successful that similar schools were established elsewhere. The education of the poor being undertaken on so large a scale by a sectarian, the subscribers being also in the main dissenters from the Church of England, caused some alarm in the leading members of that church. Bell was opposed to Lancaster, and in 1807 was employed to establish schools where the Church doctrine would be taught, and to prepare books for them. Funds were provided, and the rivalry, by stimulating both parties to exertion, resulted in nothing but good; though the particular feature, that of mutual instruction with the help of a master only, has been found to require very material modifications. Dr. Bell, as a reward for his labors, was made a prebendary of Westminster. He died at Cheltenham, January 28, 1832, leaving over £600,000 for educational purposes.—English Cyclopædia.

Bell, William, D.D., an English divine, was born about 1731, and was educated at Magdalen College, Cambridge. He became prebendary of St. Paul's, and throughout a long life was noted for his piety, learning, and benevolence. In 1810 he founded eight new scholarships at Cambridge for the benefit of sons of poor clergymen. He died at Westminster in 1816. His writings include An Inquiry into the divine Mission of John the Baptist and of Christ (Lond. 1761, 8vo; 3d ed. 1810); Defence of Revelation (1756, 8vo); Authority, Nature, and Design of the Lord's Supper (1780, 8vo); Sermons on various Subjects (Lond. 1817, 2 vols. 8vo).—Darling, Cyclopædia Bibliographica, i. 233; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i. 161.

Bell, Book, and Candle. In the Romish Church the ceremony of excommunication was formerly attended with great solemnity. Lamps or candles were extinguished by being thrown on the ground, with an imprecation that those against whom the excommunication was pronounced might be extinguished by the judgment of God. The summons to attend this ceremony was given by the ringing of a bell, and the curses accompanying it were pronounced out of a book by the priest. Hence the phrase of "cursing by bell, book, and candle." The following account, from the articles of the General Great Curse, found at Canterbury A.D. 1562, as it is set down by Thomas Becon, in the Reliques of Rome, is taken from Eadie, s. v. This was solemnly thundered out once in every quarter—that is, as the old book saith,—“The First Sunday of Advent, at coming of our Lord Jhesu Cryst: The first Sunday of Lenten: The Sunday in the Feste of the Trynyte; and Sunday within the Utas (Octaves) of the Blessed Vyrgin our Lady St. Mary.” At which Action the Prebate stands in the Pulpit in his Aube, the Cross being lifted up before him, and the Candles lighted on both sides of it, and begins thus, ‘By Authority God, Father, Son, and Holy-Ghost, and the glorious Mother and Mayden, our Lady St. Mary, and the Blessed Apostles Peter, and Paul, and all Apostles, Martyrs, Confessors, Vyrgyne, and the hallows of God; All thos byn accused that purchases Writts, or Letters of any Leud Court, or to let the Proccesse of the Law of Holy Church of Causes that longen skillfully to Christen Court, the which should not be demed by none other Law: And all that maliciously bereavev Holy Church of her right, or maken Holy Church lay fee, that is hallowd and Blessed. And also all thos that for malyce or wrathe of Parson, Vicare, or Priest, or of any other, or for wrongfull covetyse of himself withholden rightfull Tyths, and Offerings, Rents, or Mortuaries from her own Parish Church, and by way of covetyse fals lyche taking to God the worse, and to himself the better, or else torn him into another use, then hem oweth. For all Chrysten Man and Women been hard Lound on pain of deadly Sin, not onlyche by ordinance of Man, but both in the oldd Law, and also in the new Law, for to pay trulyche to God and holy Church the Tyth part of all manner of encrease that they winnen trulyche by the Grace of God, both with her travell, and alsoe with her craftes what-soe they be truly gotten.’ And then concludes all with the Curse it self, thus, ‘And now by Authoritie aforesaid we Denounce all thos accusyd that are so founden guyltie, and all thos that maintaine hem in her Sins or gyven hem hereto either help or counsell, soe they be departed free God, and all holi Church: and that they have noe part of the Pasyon of our Lord Jhesu Cryst, ne of noe Sacraments, ne no part of the Prayers among Christen Folk: But that they be accused of God, and of the Church, free the sole of her Foot to the crown of her hede, sleaping and waking, sitting and standing, and in all her Words, and in all her Werks; but if they have noe Grace of God to amend hem here in this Lyfe, for to dwell in the pain of Hell for ever withouten End: Fiat: Fiat. Doe to the Boke: Quench the Candles: Ring the Bell: Amen, Amen.’ And then the Boke is clapped together, the Candles blown out, and the Bells rung, with a most dreadful noise made by the Congregation present, bewailing the accused persons concerned in that Black Doom pronounced against them.”

Bellamy, Joseph, D.D., an eminent New England divine, was born at New Cheshire, Conn., 1719, and graduated at Yale College 1735. He began to preach at 18, and in 1749 was ordained pastor of the church in Bethlehem, Conn. In the great revival which soon after spread over New England, he was widely useful as an itinerant evangelist. His later years were spent (in addition to his pastoral labors) in teaching theology to students, who resorted to him in numbers. He was accustomed to give his pupils a set of questions, and also lists of books on the subjects of the questions; they were afterward made topics of examination on the part of the teacher, and of essays or sermons by the pupil. Many of the most prominent divines of New England in the last generation were Bellamy's students. He was less successful as a writer than as a teacher, though some of his books are still published. His True Religion delineated (Boston, 1750) went through many editions in this country and in Great Britain. He also published Theron, Paulinus, and Aspasia, or Letters and Dialogues upon the Nature of Love to God, etc. (1759); an Essay on the Nature and Glory of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, etc. (1762); The Half-way Covenant (1769); and a number of occasional sermons, with various controversial pamphlets, all of which may be found in his Works (N. Y. 1811, 3 vols. 8vo; 2d ed. Boston, 2 vols. 8vo), with memoir. A careful review of his writings, by Dr. Woodbridge, is given in the Literary and Theological Review, ii, 58.—Sprague Ann. i, 504. See NEW ENGLAND THEOLOGY.

Bellarmino, ROBERT, cardinal-archbishop of Capua, was born at Monte Pulciano, in Tuscany, October 4, 1542, being nephew, on his mother's side, of Pope Marcellus II. His father, intending him for civil life, sent him to the University of Padua; but the bent of his mind was toward theology, and in 1560 he entered the society of the Jesuits. His remarkable talents and progress in knowledge induced his superiors to order him to preach while as yet he was only a deacon; and at Mondovi, Florence, Padua, and Louvain, his talents as a preacher were first known. In 1569 he was admitted to the priesthood, and in the year following lectured on theology at Louvain, being the first Jesuit who had done so. He preached also in Latin with great repute. Upon his return to Rome in 1576, Pope Gregory XIII appointed him lecturer in controversial divinity in the new college (Collgium Romanum) which he had just founded; and Sixtus V sent him with Cardinal Cajetan into France, in the time of the League, to act as theologian to that legation, in case any controversy should arise with the Protestants, for which his studies during his residence in the Netherlands had eminently fitted him. In 1598 he was elevated to the purple by Clement VIII, and in 1601 he was made archbishop of Capua. This see he held only four years, and resigned it on being appointed librarian of the Vatican, refusing to retain a bishopric at which he could not reside. He would have been elected pope had not the cardinals feared the degree of power which the Jesuits might have attained with one of their body on the papal throne. Bellarmine died on the 17th of September, 1621, aged sixty-nine, with the reputation of being one of the most learned controversialists in Europe. It is curious that the favorite maxim of such an acute and learned controversialist was, “that an ounce of peace is worth a pound of victory.” The chief work of Bellarmine is his Body of Controversy (“De controversiis Christiane fidei,” etc.), first printed at Ingoldstadt, in 3 vols. fol., 1587-88-90. Another edition, corrected by himself, appeared at Venice, which was reprinted at Paris in 1602. In 1608 another edition (that of the Triadelpbi) was put forth at Paris, corrected and augmented upon a Memoir published by the author at Rome in 1607, entitled Recognitio Librorum omnium R. P. ab ipso edita. In this celebrated work Bellarmine generally lays down the positions of his adversaries fairly, without concealing their strength—a candor which, as Mosheim says, has exposed him to the reproaches of many writers of his own communion; and as, at the same time, he states the claims and dogmas of Rome unreservedly he is a much better source of information as to real Roman doctrine than such advocates as Bossuet and Möhler. Of this celebrated work vol. i contains three general controversies: (1.) On the Word of God, which, he says, is either written or unwritten: the written word is contained in the New and Old Testaments, the canonicity of which he defends. He maintains that the Church alone is the lawful interpreter. (2.) Of Jesus Christ, the Head of the Church; in which he proves the divinity of our Lord against the Arians; defends the Trinity; establishesthe Procession of the Holy Spirit, and justifies the addition of the word Filioque to the Creed. (3.) Of the Sovereign Pontiff, where he maintains that the government of the Church is purely monarchical; that St. Peter was the head of the Church, and that the popes succeed him in that quality; that they are infallible in their dogmatic judgments; that they have an indirect power over the temporal authority of kings, etc. Vol. ii contains four heads: (1.)

Of the Councils and the Church; among general Councils he reckons eighteen approved, eight disapproved, and six only partly approved (among which are Frankfort, Constance, and Basle), and one (Pisa, 1509) neither approved nor disapproved. He gives to the pope the authority to convoke and approve councils, and makes him superior to a general council. In the third book he treats of the visibility and indefectibility of the Church, and of the Notes of the Church. (2.) Of the Members of the Church, viz., clerks, monks, and laymen. (3.) Of the Church in Purgatory; in this he states, and endeavors to prove, the Roman doctrine of purgatory. (4.) Of the Church Triumphant, relating to the beatitude and worship of the saints. Vol. iii relates to the sacraments in general and in particular; and vol. iv treats of original sin; the necessity of grace, free-will, justification; the merit of good works, especially of prayer, fasting, and alms-giving; various matters disputed among the scholastic theologians, etc. Besides these works, we have of Bellarmine 3 vols. fol. of Opera Dieroni, published at Cologne in 1617, containing, 1. Commentaries on the Psalms, and Sermons;—2. A Treatise of Ecclesiastical Writers (often reprinted);—3. Treatises on the Translation of the Empire; on Indulgences; and the Worship of Images (against the synod of Paris); and on the judgment on a book entitled the "Concord of the Lutherans." Also, 4. Four Writings on the Affairs of Venice;—5. Two Writings against James I of England;—6. A Treatise, De potestate summi pontificis in rebus temporalibus, against William Barclay, condemned in 1620 by the Parliament;—7. Some Doctrinal Pieces;—8. Treatises on the Duties of Bishops (reprinted at Würzburg in 1749, 4to);—9. His Catholicism, or Christian Doctrine, which has been translated into many different languages: it was suppressed at Vienna by the Empress Maria Theresa. In his treatise De potestate summi Pontificis contra Barchinam (Rom. 1620, 8vo), he maintains the indirect temporal authority of the pope over princes and governments. The best edition of his whole works is that of Cologne, 1620 (7 vols. fol.). The De Controuersiis was reprinted at Rome, 1832-49 (4 vols. 4to). A good Life of Bellarmine is given in Rule's Celebrated Jesuits (Lond. 1854, 3 vols. 18mo). An Italian biography of Bellarmine, based on his autobiography, was published by Fulligatti (Rome, 1624). See also Frizon, Vie du Cardinal Bellarmine (Nancy, 1708, 4to); Nicéron, Mémoires, vol. xxxi; Bayle, *Dict. BELLAY, JEAN DE, an eminent French cardinal, was born in 1492; was made bishop of Bayonne, and in 1532 bishop of Paris. In 1533 he returned from England, whither, in 1527, he had been sent as ambassador to Henry VIII, who was then on the point of a rupture with the court of Rome, but who promised Du Bellay that he would not take the final step provided that he were allowed time to defend himself by his proctor. Du Bellay hastened to Rome, where he arrived in 1541, and obtained the required delay from Clement VII, which he sent instantly by a courier to England; but the courier not returning by the day fixed by the pope, sentence of excommunication was pronounced against Henry, and his kingdom laid under an interdict, in spite of the protestations of Du Bellay, at the instigation of the agents of Charles V. The courier arrived two days afterward. In 1535 the bishop was made cardinal, and served Francis I so effectually as his lieutenant general (C) that he made him successively bishop of Limoges (1541), archbishop of Bordeaux (1541), and bishop of Mans (1546). After the death of Francis Du Bellay was superseded by the Cardinal de Lorraine, and retired to Rome, when he was made bishop of Ostia, and died February 16th, 1560. Bellay was a friend of letters, and united with Budaëus in urging Francis I to establish the College de France. He wrote Poems, printed by Stephens (1560); Epistola Apologetica (1543, 8vo); and many letters.—Biog. Univ. tom. iv, p. 94; Nicéron, Mémoires, tom. xvi; Hoefcr, Biog. Générale, v, 227.

Bellegarde, Gabriel du Bac de, a French theologian, was born Oct. 17, 1717. He was early made canon of Lyons, but his Port-Royalism and his severe principles shut him out from preferment and lost him his canonry. He retired to Holland, where he collected Mémoires sur l'histoire de la Bulle Unigenitus dans les Pays Bas (4 vols. 12mo, 1755). He also wrote L'Histoire abrégée de l'Église d'Utrecht (1765, 12mo); edited the works of Van Espen, with a life (Lyons, 5 vols. fol. 1778), and a complete edition of the works of Arnould (Lausanne, 1775-82, with prefaces, notes, etc., 45 vols. in 4to).—Hoefcr, Biog. Générale, v, 238.

Bellegarde, Jean Baptiste Morvan de, a laborious French writer, known as the Abbé de Bellegarde, was born at Phyrac, August 30th, 1648. He was a Jesuit 16 years, but was obliged to leave the society on account of his Cartesianism. He translated the Letters and Sermons of Basil, the Sermons of Asterius, the Moralia of Ambrose, many of the works of Leo, Gregory Nazianzen, and Chrysostom, the Imitation of Christ and other works of Thomas à Kempis, and various other writings. His translations betray great negligence. He died April 26, 1734.—Hoefcr, Biog. Générale, v, 39.

Bellegarde, Octave de, a French prelate, was born in 1585, and nominated to the archbishopric of Sens in 1623. He maintained with firmness the immunities of the French clergy at the Assembly of Mantes in 1640, and was exiled by the offended court. In 1639 he subscribed the condemnation of the two works entitled Traité des Droits et Libertés de l'Église Gallicane, and Preuves of the same rights and liberties. He approved and defended the sentiments of Arnould expressed in his book De la fréquente Communion. He wrote St. Augustinus per se ipsum docens Catholicos et rinceps Pelagianus and died in 1646.—Hoefcr, Biog. Générale, v, 239.

Bellermann, JOHANN JOACHIM, a German theologian, was born at Erfurt on Sept. 23, 1754. After finishing his studies at the University of Göttingen, he accepted in 1778 a position as a private tutor in Russia. On his return in 1782 he became professor of theology in the University of Erfurt. After the suppression of this university he was called to Berlin as director of one of the colleges ("gymnasien"), and was at the same time appointed extraordinary professor at the University and consistorial councillor. He died Oct. 25, 1824. He is the author of numerous philological and theological works. The most important of the latter are Handbuch der biblischen Literatur (Erfurt, 4 vols. 1787); Versuch einer Metrik der Hebräer (Berlin, 1813); Nachrichten aus dem Alterthum über Essaver und Theophrast (Berlin, 1821); Urim und Thummim, die ältesten Gemmen (Berlin, 1824); Ueber die Gemmen der Alten mit dem Abraxasbild (3 pamphlets, Berlin, 1817-'19).—Broekhaus, Conversationslexicon, s. v.; Hoefcr, Biographie Générale, v, 251.

Belle-vue, ARMAND DE, a Dominican, who took his doctor's degree in theology about 1325, and was made master of the Sacred Palace in 1327. He died in 1334, and left ninety-eight Conférences on the Psalms (Paris, 1519; Lyons, 1525; Brixen, 1610), with the title, "Sermones plane Virgini." Also a collection of Prayers, and Meditations on the Life of our Lord (Mayence, 1503).—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Bellows (ἄνεμος, mapp'ach, blower; Sept. φούση) only occurs in Jer. vi, 29, and with reference to the casting of metal. As fires in the East are always of wood or charcoal, a sufficient heat for ordinary purposes is soon raised by the help of fans, and the use of bellows is confined to the workers in metal. Such was the case anciently; and in the mural paintings of Egypt we observe no bellows but such as are used for the forge or furnace. They occur as early as the time of Moses, being represented in a tomb at Thebes which bears the name of Thothes III. They consisted of a leathern bag secured and fitted into a frame, from which a long pipe extended for carrying the wind to the fire. They were worked by the feet, the operator standing upon them, with one under each foot, and pressing them alternately, while he pulled up each exhausted skin with a string he held in his hand. In one instance, it is observed from the painting that when the man left the bellows they were raised as if filled with air, and this would imply a knowledge of the valve. The earliest specimens seem to have been simply of reed, tipped with a metal point to resist the action of the fire (Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, iii, 338).

Two Forms of ancient Egyptian Bellows.

a, b, k, the leather case; c, l, the pipes conveying the wind to the fire; d, m, the fire; h, q, charcoal; k is raised as if full of air; i, p, r, crucibles.

Bellows of an analogous kind were early known to the Greeks and Romans. Homer (Il. xviii, 470) speaks of 20 φύσαι in the forge of Hephaestus, and they are mentioned frequently by ancient authors (Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v. Follis). The ordinary hand-bellows now used for small fires in Egypt are a sort of bag made of the skin of a kid, with an opening at one end (like the mouth of a common carpet bag), where the skin is sewed upon two pieces of wood; and these being pulled apart by the hands and closed again, the bag is pressed down, and the air thus forced through the pipe at the other end.

Belloy, JEAN BAPTISTE DE, cardinal-archbishop of Paris, was born October 9th, 1709, at Morangles, near Senlis. He entered the Church at an early age, was made archdeacon of Beauvais, and in 1751 became bishop of Glandèves. He was deputed to the Assembly of the clergy in 1755, where he sided with the moderate prelates, or Feuillants, as they were called, from their leader, the Cardinal de la Rochefoucault, who was minister of the feuille des bœufiers. The opposite party were called Theatines, from the old bishop of Mirepoix, who belonged to that order. M. Belloy was afterward made bishop of Marseilles, which diocese he governed for forty-five years. The revolution drove him into retirement at Chambly, near his native place, where he lived till 1802, when he was made archbishop of Paris, and in the following year he was created cardinal. He died June 10th, 1808, and Napoleon, who permitted his burial in the vault of his predecessors by a special privilege, desired that a monument should be erected "to testify the singular consideration which he had for his episcopal virtues."—Biog. Univ. tom. iv, p. 128; Landon, Eccles. Dictionary, s. v.

Belly (usually בֶּטֶן, be'ten, κοιλία, especially the womb; also בֶּטֶן, meim', γαστήρ, especially the bowels). Among the Hebrews and most ancient nations, the belly was regarded as the seat of the carnal affections, as being, according to their notions, that which first partakes of sensual pleasures (Titus i, 2; Phil. iii, 9; Rom. xvi, 18). It is used likewise symbolically for the heart, the innermost recesses of the soul (Prov. xviii, 8; xx, 27; xxii, 18). The expression embittering of the belly signifies all the train of evils which may come upon a man (Jer. iv, 19; ix, 15; comp. Num. xviii, 27). The "belly of hell" signifies the grave, or the under world. It is a strong phrase to express Jonah's dreadful condition in the deep (Jon. ii, 2).

Bel'maim (Βελθίμ v. r. Βελθαίμ, Vulg. Belma), a place which, from the terms of the passage, would appear to have been south of Dothaim (Judith vii, 3). Possibly it is the same as BELMEN (q. v.), though whether this is the case, or, indeed, whether either of them ever had any real existence, it is at present impossible to determine. See JUDITH. The Syriac has Abel-mechola.

Belmas, LOUIS, bishop of Cambray, was born at Montréal (Aude). At the time of the Revolution he was one of the priests who took the oath demanded by "the Civil Constitution of the Clergy." In 1801 he was appointed coadjutor to the "constitutional" bishop of Carcassonne, and in 1802 bishop of Cambray. When Napoleon was crowned, Belmas signed a formula of retractation. His pastoral letters during the reign of Napoleon showed him to be a very devoted partisan of imperialism. When, according to the Concordat of 1817, Cambray was to be made an archbishopric, the pope opposed it on account of the former views of Belmas. After the Revolution of 1830 the government again intended to make him an archbishop, but the design was once more abandoned on account of the opposition of Rome. In 1841 he issued a pastoral letter strongly urging sincere submission to and recognition of the government of Louis Philippe. This letter made a profound sensation in France, and greatly offended the Legitimists. Belmas died on July 21, 1841, at Cambray. He was the last of the "constitutional" bishops.—See HOEFER, Biographie Générale, v, 290.

Bel'men (Βελμέν v. r. Βελμαίν and Βελμαίμ; Vulg. omits), a place named among the towns of Samaria as lying between Bethhoron and Jericho (Judith iv, 4). The Hebrew name would seem to have been Abel-maim, but the only place of that name in the O. T. was far to the north of the locality here alluded to. See ABEL-MAIM. The Syriac version has Abel-meholah, which is more consistent with the context. See ABEL-MEHOLOAH; BELMAIM.

Belomancy. See DIVINATION.

Belpage, HENRY, D D., a minister of the Secession Church of Scotland, was born at Falkirk, May 24, 1774, where his father was minister of the Associate Church. He entered the University of Edinburgh in 1786, and made his theological studies under Dr. Lawson, at the secession seminary in Selkirk. He was licensed to preach at 19, and was ordained as colleague to his father in 1794, whom he succeeded as full pastor in 1798. His pulpit labors were very successful; he was one of the most popular and useful ministers of the day in Scotland. In 1814 he published Sacramental Addresses and Meditations (12mo, 5th edition, 1841, Edinb.); in 1817, Practical Discourses for the Young (8vo; several editions issued); in 1821, Sacra- mental Discourses, 2d series; 1822, Sketches of Life and Character; 1823, Discourses on Domestic Life (22mo); 1826, Discourses to the Youth; besides a number of smaller works, catechisms, etc. He died Sept. 16, 1844.—Jamieson, Cyclopædia of Relig. Biography, p. 42.

Belsham, THOMAS, a Socinian divine of note, was born at Bedford, England, April 15, 1750. In 1778 he was settled as pastor of a dissenting congregation at Worcester, from which, however, he removed in 1781 to take charge of the Daventry Academy. Here his sentiments underwent a change so far that, in 1789, he avowed himself a Unitarian of the school of Priestley. He resigned his station, and immediately took charge of Hackney College, a Unitarian institution, which in a few years sunk for want of funds. In 1805 he became minister of Essex Street Chapel, London, where he remained during the rest of his life. He died at Hampstead, Nov. 11, 1829. After Dr. Priestley he was regarded as the leader of Unitarianism in England. The "Unitarian Society for promoting Christian Knowledge" was founded at his suggestion. He aided largely in preparing the Improved Version of the N. T. (Unitarian; Lond. 1808, 8vo). His principal writings are, A Calm Inquiry into the Scripture Doctrine concerning the Person of Christ, etc. (Lond. 1811, 8vo);—Evidences of Christianity;—Epistles of Paul translated, with Exposition and Notes (Lond. 1822, 2 vols. 4to); Discourses Doctrinal and Practical; Review of American Unitarianism (1815, 8vo); Letters to the Bishop of London in Vindication of the Unitarians (1815, 8vo). His Life and Letters, by J. Williams, was published in 1833 (Lond. 8vo).—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographica, i. 238; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i. 163; Christian Examiner, xv. 69; Bennett, Hist. of Dissenters (Lond. 1839, 8vo).

Belshazzar (Heb. and Chald. Belshatzsar' [on the signif. see below], בֶּלְשַׁצְצָר; Sept. Βαλτιζααρ) is the name given in the book of Daniel to the last king of the Chaldees, under whom Babylon was taken by the Medes and Persians (chap. v. 1; vii. 1: viii. 1). B.C. 538. Herodotus calls this king, and also his father, Labyntus, which is undoubtedly a corruption of Nabonnedus, the name by which he was known to Berossus, in Joseph. Ant. Apion, i. 20. Yet in Josephus (Ant. x. 11. 2) it is stated that Baltasar was called Nabonnetel by the Babylonians, Nabonadus in the Canon of Ptolemy, Nabonnedus in Euseb. Chron. Armen. i. 60 (from Alexander Polyhistor), and Nabonnedochus in Euseb. Prep. Evang. ix. 41 (from Megasthenes), are evidently other varieties of his name. The only circumstances recorded of him in Scripture are his impious feast and violent death (Dan. v). During the period that the Jews were in captivity at Babylon, a variety of singular events concurred to prove that the sins which brought desolation on their country, and subjected them for a while to the Babylonish yoke, had not dissolved that covenant relation which, as the God of Abraham, Jehovah had entered into with them; and that any act of indignity perpetrated against this afflicted people, or any insult cast upon the service of their temple, would be regarded as an affront to the Majesty of Heaven, and not suffered to pass with impunity. The fate of Belshazzar affords a remarkable instance of this. He had had an opportunity of seeing in the case of his ancestors how hateful pride is, even in royalty itself; how instantly God can blast the dignity of the brightest crown, and consequently, how much the prosperity of kings and the stability of their thrones depend upon acknowledging that "the Most High ruleth in the Kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will." But this solemn lesson was lost upon Belshazzar. According to the views of some, Isaiah, in representing the Babylonian dynasty as the scourge of Palestine, styles Nebuchadnezzar a "serpent," Evil-Merodach a "cockatrice," and Belshazzar a "fiery flying serpent," the worst of all (Isa.

xiv. 4-29); but there is no reason for supposing the prophet in this passage to allude to any other event than the overthrow of the Philistines in the time of Hezekiah (see Henderson, Comment. in loc.).

The Scriptural narrative states that Belshazzar was warned of his coming doom by the handwriting on the wall that was interpreted by Daniel, and was slain during a splendid feast in his palace. Similarly Xenophon (Cyrop. vii. 5. 3) tells us that Babylon was taken by Cyrus in the night, while the inhabitants were engaged in feasting and revelry, and that the king was killed. On the other hand, the narratives of Berossus in Josephus (Apion, i. 20) and of Herodotus (i. 184 sq.) differ from the above account in some important particulars. Berossus calls the last king of Babylon Nabonnedus or Nabonadus (Nabu-nit or Nabo-uahit, i. e. Nebo blesses or makes prosperous), and says that in the 17th year of his reign (Cyrus took Babylon, the king having retired to the neighboring city of Borsippa or Borsippa (Birs-i-Nimrud), called by Niebuhr (Lect. on Anc. Hist. xii) "the Chaldean Benares, the city in which the Chaldeans had their most revered objects of religion, and where they cultivated their science." Being blockaded in that city, Nabonnedus surrendered, his life was spared, and a principality or estate given to him in Carmania, where he died. According to Herodotus, the last king was called Labynetus, a name easy to reconcile with the Nabonnedus of Berossus, and the Nabonnedochus of Megasthenes (Euseb. Prep. Evang. ix. 41). Cyrus, after defeating Labynetus in the open field, appeared before Babylon, within which the besieged defied attack and even blockade, as they had walls 300 feet high and 75 feet thick, forming a square of 15 miles to a side, and had stored up previously several years' provision. But he took the city by drawing off for a time the waters of the Euphrates, and then marching in with his whole army along its bed, during a great Babylonian festival, while the people, feeling perfectly secure, were scattered over the whole city in reckless amusement. These discrepancies have lately been cleared up by the discoveries of Sir Henry Rawlinson; and the histories of profane writers, far from contradicting the scriptural narrative, are shown to explain and confirm it. In 1851 he deciphered the inscriptions on some cylinders found in the ruins of Um-Kir (the ancient Ur of the Chaldees), containing memorials of the works executed by Nabonnedus (Jour. Sac. Lit. 1854, p. 252; Jan. 1862). From these inscriptions it appears that the eldest son of Nabonnedus was called Bel-shur-azzar, and admitted by his father to a share in the government. This name is compounded of Bel (the Babylonian god), Shur (a king), and the same termination as in Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar, etc., and is contracted into Belshazzar, just as Neriglissar (again with the same termination) is formed from Nergal-sharezar. In a communication to the Athenæum, No. 1377, Sir Henry Rawlinson says, "We can now understand how Belshazzar, as joint king with his father, may have been governor of Babylon when the city was attacked by the combined forces of the Medes and Persians, and may have perished in the assault which followed, while Nabonnedus leading a force to the relief of the place was defeated, and obliged to take refuge in Borsippa, capitulating after a short resistance, and being subsequently assigned, according to Berossus, an honorable retirement in Carmania." In accordance with this view, we arrange the last Chaldean kings as follows: Nebuchadnezzar, his son Evilmerodach, Neriglissar, Labrosoarchad (his son, a boy, killed in a conspiracy), Nabonnedus or Labynetus, and Belshazzar. Herodotus says that Labynetus was the son of Queen Nitocris; and Megasthenes (Euseb. Chr. Arm. p. 60) tells us that he succeeded Labrosoarchad, but was not of his family. In Dan. v. 2, Nebuchadnezzar is called the father of Belshazzar. This, of course, need only mean grandfather or ancestor. Now Neriglissar usurped the throne on the murder of Evilmerodach (Beros. ap. Joseph. Apion, i); we may therefore well suppose that on the death of his son Labrosarchad, Nebuchadnezzar's family was restored in the person of Nabonnedus or Labynetus, possibly the son of that king and Nitocris, and father of Belshazzar. The chief objection to this supposition would be, that if Neriglissar married Nebuchadnezzar's daughter (Joseph. c. Ap. i, 21), Nabonnedus would through her be connected with Labrosarchad. This difficulty is met by the theory of Rawlinson (Herod. Essay viii, § 25), who connects Belshazzar with Nebuchadnezzar through his mother, thinking it probable that Nebu-nahit, whom he does not consider related to Nebuchadnezzar, would strengthen his position by marrying the daughter of that king, who would thus be Belshazzar's maternal grandfather. A totally different view is taken by Marcus Niebuhr (Geschichte Assur's und Babel's seit Plul., p. 91), who considers Belshazzar to be another name for Evilmerodach, the son of Nebuchadnezzar. He identifies their characters by comparing Dan. v with the language of Berosus about Evilmerodach (προστάς τῶν πραγμάτων δριμόως καὶ ἀσελγῶς). He considers that the capture of Babylon described in Daniel was not by the Persians, but by the Medes, under Astyages (i. e. Darius the Mede), and that between the reigns of Evilmerodach or Belshazzar, and Neriglissar, we must insert a brief period during which Babylon was subject to the Medes. This solves a difficulty as to the age of Darius (Dan. v, 31; comp. Rawlinson, Essay iii, § 11), but most people will probably prefer the actual facts discovered by Sir Henry Rawlinson to the theory (though doubtless very ingenious) of Niebuhr. On Rawlinson's view, Belshazzar died B.C. 538, on Niebuhr's B.C. 559 (Göbel, De Belsazar, Laub. 1757).—Smith. See BABYLONIA.

Belteshaz'zar (Heb. Belteshatstzar', בֶּלְתֶּשְׁצַרְצַר, Bel's prince, that is, whom Bel favors; Sept. Βελτάσαρ), the Chaldee or Assyrio-Babylonian name, given to Daniel at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, in Babylon (Dan. i, 7, etc). See DANIEL.

Belus (Βήλος). 1. According to classical mythology, a son of Poseidon by Libya or Eurynome. He was twin brother of Agenor, and father of Ægyptus and Danaus. He was believed to be the ancestral hero and national divinity of several Eastern nations, from which the legends about him were transplanted to Greece, and became mixed up with Greek myths. (See Apollod. ii, 1, 4; Diocl. i, 28; Servius, ad Æn. i, 733.) See BAAL.

2. The father of the Carthaginian queen Dido, otherwise called Punydon. He conquered Cyprus and then gave it to Teucer. (See Virgil, Æn. i, 621; Servius, ad Æn. i, 625, 646.) By some he was thought to be the Tyrian king Eth-baal (q. v.), father of the Israelitish queen Jezebel (1 Kings xvi, 31), from whose period (she was killed B.C. 883) this does not much differ, for Carthage was founded (according to Josephus, Apion, i, 18) B.C. 861.

Belus (Βηλέϊς), called also Pagida by Pliny (v, 19), a small river of Palestine, described by Pliny as taking its rise from a lake called Cendevia, at the roots of Mount Carmel, which, after running five miles, enters the sea near Ptolemais (xxxvi, 26), of two stadia from the city according to Josephus (War. x, 2). It is chiefly celebrated among the ancients for its vitreous sand; and the accidental discovery of the manufacture of glass (q. v.) is ascribed by Pliny to the banks of this river, which he describes as a sluzgish stream of unwholesome water, but consecrated to religious ceremonies (comp. Tacitus, Hist. v, 7). It is now called Nahr Nooman, but the Lake Cendevia has disappeared. It is an ingenious conjecture of Reland (Palest. p. 290) that its ancient appellation may be connected with the Greek name for glass (βηλέϊς or βάλεις), and it is possible that the name appears in the Scriptural one, Bealoth (q. v.), incorrectly rendered "in Aloth"

(1 Kings iv, 16). For the temple of Belus, see BABEL.

Bema (βῆμα, rostrum), the third or innermost part of the ancient churches, corresponding to what we now call the chancel. The bema was the whole space where stood the altar, the bishop's throne, and the seats of the priests; in which sense Bingham understands the fifty-sixth canon of Laodicea, which forbids priests to go into the bema and take their seats there before the bishop comes (see Chrysol. Hom. 35, de Pentecost. tom. v, p. 553). The name bema arose from its being more exalted than the rest of the church, and raised upon steps. As the bema was especially devoted to the clergy, they were called sometimes οἱ τοῦ βήματος, and τάξις τοῦ βήματος, or "the Order of the Bema."—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. viii, ch. vi; Suicer, Theaurus, i, 682; Landon, Eccl. Dict. ii, 143.

Bemo, JOHN, a Seminole Indian, converted to Christianity, and afterward instrumental in great good to his tribe. He was born in the year 1825, in Florida. When quite young he was brought to St. Augustine by his father, who perished there through the brutality of the whites. Bemo was kidnapped by a ship's crew, and carried on a several years' voyage, visiting Europe, Asia, and Africa. During this voyage he was thoroughly converted, through the agency of a pious sailor. After other voyages he attended school a year with the "Friends" in Philadelphia, and then commenced laboring with great success among his people, at their new location in the West, and by his appeals in the Eastern cities he kept them alive when threatened with starvation. Further facts are wanting. He was a greatly wronged boy, but an apostolic and blessed man.—Thomson, Biographical Sketches, p. 133.

Ben (Heb. id. בֶּן; son; Sept. omits; Vulg. Ben), a Levite "of the second degree," one of the porters appointed by David to the service of the ark, apparently as an assistant musician (1 Chr. xv, 18). B.C. 1043.

Ben- (בֶּן, son of) is often found as the first element of Scriptural proper names (see those following), in which case the word which follows it is always to be considered dependent on it, in the relation of our genitive. The word which follows Ben- may either be of itself a proper name, or be an appellative or abstract, the principle of the connection being essentially the same in both cases. Comp. Ab-. As to the first class, the Syro-Arabian nations being all particularly addicted to genealogy, and possessing no surnames, nor family names in our sense, they have no means of attaching a definite designation to a person except by adding some accessory specification to his distinctive, or, as we would term it, Christian name. This explains why so many persons, both in the Old and New Testaments, are distinguished by the addition of the names of their father. The same usage is especially frequent among the Arabs; but they have improved its definiteness by adding the name of the person's child, in case he has one. In doing this, they always observe this arrangement—the name of the child, the person's own name, and the name of his father. Thus the designation of the patriarch Isaac would in Arabic run thus: Father of Jacob, Isaac, son of Abraham (Abū Ja'qūb, Ishāq, ben Ibrahim). As to the latter class, there is an easy transition from this strict use of son to its employment in a figurative sense, to denote a peculiar dependence of derivation. The principle of such a connection not only explains such proper names as Ben-Chésed (son of mercy), but applies to many striking metaphors in other classes of words, as sons of the bow, a son of seventeen years (the usual mode of denoting age), a hill, the son of oil (Isa. v, 2), and many others, in which our translation effaces the Oriental type of the expression. All proper names which begin with Ben belong to one or the other of these classes. Ben-Aminadab, Ben-Gaber, and Ben-Chesed (1 Kings iv, 10, 11), illustrate all the possibilities of combination noticed above. In these names "Ben" would, perhaps, be better not translated, as it is in our version; although the Vulgate has preserved it, as the Sept. also appears to have once done in ver. 8, to judge by the reading there.—Kitto.

These remarks apply also in part to BAR- (q. v.), the Aramaic synonyme of Ben-, as in the name Bar-Abbas.

The following are instances in which our translators have doubted whether the prefix Ben- should not be transcribed, and have therefore placed it in the margin, giving "son" in the text: Ben-Hur, Ben-Debar, Ben-Hesed, Ben-Abinadab, Ben-Geber (1 Kings iv, 8-13) [for each of these, see the latter part of the name]. Of the following the reverse is true: Ben-Hanan, Ben-Zoloth (1 Chron. iv, 20; Ben-o (1 Chron. xxiv, 26, 27); Ben-jamite (Psa. vii, title; Judg. ii, 15; xix, 16; 1 Sam. ix, 1, 4; 2 Sam. xx, 1; Esth. ii, 5).

Benai'ah (Heb. Benai'ah, בְּנֵי־אֵיחָא, built [i. e. made or sustained] by Jehorah, 2 Sam. xx, 23; 1 Chron. iv, 36; xi, 22, 31; xxvii, 14; 2 Chron. xx, 14; Ezra x, 25, 30, 35, 43; Ezek. xi, 23; elsewhere and oftener in the prolonged form, בְּנֵי־אֵיחָא; Sept. generally [also Josephus, Ant. vii, 11, 8] Barai'ac, in Chron. occasionally v. r. Barai'ac, and in Ezra Barai'ac, rarely any other v. r., e. g. Barai'ac, Barai') the name of a large number of men in the O. T.

1. The son of Jehoiada the chief-priest (1 Chron. xxvii, 5), and therefore of the tribe of Levi, though a native of Kabez (2 Sam. xxiii, 20; 1 Chron. xi, 22), in the south of Judah; set by David (1 Chron. xi, 24) over his body-guard of Cherthites and Pelethites (2 Sam. viii, 18; 1 Kings i, 38; 1 Chron. xviii, 17; 2 Sam. xx, 23), and occupying a middle rank between the first three of the Gibborim, or "mighty men," and the thirty "valiant men of the armies" (2 Sam. xxiii, 22, 30; 1 Chron. xi, 24; xxvii, 6; and see Kennicott, Diss. p. 177). The exploits which gave him this rank are narrated in 2 Sam. xxiii, 20, 21; 1 Chron. xi, 22; he overcame two Moabitish champions ("lions of God"), slew an Egyptian giant with his own spear, and went down into an exhausted cistern and destroyed a lion which had fallen into it when covered with snow. He was captain of the host for the third month (1 Chron. xxvii, 5). B. C. 1046. Benaiah remained faithful to Solomon during Adonijah's attempt on the crown (1 Kings i, 8, 10, 26), a matter in which he took part in his official capacity as commander of the king's body-guard (1 Kings i, 32, 36, 38, 44); and after Adonijah and Joab had both been put to death by his hand (2 Kings ii, 25, 29, 30, 34), as well as Shimei (2 Kings ii, 46), he was raised by Solomon into the place of Joab as commander-in-chief of the whole army (ii, 35; iv, 3). B. C. 1015. See DAVID.

Benaiah appears to have had a son called, after his grandfather, Jehoiada, who succeeded Ahithophel after the person of the king (1 Chron. xxvii, 34). But this is possibly a copyist's mistake for "Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada."—Smith, s. v.

2. A Pirathonite of the tribe of Ephraim, one of David's thirty mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii, 30; 1 Chron. xi, 31), and the captain of the eleventh monthly course (1 Chron. xxvii, 14). B. C. 1044. See DAVID.

3. A Levite in the time of David, who "played with a psaltery on Alamoth" at the removal of the ark (1 Chron. xv, 18, 20; xvi, 5). B. C. 1043.

4. A priest in the time of David, appointed to blow the trumpet before the ark when brought to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv, 21; xvi, 6). B. C. 1043.

5. The son of Jeriel, and father of Zechariah, a Levite of the sons of Asaph (2 Chron. xx, 14). B. C. considerably ante 890.

6. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah, one of the "overseers" (בְּנֵי־רִבְזֵי) of offerings" (2 Chron. xxxi, 13). B. C. 726.

7. One of the "princes" (בְּנֵי־נָזִירִים) of the families of Simeon who dispossessed the Amalekites from the pasture-grounds of Gedor (1 Chron. iv, 36). B. C. cir. 713.

8. The father of Pelatiah, which latter was "a prince of the people" in the time of Ezekiel (xi, 1, 13). B. C. ante 571.

9. One of the "sons" of Parosh, who divorced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra x, 25). B. C. 458.

10. Another Israelite, of the "sons" of Palathmoab, who did the same (Ezra x, 30). B. C. 458.

11. Another, of the "sons" of Bani, who did likewise (Ezra x, 35). B. C. 458.

12. A fourth, of the "sons" of Nebo, who did the same (Ezra x, 43). B. C. 458.

Ben-am'i (בְּנֵי־אָמִי, son of my kindred, i. e. born of incest; Sept. repeats, Ἀγγάρ, υἱὸς γένους μου), the original form of the name ΑΜΜΟΝ (q. v.), the son of Lot by his younger daughter (Gen. xix, 38).

Bené-b'erak (Heb. Beney'-Berak', בְּנֵי־בְרָכָה, sons of Berak or lightning [comp. Boanerges]; Sept. Βαρυθάρια v. r. Barauθάρια; Vulg. et Bane et Baruch), one of the cities of the tribe of Dan, mentioned only in Josh. xix, 46, between Jehud and Gath-rimmon. The paucity of information which we possess regarding this tribe (omitted entirely from the lists in 1 Chron. ii-viii, and only one family mentioned in Num. xxvi) makes it impossible to say whether the "sons of Berak," who gave their name to this place, belonged to Dan, or were, as we may perhaps infer from the name, earlier settlers dispossessed by the tribe. The reading of the Syriac, Banl-debic, favors this latter foreign origin, but is not confirmed by any other version. It is evidently the Baraca, a "village in the tribe of Dan near Azotus," mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (in the Onomasticon, s. v. Barath, Βαρακά), although they speak confusedly of its then existing name (Bareca, Βαργά). It is doubtless the present Moslem village Baraka (Robinson, Researches, iii, App. p. 118), a little north of Ashdod (Van de Velde, Map). The same place appears to be referred to in the Talmud (Sanhedr. xxxii, 1), and was the residence of the famous Rabbi Akiba (q. v.). Schwarz, however, disputes this location (Palest. p. 141).

Benedicite, or "the song of the three Hebrew children," is a canticle appointed by the rubric of the Church of England to be said or sung at the morning service, instead of the hymn Te Deum, whenever the minister may think fit. It is a paraphrase of the forty-eighth Psalm. In the Book of Common Prayer published under the sanction of Edward VI, it was ordered that the Te Deum should be said daily throughout the year, except in Lent, when the Benedicite was to be used. The minister had no choice according to this appointment; but in the subsequent revision of the Prayer Book, the choice was left to the option of the minister to read the Te Deum or the Benedicite. This hymn was sung as early as the 3d century. Chrysostom speaks of it as sung in all places throughout the world.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xiv, ch. xi, § 6; Procter, On Common Prayer, p. 224.

Benedict I, Pope, surnamed Bonus, a Roman, elected to the papal see after John III, June 3, 574. He occupied the see about four years, dying in 578. During his pontificate Rome suffered greatly from the inroads of the Lombards and from famine. Like his predecessors, he confirmed the fifth oecumenical council. An epistle to the Spanish bishop David, which has been ascribed to him, is not genuine.

II, Pope, also a Roman, succeeded Leo II, 26th June, 684, and died 7th May, 685. His incumbency was marked by nothing of note.

III, Pope, elected Sept. 1, 855. His title was disputed by Anastasius, who was supported by the emperors Lothaire and Louis, whose deputies entered Rome, forcibly ejected Benedict, and imprisoned him. Rome was thrown into consternation at these acts; and the bishops, assembling in spite of the threats of the emperor's deputies, refused to recognise Anastasius. Benedict, removed from the church where he had been imprisoned, was carried in triumph by the people to the palace of Lateran. In unison with Ethelwolf, king of the Anglo-Saxons, he established an English school at Rome. He confirmed the deposition of Bishop Gregory of Syracuse, pronounced in 854 by a synod of Constantinople, which occasioned soon after the Greek schism. There are still extant four of his epistles (Mansi, xv, 110-120). He held the see only two years and a half, and died March 10th, 858.

IV, Pope, succeeded John IX, April 6, 900, and held the papacy nearly five years, dying Oct. 20, 904. He crowned, in 901, Louis, King of Provence, as Roman Emperor. There are still extant two of his epistles, one addressed to the bishops and princes of Gaul, and the other to the clergy and people of Langres, whose exiled bishop he reinstated (Mansi, xviii, 222-236).

V, Pope, elected in 964. John XII, his predecessor, who had been protected by the Emperor Otho the Great against Berenguer and Adalbert, ungratefully took the part of the emperor's enemies. Otho, justly irritated by this conduct, convoked a council at Rome in 963, where John was deposed and Leo VIII elected. John soon after repaired to Rome, held another council in 964, and in his turn deposed Leo; but soon after this John was assassinated, and his party elected Benedict V to succeed him. Otho soon appeared again on the scene, laid siege to Rome, and carried away Benedict (who consented to his deposition) captive into Germany. Leo VIII died at Rome in April, 965: the people demanded Benedict as his successor, and the emperor would probably have granted their request, but Benedict died in July of the same year. The historians of the Church of Rome are naturally very much puzzled in deciding whether Benedict was a lawful pope or not; but the question is generally compromised by recognising both Leo and Benedict.

VI, Pope, son of Hildebrand, supposed to have been elected pope on the death of John XIII, A.D. 972. On the death of the Emperor Otho, he was strangled or poisoned in the castle of St. Angelo, 974. The papacy about this time was in a most degraded condition.

VII, Pope, son of a count of Tusculum, ascended the pontifical throne in 975, and died July, 984. He held two councils at Rome; in the one he excommunicated the antipope Boniface VIII; in the other, all those guilty of simony. A letter in which he confirms certain prerogatives of the bishop of Lerch is found in Lambecii, Biblioth. Cæs. lib. ii. Several other bulls on the privileges of certain diocesan churches are given by Mansi, tom. xix.

VIII, Pope, son of Gregory, count of Tusculum, succeeded Sergius IV, July 20, 1012. He was driven from Rome by his competitor Gregory, who in turn was expelled by Henry, King of Germany. In 1014 Benedict crowned Henry Roman Emperor, and presented him with a globe surmounted by a cross, which became henceforth one of the emblems of the empire. The emperor confirmed to the Church of Rome all the donations made by Charlemagne and the Othos, declared that the election of a pope would not require any longer the confirmation of the emperor, and reserved for himself and his successors only the right of sending commissaries to the consecration of the pope. At the request of the emperor, Benedict ordered the recital of the Constantinopolitan symbol during the mass, hoping that it would facilitate a reunion with the Greek Church. In 1016 the Saracens made an irruption into Italy, but were defeated by an army collected by Benedict's ener. y. He died July 10, 1024.—Gieseler, Ch. Hist. period iii, div. ii, § 22.

IX, the boy-pope, one of the worst monsters that ever held the papal throne. He was elected about June, 1023, but his vile conduct excited the Romans to expel him in 1045, and Silvester III was elected, who held it for about three months, when Benedict, through the influence of his family, succeeded for a time in recovering his dignity. However, he was again compelled to flee, and Johannes Gratianus was, A.D. 1045, put into his place, who took the style of Gregory VI. It is said, indeed, that Gratian bought his elevation from Benedict, who wished to marry an Italian princess. Thus there were three popes actually living at the same time, and Rome was filled with brawls and murders. To remedy this, Henry the Black, king of Germany, convoked a council at Sutri, near Rome, in December, 1046, where Gregory VI was deposed, and, by the common consent of Germans and Romans, Suidger was elected pope, and consecrated under the name of Clement II. He, however, died at the end of nine months, i. e. October 9th, 1047; upon which Benedict came to Rome for the third time, where he held his ground till July, 1048, when he was replaced by Damasus II, the nominee of the emperor. Nothing is known for certain concerning him after this period, but he is believed to have died in 1054.—Biog. Univ. iv, 183.

X (John, bishop of Velletri) was raised to the papedom by a faction in March, 1058, the instant Pope Stephen IX had closed his eyes. Benedict was so ignorant and obtuse that he obtained the surname of Muro, stupid. Hildebrand, upon his return from Germany in 1059, caused Gerard to be elected under the name of Nicholas II, to whom Benedict quickly yielded. He died in confinement in 1059.—Biog. Univ. iv, 183.

XI, Pope (Nicholas Boccasini) was born at Treviso in 1240, entered, at the age of fourteen, the order of Dominicans, and became later the general of his order. Under Boniface he was made cardinal and bishop of Ostia. He was elected pope October 27, 1303, upon the death of Boniface VIII. When elected to the papal throne he was cardinal-bishop of Ostia. His pontificate was short, extending only to eight months. He took off the sentence of excommunication pronounced against the King of Denmark, and the interdict laid upon his kingdom, and annulled the bulls of Boniface VIII against Philippe-le-Bel of France. He died of poison at Perugia on the 6th or 7th of July, 1304, and was enrolled among the saints by Pope Clement XII, April 24th, 1736, his festival being marked on the 7th of July. He left Commentaries on Job, the Psalms, the Apocalypse, and Matthew, besides some volumes of Sermons and his Bulls.

XII (originally Jacob de Novellis), a native of Savertun, and monk of Cîteaux, afterward bishop of Pamiers and of Mirepoix, pope from Dec. 1334, to April, 1342, was the third of the Avignon (q. v.) popes, the friend of Petrarch, and one of the most virtuous of the pontiffs. Scarcely was he elevated to the pontificate when a deputation was sent to him from Rome pressing him to return to the ancient seat; but circumstances induced him to remain at Avignon. He addressed the Castilian clergy on the necessity of reforming their lives, and endeavored, though with little success, to correct some of the more glaring evils of the Romish system. He died April 25, 1342, at Avignon. See his life in Baluze, Vies des Papes d'Avignon.

XIII (A), Pope, was of a noble family of Aragon. His name was Pedro de Luna, and in 1375 he was made cardinal by Gregory IX. On the death of Gregory XI began the great Western schism, by the election of Urban VI at Rome and of Clement VII at Avignon. Pedro de Luna took part with the latter, who made him his legate in Spain. Upon the death of Clement, Pedro was chosen by the cardinals attached to the party at Avignon to succeed him on the 28th of September, 1394, and in the mean time Boniface VIII had ascended the throne at Rome. To put an end to the schism, it was agreed by all the sovereigns of Europe, except the king of Aragon, that a cession of the papal dignity should be made by both parties, but both Benedict and Boniface refused to resign; whereupon, in a national council held at Paris May 23d, 1398, it was agreed to withdraw from the obedience of Benedict. This example having been followed in almost all the countries of Europe, sixteen of the cardinals who had adhered to Benedict deserted him. He was besieged at Avignon by the Marshal de Boucicault, and with difficulty escaped. After this the aspect of his affairs for a time brightened; but at length, in the council of Pisa, convoked in 1409, both Benedict and Gregory XII were excommunicated and deposed. Benedict, driven from Avignon, retired to the little castle of Peñíscola, in Valencia, retaining the support of Aragon, Castile, and Scotland. Thus the schism still remained; and it was necessary to call another council, which met at Constance in 1414, where Ottoneo Colonna was elected pope under the name of Martin V, who anathematized Benedict, but without producing any effect, since he continued in his rebellion till his death, which happened at Peñíscola November 17th, 1424. So far did he carry his resolution to prolong the schism, that he exacted a promise from the two cardinals who continued with him that they would elect another pope to succeed him after his death: this was done in the person of Clement VIII.—Hist. of the Popes, p. 280.

XIII (B). Pope, originally Peter Francis Orsini, was born in 1649, and was raised to the papal chair May 20th, 1724. He was pious, virtuous, and liberal; but, unfortunately, placed too much confidence in Cardinal Coscia, his minister, who shamefully oppressed the people. A fruitless attempt which he made to reconcile the Romish, Greek, Lutheran, and Calvinist churches bears honorable testimony to his tolerant spirit. His theological works, including Homilies on Ezekiel, etc., were published at Rome (1728, 3 vols. 6s.). He died in 1730. His Life was written by Alessandro Borgia (Rom. 1741).—Mosheim, Ecl. Hist. ii, 305, 370.

XIV, Pope, originally Prospero Lambertini, of a noble family of Bologna, was born in 1675, became in 1727 bishop of Ancona, in 1728 cardinal, in 1731 archbishop of Bologna, and succeeded Clement XII August 17th, 1740. He was a man of great ability, learning, and industry, and was especially distinguished in the canon and civil law. He died May 4th, 1758, after having signalized his pontificate by the wisdom of his government, and his zeal for the propagation of Romanism. During the eighteen years of his reign Rome enjoyed peace, plenty, and prosperity, and half a century after his death the pontificate of Lambertini was still remembered and spoken of at Rome as the last period of unalloyed happiness which the country had enjoyed. His tolerance was remarkable; indeed, it exposed him to the censure of the rigorists among the college of cardinals. Without exhibiting any thing like indifference to the doctrines of the Church of which he was the head, he showed urbanity and friendliness toward all Christians of whatever denomination, whether kings or ordinary travellers, who visited his capital; and in Germany, France, and Naples his influence was constantly exerted to discourage persecution, and to restrain the abuse of ecclesiastical power. Benedict was learned not only in theology, but in history, in the classical writers, and in elegant literature, and he had a taste for the fine arts. His works were published at Rome in 12 vols. 4to (1747). The most remarkable are his treatise De Servorum Dei Beatificatione et Beatorum Canonizatione, in four books, a work full of historical and theological learning;—De Synodo Diocesana, which is also much esteemed;—Institutiones Ecclesiasticæ;—De Missæ Officio, libri iii; besides his Bullarium, or collection of bulls issued by him, and several letters and dissertations in Italian. Benedict was always opposed to the Jesuits, and, when he died, was preparing to suppress the order.—Vie du pape Benoît XIV (Paris, 1775); Ranke, Hist. of Popes, ii, 287.

Benedict of Nursia, the great organizer of Western monasticism, was born at Nursia (or Norci.), in Spoleto, of wealthy parents, about A.D. 480. He was educated at Rome, but at 17 years of age he determined to devote himself to a monastic life. He fled secretly from Rome, and retired to the desert of Subiaco, about forty miles distant, where he shut himself up in a dismal cave. There he continued for three years, unknown to any person save a monk (Romanus), who let down bread to him by a rope. By that time his fame had become spread abroad, and he was chosen by the monks of a neighboring monastery for their abbot; but he shortly returned to his solitude, whither multitudes flocked to see him and hear him preach. His hearers soon became his disciples, and, with his consent, continued with him. So great were the numbers who did so, that in a short time there were no less than twelve monasteries formed on the spot. Benedict occupied now too exalted a position to escape attacks; he was menaced and persecuted, and his life even threatened by poison. This, after a time, compelled him to remove, and he led his little army of followers to Monte Cassino, where he converted the temple of Apollo into an oratory, and laid the foundation of an order which, in an incredibly short time, spread itself over Europe. See MONTE CASSINO. Benedict died, as Mabillon thinks, March 21st, 543, though others place his death in the year 542, or as late as 547. His body remained at Monte Cassino until the irruption of the Lombards, who burned and destroyed the monastery, when, in all probability, his relics were lost, although the possession of them has been made a subject of great dispute between the Italian and Gallican monks. His Life, written by Gregory (Dialog. lib. ii), is full of extraordinary and absurd accounts of miracles. According to Dupin, the "Rule of St. Benedict," Regula Monachorum, is the only work extant which is truly his. This Rule is divided into seventy-seven chapters, and is distinguished from others which preceded it by its mildness. A summary of it is given by Dupin (v, 45); see also Martene, Comm. in Regulam S. P. Benedicti (Paris, 1690, 4to). It required no extraordinary macerations and mortifications, and contained such principles of conduct as were most likely to lead to the peace, happiness, and well-being of a community of men living like monks. "Three virtues constituted the sum of the Benedictine discipline: silence (with solitude and seclusion), humility, and obedience, which, in the strong language of its laws, extended to impossibilities. All is thus concentrated on self. It was the man isolated from his kind who was to rise to a lonely perfection. All the social, all patriotic virtues were excluded; the mere mechanical of servance of the rules of the brotherhood, or even the corporate spirit, are hardly worthy of notice, though they are the only substitutes for the rejected and proscribed pursuits of active life. The three occupations of life were the worship of God, reading, and manual labor. The adventitious advantages, and great they were, of these industrious agricultural settlements were not contemplated by the founder; the object of the monks was not to make the wilderness blossom with fertility, to extend the arts and husbandry of civilized life into barbarous regions, but solely to employ in engrossing occupation that portion of time which could not be devoted to worship and to study." "In the Rule, Benedict distinguishes four sorts of monks: (1) Cenobites, living under an abbot in a monastery; (2) Anchorites, who retire into the desert; (3) Sarabaites, dwelling two and three in the same cell. (4) Gyrovagi, who wander from monastery to monastery: the last two kinds he condemns. His Rule is composed for the Cenobites. First, he speaks of the qualifications of abbots. Then he notes the hours for divine service, day and night, and the order of it. After this he treats of the different punishments, i. e. separation from the brethren, chastisement, or expulsion. He directs that a penitent shall be received, after expulsion, as far as the third time; that the monks shall have all things in common, and that every thing shall be at the disposal of the abbot. The monks are to work by turns in the refectory and kitchen; to attend and be kind to the sick; to perform manual labors at stated hours, and to all wear the same dress."—Cave, *Hist. Benedict, Biscop, St., was born of noble parents in Northumberland about the year 628. He was originally bred to the profession of arms, and served under king Oswy, who made him his minister, with an estate suited to his rank; but at the age of twenty-five he took leave of the court, and made a voyage to Rome, and upon his return home devoted himself to study and exercises of piety. About six years afterward he again travelled to Rome with Alfred, king Oswy's son, and subsequently retired into the monastery of Lerins in France, where he took the vows. Having spent two years in this retirement, he returned to England, upon occasion of Theodore's journey thither, who had been nominated to the see of Canterbury, and upon his arrival was made abbot of St. Augustine's at Canterbury. In 671 we find him again at Rome, when he brought back to England many liturgical works. Soon after this, i. e. in 674, he retired into the county of Northumberland, and there founded the monastery of St. Peter at Weremouth, and, ten years later, that of St. Paul at Jarrow. After this he again visited Rome and many of the Italian monasteries, seemingly for the purpose of collecting books, etc., and learning the customs and discipline of these houses. He is also said to have introduced into England the Gregorian method of chanting, and for that purpose to have brought with him from Rome the abbot John, preceptor of St. Peter's. During the last years of his life Benedict was afflicted with palsy, and to such an extent that his body was quite deprived of all power of motion. In this state he continued for about three years, and died on the 14th of January, 690. He wrote a "Treatise on the Method of Celebrating Festivals," and some other liturgical works, which are lost.—Bede, Vite Beatorum Abbatum; Landon, Ecl. Dict. ii, 235; Hook, *Ecl. Benedict of ANIANE, or AGNANA, a monastic reformer, was born in Languedoc in 750. In 774, being saved from drowning, he resolved to abandon the world, and retired into the monastery of St. Sequanas, near Dijon. His fastings, prayers, and mortifications were almost incredible; but he soon saw the folly of excess, and moderated his extravagance. In 780 he returned into Languedoc, and a little hermitage near, on the Aniane. Here a monastery was soon built, and the brotherhood became eminent for sanctity; a large cloister and magnificent church were built, where, before long, more than three hundred monks were gathered together. All the monasteries of the region now regarded him as their father and superior, and he took advantage of this feeling toward him to introduce the needful reforms into the various houses, and thus became the celebrated renovator of religious discipline in France. He collected a large library, and encouraged his monks to multiply copies of the books; and many of the secular clergy, induced by the fame of the establishment, repaired to the monastery of St. Sauveur, on the Aniane, to learn the duties of their calling. He obtained great influence with Charlemagne, and used it to promote monetry. In 779 and 780 Charlemagne sent him, with Leidradus of Lyons and Nephradius of Narbonne, to Felix of Urgel; and he composed several treatises on the Adoptianist (q. v.) controversy (given by Baluze, Miscell. v, 1-62). In 814 he became abbot of the monastery of Inda, built by Louis near Aix-la-Chapelle on purpose to have Benedict at hand. He used his clerical and political influence in behalf of monetry up to his death in 821. His principal writings are, 1. Coler Regularum, edited by Holstenius at Rome (1661; Paris, 1664, 4to);—2. Concordia Regularum, ed. Menard (Paris, 1638);—3. Modus diversarum penitentiarum (ed. Baluze, at the end of the Capitularia of Charlemagne).—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 801; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. ii, 75; Landon, Ecl. Dict. ii, 155.

Benedict, Joel, D. D., a Congregational minister, was born at Salem, N. Y., Jan. 8, 1745, and graduated at the College of New Jersey 1765. In 1771 he was made pastor of the church in Newent, Conn. On account of ill health he resigned in 1782, but on partial recovery he became pastor of the church in Plainfield, Dec. 21, 1784. He was made D. D. at Union College, 1808, and died Feb. 13, 1816. He published a funeral sermon on Dr. Hart, 1811.—Sprague's Annals, i, 682.

Benedictines, a monastic order of the Roman Catholic Church, founded by Benedict of Nursia in 515 (according to others, 529) in Monte Cassino. The leading ideas in the monastic rule of St. Benedict were [see BENEDICT OF NURSIA], that the monks should live in common a retired life, remain poor, and render unlimited obedience to their superiors. Benedict states explicitly (ch. lxxiii) that his rule can lead only to the beginning of a holy life, while he refers his monks for perfectness to the Scriptures and the fathers. His aim was to give to repentant and religious men of the world a house of refuge, but he had no projects for a universal mission in the Church such as those entertained by the later mendicant orders. He received children into his convents, who, under the common superintendence of all the monks, and clothed in the monastic habit, were educated for the monastic life.

The spread of the order was very rapid. As early as 541 it was introduced into Sicily, and in 543 into France. The order began to take extraordinary dimensions through the exertions of Pope Gregory the Great, who lent the whole weight of his vast influence to its diffusion. Augustine introduced it into England and Ireland, and the followers of Cassian and Columban in large number exchanged their former rules for those of Benedict. When, in the eighth century, the bulk of the Germanic world entered into connection with the Roman Catholic Church, the prominent influence of Boniface, himself a Benedictine, secured for the principles of his order almost general adoption by the rising monastic institutions of Germany. As its wealth and power advanced, the Benedictine order by degrees almost monopolized the science and learning in the Christian Church, and established a large number of distinguished schools. Their many Irish teachers (known under the name of Scots) were the first to lay the foundation of the scholastic theology. As many of the convents amassed great riches, the strict rule and primitive purity of morals disappeared, and attempts at reform were called forth. The most remarkable among these were that of Benedict of Aniane (q. v.) in the eighth century, of Abbot Benno at Clugny 910, at Hirschau 1069, at Val-lombrosa in the eleventh century, at Bursfield in 1425. These reforms introduced among the followers of Benedict the congregational system, combining several convents into a congregation, with a common government. The congregation of English Benedictines founded by Augustine was reformed by St. Dunstan in 900, again by Lanfranc in 1072, and finally suppressed by Henry VIII. The congregational government has since remained that of the Benedictines, who have never had a general and central government like the other orders. The efforts to introduce a greater centralization led, from the end of the tenth century, to the establishment of new orders. Thus arose, on the basis of the rule of St. Benedict, but with many alterations, the orders of Camaldoli [see CAMALDULES], Fontevault (q. v.), Chartreux (q. v.), Cîteaux [see CISTERCIANS], Humiliates, Olivetans, Tironenses [see BERNARD OF TIRON], and others.

Early Benedictine.

in Spain, Portugal, and Sardinia, reduced also the number of Benedictine convents greatly. In Austria, however, the order was restored in 1802, and at present more than one half of its members are living in Austrian convents. In Bavaria, the order received, by a rescript of 1834, the charge of several state colleges. In France an attempt at reviving the congregation of St. Maur was made in 1833 by the establishment of a Benedictine community at Solemes. These new St. Maurines have already developed a great literary activity, but have as yet neither been able to extend themselves nor to attain the celebrity of their predecessors. In Switzerland the order has, besides several other convents, the convent of Einsiedeln, one of the most famous places of pilgrimages in the Roman Catholic Church. The order has also been re-established in England and Belgium. In the United States they have St. Vincent's Abbey, in the diocese of Pittsburgh, which in 1858 elected for the first time an abbot for lifetime. Most of the Austrian abbeys followed, until very recently, a mitigated rule; and the endeavors of papal delegates, aided by the state government, to force a stricter rule upon them, led in 1858 to protracted and serious disturbances. At the general chapter of the congregation of Monte Cassino in 1858, to which also the convent of St. Paul's in Rome belongs, it was resolved to re-establish, for the benefit of all the monks of the Benedictine family who wish to study in Rome, the college of St. Anselm, such as it had been under the foundation of Pope Innocent XI.

According to the calculation of Fessler, the Benedictines count among their members 15,700 authors, 4000 bishops, 1690 archbishops, 209 cardinals, 24 popes, and 1569 canonized saints. Among the great literary names that adorn the order are those of D'Achery, Mabillon, and Montfaucon, all St. Maurines. The principal sources of information on the Benedictines are, Mabillon, Annales Ord. S. Benedicti (Paris, 1703-39, 6 vols. [carries the history up to 1157]); Ziegelbauer, Historia rei literariæ Ord. S. Bened. (Aug. Vind. 1754, 4 vols. fol.). Benedictine Nuns, nuns following the order of Benedict. They claim St. Scholastica, the sister of Benedict, as their founder, but without historical grounds. All previous orders were gradually forced to adopt the Benedictine rule, and so it spread widely throughout Christendom. In France they possessed one hundred and sixteen priories and abbeys in the gift of the king alone, and in England seventy-four houses. In some of these houses the nuns followed the strictest rules, never touching meat, wearing no

Benedict XII, in 1336, divided the Benedictines into 36 provinces, and decreed the regular holding of triennial provincial chapters and annual general chapters, but this constitution could never be carried through. The rise of the mendicant orders (q. v.) deprived the Benedictines of a great deal of their influence, and their subsequent distinction lay almost wholly in the field of literary production. The Reformation reduced the number of their convents from 15,000 to 5000. After the Reformation, piety and discipline continued to be generally at a very low ebb throughout the Benedictine community, where it was more difficult than with other orders to find a remedy, as frequently laymen were made abbots (commendatory abbots), on account of the rich revenues of the monasteries. Still, it put forth some flourishing new branches, among which the congregation of St. Faune and St. Hilolph, established by Didier de la Cœur (1550-1623), and the congregation of St. Maur [see MAUR, St.], the most learned of all monastic confraternities in the history of the Roman Catholic Church, are the most remarkable.

linen, and sleeping on the bare boards. Others admitted some relaxation of this severity. The Benedictine nunneries were rarely united in congregations, but remained single, under the jurisdiction of the diocesan bishops, rarely under that of the Benedictine monks. Irregularities and disorder spread among them earlier and more generally than among the monks; a great preference was given to the nobility, and some of the richest monasteries even changed themselves into secular institutions of ladies of nobility, which retained of the Benedictine order nothing but the name. Several congregations of reformed Benedictine nuns were founded, among which the most important were the congregation of Mount Calvary, founded in 1617, and the congregation of the Perpetual Adoration of the Sacred Sacrament, who, in addition to other austerities, are obliged to have perpetually one of their number kneeling day and night before the sacrament! They were founded by Catherine de Bar, a native of St. Dié, in Lorraine, in 1615, and ratified by Innocent XI in 1676. Both have in recent times re-established several monasteries in France, the latter also in Italy, Austria, and Poland.

Benediction, (1.) in the Romish Church, an ecclesiastical ceremony, whereby a thing is rendered sacred or venerable. It differs from consecration, in which unction is used. The Romanists consecrate the chalice and bless the pyx. Superstition in the Romish Church has introduced benedictions for almost every thing. There are forms of benediction for wax candles, for bougls, for ashes, for church vessels and ornaments, for flags and ensigns, arms, first-fruits, houses, ships, paschal eggs, hair-cloth of penitents, churchyards, etc. In general, these benedictions are performed by aspersions of holy water, signs of the cross, and forms of prayer, according to the nature of the ceremony. The forms of benediction are found in the Roman Pontifical and in the Missal. The beatific benediction (benedictio beatifica) is the viaticum given to dying persons. For the history and forms of Romanist benediction, see Boissonnet, Diet. des Cérémonies, i, 246 sq.; Mizne, Liturgie Catholique, p. 149 sq.

(2.) In the Protestant Church, the blessing of the people by the minister during divine service and at its close. In the Church of England it is given at the end of the communion service as well as at the conclusion of worship. The minister does not pretend to impart any blessing, but in effect prays that the "peace of God" may keep the "hearts and minds" of the people. Christ says to his Church, "My peace I give unto you" (John xiv, 27); the officiating minister, the Church's organ, proclaims the gift in general, and prays that it may descend upon the particular part of Christ's Church then and there assembled. The benediction most used, at the close of worship, in Protestant churches, is taken chiefly from Scripture; the first part of it from Phil. iv, 7, and the latter part being a paraphrase upon Num. vi, 24, 25, viz.: "The peace of God, which passeth all understanding, keep your heart and minds in the knowledge and love of God, and of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord; and the blessing of God Almighty, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, be amongst you and remain with you always. Amen." The great Christian benediction is the apostolical one: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all" (2 Cor. xiii, 14). In the ancient Church, short benedictions, such as "Blessed be God," "Blessed be the name of the Lord" (never the Ave Maria, q. v.), were often used before sermon. After the Lord's Prayer, in the Eucharist, the benediction, "The peace of God be with you all," was pronounced. See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xiv, ch. iv, § 16; bk. xv, ch. iii, § 29; Coleman, Primitive Church, ch. xiv; Bibliotheca Sacra, 1862, p. 707.

Benefactor (εὐεργετής). "The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors" (Luke xxii, 25). This word was employed as a title of honor to kings and princes, corresponding to the Latin pater patrarium. Ptolemy Euergetes, king of Egypt, affords an instance of the application of the word in this sense. According to Josephus and Philo, it was frequently applied to the Roman emperors (see Josephus, War, iii, 9, 8; Diod. Sic. xi, 26; Xen. Anab. vii, 6, 38).

Benefice. 1. Definition.—Benefice is defined by the canonists to be "Jus perpetuum percipiendi fructus ex bonis ecclesiasticis, clerico competens propter officium aliquod spirituale." This term was, in its origin, applied to the lands which were given by the Romans to deserving soldiers out of the territories acquired by conquest. These soldiers were called milites beneficiarii, and the lands so given beneficium. Hence the term came in time to be applied to the possessions of the Church, when certain portions were appropriated to individuals to enjoy during their life as a recompense for their services. The word is now applied to all preferments in the Church of England except bishoprics, though more commonly used to signify such churches as are endowed with a revenue for the performance of divine service; it is also used for the revenue itself. The incumbents are said to enjoy the revenue of a living ex nullo beneficio (from the pure kindness) of the patron.

II. In the Roman Church benefices are divided by the canon law (1.) into secular and regular. "Secular" benefices are those held by secular clerks, e. g. bishops, and the dignities in cathedral chapters, viz. the offices of dean, archdeacon, chancellor, precentor, canon, prebend, etc.; also perpetual vicarages, simple cures, chapels, etc. All benefices are held to be secular in the absence of proof or long possession to the contrary, and secular benefices may be held by regulars elevated to the episcopate. "Regular" benefices are those which are conferred only on monks. Such are titular abbeys, all claustral offices enjoying an appropriated revenue, e. g. those of titular conventual prior, almoner, hospitaller, sacristan, cellarer, etc. (2.) Into double (duplicia) and simple (simplicia). "Double" benefices are those to which is annexed the cure of souls, or any pre-eminence or administration of the property of the Church, e. g. pope, cardinal, dean, etc. "Simple" benefices are such as only carry the obligation to say the breviary or celebrate masses, such as secular priories, chapelries, etc. (3.) Into benefices titular (titularia) and benefices in commendam. The former are those which are given in perpetuity; the latter for a time only, until a clerk, capable of discharging the duties, can be found. There are, however, perpetual commendams, i. e. where the temporal revenues of a regular benefice are given to a secular clerk to hold perpetually.

There are six lawful ways of obtaining a benefice, viz.: 1. By the presentation of the patron, and subsequent institution; 2. by election, and the subsequent confirmation of the person elected; 3. by postulation, and the subsequent confirmation of the person postulated; 4. by free and voluntary collation; 5. by exchange; 6. by resignation in favorem, followed by collation.—London, Ecc. Diet. ii, 164

III. In the Church of England parochial benefices with cure are defined by the canon law to be a distinct portion of ecclesiastical rights, set apart from any temporal interest, and joined to the spiritual function, and to these no jurisdiction is annexed; but it is otherwise as to archdeacons and deans, for they have a jurisdiction, because they formerly took the confession of the chapter, and visited them. It is essential to a parochial benefice that it be bestowed freely (reserving nothing to the patron), as a provision for the clerk, who is only a usufructuary, and has no inheritance in it; that it have something of spirituality annexed to it, for where it is given to a layman it is not properly a benefice; that in its own nature it be perpetual —that is, forever annexed to the church; and all manner of contracts concerning it are void.

Benefield, SEBASTIAN, D.D., an eminent Calvinistic divine, was born August 12th, 1559, at Prestenbury, Gloucestershire, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. In 1608 he was chosen Margaret professor of divinity in the university. Dr. Benefield was well versed in the fathers and schoolmen, and was remarkable for strictness of life and sincerity. He died August 24, 1630. His principal writings are, Doctrina Christiana (Oxford, 1610, 4to);—Sermons (Oxf. 1614-15, 2 vols. 4to);—Exposition of Amos (Oxf. and Lond. 1613, 1629, 1629, 4to).—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 164.

Benefit of Clergy, a privilege by which, in countries where popery prevailed, persons in holy orders were exempted, either wholly or partially, from the jurisdiction of lay tribunals. The privilege was created out of regard to the clerical order, but it was soon abused. It was originally designed for clerici (clerks), and at first none could be admitted to it but such as had the usual distinction, habitus et tonsura clericalis; but subsequently, in England, all persons who could read were by law declared to be clerks, and the number of claimants almost indefinitely increased. It was abolished by the 7th and 8th of Geo. IV, c. 28. "In America this privilege has been formally abolished in some of the states, and allowed only in one or two cases in others; while in others, again, it does not appear to have been known at all. By the act of Congress of April 30, 1790, it is enacted that 'benefit of clergy shall not be used or allowed, upon conviction of any crime for which, by any statute of the United States, the punishment is or shall be declared to be death.'" See Blackstone, Commentaries, iv, 28.

Benè-ja'alkan (Heb. Beney' Ya'alkan', בְּנֵי יַאֲלָכָן, Children of Jaakan; Sept. Βαράκα v. Βαράκ; Vulg. Ben-jurem), a tribe who gave their name to certain wells in the desert which formed one of the halting-places of the Israelites on their journey to Canaan (Num. xxxiii, 31, 32). See BEEROth-BENE-JAAKAN. The tribe doubtless deriv'd its name from Jaakan, the son of Ezer, son of Seir the Horite (1 Chr. i, 42). See AKAN; JAKAN. In the time of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Tarsis; Broth til Jacin), the spot was shown ten miles from Petra, on the top of a mountain. Robinson suggests the small fountain el-Tairiyeh, at the bottom of the pass er-Rubayn et-Petra, a short distance from the Arabian (Researches, ii, 583). The word "Beeroth," however, suggests, not a spring, but a group of artificial wells. In the Targum of Pseudo-Jonathan the name is given in Numbers as Aka (בְּנֵי יַאֲלָכָן). The assemblage of fountains near the northern extremity of the Arabia is no doubt referred to. See EXONE.

Benè-Kedem (Heb. Beney'-Ke'dem, בְּנֵי קֵדְמָה, "Children of the East"), an appellation given to a people, or to peoples dwelling to the east of Palestine. It occurs in the following passages of the O. T.: (1) Gen. xxix, 1, "Jacob came into the land of the people of the East," in which was therefore reckoned Haran. (2) Job i, 3, Job was "the greatest of all the men of the East." See JOB. (3) Judg. vi, 3, 23; vii, 12; viii, 10. In the first three passages the Bene-Kedem are mentioned together with the Midianites and the Amalekites; and in the fourth the latter peoples seem to be included in this common name: "Now Zebah and Zalmunna [were] in Karkor, and their hosts with them, about fifteen thousand [men], all that were left of all the hosts of the children of the East." In the events to which these passages of Judges relate, we find a curious reference to the language spoken by these Eastern tribes, which was understood by Gideon and his servant (or one of them) as they listened to the talk in the camp; and from this it is to be inferred that they spoke a dialect intelligible to an Israelite—an inference bearing on an affinity of race, and thence on the growth of the Semitic languages. (4) 1 Kings iv, 30, "Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the East country." (5) From Isa. xi, 14, it is difficult to deduce an argument, but in Ezek. xxv, 4, 10, Ammon is delivered to the "men of the East," and its city, Rabbah, is prophesied to become "a stable for camels, and the Ammonites a couching-place for flocks;" referring, apparently, to the habits of the wandering Arabs; while "palaces" and "dwellings," also mentioned and thus rendered in the Auth. Vers., may be better read "camps," and "tents." The words of Jeremiah (xlix, 28) strengthen the supposition just mentioned: "Concerning Kedar, and concerning Hazor, which Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, shall smite, thus saith the Lord, Arise ye, go up to Kedar, and spoil the men of the East. Their tents and their flocks shall they take away: they shall take to themselves their curtains [i. e. tents], and all their vessels, and their camels."

Opinions are divided as to the extension of the appellation of Bene-Kedem; some (as Rosenmüller and Winer) holding that it came to signify the Arabs generally. From a consideration of the passages above cited and that which makes mention of the land of Kedem, Gen. xxv, 6 [see ISMAEL], we think (with Gesenius) that it primarily signified the peoples of the Arabian deserts (east of Palestine and Lower Egypt), and chiefly the tribes of Ishmael and of Keturah, extending perhaps to Mesopotamia and Babylonia (to which we may suppose Kedem to apply in Num. xxiii, 7, as well as in Isa. ii, 6); and that it was sometimes applied to the Arabs and their country generally. The only positive instance of this latter signification of Kedem occurs in Gen. x, 30, where "Sephar, a mount of the East," is by the common agreement of scholars situate in Southern Arabia. See ARABIA; SEPHAR.

In the O. T., אַרְבִּיָּה, "Arabia," with its conjugate forms, seems to be a name of the peoples otherwise called Bene-Kedem, and with the same limitations. The same may be observed of ἡ ἀνατολή, "the East," in the N. T. (Matt. ii, 1 sq.). The Heb. word "Kedem," with its adjuncts (in the passages above referred to), is translated by the Sept. and in the Vulg., and sometimes transcribed (Κεῖμη) by the former, except the Sept. in 1 Kings iv, 30, and Sept. and Vulg. in Isa. ii, 6, where they make Kedem to relate to ancient time.—Smith, s. v. See EAST.

Benevent, a town in Southern Italy, and see of a Roman Catholic archbishop. A considerable number of councils have been held there, among which the following are the most important: 1087, at which the Antipope Guibert was excommunicated, and the investiture by laymen forbidden; 1108, which again pronounced against the investiture by laymen; and 1117, at which Bishop Mauritius Verdinus (later Gregory VII) was excommunicated.

Benevolent, due (ἡ ἀφειλομένη εἴφοια, but best MSS. simply ἡ ὀφειλή), a euphemism for marital duty (1 Cor. vii, 3). See COHABITATION.

Bénézet, or Bénédet, Sr., born at Hermillon; a shepherd. The popes, during their residence at Avignon, authorized his worship. "Bénézet is said to have been directed by inspiration to proceed to the bishop of Avignon, in September, 1176, and tell him that his mission was to build the bridge of that city over the Rhône. The bishop, very naturally thinking him out of his mind, ordered him to be whipped. Bénézet, however, is said to have shown his divine mission by supernatural proofs; and the bridge was commenced in 1177, and finished in 1188. He died in 1184, and was buried on the bridge, where afterward a little chapel was built over his remains. Subsequently a hospital was added, and a confraternity es-established for the care of his worship and of the repair of the bridge. These things are said to be 'amply verified by the Acts drawn up at the time.' When the tomb was opened in 1670, owing to its ruinous state, it appears that the body was found in a perfect condition. The body was but four feet and a half long." This is a specimen of the so-called "lives of the Saints!"—Landon, Ecl. Diet. s. v.

Benezet, Anthony, an eminent philanthropist and opponent of slavery, was born at St. Quentin, Picardy, France, January 31, 1713. His parents, driven from France by Popish persecution, removed to London in February, 1715, and during their residence there became Quakers. The family came to Philadelphia in November, 1731. Anthony began a mercantile career early; but soon after his marriage, in 1740, when his affairs were in a prosperous situation, he left the mercantile business, and in 1742 he accepted the appointment of head of the Friends' English school of Philadelphia, which he held till 1782, when he resigned it to devote himself to teaching a school of colored children. "So great was his sympathy with every being capable of feeling pain, that he resolved toward the close of his life to eat no animal food. This change in his mode of living is supposed to have been the occasion of his death. His active mind did not yield to the debility of his body. He persevered in his attendance upon his school till within a few days of his decease, May 3, 1784." Men of all classes of society, and of all churches, as well as many hundred negroes, followed his remains to the grave. An officer who had served in the army during the war with Britain observed at this time, "I would rather be Anthony Benezet in that coffin than George Washington, with all his fame." "Few men since the days of the apostles ever lived a more disinterested life; yet upon his death-bed he expressed a desire to live a little longer, 'that he might bring down self.' The last time he ever walked across his room was to take from his desk six dollars, which he gave to a poor widow whom he had long assisted to maintain. By his will he devised his estate, after the decease of his wife, to certain trustees, for the use of the African school." The chief object of Benezet's life, for many years, was to excite public opinion against slavery and the slave-trade. On the return of peace in 1783, he addressed a letter to the queen of Great Britain to solicit her influence on the side of humanity. At the close of this letter he says, "I hope thou wilt kindly excuse the freedom used on this occasion by an ancient man, whose mind, for more than forty years past, has been much separated from the common course of the world, and long painfully exercised in the consideration of the miseries under which so large a part of mankind, equally with us the subjects of redeeming love, are suffering the most unjust and grievous oppression, and who sincerely desires the temporal and eternal felicity of the queen and her royal consort." He published many tracts on the subject, and also an Account of that Part of Africa inhabited by Negroes (1762); a Custom to Great Britain and her Colonies, in a short Representation of the Calumnious State of the Enslaved Negroes in the British Dominions (1767); Historical Account of Guinea, with an Inquiry into the Rise and Progress of the Slave-trade (1771); Short Account of the Religious Society of Friends (1780); Dissertation on the Plainness and Simplicity of the Christian Religion (1782); Observations on the Indian Natives of this Continent (1784). It is said that Benezet's writings first awakened Thomas Clarkson's attention to the question of slavery.—Allen's Biographical Dictionary; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 169; Le Bas, *Diet. Bengel, JOHN ALBERT, a German theologian of profound critical judgment, extensive learning, and solid piety. He was born June 24, 1687, at Winnenden, Württemberg, where his father was pastor; and from him the boy received his early education. After the death of his father he was received into his tutor's house; and from 1699 to 1703 he studied at the Gynnasium of Stuttgart, then admirably kept. Thoroughly prepared in philological elements, he entered the University of Tübingen in 1703, and devoted himself especially to the study of the sacred text. From his childhood he had been earnestly pious; and his favorite reading, while at the university, apart from his severer studies, consisted of the pietist writers, Arnit, Spener, and Franke. At the same time, he did not neglect philosophy. According to his own account, he studied Spinoza thoroughly, and it was not without mental struggles that he arrived at clearness of view on the relations of philosophy to faith. In 1705 he was brought very low by a severe illness at Maulbronn; but he was strengthened against the fear of death by Isa. cxviii, 17, "I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord." He returned to his studies with greater zeal, and with a deeper religious life. After a year spent in the ministry as vicar at Metzingen, he became theological repent at Tübingen; and in 1713 he was appointed professor at the cloister-school of Denkendorf, a seminary for the early training of candidates for the ministry. During this year he made a literary journey, visiting several of the schools of Germany, and among them those of the Jesuits. His theological culture, by all these means, became many-sided. An illustration of the spirit, both of his studies and of his teaching, is afforded by the theme chosen for his inaugural at Denkendorf, viz. "True godliness the surest road to true science." He remained in this post for twenty-eight years—years of labor, zeal, and success as teacher, preacher, student, and writer. Here he published, for the use of his pupils, an edition of Cicero's Epist. ad Familiāres, with notes (Stuttgart, 1719); also, Gregorii Thaumaturgi Panegyricus ad Origenem, Gr. et Lat. (1722); and Chrysostomi lib. vi. de Sacerdotio (1725). But his chief toil was given to the New Testament; for the results of which, see below. In 1749 he was appointed councillor and prelate of Alpirsbach, with a residence in Stuttgart, where he died, Nov. 2, 1751.

Bengel was the first Lutheran divine who applied to the criticism of the New Testament a grasp of mind which embraced the subject in its whole extent, and a patience of investigation which the study required. While a student, he was much perplexed by the various readings, which led him to form the determination of making a text for himself, which he executed in a very careful and scrupulous manner, according to very rational and critical rules, excepting that he would not admit any reading into the text which had not been previously printed in some edition. In the book of Revelation alone he deviated from this rule. His conscientious piety tended greatly to allay the fears which had been excited among the clergy with respect to various readings, and to him belongs the honor of having struck out that path which has since been followed by Wetstein, Griesbach, and others. His Gnomon N. T. was so highly valued by John Wesley that he translated most of its notes and incorporated them into his Explanatory Notes on the N. T. The least valuable part of Bengel's exegetical labors is that which he spent on the Apocalypse. His chief works are: 1. Apparatus Criticus ad N. T. ed. secunda, cur. P. D. Burkii (Tübing. 1763, 4to);—2. Gnomon Novi Testamenti, 3d ed. adjuv. Stendel (Tübing. 1850, 2 vols. 8vo);—3. An Explication of the Book of the Revelation of St. John (Stuttg. 1710, 1746, 8vo); translated by Robertson (Lond. 1757, 8vo);—4. Harmony of the Gospels (Tübing. 1736, 1747, 1766, 8vo);—5. Ordo temporum à principio per periodos economicæ divinæ, etc. (Stuttg. 1753);—6. Cyclus sive de anno magno solis, ad incrementum doctrinæ prophetice (Ulm, 1745, 8vo). His chrononological works, endeavoring to fix the "number of the beast," the date of the "millennium" (he was positive in fixing the beginning of the millennium at the year 1836), etc., have rather detracted from his reputation for solidity of judgment. His fame will permanently rest on his Gnomon, which, as a brief and suggestive commentary on the New Testament, remains unrivalled. New editions, both in Latin (Berlin, 1860; Tübingen, 1860; Stuttgart, 1860) and German, have recently appeared, and an English translation was published in Clark's Library (Edinburgh, 1857-58, 5 vols., 8vo), of which a greatly improved and enlarged edition has been issued in this country by Professors Lewis and Vincent (Philadelphia, 1860-61, 2 vols., 8vo). His Life and Letters, by Burk, translated by Walker, appeared in 1837 (London, 8vo); and a brief biography, by Fausset, is given in the 5th volume of the English translation of the Gnomon. An able article on his peculiar Significancy as a Theologian was published in the Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie, 1861, and translated in the British and Foreign Evangelical Review, April, 1862. A new Life has just appeared (1865) under the title J. A. Bengel's Lebensabriß, Character, etc., von Dr. O. Wächter (Stuttgart, 8vo), which gives a large amount of new material, found in Bengel's MS. diary and other papers, which have only recently been given up by his family for publication. Among other curious facts, it appears that Bengel had the use of but one eye during his life-long studies, and that he sedulously concealed this privation even from his wife! In a supplement to the volume are given a number of Bengel's sermons, addresses, and poems. Dr. Wächter also published a volume containing "Remarks on Bengel as an exegetical writer, and in particular on the Gnomon" (Beiträge zu J. A. Bengel's Schriftklärung, etc., Leipzig, 1865). See Hagenbach, German Rationalism, 126; Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, ii, 57.

Ben'-hadad (Heb. Ben-Hadad', בֶּן־חֲדָד, son of Hadad; Sept. νάος 'Acēp), the name of three kings of Damascus-Syria. As to the latter part of this name, Hadad, there is little doubt that it is the name of the Syrian god HADAD (q. v.), probably the Sun (Macrob. Saturalia, i, 23), still worshipped at Damascus in the time of Josephus (Ant. ix, 4, 6), and in other Syrian names are derived, as Hadadcer, i. e. Hadad has helped. The expression son of Hadad, which denotes dependence and obedience, not only accords with the analogies of other heathen names, but is also supported by the existence of such terms as "sons of God" among the Hebrews (comp. Psa. lxxvii, 6). On account of the nationality of this name, the term "palaces of Ben-hadad" came to be equivalent to Damascus itself (Jer. xlix, 27; Amos i, 4). See DAMASCUS.

1. The king of Syria, who was subsidized by Asa, king of Judah, to invade Israel, and thereby compel Baasha (who had invaded Judah) to return to defend his own kingdom (1 Kings xv, 18). B.C. 928. See ASA. This Ben-hadad has, with some reason, been supposed to be Hadad the Edomite who rebelled against Solomon (1 Kings xi, 25). Damascus, after having been taken by David (2 Sam. viii, 5, 6), was delivered from subjection to his successor by Rezon (1 Kings xi, 21), who "was an adversary to Israel all the days of Solomon." This Ben-hadad was either son or grandson to Rezon, and in his time Damascus was supreme in Syria, the various smaller kingdoms which surrounded it being gradually absorbed into its territory. Ben-hadad must have been an energetic and powerful sovereign, as his alliance was courted by Baasha of Israel and Asa of Judah. He finally closed with the latter on receiving a large amount of treasure, and conquered a great part of the north of Israel, thereby enabling Asa to pursue his victorious operations in the south. From 1 Kings xx, 31, it would appear that he continued to make war upon Israel in Omri's time, and forced him to make "streets" in Samaria for Syrian residents.—Kitto; Smith. See AHAB.

2. Another king of Syria, son of the preceding. Some authors call him grandson, on the ground that it was unusual in antiquity for the son to inherit the father's name. But Ben-hadad seems to have been a religious title of the Syrian kings, as we see by its re-appearance as the name of Hazael's son, Ben-hadad III. Long wars with Israel characterized the reign of Ben-hadad II, of which the earlier campaigns are described under AHAB. His power and the extent of his dominion are proved by the thirty-two vassal kings who accompanied him to his first siege of Samaria. B.C. cir. 906. He owed the signal defeat in which that war terminated to the vain notion which assimilated JEHOVAH to the local deities worshipped by the nations of Syria, deeming Him "a God of the hills," but impotent to defend his votaries in "the plains" (1 Kings xx, 1, 30). Instead of pursuing his victory, Ahab concluded a peace with the defeated Ben-hadad. Some time after the death of Ahab, probably owing to the difficulties in which Jehoram of Israel was involved by the rebellion of Moab, Ben-hadad renewed the war with Israel; but all his plans and operations were frustrated, being made known to Jehoram by the prophet Elisha (2 Kings vi, 8). B.C. cir. 894. After some years, however, he renewed the war, and besieged Jehoram in his capital, Samaria, until the inhabitants were reduced to the last extremities and most revolting resources by famine. The siege was then unexpectedly raised, according to a prediction of Elisha, through a panic infused into the besiegers, who, concluding that a noise which they seemed to hear portended the advance upon them of a foreign host procured by Jehoram from Egypt or some Canaanitish cities, as Tyre or Ramoth, thought only of saving themselves by flight. Jehoram seems to have followed up this unlooked-for deliverance by successful offensive operations, since we find from 2 Kings ix, 1 that Ramoth in Gilead was once more an Israelitish town. See AHAB. The next year Ben-hadad, learning that Elisha, through whom so many of his designs had been brought to naught, had arrived at Damascus, sent an officer of distinction, named Hazael, with presents, to consult him as to his recovery from an illness under which he then suffered. The prophet answered that his disease was not mortal, but that he would nevertheless certainly die, and he announced to Hazael that he would be his successor, with tears at the thought of the misery which he would bring on Israel. On the day after Hazael's return Ben-hadad was murdered, as is commonly thought, by this very Hazael, who smothered the sick monarch in his bed, and mounted the throne in his stead (2 Kings viii, 7-15). See ELISHA; JEHOHAM. The attributing of this murder to Hazael himself has been imagined by some to be inconsistent with his character and with Elisha's suggestion of the act. Ewald, from the Hebrew text and a general consideration of the chapter (Gesch. des V. T. iii, 523, note), thinks that one or more of Ben-hadad's own servants were the murderers: Taylor (Fragm. in Cabalist) believes that the wet cloth which caused his death was intended to effect his cure, a view which he supports by a reference to Bruce's Travels, iii, 33. There appears, however, to be no good reason for departing from the usual and more natural interpretation (so Josephus, Ant. ix, 4, 6) which assigns the deed to Hazael himself. See HAZAEL. Hazael succeeded him perhaps because he had no natural heirs, and with him expired the dynasty founded by Rezon. Ben-hadad's death was about B.C. 890, and he must have reigned some thirty years. See SYRIA. The Scriptural notices of this king are strikingly confirmed by the cuneiform inscriptions (q. v.) on the black obelisk found among the Assyrian monuments at Nimrud (see Rawlinson's Hist. Evidences, p. 113), and translated by Dr. Hincks (Dublin Univ. Magazine, Oct.

1853). According to these annals, the Assyrian king Shalmanubar (reigned apparently B.C. cir. 900-860 or 850) had several campaigns against the nations of Palestine and its vicinity (in his 6th, 11th, 14th, and 18th years), among which the Hittites (Khatti) and Ben-ibri (i. e. Ben-hader; comp. the Sept. vīoc 'Aēto, for Ben-hadad), king of Damascus, are particularly named, the latter being represented as defeated, although allied with at least twelve neighboring princes, and at the head of an immense army, consisting largely of cavalry and chariots (Rawlinson's Herodotus, i, 371).

3. A third king of Damascus, son of the above-mentioned Hazael, and his successor on the throne of Syria. His reign was disastrous for Damascus, and the vast power wielded by his father sank into insignificance. In the striking language of Scripture, "Jehoahaz (the son of Jehu) besought the Lord, and the Lord hearkened unto him, for He saw the oppression of Israel, because the King of Syria oppressed them; and the Lord gave Israel a saviour" (2 Kings xiii, 4, 5). This saviour was Jeroboam II (comp. 2 Kings xiv, 27); but the prosperity of Israel began to revive in the reign of his father Jehoahaz, the son of Jehoahaz. When Ben-hadad succeeded to the throne of Hazael, Jehoahaz, in accordance with a prophecy of the dying Elisha, recovered the cities which Jehoahaz had lost to the Syrians, and beat him in Aphek (2 Kings viii, 17), in the plain of Esdraelon, where Ahab had already defeated Ben-hadad II. B.C. 835. Jehoahaz gained two more victories, but did not restore the dominion of Israel on the east of Jordan. This glory was reserved for his successor Jeroboam. The misfortunes of Ben-hadad III in war are noticed by Amos (i, 4).—Smith, s. v.

Ben-ha'il (Heb. Ben-Cha'il, בְּנֵי חַיִל, son of strength, i. e. warrior; Sept. translates οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ ἐν-ρατῶν), one of the "princes" of the people sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the inhabitants of Judah, and carry out the reformation begun by him (2 Chron. xvii, 7). B.C. 910.

Ben-ha'nan (Heb. Ben-Chanan', בְּנֵי חַנָּן, son of one gracious; Sept. vīoc 'Anān v. r. φανά), the third named of the four "sons" of Shimon (of Shammai), of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 20). B.C. prob. post 1612. Perhaps the name ought to be translated "son of Hanan." See BEN-.

Ben-Hesed, Ben-Hur. See BEN-.

Ben'inu (Heb. Benim', בְּנֵי נִי, our son; Sept. confounds with Bani preceding, and translates both vīoc Bavonā v. r. Barvonaai), one of the Levites who sealed the covenant on the return from Babylon (Neh. x, 13). B.C. 410.

Benitier, the French name for the vessel for holding the so-called holy water, placed at the entrance of Romanist places of worship. See HOLY WATER.

Ben'jamin (Heb. Benjamin', בְּנֵימִן, i. q. Felix [see below]; Sept., Joseph, and New Test. Berajim'), the name of three men.

1. The youngest son of Jacob by Rachel (Gen. xxxv, 18), and the only one of the thirteen (if indeed there were not more; comp. "all his daughters," Gen. xxxvii, 35; xvi, 7) who was born in Palestine. His birth took place on the road between Bethel and Beth-lehem, a short distance—"a length of earth"—from the latter. B.C. 1889. His mother died immediately after he was born, and with her last breath named him בְּנֵימִן, BEN-ONI ("son of my pain"), which the father changed into BENJAMIN, a word of nearly the same sound, but portending comfort and consolation, "son of my right hand," probably alluding to the support and protection he promised himself from this, his last child, in his old age. See JAMIN. This supposition is strengthened when we reflect on the reluctance with which he consented to part with him in very trying circumstances, yielding only to the pressure of famine and the most urgent necessity (Gen. xlii). This interpretation is inserted in the text of the Vulgate and the margin of the A. V., and has the support of Gesenius (Theo., p. 219). On the other hand, the Samaritan Codex gives the name in an altered form as בְּנֵימִי, "son of days," i. e. "son of my old age" (comp. Gen. xlii, 20), which is adopted by Philo, Aben-ezra, and others. Both these interpretations are of comparatively late date, and it is notorious that such explanatory glosses are not only often invent-d long subsequently to the original record, but are as often at variance with the real meaning of that record. The meaning given by Josephus (αὐτὸν ἰπὸ ἀσπὸς γενόμενον ὀνόματι τῆς μητρὸς, Ant. i, 21, 3) has reference only to the name Ben-Oni. However, the name is not so pointed as to agree with the usual signification, "son of," being בְּנֵי, and not בְּנִי. But the first vowel has here probably supervened (for בְּנֵי) merely because of the perfect coalescence of the two elements into a single word. Moreover, in the adjectival forms of the word the first syllable is generally suppressed, as בְּנֵימִי, בְּנֵימִי, i. e. "sons of Yemini'" for sons of Benjamin; בְּנֵימִי, שֹׁשֶׁל, "man of Yemini'" for man of Benjamin (1 Sam. ix, 1; Esth. ii, 5); בְּנֵימִי, שֹׁשֶׁל, "land of Yemini'" for land of Benjamin (1 Sam. ix, 4); as if the patriarch's name had been originally בְּנֵימִי, Yemini' (comp. Gen. xlii, 10), and that of the tribe Yeminites. These adjectival forms are carefully preserved in the Sept. The prefix Ben seems to be merely omitted in them for brevity, as being immaterial to the reference. Usually, however, the posterity of Benjamin are called BENJAMITES (Gen. xxxv, 18; xlix, 27; Deut. xxxiii, 12; Josh. xviii, 21-28; 1 Kings xii, 16-24; Judg. iii, 15; xix, 16, etc.).—Smith, s. v. See BEN; JEMINI.

Until the journeys of Jacob's sons and of Jacob himself into Egypt we hear nothing of Benjamin, and, so far as he is concerned, those well-known narratives disclose nothing beyond the very strong affection entertained toward him by his father and his whole-brother Joseph, and the relation of fond endearment in which he stood, as if a mere darling child (comp. Gen. xlii, 20), to the whole of his family. Even the harsh natures of the elder patriarchs relaxed toward him.

In Gen. lvi, 21 sq., the immediate descendants of Benjamin are given to the number of ten, whereas in Num. xxvi, 38-40, only seven are enumerated, and some even under different names. This difference may probably be owing to the circumstance that some of the direct descendants of Benjamin had died either at an early period or at least childless. Considerable difficulty occurs in the several Biblical lists of the sons and grandsons of Benjamin (Gen. xlii, 21; Num. xxvi, 38-40; 1 Chron. vii, 6-12; viii, 1-7), which may be removed by the following explanations. As Benjamin was quite a youth at the time of the migration to Canaan (Gen. xlii, 20, 22), the list in Gen. xlii cannot be merely of Jacob's descendants at that time, since it contains Benjamin's children (comp. the children of Pharez, ver. 12, who was at that time a mere child, see ch. xxxviii, 1), but rather at the period of his death, seventeen years later (ch. xlvii, 28). See JACOB. Yet the list could not have been made up to a much later period, since it does not contain the grandchildren of Benjamin subsequently born (1 Chron. viii, 3 sq.). The sons of Benjamin are expressly given in 1 Chron. viii, 1, 2, as being five, in the following order: Bela (the same in the other accounts), Ashbel (otherwise perhaps Jediael), Aharah (evidently the same with Ahiran of Num.), and probably the Aher of 1 Chron. vii, 12, since this name and Ir are given apparently in addition to the three of ver. 6, and probably also the Ehi of Gen.), Nohah (who is therefore possibly the same with Becher, and probably also with Ir, since Shupham [Shuppiam or Muppiam of the other] and Hupham [Huppim], enumerated as the sons of the latter, although they do not appear in the list of Becher's sons, must be such under other names, but—like Bela's in the same list—undistinguishable, as Jediel had but one son, and the rest are otherwise identified, and finally Kapha (who can then be no other than Rosh). See all the names in their alphabetical place.

TRIBE OF BENJAMIN.—The history of Benjamin to the time of the entrance into the Promised Land is as meagre as it is afterward full and interesting. We know indeed that shortly after the departure from Egypt it was the smallest tribe but one (Num. i, 36; comp. verse 1); that during the march its position was on the west of the tabernacle, with its brother tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (Num. ii, 18-24). In the desert it counted 35,400 warriors, all above twenty years of age (Num. i, 36; ii, 22), and, at the entrance of Israel into Canaan, even as many as 45,600. We have the names of the "captain" of the tribe when it set forth on its long march (Num. ii, 22); of the "ruler" who went up with his fellows to spy out the land (xiii, 9); of the families of which the tribe consisted when it was marshalled at the great halt in the plains of Moab by Jordan-Jericho (Num. xxvi, 38-41, 63), and of the "prince" who was chosen to assist in the dividing of the land (xxxiv, 21). But there is nothing to indicate what were the characteristics and behavior of the tribe which sprang from the orphan darling of his father and brothers. No touches of personal biography like those with which we are favored concerning Ephraim (1 Chr. vii, 20-23) or record of zeal for Jehovah like Levi (Exod. xxxii, 26); no evidence of special bent as in the case of Reuben and Gad (Num. xxxii). The only foreshadowing of the tendencies of the tribe which was to produce Ehud, Sani, and the perpetrators of the deed of Gibeah, is to be found in the prophetic gleam which lighted up the dying Jacob, "Benjamin shall raven as a wolf; in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil" (Gen. xlix, 27). From this passage some have inferred that the figure of a wolf was the emblem on the tribal standard.

1. Geography.—The proximity of Benjamin to Ephraim during the march to the Promised Land was maintained in the territories allotted to each. Benjamin lay immediately to the south of Ephraim, and between him and Judah. The situation of this territory was highly favorable. It formed almost a parallelogram, of about 26 miles in length by 12 in breadth. Its eastern boundary was the Jordan, and from thence it mainly extended to the wooded district of Kirjath-jearim, about six miles west of Jerusalem, while in the other direction it stretched from the valley of Hinnom, under the "Shoulder of the Jebusite" on the south, to Bethel on the north. Thus Dan intervened between this tribe and the Philistines, while the communications with the valley of the Jordan were in its own power. On the south the territory ended abruptly with the steep slopes of the hill of Jerusalem; on the north it almost melted into the possessions of the friendly Ephraim. See TRIBE. In Josh. xviii, from verse 12 to 14, is sketched the northern boundary-line (mostly repeated in chap. xvi, 1-5), and from 15 to 20 the southern (repeated in chap. xv, 6-9, in a reverse direction). Within the boundaries described in these few verses lay a district rather small, but highly cultivated and naturally fertile (Josephus, Ant. v, 1, 22; Reland, p. 637), containing twenty-six chief towns (with their villages, in two main sections), which are named in Josh. xviii, 21-28; and the principal of which were Jericho, Beth-hogla, Bethel, Gibeon, Ramah, and Jebus or Jerusalem. This latter place subsequently became the capital of the whole Jewish empire, but was, after the division of the land, still in possession of the Jebusites. The Benjamites had indeed been charged to dispossess them, and occupy that important town; but (Judg. i, 21) the Benjamites are reproached with having neglected to drive them from thence, that is, from the upper, well-fortified part of the place Zion, since the lower and less fortified part had already been taken by Judah (Judg. i, 8), who in this matter had almost a common interest with Benjamin. The Jebusite citadel was finally taken by David (2 Sam. v, 6 sq.). A trace of the pasture-lands may be found in the mention of the "herd" (1 Sam. xi, 5); and possibly others in the names of some of the towns of Benjamin, as hap-Parah, "the cow;" Zela-ha-oleph, "the ox-rib" (Josh. xviii, 23, 28). In the degenerate state of modern Palestine few evidences of the fertility of this tract survive. But other and more enduring natural peculiarities remain, and claim our recognition, rendering this possession one of the most remarkable among those of the tribes.

(1.) The general level of this part of Palestine is very high, not less than 2000 feet above the maritime plain of the Mediterranean on the one side, or than 3000 feet above the deep valley of the Jordan on the other, besides which this general level or plateau is surmounted, in the district now under consideration, by a large number of eminences—defined, rounded hills—almost every one of which has borne some part in the history of the tribe. Many of these hills carry the fact of their existence in their names. Gibeon, Gibeah, Gela or Gaba, all mean "hill;" Ramah and Ramathaim, "eminence;" Mizpeh, "Watch-tower;" while the "ascent of Beth-horon," the "cliff Rimmon," the "pass of Michmash" with its two "teeth of rock," all testify to a country eminently broken and hilly. The special associations which belong to each of these eminences, whether as sanctuary or fortress, many of them arising from the most stirring incidents in the history of the nation, will be best examined under the various separate heads.

(2.) No less important than these eminences are the torrent beds and ravines by which the upper country breaks down into the deep tracts on each side of it. They formed then, as they do still, the only mode of access from either the plains of Philistia and of Sharon on the west, or the deep valley of the Jordan on the east—the latter steep and precipitous in the extreme, the former more gradual in their declivity. Up these western passes swarmed the Philistines on their incursions during the time of Samuel and of Saul, driving the first king of Israel right over the higher district of his own tribe, to Giggal, in the hot recesses of the Arabah, and establishing themselves over the face of the country from Michmash to Ajalon. Down these same defiles they were driven by Saul after Jonathan's victorious exploit, just as in earlier times Joshua had chased the Canaanites down the long hill of Beth-horon, and as, centuries after, the forces of Syria were chased by Judas Maccabæus (1 Macc. iii, 16-24). It is perhaps hardly fanciful to ask if we may not account in this way for the curious prevalence among the names of the towns of Benjamin of the titles of tribes, Ha-Arvim, the Avites; Zemaraim, the Zemarites; ha-Ophni, the Ophnite; Cephrah ha-Ammonal, the village of the Ammonites; ha-Jebusi, the Jebusite, are all among the names of places in Benjamin; and we can hardly doubt that in these names is preserved the memory of many an ascent of the wild tribes of the desert from the sultry and open plains of the low level to the fresh air and secure fastnesses of the upper district.

The passes on the eastern side are of a much more difficult and intricate character than those on the western. The principal one, which, now unfrequented, was doubtless in ancient times the main ascent to the interior, leaves the Ghôr behind the site of Jericho, and, breaking through the barren hills with many a wild bend and steep slope, extends to and indeed beyond the very central ridge of the table-land of Benjamin, to the foot of the eminence on which stand the ruins of the ancient Beeroth. At its lower part this valley bears the name of Wady Fûrâr, but for the greater part of its length it is called Wady Suweinit. It is the main access, and from its central ravine branch out side valleys, conducting to Bethel, Michmah, Gibeah, Anathoth, and other towns. After the fall of Jericho this ravine must have stood open to the victorious Israelites, as their natural inlet to the country. At its lower end must have taken place the repulse and subsequent victory of Ai, with the conviction and stoning of Achan, and through it Joshua doubtless hastened to the relief of the Gibeonites, and to his memorable pursuit of the Canaanites down the pass of Beth-horon, on the other side of the territory of Benjamin. Another of these passes is that which since the time of our Saviour has been the regular road between Jericho and Jerusalem, the scene of the parable of the Good Samaritan. Others lie farther north, by the mountain which bears the traditional name of Quarantania; first up the face of the cliff, afterward less steep, and finally leading to Bethel or Taiyibeh, the ancient Ophrah. These intricate ravines may well have harbored the wild beasts which, if the derivation of the names of several places in this locality are to be trusted, originally haunted the district—zabim, hyenas (1 Sam. xiii, 18), shud and shuabim, foxes or jackals (Judg. i, 35; 1 Sam. xiii, 17), ajalon, gazelles. (See Stanley, Sinai and Pal. sine, ch. iv.)

Such were the limits and such the character of the possession of Benjamin as fixed by those who originally divided the land. But it could not have been long before they extended their limits, since in the early lists of 1 Chron. viii we find mention made of Benjamites who built Led and Ono, and of others who were founders of Ajalon (12, 13), all which towns were beyond the spot named above as the westernmost point in their boundary. These places, too, were in their possession after the return from the captivity (Neh. xi, 35).—Smith, s. v.

2. History.—In the time of the Judges the tribe of Benjamin became involved in a civil war with the other eleven tribes for having refused to give up to justice the miscreants of Gibeon that had publicly violated and caused the death of a concubine of a man of Ephraim, who had passed with her through Gibeon. This war terminated in the almost utter extinction of the tribe, leaving no hope for its regeneration from the circumstance that not only had nearly all the women of that tribe been previously slain by their foes, but the eleven other tribes had engaged themselves by a solemn oath not to marry their daughters to any man belonging to Benjamin. When the thirst of revenge, however, had abated, they found means to evade the letter of the oath, and to revive the tribe again by an alliance with them (Judg. xix, 20, 21). That frightful transaction was indeed a crisis in the history of the tribe; the narrative undoubtedly is intended to convey that the six hundred who took refuge in the cliff Rimmon, and who were afterward provided with wives partly from Jalesh-gilead (Judg. xxi, 10), partly from Shiloh (xxi, 21), were the only survivors. The revival of the tribe, however, was so rapid that, in the time of David, it already numbered 59,434 able warriors (1 Chron. vii, 6-12); in that of Asa, 280,000 (2 Chron. xiv, 8); and in that of Jehoshaphat, 200,000 (2 Chron. xvii, 17). See under CHENAANAH.

This tribe had also the honor of giving the first king to the Jews, Saul being a Benjamite (1 Sam. ix, 1, 2). After the death of Saul, the Benjamites, as might have been expected, declared themselves for his son Ishbosheth (2 Sam. ii, 8 sq.), until, after the assassination of that prince, David became king of all Israel. David having at last expelled the Jebusites from Zion, and made it his own residence, the close alliance that seems previously to have existed between the tribes of Benjamin and Judah (Judg. i, 8) was cemented by the circumstance that, while Jerusalem actually belonged to the district of Benjamin, that of Judah was immediately contiguous to it. Thus it happened that, at the division of the kingdom after the death of Solomon, Benjamin espoused the cause of Judah, and formed, together with it, a kingdom by themselves. Indeed, the two tribes stood always in such a close connection as often to be included under the single term Judah (1 Kings xi, 13; xii, 20). After the exile, also, these two tribes constituted the flower of the new Jewish colony in Palestine (comp. Ezra xi, 1; x, 9).—Kitto.

3. Characteristics.—The contrast between the warlike character of the tribe and the peaceful image of its progenitor has been already noticed. That fierce-ness and power are not less out of proportion to the smallness of its numbers and of its territory. This comes out in many scattered notices. (a) Benjamin was the only tribe that seems to have pursued archery to any purpose, and their skill in the bow (1 Sam. xx, 20, 36; 2 Sam. i, 22; 1 Chron. viii, 40; xii, 2; 2 Chron. xvii, 17) and the sling (Judg. xx, 16) are celebrated. (b) When, after the first conquest of the country, the nation began to groan under the miseries of a foreign yoke, it is to a man of Benjamin, Ehud, the son of Gera, that they turn for deliverance. The story seems to imply that he accomplished his purpose on Eglon with less risk, owing to his proficiency in the peculiar practice of using his left hand—a practice apparently confined to B-njamites, and by them greatly employed (Judg. iii, 15, and see xx, 16; 1 Chron. xii, 2). (c) Baanah and Rechab, “the sons of Rimmon the Bersobite, of the children of Benjamin,” are the only Israelites west of the Jordan named in the whole history as captains of marauding predatory “bands” (צבאות); and the act of which they were guilty—the murder of the head of their house—hardly need of the summary vengeance inflicted on them by David to testify the abhorrence in which it must have been held by all Orientals, however warlike. (d) The dreadful deed recorded in Judg. xix, though repelled by the whole country, was unhesitatingly adopted and defended by Benjamin with an obstinacy and spirit truly extraordinary. Of their obstinacy there is a remarkable trait in 1 Sam. xxii, 7-18. Though Saul was not only the king of the nation, but the head of the tribe, and David a member of a family which had as yet no claims on the friendship of Benjamin, yet the Benjamites resisted the strongest appeal of Saul to betray the movements of David; and after those movements had been revealed by Doeg the Edomite (worthy member as he must have seemed to them—of an accursed race) they still firmly refused to lift a hand against those who had assisted him (see Niemeyer, Charakt. crit. iii, 565 sq.).

Several circumstances may have conduced to the relative importance of this small tribe (see Plesken, De Benjamin patre, Wittenb. 1729). The Tabernacle was at Shiloh, in Ephraim, during the time of the last judge; but the ark was near Benjamin, at Kir-jath-jearim. Ramah, the official residence of Samuel, and containing a sanctuary greatly frequented (1 Sam. ix, 12, etc.), Mizpah, where the great assemblies of “all Israel” took place (1 Sam. vii, 5), Bethel, perhaps the most ancient of all the sanctuaries of Palestine, and Gibeon, specially noted as “the great high place” (2 Chron. i, 3), were all in the land of Benjamin. These must gradually have accustomed the people who resorted to these various places to associate the tribe with power and sanctity, and they tend to elucidate the anomaly which struck Saul so forcibly, “that all the desire of Israel” should have been fixed on the house of the smallest of its tribes (1 Sam. ix, 21).

The struggles and contests that followed the death of Saul arose from the natural unwillingness of the tribe to relinquish its position at the head of the nation, especially in favor of Judah. Had it been Ephraim, the case might have been different; but Judah had as yet no connection with the house of Joseph, and was, besides, the tribe of David, whom Saul had pursued with such unrelenting enmity. The tact and sound sense of Abner, however, succeeded in overcoming these difficulties, though he himself fell a victim in the very act of accomplishing his purpose; and the proposal that David should be “king over Israel” was one which “seemed good to the whole house of Benjamin,” and of which the tribe testified its approval and evinced its good faith by sending to the distant capital of Hebron a detachment of 3000 men of the “brethren of Saul” (1 Chron. xii, 29). Still, the insults of Shimei and the insurrection of Sheba are indications that the soreness still existed, and we do not hear of any cordial co-operation or firm union between the two tribes until a cause of common quarrel arose at the disruption, when Rehoboam assembled “all the house of Judah, with the tribe of Benjamin, to fight against the house of Israel, to bring the kingdom again to the son of Solomon” (1 Kings xii, 21; 2 Chr. xi, 1). Possibly the seal may have been set to this by the fact of Jeroboam having just taken possession of Bethel, a city of Benjamin, for the calf-worship of the northern kingdom (1 Kings xii, 29). Bethel, however, was on the very boundary-line, and centuries before this date was inhabited by both Ephraimites and Benjamites (Judg. xix, 16). On the other hand, Rehobam fortified and garrisoned several cities of Benjamin, and wisely dispersed the members of his own family through them (2 Chron. xi, 10-12). The alliance was farther strengthened by a covenant solemnly undertaken (2 Chron. xv, 9), and by the employment of Benjamites in high positions in the army of Judah (2 Chron. xvi, 17). But what, above all, must have contributed to strengthen the alliance, was the fact that the Temple was the common property of both tribes. True, it was founded, erected, and endowed by princes of "the house of Judah," but the city of "the Jebusites" (Josh. xviii, 28), and the whole of the ground north of the Valley of Hinnom, was in the lot of Benjamin. In this latter fact is literally fulfilled the prophecy of Moses (Deut. xxxiii, 12): Benjamin "dwelt between" the "shoulders" of the ravines which encompass the Holy City on the west, south, and east (see a good treatment of this point in Blunt's Notes, Coincidences, pt. ii, § xvii).

Although thereafter the history of Benjamin becomes merged in that of the southern kingdom, yet that the tribe still retained its individuality is plain from the constant mention of it in the various censuses taken of the two tribes, and on other occasions, and also from the lists of the men of Benjamin who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii; Neh. vii), and took possession of their old towns (Neh. xi, 31-35). At Jerusalem the name must have been always kept alive, if by nothing else, by the name of "the high gate of Benjamin" (Jer. xx, 2). (See below.) That the ancient memories of their house were not allowed to fade from the recollections of the Benjamites, is clear also from several subsequent notices. The genealogy of Saul, to a late date, is carefully preserved in the lists of 1 Chr. (viii, 33-40; ix, 29-44); the name of Kish recurs as the father of Mordecai (Esth. ii, 5), the honored deliverer of the nation from miseries worse than those threatened by Nabash the Ammonite. The royal name once more appears, and "Saul, who also is called Paul," has left on record under his own hand that he was "of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin." It is perhaps more than a mere fancy to note how remarkably the chief characteristics of the tribe are gathered up in his one person. There was the fierceness in his persecution of the Christians, and there were the obstinacy and persistence which made him proof against the tears and prayers of his converts, and "ready not to be bound only, but also to die for the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts xxi, 12, 13). There were the force and vigor to which natural difficulties and confined circumstances formed no impediment; and, lastly, there was the keen sense of the greatness of his house in his proud reference to his forefather "Saul, the son of Cis, of the tribe of Benjamin."—Smith.

GATE OF BENJAMIN (Jer. xxxvii, 13; xxxviii, 7; "Benjamin's gate," Zech. xiv, 10; "high gate of Benjamin," Jer. xx, 2) was doubtless on the northern side of Jerusalem, probably the same elsewhere called "the gate of Ephraim" (1 Kings xv, 13), and apparently coinciding nearly in position with the present "Damascus Gate" (Strong's Harmony and Expos. of the Gospels, App. ii, p. 18). See JERUSALEM.

3. An Israelite, one of the "sons of Harim," who divorced his foreign wife after the exile (Ezra x, 32). B.C. 458. He seems to be the same person who had previously assisted in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (in connection with Hushub), opposite his house on Zion (Neh. iii, 23).

Bennet, Benjamin, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Wellesburgh, Leicestershire, 1674, and was for many years pastor of a Presbyterian church at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. He was an industrious and successful pastor, and still more eminent as a writer. He published Memoirs of the Reformation (Lond. 2d ed. 1721, 8vo); Ironicum, a Review of Controversies on the Trinity, Church Authority, etc. (1722, 8vo); Christian Oration, or the Devotions of the Closet (many editions); Discourses against Popery (1714, 8vo); Sermons on Inspiration (1730, 8vo).—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographica, i, 243; Allibone, Diet. of Authors, i, 165.

Bennet, Thomas, D.D., an eminent English divine, was born at Salisbury in 1673. He took his M.A. degree at Cambridge in 1694. He was made rector of St. James's at Colechester 1700, and in 1716 vicar of St. Giles's in London, where he died in 1728. He was highly esteemed by Hoadley, although he differed from him in his opinions. He wrote various works against the Romanists and Dissenters, An Essay on the Thirty-nine Articles (Lond. 1715, 8vo), A Paraphrase on the Book of Common Prayer (Lond. 1709, 8vo), Brief History of Forms of Prayer (Camb. 1708, 8vo), etc.—Biog. Britannica.

Bemno, Sr., descended from the counts of Woldenburgh in Saxony, was born at Hildesheim in 1010, and became, in 1060, bishop of Meissen. He eagerly exerted himself for the conversion of the pagan Slavonians. In the struggle between the Emperor Henry IV and Gregory VII he was an unflinching adherent of the latter, and therefore expelled by the emperor from his see in 1085, but afterward reinstated. He died June 16, 1107. His canonization, in 1523, called forth the spicy pamphlet of Luther, Against the new Idol and old Devil who is to be set up in Meissen. His Life was written by Emser (Leipz. 1512). See also Seyffarth, Ossilegium Benonius (Munich, 1765); Ranke, History of the Reformation, i, 90.

Be'no (Heb. Benoi', בְּנוֹ, his son; Sept. vici Bori' in ver. 26, and translates literally vici airov in ver. 27) is given as the only son, or the first of the four sons of Jaaziah the Levite, of the family of Merari, in 1 Chron. xxiv, 26, 27; but there is much confusion in the whole passage. B.C. perh. 1014. See BEN-.

Benoit, Elie, a Protestant French theologian, was born at Paris on Jan. 20, 1640. Having studied theology at Paris and Montauban, he became, in 1665, minister at Alençon. Here he had repeatedly theological disputations with Roman Catholic priests, especially the Jesuit La Rue, who tried to excite the mob against the Protestants. In consequence of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes he had to leave France; he went to Holland, and became pastor at Delft, where he died Nov. 15, 1728. He was highly esteemed as a meek, peaceable man, who did not seek controversies, but did not flee from them when forced upon him. His chief work is the History of the Edict of Nantes (Histoire de l'Édit de Nantes, Delft, 1693-95, 5 vols. 4to). This work is distinguished for its accuracy, and still remains a chief source for the history of the Reformed Church of France. Among his other works are the following: Histoire et Apologie de la Retraite des Pasteurs (Francfort, 1687, 12mo); and a defence of this Apology, Francfort, 1688, 12mo); Mélange de Remarques critiques, historiques, philosophiques, et théologiques contre deux écrits de Lohand (Delft, 1712, 8vo).—Herzog, Supplement, i, 174; Hoefler, Biog. Générale, v, 334.

Benoit or Benedict, René, curate of the church of St. Eustache at Paris, was born near Angers in 1521. In 1566 he distinguished himself by a French translation of the Bible, published in that year at Paris in fol., and in 1588 in 2 vols. 4to. He was accused of having pretended to make his translation from the Greek and Hebrew, of which languages he knew nothing, and of having, in fact, followed the Geneva Bible, making a few verbal alterations. In spite of his defence, he was expelled from the faculty of theology by a decree dated October 1st, 1572, and the censure passed by that society on his works was confirmed by Gregory XIII; the author was subsequently compelled to submit, was readmitted into the faculty, and made dean. Benoit had been confessor to the unhappy Mary, Queen of Scots, whom he accompanied into Scotland. He died at Paris March 7th, 1608. He published an immense number of works, among which may be specified, 1. Stronata in Universa Biblia (Cologne, 1608, 8vo);—2. A Catholic Apology (showing that the profession of the Protestant faith was not a sufficient and lawful reason for excluding the heir from the throne of France);—3. Examen pacifique de la Doctrine des Huguenots. (This curious work was printed at Caen in 1590, and is intended to show that the Council of Trent, not having been fully received in France, was not of sufficient authority there to condemn the Huguenots.)—Hoefler, Biog. Gén. v, 395.

Ben-oni (Heb. Ben-Oni, בֶּן־אֹנִי, son of my sorrow, otherwise of my strength, i. e. of my last effort, Hiller, Onomast. p. 200; Sept. translates בֶּן־עֲוֹן ben-on), the name given by Rachel in her expiring breath to her youngest son, in token of the death-pangs that gave him birth (Gen. xxxv, 18); afterward changed by his father to BENJAMIN (q. v.).

Benson, George, D.D., a learned and eminent English Dissenter, was born at Great Salkeld 1699; studied at Glasgow, and settled as pastor at Abingdon about 1721. In 1729 he went to London, and in 1740 was chosen pastor of the church in Crutched Friars, where he remained until his death in 1763. He was trained a Calvinist, but his views in later years were tinged with Arrianism. He published The Design and End of Prayer (Lond. 1737, 8vo, 2d ed.);—Paraphrase and Notes on Paul's Epistles, after Locke's Manner (Lond. 1752-56, 2 vols. 4to, best ed.);—History of the first Planting of the Christi in Religion (Lond. 1756, 2 vols. 4to, best ed.). After his death, his Life of Christ, with a memoir of the author by Amory, appeared (Lond. 1764, 4to).—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 166.

Benson, Joseph, one of the most eminent of the early Methodist ministers in England, was born at Melmerby, in Cumberland, Jan. 25, 1748. His father designed him for the ministry in the Established Church, and had him taught Greek and Latin by the Rev. Mr. Deam, of Parkhead, under whom he made great proficiency. At sixteen he fell in for the first time with the Methodists and was converted. In 1766 Mr. Wesley appointed him classical master at Kingswood School. He devoted himself closely to philosophy and theology, studying constantly and zealously. In 1769 he was made head-master of Lady Huntingdon's Theological College at Trevecca; but in 1771 he left it, because of its becoming a thoroughly Calvinistic school. Mr. Benson was then, and always after, a decided Arminian. While engaged in these seminars he still regularly kept his terms at St. Edmund Hall, Oxford. In August, 1771, he was admitted into the Methodist Conference, and soon became one of the ablest preachers in the body. He filled the chief stations, such as Edinburgh, Newcastle, Sheffield, Hull, Birmingham, and London, and crowds attended his preaching wherever he went. After a life of great clerical and literary industry, he died Feb. 16, 1821, at London. Dr. Clarke calls him "a sound scholar, a powerful and able preacher, and a profound theologian." Besides editing for many years the Methodist Magazine, he published A Defence of the Methodists (Lond. 1793, 12mo);—A Further Defence of the Methodists (1794, 12mo);—Vindication of the Methodists (Lond. 1800, 8vo);—Apology for the Methodists (Lond. 1801, 12mo);—Sermons on various Occasions (Lond. 1836, 2d edit. 2 vols. 12mo);—A Commentary on the Holy Scriptures (Lond. 1848, 6th edit. 6 vols. 8vo);—Life of John Fletcher (New York, 1 vol. 8vo). His life has been twice written, once by Macdonald (New York, 8vo), and again by Treffry (New York, 12mo).

Bentham, Edward, was born at Ely in 1707, and was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, from whence, in 1723, he removed to Corpus Christi College, and in 1731 was chosen fellow of Oriol. In 1733 he obtained a prebend in the cathedral of Hereford. In 1749 he proceeded to D.D., and in 1754 was made canon in his cathedral. On the death of Dr. Fanshaw he was nominated regius professor of divinity in the university. He died in 1776. Besides some single sermons, Dr. Bentham published, 1. An Introduction to Moral Philosophy, 8vo;—2. A Letter to a young Gentleman on Study; with a Letter to a Fellow of a College, 8vo;—3. Advice to a young Man of Rank upon coming to the University;—4. Reflections on Logic, with a Vindication of the same, 8vo;—5. Funeral Eulogies upon military Men, from the Greek, 8vo;—6. De Studiis Theologicis Proletio;—7. Reflections upon the Study of Divinity, with Heads of a Course of Lectures, 8vo;—8. De Vita et Moribus Johannis Burton, S. T. P.;—9. An Introduction to Logic, 8vo;—10. De Tumulibus Americenis deque eorum concitatoribus similis meditato.—Biog. Brit.; Hook, Ecl. Eng. ii, 250.

Bentham, Jeremy, was born in London, February 15, 1748. He received his early education at Westminster School; and when yet a boy, being little more than twelve years of age, he went to Owen's College, Oxford, where he took his master's degree in 1766. He studied law, and was called to the bar in 1772, but devoted himself entirely to study, and became an able and voluminous writer on government and legislation. His name is mentioned here in view of his writings on morals, which, however, are less original and valuable than those on government. In all his writings, utility is the leading and pervading principle; and his favorite vehicle for its expression is the phrase, "the greatest happiness of the greatest number," which was first coined by Priestley, though its prominence in politics has been owing to Bentham. "In this phrase," he says, "I saw delineated for the first time a plain as well as a true standard for whatever is right or wrong, useful, useless, or mischievous in human conduct, whether in the field of morals or politics." Accordingly, the leading principle of his ethical writings is, "that the end of all human actions and morality is happiness. By happiness, Bentham means pleasure and exemption from pain; and the fundamental principle from which he starts is, that the actions of sentient beings are wholly governed by pleasure and pain. He held that happiness is the 'summum bonum,' in fact, the only thing desirable in itself; that all other things are desirable solely as means to that end; that therefore the production of the greatest possible amount of happiness is the only fit object of all human exertion." He died in Westminster, June 6, 1832. See ERNICUS; MORALS.

Bentham, Thomas, bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, was born in Yorkshire about 1513. He became a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1543, and distinguished himself in Hebrew. He early sided with the Reforming party, and became prominent as a zealous opponent of the superstitions of popery. On the accession of Mary, he disdained to conceal or retract his sentiments, and he was deprived of his fellowship in 1553 and compelled to go abroad. At Zurich and Basle he preached to the English exiles. Even during the height of Mary's persecutions he returned to London to take charge of a Protestant congregation. In the second year of Queen Elizabeth he was raised to the see of Lichfield and Coventry, and was conseerated in 1559. Had Bentham been supreme, the English Reformation would have been far more thorough than it was, and the Christian Church would have avoided much evil. He died Feb. 19, 1578. He translated the Psalms, Ezekiel, and Daniel in the "Bishop's Bible."—Hook, Eccles. Biography, ii, 249.

Bentley, RICHARD, D.D., called from his eminence in philological criticism "the British Aristarchus," was born at Wakefield 1611, and admitted at St. John's College 1676. He accepted the mastership of the grammar-school of Spalding, in Lincolnshire, early in 1632. In 1683 he became private tutor to the son of Dr. Stillingfleet, afterward bishop of Worcester. He accompanied his pupil to Oxford, where he was admitted M.A. At Oxford he had access to the MSS. of the Bodleian Library. At this time he meditated two very laborious undertakings—a complete collection of Fragments of the Greek Poets, and an edition of the three principal Greek lexicographers, Hesychius, Suidas, and the Etymologicum Magnum, to be printed in parallel columns on the same page. Neither scheme, however, was carried into effect. To the edition of Callimachus, published by Grævius in 1697, Bentley contributed a collection of the fragments of that poet. But his reputation for scholarship was established by a performance of a much more confined nature—a dissertation on an obscure chronicler named Malala, which was published as an Appendix to Chilmead and Mill's edition of the author in 1691. This showed such an intimate acquaintance with Greek literature, especially the drama, that it drew the eyes of foreign as well as British scholars upon him, and obtained a warm tribute of admiration from the great critics Grævius and Spanheim to this new and brilliant star of British literature. Bentley was ordained deacon in March, 1690. In 1692, having obtained the first nomination to the Boyle lectureship, he chose for his subject the confutation of atheism, directing his arguments more especially against the system of Hobbes. In these lectures Bentley applied the principles and discoveries of Newton's Principia to the confirmation of natural theology. "The Principia had been published about six years; but the sublime discoveries of that work were yet little known, owing not merely to the obstacles which oppose the reception of novelty, but to the difficulty of comprehending the proofs whereby they are established. To Bentley belongs, as bishop Monk remarks, the undoubted merit of having been the first to lay open these discoveries in a popular form, and to explain their irresistible force in the proof of a Deity. This constitutes the subject of his seventh and eighth sermons—pieces admirable for the clearness with which the whole question is developed, as well as for the logical precision of their arguments. Among other topics, he shows how contradictory to the principles of philosophy is the notion of matter contained in the solar system having been once diffused over a chaotic space, and afterward combined into the large bodies of the sun, planets, and secondaries by the force of mutual gravitation; and he explains that the planets could never have obtained the transverse motion, which causes them to revolve round the sun in orbits nearly circular, from the agency of any cause except the arm of an almighty Creator. From these and other subjects of physical astronomy, as well as from the discoveries of Boyle, the founder of the lecture, respecting the nature and properties of the atmosphere, a conviction is irresistibly impressed upon the mind of the wisdom and benevolence of the Deity. We are assured that the effect of these discourses was such that atheism was deserted as untenable ground; or, to use his own expression, the atheists were 'silent since that time, and sheltered themselves under desism.'" This work gave him great reputation, and in 1692 he was made canon of Worcester by bishop Stillingfleet. In 1699 he was appointed master of Trinity College, Cambridge; and in the following year the archdeaconry of Ely was conferred upon him. Of his contributions to Greek literature we have not room to speak; but, in the midst of personal quarrels, his literary activity for many years was wonderful. In 1713 he published, under the signature of Philoentherus Lipsiensis, a reply to Collins's Discourse of Freethinking; and in none of his writings are his accurate learning and matchless faculty of disputation more signally displayed. In 1717 he was chosen regius professor of divinity at Cambridge. In 1720 he issued proposals for a new edition of the N. T. in Greek, with the Latin version of Jerome. Taking up that father's observation that in the translation of the Holy Scriptures "the very order of the words is mystery," he conjectured that if the most ancient Greek manuscripts were compared with Jerome's Latin, they might be found to agree with that version both in the words and order; and, upon trial, his ideas were realized even beyond his expectations. He stated also in these proposals that he believed he had recovered, with very few exceptions, the exemplar of Origen, the great standard of the most learned fathers for more than two hundred years after the Council of Nice; and observed that, by the aid of the Greek and Latin manuscripts, the text of the original might be so far settled that, instead of thirty thousand different readings, found in the best modern editions, not more than two hundred would deserve much serious consideration. But so much opposition was made to his plan that he dropped it. Bentley died July 14, 1742. His Works, collected and edited by the Rev. Alexander Dyce, were published in London in 1836 (3 vols. 8vo), but unfortunately the collection is incomplete. His Life and Writings, by bishop Monk, were published in London in 1830; and his Correspondence, edited by Wordsworth, in 1842 (2 vols. 8vo). See Foreign Quarterly Review, July, 1839; North American Review, xliii, 458; Edinburgh Review, li, 321; Allibone, i, 169; Hook, Ecclesiastical Biography, ii, 253.

Benzel, ERICH, a prominent Swedish theologian, was born in 1642 at Benzeby; became in 1665 Professor of History and Ethics, and in 1666 Professor of Theology, at Upsala; in 1677 bishop of Stregnäs, and in 1700 archbishop of Upsala, where he died in 1709. He wrote, among other works, Evangelium historicæ ecclesiæ v. c. N. Testament. (Ups. 3d ed. 1717). He also superintended the printing of the Swedish Bible translation under Charles XII. One of his sons, whose name was likewise Erich, became in 1726 bishop of Gothenburg, and died as archbishop of Upsala in 1743.

Ben-zo'heth (Heb. Ben-Zocheth, בְּנֵי זֹחֶת, son of Zoheth; Sept. translates v. c. i. Zoachis), a person named (1 Chron. iv, 20) as the second of the sons of Ishi, a descendant of Judah (B.C. apparently post 1856), the other being given as Zoheth simply; but either the true name of the son of the Zoheth preceding seems to have fallen out of the text, or this individual is only mentioned patronymically as the grandson of Ishi, being son of Zoheth himself. See BEN-.

Be'ôn (Heb. Be'ôn, בְּעֹן, apparently an early error of transcription for MEON [q. v.]; Sept. Βααν v. r. Βαυά), one of the places fit for pastureage given by Joshua to the tribes on the east of Jordan (Num. xxxii, 3). It is elsewhere more properly called BETH-BAL-MEON (Josh. xiii, 17), or more briefly BAL-MEON (Num. xxxii, 38), and BETH-MEON (Jer. xlviii, 23), for which this name may be a contraction.

Be'ôr (Heb. Be'ôr, בְּעֹר, a torch; Sept. Βεορ), the name of two men. See BALAAM.

1. The father of Bela (q. v.), one of the kings of Edom (Gen. xxxvi, 32; 1 Chron. i, 43). B.C. apparently ante 1618.

2. The father of Balaam, the backsliding prophet (Numb. xxii, 5; xxiv, 3, 15; xxxi, 8; Josh. xii, 22; xxiv, 9; Mic. vi, 5; Deut. xxiii, 4). In 2 Pet. ii, 15, he is called Bason (q. v.). B.C. ante 1618.

Be'ra (Heb. id. בְּרָא, g'fl, otherwise excellence, but more prob. for בְּרָאָה, son of evil; Sept. Βαρά; Josephus, Βαρά; Ant. i, 9, 1), king of Sodom at the time of the invasion of the five kings under Chedorlaomer (q. v.), which was repelled by Abraham (Gen. xiv, 2; ad-o 17 and 21). B.C. cir. 2077.

Ber'achah (Heb. Berachah, בְּרָכָה, a blessing), the name of a valley and also of a man.

1. (Sept. translates εὐδοκία.) A valley in the direction of Tekoa, so called as being the place where Jehoshaphat celebrated the miraculous overthrow of the Moabites and Ammonites (2 Chron. xx, 26). It is still called Wady Ber'achah, near the ruined village of the same name south of Tekoa (Robinson's Researches, ii, 189), first identified by Wolcott (Biblioth. Sac. 1843, p. 43; comp. Wilson, Labels of Bible, i, 386). See JERUEL; CAPHAR-BARUCHA.

2. (Sept. Βεραία.) One of the thirty Benjamite warriors, "Saul's brethren," who joined David while in retirement at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii, 8). B.C. 1054.

Berachi'ah (1 Chron. vi, 39). See BERECHIAH.

Berakoth. See MISHNA.

Beraï'ah (Heb. Berayah, בְּרָאִיָּה, created by Jehovah; Sept. Βεραία), next to the last named of the nine sons apparently of Shimli, and a chief Benjamite of Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii, 21). B.C. perhaps 588.

Be'reä (Βερέα), a place in Judea apparently not very far from Jerusalem, where Bacchides, the general of Demetrius, encamped shortly before the engagement in which Judas Maccabeus was slain (1 Macc. ix, 4). Other copies, however, read Berath (Βεραθή, Βεραθή, Βεραθή, etc., see Grimm, in loc.), from which Keland conjectures (Palæst. p. 624) that it may be the BEZETH (q. v.) of 1 Macc. vii, 19, especially as Josephus, in his parallel account (1 Chron. xii, 11, 4), calls the place in question Bethzetho (Βηθζηθώ, Ant. xii, 11, 1; comp. 10, 2). See also BERGA.

Bereans, a small sect of dissenters from the Church of Scotland, who profess to follow the example of the ancient Bereans (Acts xvii, 11) in building their system upon the Scriptures alone, without regard to any human authority. The sect was founded in 1773 by a clergyman named Barclay, who was excluded from the parish of Fettercairn. They hold the Calvinistic creed, with the following peculiarities: 1. They reject natural religion as undermining the evidences of Christianity. 2. They consider faith in Christ and assurance of salvation as inseparable, or rather as the same thing, because (say they) "God hath expressly declared, he that believeth shall be saved; and therefore it is not only absurd, but impious, and in a manner calling God a liar, for a man to say I believe the Gospel, but have doubts, nevertheless, of my own salvation." 3. They say that the sin against the Holy Ghost is nothing else but unbelief; and that the expression, "It shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, nor that which is to come," means only that a person dying in unbelief would not be forgiven, neither under the former dispensation by Moses, nor under the Gospel dispensation, which, in respect of the Mosaic, was a kind of future world, or world to come. 4. They interpret the Old Testament prophecies, and especially the Psalms, as typical or prophetic of Christ, and never apply them to the experience of private Christians. There are still some congregations of Bereans in Scotland, and a few, it is believed, in America. See HUTCHINSONIANS.

Berachi'ah (Heb. Berachah, בְּרָכָה, blessed by Jehovah; also in the prolonged form Berachyah, בְּרָכְיָה, in 1 Chron. vi, 39; xv, 17; 2 Chron. xxviii, 12; Zech. i, 7; Sept. Βεραχιας, often Βεραχια), the name of six men. See also BARACHIAH and BARUCHIAS.

1. The son of Shimea and father of Asaph, the celebrated musician; he was one of the Levites who bore the ark to the tent prepared for it by David (1 Chron. vi, 39, where the name is Anglicized "Berachiah;" xv, 17, 23). B.C. 1043.

2. The son of Meshillemeth, and one of the seven Ephraimite chieftains who enforced the prophet Oded's prohibition of the enslavement of their Judaite captives by the warriors of the northern kingdom (2 Chron. xxviii, 12). B.C. 749.

3. The fourth named of the five brothers of Zerubabel (q. v.), of the royal line of Judah (1 Chron. iii, 20; see Strong's Harmony and Expos. of the Gospels, p. 17, note m). B.C. 536.

4. A son of Asa, and one of the Levites that dwelt in the villages of the Netophathites on the return from Babylon (1 Chron. ix, 16). B.C. post 536.

5. The son of Iddo and father of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. i, 1, 7). B.C. ante 500.

6. A son of Meshezbead and the father of Meshulam, which last repaired a part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 4, 50; vi, 18). B.C. ante 446.

Be'red (Heb. id. בְּרֵד, hail, in pause Bu'red, בְּרֵדָה, Gen. xvi, 14; Sept. always Βεράδ), the name of a place and of a man.

1. A town in the south of Palestine, between which and Kadesh lay the well Lahai-roi (Gen. xvi, 14; comp. ver. 7). The name is variously given in the ancient versions: Syriae, Caluar [= Gerar]; Arab. Jared, probably a mere corruption of the Hebrew name; Onkelos, Chagra, חַגְרָה (elsewhere employed in the Targums for "Shur"); Ps.-Jonathan, Chalutsa, חַלְוִטָּה, i. e. the Elusa, Ἐλουσα, of Ptolemy and the ecclesiastical writers, now el-Khidlalah, on the Helron road, about 12 miles south of Beersheba (Robinson, i, 296; Stewart, p. 205; Keland, p. 755). We have the testimony of Jerome (Vita S. Hilarionis) that Elusa was called by its inhabitants Baree, which would be an easy corruption of Bered, בְּרֵד being read for בְּ. Chalutsa is the name elsewhere given in the Arabic version for "shur" and for "Gerar."—Smith. See ELUSA.

2. A son of Shuthelah and grandson of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii, 20); supposed by some to have been identical with Becher in Num. xxvi, 85, by a mere change of letters (בְּרֵד for בְּכֵר), but with little probability from the context. B.C. post 1856.

Berengarians, the followers of Berengarius, who taught, in the eleventh century, that the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper were not really and essentially, but figuratively, changed into the body and blood of Christ. See BERENGARIUS.

Berengarius or Berenger, archdeacon of Angers, was born at Tours in the beginning of the eleventh century, and studied first in the school of St. Martin, and subsequently at Chartres, under the celebrated Fulbert. Upon his death Berenger left Chartres and returned to Tours, where he taught publicly at St. Martin's. He very early manifested a liberal spirit of inquiry, and was distinguished for his piety as well as for his industry in study. He quitted this city again and repaired to Angers, where he was well received by Hubert de Vendôme, who administered the church of Angers at that period, and who made Berenger archdeacon. Scholars flocked to him from all parts of France. Some time between 1040 and 1050 he began to publish his sentiments on the Eucharist, in which he opposed the doctrine of Paschasius on transubstantiation. Lanfranc, who was then in Normandy, and who had been the intimate friend of Berenger, entered into a controversy with him on the subject. Berenger answered Lanfranc in a letter (see Gieseler, Ch. Hist. per. iii, § 29), in which he blamed him for charging Scotus with heresy for his opinion that the bread and wine are not changed in substance by consecration in the Eucharist, and declared that in doing so he equally condemned Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and others of the fathers. This letter fell into the hands of Pope Leo IX, who convoked a council at Rome in April, 1059, when Berenger was excommunicated. He was also, in this year, condemned in the synods of Brienne and Verelli. In this last council, which was held in September, the books of Scotus were burned. In October in the same year he was synodically condemned, for the fourth time, at Paris. Berenger appears to have adhered to his views until 1055, when, being cited before a synod held at Tours, where Hildebrand acted as legate to Victor II, he signed a confession of faith, which, though not a complete retraction, was satisfactory to the prelates present, who accordingly received him into communion. He had not, however, changed his opinions, and still continued to defend in writing his real views, whereupon he was again cited before a council, held at Rome in 1059, where he again retract'd, and signed a confession drawn up by Cardinal Humbertus. Upon his return into France he again retract'd his recantation, and published another work in defence of his original opinion. This work Lanfranc endeavored to answer, but without any effect so far as Berenger was concerned, who also, by letter, assured Pope Alexander II that his opinion was unalterable. Thus another synod was held against him at Rouen in 1063, another at Poitiers in 1073, another at St. Maixent in 1075, another at Rome in 1078, where he confessed the doctrine of transubstantiation to save his life, but withdrew his confession as soon as he was safe in France. He died in communion with the Church in the island of Còme, near Tours, January 5th, 1088, at the age of ninety. Berenger was greatly in advance of his age both intellectually and morally, though he had not physical to equal his moral courage. The injustice with which he was treated at Rome caused him to use the following language of Leo IX: "In him I found by no means a saint, by no means a lion of the tribe of Judah; not even an upright man. To be declared a heretic by him I account as nothing." He styled the doctrine of transubstantiation an incepta verborum vulgi. From his great reputation as a teacher, his views were widely diffused, not only in France, but in other countries. Much light has been recently thrown upon the history and character of Berenger by the publication of Berengarius Taronensis, oder eine Sammlung ihm betreffender Briefe herausg. von Dr. H. Sudendorf (Berlin, 1850). This collection of his letters shows him as a worthy man, a loving Christian, and a man of tender and plebeian nature. It shows also that his learning embraced a wide range; he was a most zealous student of the fathers, he practised medicine as a physician, and was much admired as an orator. It shows farther, what was not before known, that he was in intimate relations with some of the foremost men in France; and that, in particular, Godfrey of Anjou was his friend and protector. We also learn a great deal from this book of Gregory's conduct during his stay in France, and find that a very general sympathy with Berengarius's views existed among the chief clergy of France and of the neighboring German border. Dr. Sudendorf's historical explanations are both acute and thorough.—Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 503-522; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. i, 285-291; Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, ii, 75-88; Landon, Ecol. Dict. ii, 180.

Berenicè. See BERNICE.

Bergier, NICOLAS SILVESTRE, D.D., was born at Darnay, in Lorraine, December 31, 1718, and became successively curé of Flange-Bouche, in Franche-Comté, canon of Notre-Dame, Paris, and confessor to the king. He was one of the most formidable opponents of the modern philosophical spirit. In 1768 he published La

Certitude des Preuves du Christianisme, which passed through three editions in one year, and was translated into Italian and Spanish. Voltaire replied to it by his Conseils raisonnables, and Bergier rejoined. Anacharis Cloots published, in opposition to the work of Bergier, his Certitude des Preuves de Mahométisme. Bergier afterward published Le Disme réfuté par lui-même (Paris, 1765-66-68, 2 vols. 12mo, which contains an examination of the opinions of Rousseau):—Apologie de la Religion Chrétienne (against d'Holbach: Paris, 1769, 2 vols. 12mo):—Examen du Matérialisme (Paris, 1771, 2 vols. 12mo):—Traité de la vraie Religion (Paris, last ed. 1854, 8 vols. 8vo):—L'Origine des deux du Paganisme (Paris, 1774, 2 vols. 12mo). He also wrote for the Encyclopédie his Dictionnaire de Théologie (best ed. Paris, 1854, 6 vols. 8vo, edited by Archbishop Gousset), to which the editors of this Cyclopædia are much indebted. Bergier died April 19, 1790. His works above named are constantly appearing in new editions in Paris.—Hoefcr, Elog. Gén. v, 515.

Bergius, JOHANNES, a Reformed theologian, was born at Stettin 1587, and studied at Heidelberg, Strasburg, and Dantzic. In 1616 he was made professor of theology at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder. In theology he opposed Supralapsarian Calvinism, and declined to attend the Synod of Dort, whose cruel treatment of the Arminians he reprobated (see Limborch, Vita Episcopii, p. 210). He taught "free grace" in his treatise Der Wille Gottes v. aller Menschen Seligkeit (1653). He represented Brandenburg at the Leipzig Conference (1631) and at the Thorn Colloquium (1642). He died 1658.—Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Be'ri (Heb. Ber', בְּרִי, q. d. fontanus, for בְּרִיא, Beri; Sept. Bap'i v. r. Basir), a chief warrior, the fourth named of the eleven sons of Zophar, a descendant of Asher (1 Chron. vii, 36). B.C. perh. 1016.

Beri'ah (Heb. Beriah', on the signifi. see below), the name of four men.

1. (Sept. Basai.) The last named of the four sons of Asher, and the father of Heber and Malchiel (Gen. xlii, 17). B.C. 1856. His descendants were called BERITHES (Num. xxvi, 44, 45).

2. (Sept. Basai v. r. Besai.) A son of Ephraim, so named on account of the state of his father's house when he was born. "And the sons of Ephraim; Shuthelah, and Bered his son, and Tahath his son, and Eladah his son, and Tahath his son, and Zabab his son, and Ezer, and Elcad, whom the men of Gath [that were] born in [that] land slew" [lit. "and the men . . . slew them"], "because they came down to take away their cattle. And Ephraim their father mourned many days, and his brethren came to comfort him. And when he went in to his wife, she conceived, and bare a son, and he called his name Beriah, because it went evil with his house" [lit. "because in evil" or "a gift" "was to his house": בְּרִיאִי הָיָה בְּיָמָיו וְעָשָׂה עָוֹן; Sept. בְּרִיאִי הָיָה בְּיָמָיו וְעָשָׂה עָוֹן; Vulg. "eo quod in malis domus ejus ortus esset"] (1 Chron. vii, 20-23). With respect to the meaning of the name, Gesenius prefers the rendering "in evil" to "a gift," as probably the right one. In this case, בְּרִיאִי in the explanation would be, according to him, בְּרִיאָה with Beth essential (Thess. s. v.). It must be remarked, however, that the supposed instances of Beth essential being prefixed to the subject in the O. T. are few and inconclusive, and that it is disputed by the Arabian grammarians if the parallel "redundant Bè" of the Arabic be ever so used (comp. Thess. p. 174, 175, where this use of "redundant Bè" is too arbitrarily denied). The Sept. and Vulg. indicate a different construction, with an additional variation in the case of the former ("my house" for "his house"), so that the rendering "in evil" does not depend upon the construction proposed by Gesenius. Michaelis suggests that בְּרִיאִי may mean a spontaneous gift of God, beyond expectation and the law of nature, as a son born to Ephraim now growing old might be called (Suppl. p. 224, 225). In favor of this meaning, which, with Gesenius, we take in the simple sense of "gift," it may be urged that it is unlikely that four persons would have borne a name of an unusual form, and that a case similar to that here supposed is found in the naming of Seth (Gen. iv, 25). Fürst (H. b. Handb. s. v.) suggests what appears a still better derivation, namely, a contraction of $\text{בְּרִיָּה בְּרִיָּה}$ for $\text{בְּרִיָּה בְּרִיָּה}$, son of evil, i. e. unlucky.

This short notice is of no slight historical importance, especially as it refers to a period of Hebrew history respecting which the Bible affords us no other like information. The event must be assigned to the time between Jacob's death and the beginning of the oppression. B. C. post. 1856. The indications that guide us are, that some of Ephraim's sons must have attained to manhood, and that the Hebrews were still free. The passage is full of difficulties. The first question is, What sons of Ephraim were killed? The persons mentioned do not all seem to be his sons. Shuthelah occupied the first place, and a genealogy of his descendants follows as far as a second Shuthelah, the words "his son" indicating a direct descent, as Honbigan (ap. Barrett, Synopsis, in loc.) remarks, although he very needlessly proposes conjecturally to omit them. A similar genealogy from Beriah to Joshua is given in ver. 25-27. As the text stands, there are but three sons of Ephraim mentioned before Beriah—Shuthelah, Ezer, and Elead, all of whom seem to have been killed by the men of Gath, though it is possible that the last two are alone meant, while the first of them is stated to have left descendants. In the enumeration of the Israelite families in Numbers four of the tribe of Ephraim are mentioned, sprung from his sons Shuthelah, Becher, and Taban, and from Eran, son or descendant of Shuthelah (xxvi. 35, 36). The second and third families are probably those of Beriah and a younger son, unless the third is one of Beriah, called after his descendant Taban (I Chron. vii, 25); or one of them may be that of a son of Joseph, since it is related that Jacob determined that sons of Joseph who might be born to him after Ephraim and Manasseh should "be called after the name of their brethren in their inheritance" (Gen. xlviii, 6). See, however, BECHER. There can be no doubt that the land in which the men of Gath were born is the eastern part of Lower Egypt, if not Goshen itself. It would be needless to say that they were born in their own land; but as this was not Gath itself, they must have been called "men of Gath" (q. d. Gittites) as being descended from natives of that place. At this time very many foreigners must have been settled in Egypt, especially in and about Goshen. Indeed, Goshen is mentioned as a non-Egyptian country in its inhabitants (Gen. xlv, 3), and its own name, as well as nearly all the names of its cities and places mentioned in the Bible, save the cities built in the oppression, are probably Semitic. In the Book of Joshua, Sihor, the Nile, here the Pelusiac branch, is the boundary of Egypt and Canaan, the Philistine territories apparently being considered to extend from it (Josh. xiii, 2, 3). It is therefore very probable that many Philistines would have settled in a part of Egypt so accessible to them and so similar in its population to Canaan as Goshen and the tracts adjoining it. Or else these men of Gath may have been mercenaries like the Cherethim (in Egyptian "Shay-ratana") who were in the Egyptian service at a later time, as in David's, and to whom lands were probably allotted as to the native army. Some suppose that the men of Gath were the aggressors, a conjecture not at variance with the words used in the relation of the cause of the death of Ephraim's sons, since we may read "when (ׁ) they came down," etc., instead of "because," etc. (Bagster's Bible, in loc.), but it must be remembered that this rendering is equally consistent with the other explanation. There is no reason to suppose that the Israelites at this time may not have sometimes engaged in predatory or other warfare. The warlike habits of Jacob's sons are evident in the narrative of the vengeance taken by Simeon and Levi upon Hamor and Shechem (Gen. xxxiv, 25-29), and that the same traits existed in their posterity appears from the fear which the Pharaoh who began to oppress them entertained lest they should, in the event of war in the land, join with the enemies of his people, and thus escape out of the country (Exod. i, 8-10). It has been imagined, according as either side was supposed to have acted the aggressor, that the Gittites descended upon the Ephraimites in a predatory excursion from Palestine, or that the Ephraimites made a raid into Palestine. Neither of these explanations is consistent with sound criticism, because the men of Gath are said to have been born in the land, that is, to have been settled in Egypt, as already shown, and the second one, which is adopted by Bunsen (Egypt's Place, i, 177, 178), is inadmissible on the ground that the verb used, בָּרַח , "he went down," or "descended," is applicable to going into Egypt, but not to coming from it. The rabbinical idea that these sons of Ephraim went to take the Promised Land needs no refutation. (For these various theories, see Poole's Synopsis, in loc.—Smith, s. v.

3. (Sept. Βερά v. r. Βαρά.) A Benjaminite, and apparently son of Elpaal; he, with his brother Shimea, were founders of Ajalon, and expelled the Gittites (I Chron. viii, 13). B. C. prob. 1612. His nine sons are enumerated in ver. 14-16.

4. (Sept. Βαρά v. r. Βερά.) The last named of the four sons of Shimea, a Levite of the family of Gershom (I Chron. xxiii, 10). B. C. 1014. His posterity was not numerous (ver. 11).

Beri'ite (Heb. with the art., hab-Ber'i, $\text{בְּרִיָּה בְּרִיָּה}$; Sept. ὁ Βαρά), the patronymic title of the family of BERIAH (q. v.), the son of Asher (Num. xxvi, 44).

Berington, JOSEPH, one of the most prolific Roman Catholic writers of Great Britain, was born in 1743 in Shropshire, and died in 1827. He was sent by his parents for education to the College of St. Omer, in France. For many years he exercised the priestly functions in France, and in 1814 was appointed pastor at Buckland, near Oxford. He wrote a number of works on the history, present state, and rights of his co-religionists. He was regarded as a liberal Romanist, and many of his expressions were considered by his superiors as little orthodox. His principal work is a Literary History of the Middle Ages—from the reign of Augustus to the fifteenth century (Lond. 1814; new ed., with index, by D. Bogue, Lond. 1846).

Be'rite (Heb. only in the plur., and with the art., hab-Berim, $\text{בְּרִיָּה בְּרִיָּה}$, derivation uncertain [Gesenius and Fürst both overlook the word altogether], if indeed the text be not corrupt; Sept. ἱρ Ναβή, but most copies omit), a tribe or place named with Abel of Beth-machab—and therefore doubtless situated in the north of Palestine—only as having been visited by Joab in his pursuit after Sheba, the son of Bichri (2 Sam. xx, 14). The expression is a remarkable one, "all the Berites" (comp. "all the Bithron"). The Vulgate has a different rendering—omnes viri electi—apparently for $\text{בְּרִיָּה בְּרִיָּה}$, i. e. young men, and this is, in Ewald's opinion, the correct reading (Isr. Gesch. iii, 249, note). Schwarz, however, is inclined to regard it as a collective term for several places of similar name mentioned in Josephus and the Talmud as lying in the vicinity of Lake Merom (Palest. p. 203); and Thomson (Land and Book, i, 425) conjectures that it may specially designate the Berath (Βηράθη) of Upper Galilee, where, according to Josephus (Ant. v, 1, 18), the Canaanitish kings encamped against Joshua (comp. Josh. xi, 5).

and which he identifies with Biria, a short distance north of Safed (Van de Velde, Map).

Be'ri'th (Heb. Berith', בְּרִית, covenant; Sept. mites the three terms, "the house of the god Berith," into one, Βερίθη/Βερίθη), stands alone in Judg. ix, 46, for BAAI-BERTH (q. v.).

Berkeley, GEORGE, bishop of Cloyne, was born at Kilerin March 12, 1684, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. In 1707 he published Arithmetica obsequia Algebrae aut Euclidis demonstrata; and in 1709 appeared his well-known Theory of Vision, the first work in which an attempt was made to distinguish the immediate operations of the senses from the deductions which we habitually draw from our sensations. In 1710 appeared his Principles of Human Knowledge, in which he propounded the novel doctrine that what we call matter has no actual existence, and that the impressions which we believe that we receive from it are not, in fact, derived from any thing external to ourselves, but are produced within us by a certain disposition of the mind, the immediate operation of God. In 1724 he was made dean of Derry, and in the year following published his propositions for the conversion of the American savages by means of a college in the Bermudas. The design was received with favor by the government and by individuals, and great promises of money were made to him, such as to induce him to resign his living, worth £1100 a year, and to embark with his wife in order to purchase land for the intended College of St. Paul and to prepare for its foundation. Landing at Newport, R. I., he remained there for two years, and, finding all his expectations of assistance vain, he was compelled to return to England, and thus ended a noble scheme, to complete which he had spent seven years of his life, resigned his actual preferment, and refused a bishopric, declaring that he would rather have the office of superior in the new college of St. Paul than be primate of all England, this superiority being actually worth to him £100 a year. In 1732 he published Alciphron, 2 vols. 8vo, the design of which work was to refute the various systems of atheism, fatalism, and scepticism. At length, in 1734, he was raised to the see of Cloyne. He continued to put forth from time to time works calculated to advance the cause of Christianity and his country, refused to exchange his see for that of Clogher, although the income was twice as great, and died at Oxford in 1753. His Works, with a Life of the Author, by Wright, were reprinted, with a translation of the Latin essays, in 1843 (London, 2 vols. 8vo). Mackintosh says that Berkeley's writings afford the finest models of philosophical style since Cicero. His style is very clear, and his bold method of thinking, and absence of all adhesion to great authorities, make his works even now valuable to the student. These same qualities make them difficult to describe, and the peculiar nature of the subjects which he treated has caused them to be misrepresented, so that their true scope is less understood than that of any other writings of his day.—London, Ecol. Dict. ii, 188; New England, vii, 474; Engl. Cyclopaedia; Sprague, Annals, v, 63; Tennemann, Manual Hist. Phil. § 249; Mackintosh, History of Ethics, p. 130; *Natl. Amer. Berkenmeyer, WILLIAM CHRISTOPHER, a Lutheran minister, of whose parentage and early life little is known. He arrived in America in 1725, and became minister to the Lutheran congregation of Quassaik Parish. His residence was at Loomenburgh (now Athens, N. Y.), but his itinerant labors extended over a large part of the colony of New York. He was regarded as a man of great learning in his time, and tradition still speaks of his great zeal and industry as a minister. He gave special care to the negro race.—Evang. Rev. April, 1862; Doc. Hist. of N. Y. vol. iii.

Berleburg Bible (Berleburger Bible), an edition of the Bible published at Berleburg, Germany, 1726-29, by anonymous editors. It gives an entirely new translation, with a running exposition, giving the literal, spiritual, and hidden, or mystical interpretation. It was edited in the spirit of pietism of a mystical tendency (Walch, Biblioth. Theol. iv, 187).

Bernard of MENTONE (or of AOSTA), St., was born in 923, near Aneauy. He is memorable as the founder of two establishments of Hospitaliers, where for more than nine hundred years travellers have found an asylum against the perils of the Alps. He was archdeacon of Aosta, and grand-vicar of the diocese. In his journeys he had opportunities of seeing the sufferings to which the pilgrims were exposed in crossing the Alps, and he conceived the project of establishing two hospitals, one on Mount Joux (Mons Jovis), the other in a pass in the Greek Alps, called Colony Jan, on account of a pile of stones raised on the spot to point out the road to travellers. Upon these summits he raised the two hospitals known as the Great and Little St. Bernard, which he confided to the regular canons of St. Augustine, who, from that time down to the present, have continued to fulfil with a zeal and charity beyond all praise the merciful intentions of the founder. The chief monastery is on the Great St. Bernard, which is supposed to be the highest dwelling in Europe, and there, amid perpetual snows, the monks exercise their hospitable labors. Bernard died at Novara May 28, 1008. His festival is celebrated on June 15, the day of his interment. His life is given in the Acta Sanctorum, June 15.—London, Ecol. Dict. ii, 189; Butler, Lives of Saints, June 15.

Bernard of TIROX, St., founder of a new congregation of Benedictines (q. v.), viz. the Tironensians (q. v.), was born at Ponthieu about A.D. 1046. He was at first abbot of St. Cyprian's, but in 1109 founded the abbey of Tiron and the new congregation named from the place. The monks gave themselves to silence, manual labor, prayer, and psalmody, and their dress was of the commonest material. Bernard, before long, found himself surrounded by more than five hundred disciples of both sexes. Each one was set to perform whatever art he best excelled in, and thus were found carpenters, smiths, goldsmiths, painters, vine-dressers, agriculturists, writers, men of all callings, glad to exercise their talents in obedience to their superior. A noble monastery soon arose in the solitude. Congregations were soon established in France, Britain, and elsewhere; eleven abbeys were founded, subject to the chief of the order at Tiron; of these eight were in France, one in Wales, in the diocese of St. David's, called the abbey of St. Mary de Cameis, and one in Scotland, at Roxburgh. Bernard died on the 14th of April, 1116. He has not been canonized by the Church, but the Martyrologies of the Benedictines and of France mention him on the 14th of April. His life is given in the Acta Sanctorum, April, t. ii.—Baillet, Vies des Saints, 14 Aprilis; Helyot, Ordres Religieux, iii, 674.

Bernard of CLAIRVAUX, St., one of the most eminent names in the Mediaeval Church, was born of noble parents near Dijon, in the year 1091. He had five brothers and one sister, all of whom he persuaded to the same course of religious life with himself; and, after having lived for some time in seclusion in their father's house, the brothers all left it together in 1113, and repaired to Cîteaux, where they demanded of the abbot Stephen to be admitted. Besides his brothers, he took with him other companions, making in all thirty. Having distinguished himself by his piety, devotion, and learning, he was commissioned, in 1114, to conduct a colony of monks to Clairvaux, where, having built their monastery, he was appointed the first abbot. His learning and consummate abilities could not be long concealed in the cloister, and very soon he was called upon to take part in all the important affairs of the Church. In 1128 he was present in the Synod of Troyes, convoked by the legate Matthew, cardinal bishop of Albano, where, by his means, the order of the Knights Templars was confirmed, as well as the rule for their observation. In the schism between Innocent II and Anacletus, Bernard took the side of the former. In 1140 we find him strenuously opposing Abelard (q. v.), whom, both by word and by his writings, he resisted, especially in the Council of Sens held in that year. His arbitrary and persevering persecution of Abelard is one of the greatest stains upon his reputation. "About the year 1140, Bernard was involved in an important controversy concerning what was called the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary. Several churches in France began about that time to celebrate the festival consecrated to this pretended conception. It is reported by some authors that it had been introduced into the Church of England before this period, in consequence of the exhortations of archbishop Anselm. The Church of Lyons was the first which adopted this new festival in France, which no sooner came to the knowledge of St. Bernard than he severely censured the canons of Lyons on account of this innovation, and opposed the immaculate conception of the Virgin with the greatest vigor, as it supposed her to be honored with a privilege which belonged to Christ alone. Upon this a warm contest arose, some siding with the canons of Lyons, and adopting the new festival, while others adhered to the more orthodox sentiments of St. Bernard. The controversy, notwithstanding the zeal of the contending parties, was carried on during this century with a certain degree of decency and moderation. But in after times, as Mosheim remarks, when the Dominicans were established in the Academy of Paris, the contest was renewed with the greatest violence, and the same subject was debated on both sides with the utmost animosity and contentment of mind. The Dominicans declared for St. Bernard, while the Academy patronized the canons of Lyons, and adopted the new festival." (See IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.) It was in the year 1145 that information was received in Europe of the perilous condition of the newly-established kingdom in the East. Edessa was taken by the Saracens; Antioch and Jerusalem were threatened. The news excited universal sorrow. Louis the Seventh, king of France, in a penitential spirit, was the first who prepared to arm in defence of the Holy Sepulchre. The French king's determination was approved by the pope, Eugenius III; and Bernard was commissioned to travel through France and Germany for the purpose of raising an army of crusaders. The success of Bernard was marvellous. The unwilling emperor, Conrad III, yielded at length to his impassioned eloquence. In his management of Conrad, the fact and good taste of Bernard were conspicuous. It was at Frankfort-on-Maine that he had his first private audience. When the emperor then gave him to understand how little interest he took in the matter, Bernard pressed the subject no farther, but awaited another opportunity. After having succeeded in making peace between several of the princes of the empire, he preached the crusade publicly, exhorting the emperor and princes to participate in it, at the diet held at Christmas in the city of Spire. Three days after this he again addressed the emperor in private, and exhorted him, in a friendly and affectionate manner, not to lose the opportunity of so short, so easy, and so honorable a mode of penance. Conrad, already more favorably disposed to the undertaking, replied that he would advise with his councillors, and give him an answer on the following day. The next day Bernard officiated at the holy communion, to which he unexpectedly added a sermon in reference to the crusade. Toward the conclusion of his discourse, he turned to the emperor, and addressed him frankly, as though he had been a private man. He described the day of judgment, when the men who had received such innumerable benefits from God, and yet had refused to minister to Him to the utmost of their power, would be left without reply or excuse. He then spoke of the blessings which God had in such overflowing measure poured upon the head of Conrad—the highest worldly dominion, treasures of wealth, gifts of mind and body—till the emperor, moved even to tears, exclaimed, 'I acknowledge the gifts of the divine mercy, and I will no longer remain ungrateful for them. I am ready for the service which He Himself hath exhorted me.' At these words a universal shout of joy burst from the assembly; the emperor immediately received the cross, and several of the nobles followed his example." On this occasion he went so far as to claim inspiration, and to prophesy the success of the undertaking. This is the most reprehensible part of his career, and he attempted to cover the failure of his prophecy by a poor quibble. In the same year a council was held at Chartres, where the Crusaders offered Bernard the command of the army, which he refused. In 1147, at the Council of Paris, he attacked the doctrine of Gilbert de la Porrée, bishop of Poitiers, on the Trinity; and in the following year, at the Council of Rheims, procured its condemnation. He was an earnest and zealous advocate of practical religion, and was undoubtedly one of the holiest men of his time. But it must be confessed that he was misled by the love of ecclesiastical conformity to false pretensions and persecuting principles. All ecclesiastical dignities he constantly refused; but his virtues and talents gained him a higher influence in the Christian world than was possessed even by the pope himself, and the disputes of the Church were often referred to his arbitration. Luther says of him, "If there has ever been a pious monk who feared God, it was St. Bernard; whom alone I hold in much higher esteem than all other monks and priests throughout the globe." His devotional Meditations are still read and admired, even among Protestants. They were translated into English by Stanhope. There can be no question but that he saw with sorrow many of the errors, corruptions, and defilements of the Church of Rome, nor did he hesitate to do all in his power to correct them. In the year 1152, just before his death, he put forth his Libri de Consideratione, addressed to Pope Eugenius III, in which he handles the subject at large, and strongly urges it. In the first book of this work he inveighs against the abuses of the ecclesiastical courts. In the second he admonishes Eugenius to consider, as to his person, who he is, and, as to the dignity of his office, what he is. He reminds him that he is not set over others to domineer over them, but to minister to them and watch over them; that he had indeed given to him the charge of all the churches, but no arbitrary dominion over them, which the Gospel disallows. "To you," he says, "indeed the keys of heaven have been intrusted, but there are other doorkeepers of heaven and other pastors besides you; yet are you so much the more above them as you have received the title after a different manner. They have every one a particular flock, but you are superintendent over them all; you are not only supreme pastor over all flocks, but likewise over all the shepherds." In the third book he treats of his duty toward inferiors, and complains heavily of the grievance caused by the appeals to Rome, which, he says, were the occasion of incalculable mischief, and, justly, a source of murmuring and complaint. He further inveighs against the multitude of exemptions which destroyed the ecclesiastical hierarchy. In the fourth book he admonishes the pope to mind his duty toward the clergy, cardinals, and other officers of his court, and to repress their intrigues, luxury, and sumptuousness. He advises him as to the qualifications of those whom he should retain near his person, and, lastly, makes a recapitulation of the qualities requisite for the due fulfilament of the papal office: "Consider that the Church of Rome, over which God hath placed you as supreme, is the mother, and not the mistress of other churches; and that you are not a sovereign lord over the other bishops, but only one among them; that you are a brother of those that love God, and a companion of such as fear him," etc. "His meditations have been translated by Dean Stanhope. His sermons have been the delight of the faithful in all ages. 'They are,' says Sixtus of Sienna, 'at once so sweet and so ardent that it is as though his mouth were a fountain of honey, and his heart a whole furnace of love.' The doctrines of St. Bernard differ on some material points from that of the modern Church of Rome; he did not hold those refinements and perversions of the doctrine of justification which the school divinity afterward introduced, and the Reformers denounced; he rejected the notion of supererogatory works; he did not hold the modern purgatorial doctrines of the Church of Rome; neither did he admit the immaculate conception of the blessed Virgin. He maintained the doctrine of the real presence, as distinguished from the Romish doctrine of transubstantiation. In his discourse on the Lord's Supper, he joins together the outer and form of the sacrament, and the spiritual efficacy of it, as the shell and the kernel, the sacred sign, and the thing signified; the one he takes out of the words of the institution, and the other out of Christ's sermon in the sixth of St. John. And in the same place explaining that sacraments are not things absolute in themselves without any relation, but mysteries, wherein, by the gift of a visible sign, an invisible and divine grace with the body and blood of Christ is given, he saith 'that the visible sign is as a ring, which is given, not for itself or absolutely, but to invest and give possession of an estate made over to one.' Now, as no man can fancy that the ring is substantially changed into the inheritance, whether lands or houses, none also can say with truth, or without absurdity, that the bread and wine are substantially changed into the body and blood of Christ. But in his sermon on the Purification he speaks yet more plainly: 'The body of Christ in the sacrament is the food of the soul, not of the belly, therefore we eat Him not corporally; but in the manner that Christ is meat, in the same manner we understand that He is eaten.' Also in his sermon on St. Martin: 'To this day,' saith he, 'the same flesh is given to us, but spiritually, therefore not corporally.' For the truth of things spiritually present is certain also." Bernard died August 20, 1153, leaving one hundred and sixty monasteries of his order, all founded by his exertions. The brief character of him given by Erasmus is this: "Christiane doctus, sancte facundus et pie festivus." He was canonized, with unexampled splendor, twenty years after his death, by Alexander III, and the Roman Church celebrates his memory on the 20th of August. Of all the editions of his works, by far the best is that by Mabillon (Paris, 1690, 2 vols. fol.; reprinted, with additions, Paris, 1830, 4 vols. imp. 8vo).—Hook, *Eccles. Bernard of Chartres, a celebrated philosopher and theologian of the 12th century. Little is known of his life except that he was the head of the school of Chartres at the same time that Guillaume de Chartres was the head of the school of St. Victor. His writings and his philosophical views were likewise unknown until Mr. Cousin discovered in the Imperial Library one of his manuscripts, a kind of poem, followed by verse and prose, and divided into two parts, the one called Megacosmus (great world), and the other Microcosmus (little world; a treatise on man). The system of Bernard was a Platonism, sometimes interpreted according to the genius of the Alexandrines.—Hofer, Biog. Générale, v, 572; Cousin, Introduction aux fragments inédits d'Abailard.

Bernard of Thuringia, a German visionary who lived toward the close of the 12th century, but of whose life nothing else is known. On the ground of some passage in the Revelation he announced the end of the world as close at hand, and produced a wonderful commotion throughout the whole of Europe. Many were induced to leave all they had and to emigrate to Palestine, where Christ was to descend from heaven to judge the quick and the dead. The secular authority had great difficulty in checking this movement.—Hofer, Biog. Générale, v, 558.

Bernard, Ptolomei, Str., founder of the Olivetans (q. v.), was born at Sienna 1272, died August 20, 1348. He descended from one of the first families of Sienna, and had filled the highest positions in his country. In consequence of a vow to leave the world if he should be cured from a sore eye, he sold all he had, distributed the money among the poor, withdrew to a desert ten miles from Sienna, and then practiced extraordinary austerities. He was soon joined by some followers; and when the pope counselled him to connect himself with one of the monastic orders of the Church, he adopted the rule of St. Benedict and a white habit. The congregation established by him is known under the name of Congregation of the Virgin Mary of Mount Olivet, and was approved by several popes.—Hofer, Biog. Générale, v, 375.

Bernard, Jacques, a Reformed minister of France, was born at Nions, in Dauphiné, September 1, 1658, and died April 27, 1718. His father, who was a Reformed minister, sent him to Geneva to pursue his theological studies. On his return he was himself ordained minister, and preached publicly, notwithstanding the prohibitive laws. He was soon compelled to flee, and went first to Lausanne, where he remained until the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Then he went to Holland, where he established a school of belles lettres, philosophy, and mathematics. He undertook, in 1691, to continue the publication of the Bibliothèque Universelle, begun by Jean Leclerc. In 1693 he succeeded Bayle as editor of the journal La République des Lettres. He wrote, besides a number of historical works, Traité de la Repentance tardive (Amsterdam, 1712, 12mo), and Traité de l'Excellence de la Religion (Amsterdam, 1714).—Hofer, Biog. Générale, v, 584.

Bernard, Richard, a Puritan divine, was born 1566 or 1567, died in 1641. Among his numerous works are the following: Plain Evidence that the Church of England is Apostolical (Lond. 1610); A Key for Opening the Mysteries of the Revolution of St. John (Lond. 1617); The fabulous Foundation of the Popedom, showing that St. Peter was never at Rome (Oxford, 1619); and several other works against the Church of Rome; The Isle of Man, or legal Proceedings in Manshire against Sin (Lond. 1627, 10th edit. 1635), supposed by some to have been the germ of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress; A Guide to Grand Jurymen with regard to Witches (Lond. 1627, 12mo).—Hofer, Biog. Générale, v, 592; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 179.

Bernardin, Str., of Sienna, descended from the family Albicessi, one of the most distinguished in the republic of Sienna, was born in 1380 at Massa-Carrara, and entered the Franciscan order in 1404. He became one of the boldest and most famous preachers against the prevailing corruptions of the times; was appointed in 1438 vicar general of his order, and successfully exerted himself for the restoration of the strict monastic rule. He died in 1444 at Aquila, where his relics are still kept, and was canonized in 1450. He is commemorated by the Roman Church on March 20. His works are mostly of a mystical character; among them is a commentary on the Revelation. His complete works have been often published (Ven. 1591, 4 vols. 4to; Paris, 1636, 5 vols. fol.; Ven. 1745, 5 vols. fol.).

Bernardin de Sahagun, a Spanish Franciscan, lived in the second half of the 16th century. He spent many years in the West Indies and Mexico, and composed a grammar and dictionary of the language of the latter country, and many other works for the use of the missionaries and native Christians. He wrote in Spanish a history of the religion, the government, and the customs of the natives of the West Indies, and an essay on the conquest of New Spain or Mexico.—Hoefler, Biog. Générale, v. 606.

Bernardine Moulès (the same with the Cistercians), so called after Bernard of Clairvaux, who greatly extended the order. See BERNARD and CISTERCIANS.

Berne, CONFERENCE or DISPUTATION OF, a name given especially to a conference held in 1528, which led to the establishment of the Reformation in that city. The soil of Berne, not originally favorable to the reform, was suddenly prepared for it by the juggling doings of the Dominicans (1507–1509), and by Sampson's bold traffic in indulgences (Moshelm, Ch. Hist. iii. 13, 27). The reform movement was earnestly preached by Kolk, Haller, etc. (q. v.). The bishop of Lausanne demanded the indictment of the heretical preachers, but the council of the city refused to interfere. Great excitement arose (D'Aubigné, Hist. of Ref. bk. viii). The mandates of Viti and Modesti (June 15, 1523) were intended to mediate between the parties, and the council forbade any preaching, "whether of doctrine given out by Luther or other doctors, in the way of disputation, apart or aside from proof out of the Word of God." For two years the cause of reform fluctuated between advance and retreat. In 1526 the "Baden Disputation" was held, and its issue seemed likely to be fatal to the reformers. But the decisions of Baden were too severe and partial for the patience of the Bernese, to whom Haller and Kolb were still preaching. On November 17th, 1527, the great council decided to hold a conference at Berne to settle the disputes by appeals to the Word of God. They invited the bishops of Constance, Basle, the Valais, and Lausanne, and the Leagues of both parties were requested to send "delegates and learned men." The bishops declined the invitation, and the emperor, Charles V. sent a dissuasive, advising trust and recourse to the anticipated general council. Nevertheless, there was a large assembly that opened on the 6th of January, 1528, the majority being reformers, and among them Bucer, Capito, (Ecolampadius, and Zuingle). A graphic account of the discussion is given by D'Aubigné (History of Ref. rev. a. n. k. xv). Among the results of this disputation were the abrogation of the mass, the removal of images, etc., from the churches, and the Reformation Edict of Feb. 7th, 1528, annulling the authority of the bishops, settling questions of Church order, etc. For Berne, and, in fact, for Switzerland, this conference was the turning-point of the Reformation. See D'Aubigné, as above cited, and Fischer, Geschichte d. Disputation u. Reformation in Bern (Berne, 1828); Herzog, Real-Encyclop. ii. 81; Ruchat, Reformation in Switzerland, ch. iv.

Berne, SYNOD OF, an assembly of the clergy of Berne, Switzerland, to consolidate the work of the Reformation, held in 1532. It was the first of the Reformed synods of Berne, and was attended by 230 of the clergy, June 9–14, 1532. A Church Directory and Manual for Pastors were adopted, containing many excellent regulations, and full of the Christian spirit, as are the Acts of the Synod. They were published in Basle, 1532; and again enjoined in 1728 and 1775; re-published, Basle, 1830, 8vo, with a German version.—Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, ii. 87.

Berni 'cè (Βερνικη in Acts, also in Josephus; Bernice = Φαρνικη, see Sturz, Dial. Maced. p. 31; the form Bernice is also found, comp. Eustath. ad Il. x. 192; Valckenauer, ad Herod. p. 477; Niebuhr, Kl. Schr. i. 237), the name of several Egyptian princesses (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v. Berenice), and also of several Jewish females of royal connection named in Josephus, and one of them in the New Testament.

1. The daughter of Costabarnus and Salome, and niece of Herod the Great. She was married to Aristobulus, the son of Herod, who, proud of his descent from the Maccabees through his mother Mariamme, is said to have taunted her with her comparatively low origin; and her consequent complaints to her mother served to increase the feud, which resulted in the death of Aristobulus (Josephus, Ant. xviii. 5, 4; xvi. 1, 2; 4, 1; 7, 3; War. i. 23, 1; 24, 3). See ARISTOBULUS. After his execution, B.C. 6, Bernice became the wife of Theudion, maternal uncle to Antipater, the eldest son of Herod—Antipater having brought about the marriage, with the view of conciliating Salome and disarming her suspicions toward himself (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 1, 1; War. i. 28, 1). Josephus does not mention the death of Theudion, but it is probable that he suffered for his share in Antipater's plot against the life of Herod (Ant. xvii. 4, 2; War. i. 30, 5). See ANTIPATER. Bernice certainly appears to have been again a widow when she accompanied her mother to Rome with Archelaus, who went thither at the commencement of his reign to obtain from Augustus the ratification of his father's will (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 9, 3; War. ii. 2, 1). See ARCHELAUS. She seems to have continued at Rome the rest of her life, enjoying the favor of Augustus and the friendship of Antonia (q. v.), the wife of the elder Drusus. The affection of Antonia for Bernice, indeed, exhibited itself even after the latter's death, and during the reign of Tiberius, in offices of substantial kindness to her son Agrippa I (q. v.), whom she furnished with the means of discharging his debt to the imperial treasury (Strabo, xvi. 765; Josephus, Ant. xviii. 6, 1–6).

2. The eldest daughter of Agrippa I (q. v.) by his wife Cypros; she was espoused at a very early age to Marcus, son of Alexander the Alabarch; but he died before the consummation of the marriage, and she then became the wife of her uncle Herod, king of Chaleis, by whom she had two sons (Josephus, Ant. xviii. 5, 4; xix. 5, 1; 9, 1; xx. 5, 2; 7, 3; War. ii. 2, 6). After the death of this Herod, A.D. 48, Bernice, then but 20 years old, lived for a considerable time with her own brother, Agrippa II (q. v.), and not without just suspicion of an incestuous commerce with him, to avoid the scandal of which she induced Polemon, king of Cilicia, to marry her; but she soon deserted him and returned a gain to her brother (Joseph. Ant. xx. 7, 3; Juvenal, vi. 156), in connection with whom she is mentioned Acts xxv. 13, 23; xxvi. 30, as having visited Festus at Caesarea on his appointment as procurator of Judaea, when Paul defended himself before them all, A.D. 53. About A.D. 65 we hear of her being at Jerusalem (whether she had gone in pursuance of a vow), and interceding for the Jews with the procurator Florus, at the risk of her life, during his cruel massacre of them (Joseph. War. ii. 15, 1). Together with her brother she endeavored to divert her countrymen from the purpose of rebellion (Joseph. War. ii. 16, 5); and, having joined the Romans with him at the outbreak of the final war, she gained the favor of Vespasian by her munificent presents, and the love of Titus by her beauty. Her connection with the latter continued at Rome, whither she went after the capture of Jerusalem, and it is even said that he wished to make her his wife; but the fear of offending the Romans by such a step compelled him to dismiss her, and, though she afterward returned to Rome, he still avoided a renewal of their intimacy (Tacitus, Hist. ii, 2, 81; Sueton. Tit. 7; Dio Cass. lxxvi, 15, 18). Quintilian (Inst. Orat. iv, 1) speaks of having pleaded her cause on some occasion not otherwise alluded to, on which she herself sat as judge. See Nolde, Hist. Idem. p. 403 sq.

3. The daughter of Archelaus son of Chelcias, and Miriamne daughter of Herod Agrippa I (Josephus, Ant. xx, 7, 1).

Bero'dach-bal'adan (Heb. Berodak' Baladan', בִּרְוֹדַח בַּלְאֲדָן; Sept. Βαρωδάχ [v. r. Βαρωδάχ] Βαλαδάρ; Vulg. Berodach Baladan), the king of Babylon who sent the friendly deputation to Hzekiah (2 Kings xx, 12), called in the parallel passage (Isa. xxxix, 1), apparently more correctly, MERODACH-BALADAN (q. v.).

Bere'a (Βερεα, also written Βερίποτα according to Vossius, Theol. i, 61, the Macedonian for Φερεα), the name of two cities mentioned in Scripture.

1. A city in the north of Palestine, mentioned in 2 Macc. xiii, 4, in connection with the invasion of Judea by Antiochus Eupator, as the scene of the miserable death of Menelaus. This seems to be the city in which Jerome says that certain persons lived who possessed and used Matthew's Hebrew Gospel (De Vir. Illust. c, 3). This city (the name of which is written also Βερίον; comp. Beroensis, Plin. v, 23) was situated in Syria (Strabo, xvi, 751), about midway between Antioch and Hieropolis (Ptol. v, 15), being about two days' journey from each (Julian, Epist. xxvii; Theodoret, ii, 22). Chosroes, in his inroad upon Syria, A.D. 540, demanded a tribute from Berea, which he remitted afterward, as the inhabitants were unable to pay it (Procop. Bell. Pers. ii, 7; Le Beau, Bus Empire, ix, 15); but in A.D. 611 he occupied this city (Gibbon, viii, 225). It owed its Macedonian name Berea to Seleucus Nicator (Nieph. Hist. Eccl. xv, 39), and continued to be called so till the conquest of the Arabs under Abu Obeidiah, A.D. 638, when it resumed its ancient name, Chaleb or Chalybon (Schultens, Index Geogr. s. v. Haleb). It afterward became the capital of the sultans of the race of Hamadan, but in the latter part of the tenth century was united to the Greek empire by the conquests of Zimisees, emperor of Constantinople, with which city it at length fell into the hands of the Saracens. It is now called by Europeans Aleppo (Hardouin, ad Pline. ii, 267), but by the natives still Haleb, a famous city of the modern Orient (Mauert, Yl. i, 514 sq.; Büsching, Erdbeschr. V, i, 285). The excavations a little way eastward of the town are the only vestiges of ancient remains in the neighborhood: they are very extensive, and consist of suites of large apartments, which are separated by portions of solid rock, with massive pilasters left at intervals to support the mass above (Chesney, Euphrat. Exped. i, 435). Its present population is somewhat more than 100,000 souls (see Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. Haleb; McCulloch, Geogr. Dict. s. v. Aleppo; Russell's Nat. Hist. of Aleppo, passim). See HELEB.

Coin of Berea in Syria, with the Head of Trajan.

2. A city of Macedonia, to which the apostle Paul retired with Silas and Timotheus, in the course of his first visit to Europe, on being persecuted in Thessalonica (Acts xvii, 10), and from which, on being again persecuted by emissaries from Thessalonica, he withdrew to the sea for the purpose of proceeding to Athens (ib. 14, 15). The community of Jews must have been considerable in Berea, and their character is described in very favorable terms (ib. 11; see Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, i, 339). Sopater, one of Paul's missionary companions, was from this place (Beroaiot, Acts xx, 4; comp. Beroos, Liv. xxiii, 39). Berea was situated in the northern part of the province of Macedonia (Ptol. iv, 10), in the district called Emathia (Ptolem. iii, 13, 39), on a river which flows into the Haliaemon, and upon one of the lower ridges of Mount Bermius (Strabo, vii, p. 300). It lay 30 Roman miles from Pella (Pent. Tab.), and 51 from Thessalonica (Rin. Antonin.), and is mentioned as one of the cities of the thema of Macedonia (Constant. De Them. ii, 2). Coins of it are rare (Rasche, i, 1492; Eckhel, ii, 69). Berea was attacked, but unsuccessfully, by the Athenian forces under Callias, B.C. 432 (Thucyd. i, 61). It surrendered to the Roman consul after the battle of Pydna (Liv. xiv, 45), and was assigned, with its territory, to the third region of Macedonia (Liv. xlv, 29). B.C. 168. It was a large and populous town (Lucian, Asianns, 34), being afterward called Irenopolis (Cellarii Natit. i, 1038), and is now known as Ferris or Kava-Verris, which has been fully described by Leake (North-corn Greece, iii, 290 sq.) and by Cousinery (Voyage dans la Macédoine, i, 69 sq.). Situated on the eastern slope of the Olympian mountain range, with an abundant supply of water, and commanding an extensive view of the plain of the Axios and Haliaemon, it is regarded as one of the most agreeable towns in Rumili, and has now 15,000 or 20,000 inhabitants. A few ancient remains, Greek, Roman, and Byzantine, still exist here. Two roads are laid down in the itineraries between Thessalonica and Berea, one passing by Pella. Paul and his companions may have travelled by either of them. Two roads also connect Berea with Dium, one passing by Pydna. P was probably from Dium that Paul sailed to Athens, leaving Silas and Timotheus behind; and possibly 1 Thess. iii, 2 refers to a journey of Timotheus from Berea, not from Athens. See TIMOTHY.

Berosh; Beroth. See FIN.

Berōsus (perhaps from Bar-Osea, the son of Oseas), a priest of Belus and historian at Babylon, lived, according to some, at 250 B.C., according to others, at the time of Alexander the Great. He wrote a history of Chaldea, which he compiled from the temple archives of Babylon, of which he was the keeper. This work, which was highly valued by the ancients, was still extant at the time of Josephus, who used it to a considerable extent for his Antiquities. Other fragments may be found in the writings of Eusebius and others. Fabricius, in his Biblioth. Græca (tom. xiv), has collected the least doubtful fragments of Berossus. Other collections of these fragments were made by Richter, Berosi Chaldeorum historie que supersunt (Leipz. 1825), and by Didot (1848). A work with the title Antiquitatum libri quinque cum commentariis Joannis Annii, which first appeared at Rome 1498 (again Heidelb. 1599, Wittenb. 1612), is a forgery of the Dominican Giovanni Nanni, of Viterbo. Whether the historian Berossus is the same person as the astronomer is still a controverted question. The astronomer Berossus, who is likewise called a Chaldean and priest of Belus at Babylon, left his native country, and established a school on the island of Cos. See Vossius, De Hist. Græc. xiii; Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. iv, 103; Biogr. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.

Beroth (Βηροθ v. r. Βηρώθ), a place named in connection with Caphira, to which exiles returned from Babylon belonged (1 Esdr. v, 19); evidently the BEROTHU (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra ii, 25).

Bero'thah (Heb. id. בְּרֹתַח, as if meaning "to Beroth," or toward the wells; Sept. in most copies has a mass of undistinguishable names, but some read Βηρωθαι or Βηρωθαιμ; Vulg. Berothia) and Ber'othai (Heb. Berothay', בְּרוֹתַי, my wells; Sept. αἱ ἰκελεκταὶ πόλεις; Vulg. Beroth). The first of these two names, each of which occurs once only, is given by Ezekiel (xlvii, 16), in connection with Hamath and Damascus, as forming part of the northern boundary of the promised land as restored in his vision. The second is mentioned (2 Sam. viii, 8) as the name of a city of Zobah taken by David (from which he brought away great quantities of "brass" as spoil), also in connection with Hamath and Damascus. The slightness of these references makes it impossible to identify the names with any degree of probability, or even to decide whether they refer to the same locality or not (Hassel, Vorst. Erkl., xiii, 345). The well-known city Beirut (Berytus) naturally suggests itself as identical with one, at least, of the names; but in each instance the circumstances of the case seem to require a position farther east, since Ezekiel places Berothah between Hamath and Damascus, and David's war with the King of Zobah led him away from the sea-coast toward the Euphrates (2 Sam. viii, 3). In the latter instance, the difficulty is increased by the Hebrew text reading in 1 Chr. xviii, 8, CHUX (q. v.) instead of Berothai, and by the fact that both in Samuel and Chronicles the Greek translators, instead of giving a proper name, translate by the phrase "from the choice cities;" clearly showing that they read either the same text in each passage, or at least words which bore the same sense. First regards Berothah and Berothai as distinct places, and identifies the first with Berytus. Mislin (S. Ints. Lenz, i, 244) derives the name from the wells (Ber-roth), which are still to be seen bored in the solid rock at Beirut. Against this identification, however, there is this further objection, that the proper boundaries of the tribes (q. v.) never extended so far north as Berytus (q. v.), nor did David ever molest the Phœnician sea-coast in his wars. Both Berothah and Berothai are therefore probably to be sought in the vicinity of the springs that form the source of the Nahr Hasbany, near the present Hasbeya. See HAZAR-ESAN.

Be'rothito (Heb. Berothi', בְּרוֹתִי; Sept. Βηρωθῖ v. r. Βηρωθῖ), an epithet of Naharai, Job's armor-bearer (1 Chr. xi, 19), doubtless as being a native of the ΒΕΡΟΘΗ (q. v.) of Benjamin (Josh. xi, 17).

Berquin, Louis, a French nobleman, was born in 1489. His friend Erasmus states that he was highly respected at the French court, and that he was a religious man, but hated the monks on account of their ignorance and fanaticism. When he translated Luther's work, De Vitis Monasticis, he was denounced by the Sorbonne as a heretic. In 1523 the Parliament of Paris had his books seized, and ordered Berquin to abjure his opinions, and to pledge himself neither to write nor to translate any more books against the Church of Rome. On his refusal he was sent before the ecclesiastical tribunal of the diocese. Francis I. liberated him from prison, and submitted his case to the chancellor of his council, who demanded of Berquin the abjuration of some heretical opinions, with which the latter complied. In 1525, two councillors of the court of Rome denounced him as having relapsed into heresy, but he was again set free through the interposition of Francis I. In 1528 he was again arrested, and tried before a commission of twelve members of the Parliament, which decreed that his books should be burned, his tongue pierced, and that he should be imprisoned for life. From this judgment Berquin appealed to Francis I; but the commission, considering this appeal as a new crime, ordered him to be burned, but, in consideration of his nobility, to be previously strangled. This sentence was executed on April 22, 1529.—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, v, 658.

Berridge, John, one of the Methodist reformers of the Church of England, was born at Kingston 1716, and entered at Clare Hall 1734, and in 1755 became vicar of Everton. In 1778 he invited Wesley to visit his parish, and a wide-spread reformation broke out, attended by some irregularities and excesses. Berridge soon began to itinerate, and Everton was for some years the centre of a wide sphere of evangelical labors. He preached ten or twelve sermons a week, often in the open air. His theological opinions allied him with Whitefield, and he became a notable champion of Calvinistic Methodism. He was rich, but liberal to excess, and rented preaching-houses, supported lay preachers, and aided poor societies with an unsparring hand. He was a laborious student, and nearly as familiar with the classical languages as with his native tongue. Like most good men whose temperament renders them zealous, he had a rich vein of humor, and his ready wit played freely but harmlessly through both his public and private discourse. He died 1793. His Christian World Unmasked, with His Life, Letters, etc., was reprinted in 1824 (Lond. 8vo).—Stevens, History of Methodism, i, 382; Wesley, Works, iv, 25.

Beriman, William, D.D., an English divine, was born in London 1688, and educated at Oriel College, Oxford. He became rector of St. Andrew-Under-haft and Fellow of Eton 1729. His studies were extensive, especially in the Oriental languages. He died 1749. His principal writings are, Eight Sermons on the Trinity (Lond. 1726, 8vo).—Gradual Revelation of the Gospels (Boyle Lectures for 1730, 1731, 1732).—Sermons on Christian Doctrines and Duties (Lond. 1751, 2 vols. 8vo).—Hook, Ecl. Biog., ii, 330.

Berruyer, Joseph Isaac, born November 7th, 1681, at Rouen; became a Jesuit, and died at Paris in 1758, after having made much stir in the world by his Histoire du Peuple de Dieu. The first part, the O. T., appeared in 1728 (7 vols. 4to). The work is shocking, not only from its almost infidelity, but from its style, the O. T. history being, in fact, turned into a romance, in many cases irreconcilable with decency and propriety. The general of the order commanded the writer to put forth a new edition, which appeared in 1733 (8 vols. 4to), but it was still very far from satisfactory. The second part, containing the N. T., or, at least, part of it, in style and matter even worse than the first, appeared in 1753 (4 vols. 4to). The superiors of the three Jesuit establishments at Paris, seeing the storm which the book had raised, immediately put forth a declaration to the effect that the work had appeared without their knowledge, and compelled the author to sign an act of submission to the episcopal mandate. A formal censure on the part of the faculty of theology, and then a papal brief, and, lastly, a bull of Benedict XIV, proscribing the book in whatever language it might appear, followed. The third part appeared in 1758 at Lyons, containing a paraphrase of the epistles, filled with absurdities, and even outraging the doctrine of the Trinity. Clement XIII condemned it in 1758. The publication of this work produced a violent commotion among the Jesuits. Father Tournemine, the head of the opposition party denounced the work to the superiors in a very forcible tract; the opposite party replied; the dispute waxed hotter and hotter, but ultimately, by the death of Tournemine, the party of Berruyer gained the upper hand, and his infamous book is still reprinted.—Landon, Ecl. Diet., ii, 204.

Berry, Lucien W., D.D., an eminent Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Alburg, Vt., in 1815. He began to preach in 1833, and by his diligence as preacher, pastor, and student, he gradually acquired wide reputation and influence. He entered the travelling ministry in the Ohio Conference, and succeeded Dr. Simpson in the presidency of the Indiana Asbury University in 1848. After remaining for about six years in charge of this institution, he accepted the presidency of the Iowa Wesleyan University at Mount Pleasant. He remained in connection with this institution for about three years. In the summer of 1857 he resigned his place at Mount Pleasant, and took charge of the university of Missouri at Jefferson City. He labored with great zeal and energy to build up the university; but in November, 1857, he was attacked with erysipelas, which was subsequently followed by paralysis, and he died in peace, after great suffering, July 23, 1858, at Cincinnati, Ohio. He was "a profound divine, a critical scholar, an orator of uncommon power, and an eminently holy man."—Minutes of Conferences, 1859, p. 126.

Berthier, GUILLAUME FRANÇOIS, a Jesuit writer, born April 7th, 1704. He was first professor of the Humanities at Blois, and afterward of theology at Paris. The talent which he displayed caused him to be appointed to succeed Brumoy in 1742 as continuator of the history of the Gallican Church (Histoire de l'Église Gallicane), of which he published six volumes, carrying the history to A.D. 1529. In 1745 his superiors intrusted him with the direction of the Journal de Trévoux, which he edited until the suppression of the company. While thus employed he was necessarily brought into collision with Voltaire, whose works he freely criticised and stigmatized. In 1764 the ex-Jesuits were banished from court, whereupon he retired beyond the Rhine, and died at Bourges December 15th, 1782. After his death appeared his Œuvres Spirituelles (5 vols. 12mo, best ed. Paris, 1811):—Prænes et Esais, trad. avec réflexions et Notes (Paris, 1788, 5 vols. 12mo).—Hoefler, Biog. Générale, v. 507.

Berthold, a Calabrian who went to Mount Carmel about the middle of the 11th century and founded the order of Carmelites (q. v.).

Berthold, the apostle of Livonia, died in 1198. After the death of the first missionary and bishop of the Livonians, Meinhard (1196), Berthold, who was at that time abbot of the Cistercian convent Loccum, was ordained missionary bishop for the Livonians by Archbishop Hartwig of Bremen and Hamburg. Having arrived at Yxkull on the Duna, he at first tried to win over the Letts by clemency, but was forced to leave the country. He then returned at the head of an army of crusaders from Lower Saxony, and tried to conquer the Letts, and compel them by force of arms to submit to baptism. In a battle in 1198, Berthold was slain; but the crusaders were victorious, and the Letts had for a time to submit; but as soon as the crusaders had left their country they returned to paganism.—Brockhaus, Conversations-Lexicon, s. v.

Berthold of RATISBON, also called Berthold the Franciscan, a Franciscan monk, and one of the most powerful preachers that ever spoke in the German tongue. He is supposed to have been born about 1225 in Regensburg, where he died in 1272. His theological education he received chiefly in the Franciscan convent of Ratisbon, where a pious and learned mystic, Brother David of Angsburg, was professor of theology and master of the novitiate. It is doubtful whether, as has been asserted by some (Dr. Schmidt, in Studien und Kritiken, see below), he continued his studies in Paris and Italy. His first public appearance, as far as we know, was in the year 1246, when the papal legate, Philippus of Ferrara, charged him, Brother David, and two canons of Ratisbon, with the visitation of the convent of Niedermünster. His labors as a travelling preacher began in 1259 (according to others in 1251 or 1252) in Lower Bavaria, and extended to Alsatia, Alemannia (Baden), Switzerland, Austria, Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, Thuringia, Franconia, and perhaps Hungary. When he was unacquainted with the language of the country he used an interpreter, Rudelbach, in the Zeits. für Luth. Theol. 1859, calls Berthold "the Chrysostom of the Middle Ages." No church was large enough to hold the multitudes that flocked to hear him; from a pulpit in the fields he often addressed 60,000 hearers. He fearlessly rebuked sinners of all ranks. He was especially severe against the preachers of indulgences, whom he styled "penny preachers" and "the devil's agents." A volume of his sermons, edited by Kling, was published at Berlin in 1824 (B. d. s. Franciscaner's Predigten). The first complete edition of his sermons was published by F. Pfeiffer (Vienna, 2 vols. 1862 sq.). A translation of his sermons from medieval into modern German was published by Göbel, with an introduction by Alban Stolz (2 vols. 8vo). Recently the German jurists have found that the sermons of Berthold are of the greatest importance for the history of the German law. The passages in these sermons which agree with the popular law-book called the Schrahenspiegel are so numerous that some (as Laband, Beiträge zur Geschichte des Schrahenspiegels, Berlin, 1861) have regarded Berthold as its author. The best treatise on Berthold is by Schmidt, B. der Franciscaner in Studien und Kritiken (1864, p. 7-82). See also Kling, in Herzog, Real-Encyclop. ii, 101, and Wagemann, in Herzog, Suppl. i, 183; Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie, 1863, p. 386 sq.; Piper, *Eveng. Berthold of ROHRBACH, a layman who preached at Würzburg about 1336 against the bad practices of the clergy. Having been arrested by the Inquisition, he recanted and was released. Preaching again at Spire, he was condemned and burnt in 1356. His teachings seem to have been of a mystical and extravagant tendency; e. g. that man can reach such a degree of perfection in this life that prayer and fasting are no longer necessary for him. Trithemius calls him a Beghard (q. v.); Mosheim classes him with the "Brethren of the Free Spirit" (q. v.). See Mosheim, De Beghards, p. 325 sq.; Landon, s. v.

Berthold, bishop of Chiemsee, whose original name was Pirstinger, was born in 1465, at Salzburg. He was for some time a canon at Salzburg, and in 1508 was elected bishop of Chiemsee, where he displayed an indefatigable zeal for the reformation of the demoralized clergy. He is the author of the celebrated work entitled Deutsch Theologie, one of the best works of the Middle Ages on scientific theology (latest edition, with notes, a dictionary, and a biography of Berthold, ed. by W. Reithmeier, with a preface by Dr. Fr. Windishmann, Munich, 1852). He is probably, also, the author of the Opus Ecclesiæ, a description of the corruption pervading the whole Church (Landslut, 1524; last edit. 1620).—Pierer, Univ. Lex. xix, 811.

Berthold, Leonhard, a German theologian, was born May 8, 1774, at Emskirchen, in Bavaria. He became in 1805 professor in the philosophical, and in 1806, in consequence of his commentary on Daniel (Erlangen, 2 vols. 8vo, 1806-'08), in the theological faculty of the University of Erlangen. He was a prominent representative of the Rationalistic school. His foremost works are an Introduction into the Bible (Hist. Kritische Einleitung in die sämtlichen kanonischen und apocryphischen Schriften des A. und N. Testaments, 5 vols. Erlangen, 1812-19, 8vo); Theolog. Wissenschaftskunde. Einleitung in die theol. Wissenschaften (Erlangen, 1821-'22, 2 vols. 8vo); A History of Doctrines (Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte (Erlangen, 1822-'23, 2 vols. 8vo). He died on March 31, 1822. In 1814 Berthold became editor of the Kritische Journal der neuesten deutschen Theologie, of which he published vol. v to vol. xiv. A collection of his "Opuscula Academica" was published by his successor Winer (Leipzig, 1824, 8vo).—Herzog, Suppl. i, 185.

Berti, GIOVANNI LORENZO, an Augustinian monk, born 1696, in Tuscany. He was called by the Grand-duke of Tuscany to the chair of theology at Pisa, where he died, May 26, 1766. His principal work is a course of theology, printed at Rome, from 1739 to 1745, in 8 vols. 4to, under the title De Theologicis Disciplinis (also Naples, 1776, 10 vols. 4to). He was charged with Jansenism, and, by order of the pope, printed, at the Vatican, in 1749, an apology, under the title Augustinum systema de gratia, de iniqua Baianicis et Jansenicis erroris insimulatione vindictatum (2 vols. 4to). Against Archbishop Languey, who repeated the same charge, and denounced him to Pope Benedict XIV, he wrote the work, In Opusculum Inscriptum J. J. Languey, Judicium de operibus Theologicis Belli et Berti, copulatione (Leghorn, 1756). Berti also wrote an Eccelesiastical History (7 vols. 4to; afterward abridged, Naples, 1718); and a work on the life and writings of Augustine (De Rebus gestis S. Augustini, librisque ab eodem conscriptis, Venice, 1756).—Biographie Universelle, iv, 361.

Berti, PETER, born in Flanders, November 14, 1653, became rector of the college of the States at Leyden, and professor of philosophy. Having embraced the opinions of Arminius, he drew upon himself the enmity of the Gomarists, and was stripped of his employments. Upon this he removed to France, where, in 1629, he joined the Romish Catholic Church, and was nominated to the professorship of eloquence in the college of Boncourt. He afterward became historiographer to the king, and died October 3, 1629. Among his works are, 1. Notitia Episcopatum Galliarum (Paris, 1625, fol.);—2. Theatrum Geographicum veteris (Amst. 1618-19, 2 vols. fol.). See Mosheim, Ch. Hist. iii, 390.

Bertram, monk of Corbie. See RATRAMUS.

Bertram, CORNELIUS BONAVENTURA, professor of Hebrew at Geneva and Lausanne, was born at Thouars in 1531, and died at Lausanne in 1594. He published a translation of the Bible from the original Hebrew into French, which is in high repute among the French Calvinists. He also published De Republica Hebræorum (Lugd. Bat. 1641), which is given in the Critici Sacri, vol. v.—London, Ecol. Diet. ii, 272.

Berul, PIERRE DE, institutor and first superior general of the "congregation of priests of the Oratory" in France, was born in the neighborhood of Troyes, in Champagne, February 4, 1575. After establishing the Carmelites in France, he laid the foundation of the "Congregation of the Oratory," which raised a great storm on the part of the Jesuits. He, however, had the concurrence of the pope and of the king, Louis XIII, and on the 4th of November, 1611, the Oratory [see ORATORIANS] was established. In 1627 Urban VIII made him cardinal. He died suddenly at the altar, Oct. 2, 1629, not without suspicion of having been poisoned by Richelieu. He left many controversial and devotional works, published at Paris (1611, 1657, 2 vols. fol.). His Life was written by Hubert (Paris, 1746) and Tabaraud (new ed. Paris, 1817, 2 vol.).—Biog. Univ. iv, 379-384; London, ii, 214.

Beryl is the uniform rendering in the Auth. Vers. only of the Heb. בְּרִיל, berish (so called, according to Gesenius, as being brought from Tarshish), and the Gr. βήρυλλος, a precious stone, the first in the fourth row on the breastplate of the high-priest (Exod. xxxiii, 20; xxxix, 13). The color of the wheels in Ezekiel's vision was as the color of a beryl-stone (Ezek. i, 16; x, 9); it is mentioned among the treasures of the King of Tyre in Ezek. xxviii, 13, where the marginal reading is chrysolite; in Cant. v, 14, as being set in rings of gold; and in Dan. x, 6, the body of the man whom Daniel saw in vision is said to be like the beryl. In Rev. xxi, 19, the beryl is the 8th foundation of the city, the chrysolite being the 7th. In Tobit xiii, 17, is a prophetic prayer that the streets of Jerusalem may be paved with beryl. In Exod. xxviii, 20, the Sept. renders berish by "chrysolite," χρυσόλιθος, while they render the 11th stone, בְּרִיל, shoham, by "beryl," βήρυλλος. In Ezek. i, 16, they have θαυραίς; in x, 9, λίθος ἀνθρακός; and xxviii, 13, ἀνθραξ, in Cant. v, 14, and in Dan. x, 6, θαυραίς. This variety of rendering shows the uncertainty under which the old interpreters labored as to the stone actually meant. See GEM. Josephus takes it to have been the chrysolite, a golden-colored gem, the topaz of more recent authors, found in Spain (Plin. xxxvii, 109), whence its name berish (see Braun, de Vest. Sac. Heb. lib. ii, c. 18, § 193). Luther suggests turquoise, while others have thought that amber was meant. Kalisch, in the two passages of Exodus, translates berish by chrysolite, which he describes as usually green, but with different degrees of shade, generally transparent, but often only translucent—harder than glass, but not so hard as quartz. The passage in Rev. xxi, 20, is adverse to this view. Schleusner (l. 446) says the βήρυλλος is aqua-marine. "The beryl is a gem of the genus emerald, but less valuable than the emerald. It differs from the precious emerald in not possessing any of the oxide of chrome. The colors of the beryl are grayish-green, blue, yellow, and sometimes nearly white" (Humble, Dict. Geol. p. 30).—Penny Cyclopædia, s. v.; Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Beryllus. See OSYX.

Beryllus, bishop of Bostra, in Arabia, 3d century. Our only definite knowledge of him is derived from a passage in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vi, 33), which says that he held that "our Lord did not exist, in the proper sense of existence, before he dwelt among men; neither had he a proper divinity, only that divinity which dwelt in him from the Father." Eusebius goes on to say that Origen, by discussion with Beryllus, brought him back to the faith. There has been much discussion of late as to the real nature of the heresy of Beryllus. See an article of Schleiermacher, translated in the Biblical Repository, vi, 14; see also Neander, Ch. History, i, 593 sq.; Dörner, Doctrine of the Person of Christ, div. i, vol. ii, p. 35.

Berytus (Βηρυτῶν), a town of Phœnicia (Dionys. Per. v, 911; Pomp. Mel. i, 12, § 5; Amm. Marc. xiv, 8, § 9; Tacit. Hist. ii, 81; Anton. Itin. and Peut. Tab.), which has been (apparently without good foundation) identified with the Berotah (q. v.) or Berotah of Scripture (2 Sam. viii, 8; Ezek. xlviii, 16; comp. 2 Chron. viii, 3). It lay on the sea-shore, about twenty-five miles north of Sidon (comp. Ptolem. v, 15; Strabo, xvi, 755; Mannert, VI, i, 378 sq.). After its destruction by Tryphon, B.C. 140 (Strabo, xvi, 756), it was reduced by the Roman Agrippa, and colonized by the veterans of the fifth "Macedonian legion," and seventh "Augustan," and hence became a Roman colonia (Pliny, v, 17), under the name of Julia Felix (Orelli, Inscr. n. 514; Eckhel, Nom. iii, 356; Marquardt, Handb. d. Röm. Alt. p. 199), and was afterward endowed with the rights of an Italian city (Ulpian, Dig. xv, l, § 1; Pliny, v, 16). It was at this city that Herod the Great held the pretended trial of his two sons (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 11, 1-6). The elder Agrippa greatly favored the city, and adorned it with a splendid theatre and amphitheatre, besides baths and porticoes, inaugurating them with games and spectacles of every kind, including shows of gladiators (Josephus, Ant. xix, 7, 5). Here, too, Titus celebrated the birthday of his father Vespasian by the exhibition of similar spectacles, in which many of the captive Jews perished (Josephus, War, vii, 3, 1; comp.

5, 1). Coins of the imperial period, both Roman and native, are not uncommon (see Rasche, Lex. Num. i, 1492). Afterward Berytus became renowned as a school of Greek learning, particularly of law, to which scholars repaired from a distance. Its splendor may in the rock outside the south-western wall. The city lies on a gradual slope, so that the streets have a descent toward the sea; but back of the town the ground toward the south rises, with more rapidly, to a considerable elevation. Here, and indeed all around the city, is a succession of gardens and orchards of fruit and of countless mulberry-trees, sometimes surrounded by hedges of prickly-pear, and giving to the gardens of Beirut an aspect of great verdure and beauty, though the soil is perhaps less rich and the fruits less fine than in the vicinity of Sidon."

Berze'lus (βαρζελατιος v. r. Ζορδαλατιος, Vulg. Pharagelus), the father of "Augia," who was married to the pseudo-priest Addas (1 Esdr. v, 38); evidently the BARZILLAI (q. v.) of the Heb. text (Ezra ii, 61).

be computed to have lasted from the third to the middle of the sixth century (Milman's Gibbon, iii, 51). Eusebius relates that the martyr Appian resided here some time to pursue Greek secular learning (De Mart. Palest. c. 4), and Gregory Thaumaturgus repaired to Berytus to perfect himself in civil law (Socrates, Hist. Eccles. iv, 27). A later Greek poet describes it in this respect as "the nurse of tranquil life" (Nonnus, Dionys. xli, fin.). Under the reign of Justinian, it was laid in ruins by an earthquake, and the school removed to Sidon, A.D. 551 (Milman's Gibbon, vii, 420). During the Crusades, under the name of Baurium (Abb. 1q, v, 49; x, 8), it was an object of great contention between the Christians and Moslems, and fell successively into the hands of both. In A.D. 1110 it was captured by Baldwin I (Wilken, Kreuz. ii, 212), and in A.D. 1187 by Salah-ed-din (ib. 111, ii, 295). It was in the neighborhood of Berytus that the scene of the combat between St. George (who was so highly honored in Syria) and the dragon is laid. The place is now called Beirut (Abulfeda, Syr. p. 48, 94), and is commercially the most important place in Syria (Niebuhr, Reisen, ii, 469 sq.; Joliffe, p. 5). It is the centre of operations of the American missionaries in Palestine, and altogether the most pleasant residence for Franks in all Syria, being accessible by a regular line of steamers from Alexandria (see McCulloch's Geogr. Dict. s. v. Beyrout). The population is nearly 80,000 souls (Bädeker, Palestine und Syrien, p. 441). In the middle of September, 1840, it was bombarded by the combined English and Austrian fleets for the ejection of the troops of Mehemet Ali from Syria; but it has now recovered from the effects of this devastation (Wilson, Little Lands, ii, 205 sq.).

The modern city is thus described by Dr. Robinson (Researches, iii, 437 sq.): "Beirut is situated on the north-west coast of the promontory of the same name, about an hour distant from the cape, directly upon the sea-shore. There was once a little port, now filled up, so that vessels can anchor only in the open road. The town is surrounded on the land side by a wall of no great strength, with towers. The houses are narrow and solidly built of stone. The streets are narrow and gloomy, badly paved, or rather laid with large stones, with a deep channel in the middle for animals, in which water often runs. The aspect of the city is quite substantial. I went twice into the town, and saw the only remains of antiquity which are now pointed out, viz., the numerous ancient columns lying as a foundation beneath the quay, and the ancient road cut Be'sai (Heb. Besay', בֵּסַי, subjugator, from בָּסַי; or, according to Bohlen, from Sanscrit bagaya, victory; Sept. Basi, and Bai v. r. Bayai), one of the family-heads of the Nethinim whose posterity returned from Babylon (Ezra ii, 49; Neh. vii, 52). B.C. ante 536.

Besodei'ah (Heb. Besodiyah', בִּסְדֵיִיָּהּ, in the concord of Jehorah; according to Fürst, son of trust in Jehorah; Sept. Basodicia), the father of Meshullam, which latter repaired "the old gate" of Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 6). B.C. ante 446.

Besoigne, JEROME, a French Jansenist theologian, was born in Paris in 1686, and became professor of theology at the college Du Plessis. He was one of the appellants (q. v.) against the bull Unigenitus, and thereby drew upon himself many persecutions from the Jesuit party. He died in Paris January 25, 1763. His writings were very numerous; among them are Histoire de l'abbaye de Port Royal (Cologne, 1756, 8 vols. 12mo), including also lives of Arnaud, Nicole, and other Jansenists; Concord des épîtres de St. Paul et des épîtres Canoniques (Paris, 1747, 12mo); Principes de la perfection Chrétienne (Paris, 1748, 12mo); Principes de la Paix et de la Conversion (Paris, 1762, 12mo). —Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, v, 800.

Besold, CHRISTOPHER, was born in Tübingen 1577, and educated for the law, but combined theological with legal studies. In 1610 he became professor of law at Tübingen, and lectured with great acceptance. When, after the battle of Nördlingen, 1624, Protestantism in Würtemberg seemed likely to be overthrown, he went over to Rome publicly. It is said, however, that he had privately joined the Roman Church four years before. He became professor at Ingolstadt 1637, and died there Sept. 15, 1638, crying, "Death is a bitter herb." —Mosheim, Ch. Hist. c. xvii § 2, pt. i, ch. i; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. ii, 111.

Besom (בֶּסוֹם, metath. a sweep), occurs only in the phrase "besom of destruction," i. e. desolating broom, with which Babylonia is threatened (Isa. xiv, 23); a metaphor frequent still in the East for utter ruin (Roberts, Orient. Illustr. in loc.).

Be'sor (Heb. only with the art., hab-Besor', בְּסוֹרֵי, the cool; Sept. Βορά; Josephus, Βάσιλος, Ant. vi, 14, 6), a torrent-bed (בְּרֵךְ, "brook") or ravine in the extreme south-west of Judah or Simeon, where two hundred of David's men staid behind, being faint, while the other four hundred pursued the Amalekites, who had burnt the town of Ziklag, not far distant (1 Sam. xxx. 9, 10, 21). Sanutus derives its source from the interior Carmel, near Hebron, and states that it enters the sea near Gaza (Liber Secretorum, p. 252). For other slight ancient notices, see Reland, Palest., p. 288. It is, without doubt, the same that Richardson crossed on approaching Gaza from the south, and which he calls "Oadi Gaza" (Wady Gaza). The bed was thirty yards wide, and its stream was, early in April, already exhausted, although some stagnant water remained. The upper part of this is called Wady Shriakh, and is doubtless the brook Besor, being the principal one in this vicinity (Van de Velde, Memoir., p. 233; Schwarz, Palest., p. 52, 78).

Bessarion, JOHANNES, patriarch of Constantinople, and cardinal, was born at Trebizond in 1389 (or, according to Bandini, in 1395). He studied under Gemistus Pletho, who was one of the first to introduce the study of Plato in the West. He took the habit of St. Basil, and spent twenty-one years in a monastery in the Peloponnesus, occupied with his literary and theological studies, becoming one of the most eminent scholars of the age. When the emperor John Palaeologus resolved to attend the Council of Ferrara (q. v.), he withdrew Bessarion from his retreat, made him archbishop of Nicaea, and took him to Italy, with Marcus Eugenius, archbishop of Ephesus, and others. At the Council of Ferrara, and also at its adjourned session at Florence, the two most distinguished speakers present were Marcus and Bessarion—the former firm and resolute against any union with Rome on the terms proposed; the latter, at first vacillating, at last declared for the Latins. He was immediately employed by the pope to corrupt others; and by rewards, persuasions, threats, and promises, eighteen of the Eastern bishops were induced to sign the decree made in the tenth session, declaring that the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father and the Son; that the Sacrament is validly consecrated in unleavened as well as in leavened bread; that there is a purgatory; and that the Roman pontiff is primate and head of the whole church. The patriarch of Constantinople (who died at the council), Mark of Ephesus, the patriarch of Hieraclea, and Athanasius, remained uncorrupted. The Greek deputies returned to Constantinople, and were received there with a burst of indignation. The Greek Church indignantly rejected all that had been done, and in a council at Constantinople, held, according to their own account, a year and a half after the termination of that of Florence, all the Florentine proceedings were declared null and void, and the synod was condemned. Bessarion was branded as an apostate, and found his native home so uncomfortable that he returned to Italy, where Eugenius IV created him cardinal; Nicolas V made him archbishop of Siponto and cardinal-bishop of Sabina; and in 1463, Pius II conferred upon him the rank of titular patriarch of Constantinople. He was even thought of as the successor of Nicolas, and would have been elevated to the papal throne but for the intrigues of cardinal Allan. He was again within a little of being elected upon the death of Pius. He died at Ravenna, November 19, 1472, and his body was transported to Rome. His writings are very numerous, and, for the most part, remain unpublished. A catalogue of them is given by Fabricius, Bibliotheca Græca, xi. 121. His life was written by Bandini (Rome, 1777, 4to). Among his published writings is a treatise, Contra Calumniam Platonicam (Rome, 1469), against George of Trebizond, who had attacked Plato. His treatise De Sacramento Eucharistia is given in Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xvi. In this he asserts that the bread and wine become the body and blood of Christ, not through the prayer of the priest, but by virtue of the words of Christ. Other theological works of Bessarion may be found in the acts of the Council of Constance by Labbe and Hardouin.—London, Eccles. Dictionary, ii. 222; Hook, Eccles. Biography, ii. 316.

Bessel, GOTTFRIED VON, a learned Benedictine, was born Sept. 5, 1662, at Buchheim, in the archbishopric of Mayence. In 1692 he entered the Benedictine convent of Gottweich, near Vienna. Being called to the court of Lothar Franz, elector of Mainz, he was employed for diplomatic missions to Vienna, Rome, and Wolfenbuttel. He prevailed in 1710 upon the old and vain Duke Anton Ulrich, of Brunswick, to go over to the Church of Rome, the latter having previously urged his granddaughter Elizabeth to take the same step in order to become the wife of the Emperor Charles VI. On this occasion Bessel compiled the work Quinquaginta Romanocatholicam fidem omnibus aliis preferendi motiva; also, in German, Fünfzig Bedenken, etc. (Mayence, 1708). The work purports to be written by a former Protestant, and has, therefore, been wrongly ascribed—for instance, by Augustin Theiner—to Duke Anton Ulrich himself. He also began the publication of the Chronica Godricense, a work of great importance for the early church history of Austria; but he finished only the 1st vol. of it (Tegernsee, 1722, fol.).—Herzog, Real-Encyklop., ii. 114.

Bessin, GUILLAUME, a French Romanist theologian, was born at Glos-la-Ferté, in the diocese of Evreux, March 27, 1654. In 1674 he entered the order of Benedictines, and afterward taught philosophy and theology in the abbeys of Bec, Séez, and Fécamp. He was also made syndic of the monasteries of Normandy. He died at Rouen, October 18, 1736. He wrote Éléments sur le nouveau système du R. P. Lami, who maintained that our Lord did not celebrate the Jewish Passover on the eve of his death. "He is, however, chiefly known by the Concilia Rotomagensis Provincia, 1717, fol. It was first printed in 1677, and was the work of Dom Penneraye. Dom Julien Bellaise undertook a new edition, which he greatly enlarged, but died before its completion, and Bessin finished it, added the preface, and published it under his own name." He was one of the editors of the works of Gregory the Great (1705, 4 vols. fol.).—London, Ecclesiastical Dictionary, ii. 224; Hoefler, Neuville Biographie Générale, v. 819.

Besson, JOSEPH, a French Jesuit missionary, was born at Carpentras in 1607, and entered the Society of Jesus in 1623. He became professor of philosophy, and rector of the college at Nismes; but finally offered himself as a missionary, and was sent to Syria, where he spent many years. He died at Aleppo, March 17, 1691, leaving La Syrie Sainte, ou des Missions des Pères de la Compagnie de Jesus en Syrie (Paris, 1660, 8vo).—Hoefler, Nov. Biog. Générale, v. 821.

Best, DAVID, a Methodist Episcopal minister, born in Ireland, who emigrated to America at the age of 22, and joined the Philadelphia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1801. He filled various appointments, with honor to himself and profit to his people, until in the spring of 1835 he took a supernumerary relation. He was a man of strong mind, sound judgment, and unflinching firmness, and, as a preacher, his talents were more than ordinary. He died in Dec., 1841, in the 41st year of his ministry and 67th of his age.—Minutes of Conferences, iii. 250.

Bestead, an old English word, signifying to place in certain circumstances good or ill, and used once in the Auth. Vers. ("hardly bestead," Isa. viii. 21) for the Heb. קָשָׁה, kashah, to oppress.

Be'tah (Heb. בֵּיתַח, בְּתַח; Sept. Βαράχ v. r. Μετῆβᾶκ [quasi בְּתַחֲבָה], and Μεσβᾶχ, Vulg. Bete), a city belonging to Hadadezer, king of Zobah, mentioned with Berothai as having yielded much spoil of brass to David (2 Sam. viii. 8). In the parallel account (1 Chr. xviii. 8) the name is called, by an inversion of letters, TIBATHI (q. v.). Ewald (Gesch. ii. 195) pronounces the latter to be the correct reading, and compares it with TERAH (Gen. xxii. 21).—Smith, s. v.

Bet'anê (Βετάνη v. r. Βατάνη, i. e. prob. Βατάνη; Vulg. omits), a place apparently south of Jerusalem (Judith i, 9), and, according to Reland (Palest. p. 625), identical with the ATN (q. v.) of Josh. xxi, 16, and the Bethanin (Βηθανίη) of Eusebius (Onom. 'Aoi, Aín), two miles from the Terebinth of Abraham and four from Hebron. Others, with less probability, compare it with BETEN (q. v.). See under CHELLUS.

Be'ten (Heb. id. בֵּתֵן, bully, i. e. hollow; Sept. Βετῆν v. r. Βαθῆν and Βατῆν), one of the cities on the border of the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix, 25, only). By Eusebius (Onom. s. v. Barra) it is said to have been then called Bebetn (Βεβῆτη), and to have lain eight miles east of Ptolemais; but this distance is too little, as the place appears to be the "Ebatana of Syria" (Cellar, Notit. iii, 3, 13, 74), placed by Pliny (v, 17) on Carmel; apparently the present village with ruins called el-Babach, five hours east of Akka (Van de Velde, Narrat. i, 285).

Beth- (Heb. Beyth, the "construct form" of בֵּית, bu'yith, according to Fürst, from בית, to lodge in the night; according to Gesenius, from בָּנִית, to build, as δομῆς, domus, from ἔβου), the name of the second letter of the Hebrew alphabet, corresponding to our B, which was derived from it. As an appellative, it is the most general word for a house or habitation. Strictly speaking, it has the force of a settled stable dwelling, as in Gen. xxxiii, 17, where the building of a "house" marks the termination of a stage of Jacob's wanderings (comp. also 2 Sam. vii, 2, 6, and many other places); but it is also employed for a dwelling of any kind, even for a tent, as in Gen. xxiv, 32, where it must refer to the tent of La'an; also Judg. xviii, 31; 1 Sam. i, 7, to the tent of the tabernacle, and 2 Kings xxiii, 7, where it expresses the textile materials (A. V. "hangings") for the tents of Astarte. From this general force the transition was natural to a house in the sense of a family, as Psa. cvii, 41, "families," or a pedigree, as Ezra ii, 59. In 2 Sam. xiii, 7, 1 Kings xiii, 7, and other places, it has the sense of "house," i. e. "to the house." Beth also has some collateral and almost technical meanings, similar to those which we apply to the word "house," as in Exod. xxv, 27, for the "places" or sockets into which the bars for carrying the table were "housed;" and others. Like Edes in Latin and Dom in German, Beth has the special meaning of a temple or house of worship, in which sense it is applied not only to the tabernacle (see above) or temple of Jehovah (1 Kings iii, 2; vi, 1, etc.), but to those of false gods—Dagon (Judg. xvi, 27; 1 Sam. v, 2), Rimmon (2 Kings v, 18), Baal (2 Kings x, 21), Nisroch (2 Kings xix, 37), and other gods (Judg. ix, 27). "Bajith" (q. v.) in Isa. xv, 2 is really habajith—"the Temple"—meaning some well-known idol fane in Moab. Beth is more frequently employed as the first element of the names of places than either Kirjath, Hazer, Beer, Ain, or any other word. See those following. In some instances it seems to be interchangeable (by euphemism) for BAAL (q. v.). In all such compounds as Beth-el, etc., the latter part of the word must be considered, according to our Occidental languages, to depend on the former in the relation of the qualiter; so that BETH-EL can only mean "house of God." The notion of house is, of course, capable of a wide application, and is used to mean temple, habitation, place, according to the sense of the word with which it is combined. In some instances the Auth. Vers. has translated it as an appellative; see BETH-UKED; BETH-HAG-GAN; BETH-EDEN.—Smith, s. v.

Bethab'ara (Βηθαβάρᾱ, quasi בֵּית אַבְרָהָם, house of the ford or ferry), a place beyond Jordan (πέραν τοῦ ἰοῦ), in which, according to the Received Text of the N. T., John was baptizing (John i, 28), apparently at the time that he baptized Christ (comp. ver. 29, 30, 35). If this reading be the correct one, Bethabara may be identical with BETH-BARAH (q. v.), the ancient ford of Jordan, of which the men of Ephraim took possession after Gideon's defeat of the Midianites (Judg. vii, 24); or possibly with BETH-TIMRAN (q. v.), on the east of the river, nearly opposite Jericho. But the oldest MSS. (A, B) and the Vulgate have not "Bethabara," but Bethany (Βηθανία), a reading which Origen states (Opp. ii, 130, ed. Huet) to have obtained in almost all the copies of his time (σχετὸν πάντα τὰ ἀντίγραφα), though altered by him in his edition of the Gospel on topographical grounds (see Kuinöl, in loc.). In favor of Bethabara are (a) the extreme improbability of so familiar a name as Bethany being changed by copyists into one so unfamiliar as Bethabara, while the reverse—the change from an unfamiliar to a familiar name—is of frequent occurrence. (b) The fact that Origen, while admitting that the majority of MSS. were in favor of Bethany, decided, notwithstanding, for Bethabara. (c) That Bethabara was still known in the days of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomasticon, Βηθαβάρᾱ, Bethabara, which is expressly stated to have been the scene of John's baptism), and greatly resorted to by persons desirous of baptism. Still the fact remains that the most ancient MSS. have "Bethany," and that name has been accordingly restored to the text by Lachmann, Tischendorf, and other modern editors. The locality must, therefore, be sought by this name on the east shore of the Jordan.—Smith, s. v. See BETHANY.

Beth-anab (q. d. בֵּית אַנָּב, house of figs) is probably the correct name of a village mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Ἀνωβί, Anobí) under the form Μεσσηνιάκ or Βεθοαννάβ, as lying four Roman miles east of Diopolis (Lydda), while Jerome (ib.) speaks of still another name, Bethannabab, as belonging to a village eight miles in the same direction. Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 293) ingeniously reconciles these statements by assigning the first locality as that of the modern Annabeh, and the second as Beit-Naba, which lie respectively at the required distances south-east of Ludd. Comp. ANAB.

Beth'-anath (Heb. Beyth-Anath', בֵּית אַנָּת, house of response; Sept. Βηθανιάζ v. r. Βαθῆζαμῆ and Βαζαράζ), one of the "fenced cities" of Naphtali, named with Bethshemesh (Josh. xix, 38); from neither of which were the Canaanites expelled, although made tributaries (Judg. i, 33). It is mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Βαθῆν, Bethnath), who, however, elsewhere (s. v. Βηθανιάζ, Bethana) speak of a village (apparently in Asher, ib. s. v. Ἀρείη, Aníē) called Bethana (Βαθαναία, Bathanaa; Βαροαναία, Baroana), fifteen miles eastward of Caesarea (Diocæsarea or Sepphoris), and reputed to contain medicinal springs. It is perhaps the present village Anata, north of Bint-Jebel (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 293). Schwarz (Palest. p. 184) confounds it with the site of Beten.

Beth'-anoth (Heb. Beyth-Anoth', בֵּית אַנֹּת, house of answers, i. e. echo; Sept. Βηθανιάζ v. r. Βαζαράμ), a city in the mountain district of Judah, mentioned between Maarath and Elekou (Josh. xv, 59). It has been identified by Wolcott (Bibl. Sacra, 1843, p. 58) with the present village Beit-Anun, first observed by Robinson (Researches, ii, 186), about one and a half hours north-east of Hebron, on the way to Tekoa (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 293), containing extensive ruins of high antiquity (Wilson, Lands of Bible, i, 384 sq.), which are described by Robinson (Later Bib. Res. p. 281). Compare BETANE.

Beth'any (Βηθανία; according to Simonis, Onom. N. T. p. 42, for the Heb. בֵּית אַנָּת, house of depression; but, according to Lightfoot, Reland, and others, for the Aramaean בֵּית אַנָּת, house of dates; comp. the Talmudic אַנְוִיָּה, an unripe date, Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 38), the name of two places.

1. Instead of Bethabara (Βηθαβάρᾱ), in John, i, 28 (where the text was altered since Origen's time; see Cromie, Beitr. i, 91 sq.), the reading in the oldest and best MSS. (also in Nonnius's Paraphr. in loc.) is Bethany, Βηθανυᾶ (see De Dieu, Crit. Sacr. p. 491), which appears to have been the name of a place east of Jordan (against the interpretation of Kuinöl, Comment. in loc., that πέραρ signifies this side; see Lücke, in Krit. Journ. iii, 383; Cromie, Beitr. i, 82 sq.); while the punctuation of Paulus, Serm. i, 287, who places a period after Βηθανυᾶ, Comment. iv, 129, is not favored by the context. Possin (Spicil. Evang. p. 32) supposes that the place went by both names (regarding "Bethabarah" = בֵּית־בְּרַחַת, domus transiūs, ferry-house; and "Bethany" = בֵּית־נַחְשִׁי, domus neri's, boat-house). See BETHABARA. The spot is quite as likely to have been not far above the present "pilgrims' bathing-place" as any other, although the Greek and Roman traditions differ as to the exact locality of Christ's baptism (Robinson, Researches, ii, 261). The place here designated is apparently the same as the BETH-ARABAH (q. v.) of Judg. vii, 24, or possibly the same as BETH-NIMRAH (q. v.).

2. A town or village in the eastern environs of Jerusalem, so called probably from the number of palm-trees that grew around, and intimately associated with many acts and scenes of the life of Christ. It was the residence of Lazarus and his sisters Mary and Martha, and Jesus often went out from Jerusalem to lodge there; it was here that he raised Lazarus from the dead; from Bethany he commenced his "triumphal entry" into Jerusalem; here, at the house of Simon the leper, the supper was given in his honor; and it was in this vicinity that the ascension took place (Matt. xxi, 17; xxvi, 6; Mark xi, 11, 12; xiv, 3; Luke xxiv, 50; John xi, 1; xii, 1). It was situated "at" (πρός) the Mount of Olives (Mark xi, 1; Luke xix, 29), about fifteen stadia from Jerusalem (John xi, 18), on or near the usual road from Jericho to the city (Luke xix, 29, comp. 1; Mark xi, 1, comp. s. 46), and close by and east (?) of another village called BETHFRUAGE (q. v.). There never appears to have been any doubt as to the site of Bethany, which is now known by a name derived from Lazarus—el-Azariyeh, or simply Lazar'eh. It lies on the eastern slope of the Mount of Olives, fully a mile beyond the summit, and not very far from the point at which the road to Jericho begins its more sudden descent toward the Jordan valley (Lindsay, p. 91; De Saulcy, i, 120). The spot is a woolly hollow more or less planted with fruit-trees—olives, almonds, pomegranates, as well as oaks and carobs; the whole lying below a secondary ridge or hump, of sufficient height to shut out the village from the summit of the mount (Robinson, ii, 100 sq.; Stanley, p. 189; Bonar, p. 138, 139). From a distance the village is "remarkably beautiful"—"the perfection of retirement and repose"—"of seclusion and lovely peace" (Bonar, p. 139, 230, 310, 337; and see Lindsay, p. 69); but on a nearer view is found to be a ruinous and wretched village, a wild mountain hamlet of some twenty families, the inhabitants of which display even less than the ordinary Eastern thrift and industry (Robinson, ii, 102; Stanley, p. 189; Bonar, p. 316). In the village are shown the traditional sites of the house and tomb of Lazarus, the former the remains of a square tower apparently of old date, though certainly not of the age of the kings of Judah, to which De Saulcy assigns it (i, 128)—the latter a deep vault excavated in the limestone rock, the bottom reached by twenty-six steps. The house of Simon the leper is also exhibited. As to the real age and character of these remains there is at present no information to guide us. Schwarz maintains el-Azariyeh to be AZAL, and would fix Bethany at a spot which, he says, the Arabs call Beth-hanan, on the Mount of Offence above Siloam (p. 263, 135). These traditional spots are first heard of in the fourth century, in the Itinerary of the Bourdeaux Pilgrim, and the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome, and they continued to exist, with certain varieties of buildings and of ecclesiastical establishments in connection therewith, down to the sixteenth century, since which the place has fallen gradually into its present decay (Robinson, Researches, ii, 102, 103). By Mandeville and other mediaeval travellers the town is spoken of as the "Castle of Bethany," an expression which had its origin in castellum being employed in the Vulgate as the translation of κομη in John xi, 1.—Smith, s. v. See JERUSALEM.

Beth-ar'abah (Heb. Beyth ha-Arabah, בֵּית־אֲרָבָה, house of the desert; Sept. Βηθαράβα v. r. Βαζαράβα and Θαραβάρη; in Josh. xviii, 22, Βηθαβάρᾱ v. r. Βαζαβάρᾱ), one of the six cities of Judah which were situated in the Arabah, i. e. the sunk valley of the Jordan and Dead Sea ("wilderness," Josh. xv, 61), on the north border of the tribe, and apparently between Beth-hoglah and the high land on the west of the Jordan valley (xv, 6). It was afterward included in the list of the towns of Benjamin (xviii, 22). It is elsewhere (Josh. xviii, 18) called simply ARABAH (q. v.). It seems to be extant in the ruins called Kasr Hajla, a little south-west of the site of Beth-hoglah (q. v.).

Beth'aram (Heb. Beith Haram, בֵּית־הָרָם, house of the height [for the syllable ha- is prob. merely the def. art.], q. d. mountain-house; Sept. Βηθαρά v. r. Βαζαράβα and Βαζαράβη), one of the towns ("fenced cities") of Gad on the east of Jordan, described as in "the valley" (בְּגֵב־וַדִּי, not to be confounded with the Arabah or Jordan valley), Josh. xiii, 27, and no doubt the same place as that named BETHNARAN in Num. xxxiii, 36. Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.) reports that in his day its appellation ("by the Syrians") was Betharamtha (Βηθραμθᾶ [prob. for the Chaldaic form Βηθραμθᾶ]; Jerome, Betharam), and that it was also named Livias (Λιβίας, Libias; Jerome adds, "by Herod, in honor of Augustus"). Josephus's account (Ant. xviii, 2, 1) is that Herod (Antipas), on taking possession of his tetrarchy, fortified Sepphoris and the city (πίλις) of Betharamphtia (Βηθαραμφθᾶ), building a wall round the latter, and calling it Julius (Ιουλιᾶς; different from the Julius of Gaulonitis, War, ii, 9, 1), in honor of the wife of the emperor. As this could hardly be later than B. C. 1, Herod the Great, the predecessor of Antipas, having died in B. C. 4, and as the Empress Livia did not receive her name of Julia until after the death of Augustus, A. D. 14, it is probable that Josephus is in error as to the new name given to the place, and speaks of it as having originally received that which it bore in his own day (see Ant. xx, 8, 4; War, ii, 13, 2). It is curious that he names Livias (Λιβίας) long before (Ant. xiv, 1, 4) in such connection as to leave no doubt that he alludes to the same place. Under the name of Anathus (q. v.) he again mentions it (Ant. xvii, 10, 6; comp. War, ii, 4, 2), and the destruction of the royal palaces there by insurgents from Peraea. At a later date it was an episcopal city (Roland, Palest. p. 874). For Talmudical notices, see Schwarz, Palest. p. 231. Ptolemy gives the locality of Livias (Λιβίας) as 31° 26' lat., and 67° 10' long. (Ritter, Erdk. xv, 573); and Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Βηθραμθᾶ, Bethannaram) state that it was five miles south of Bethnabris or Bethannaris (i. e. Beth-nimrah; see Josephus, War, iv, 7, 4 and 6). This agrees with the position of the Wady Seir or Sir, which falls into the Eihor opposite Jericho, and half way between Wady Heshàn and Wady Shoabib. Seetzen heard that it contained a castle and a large tank in masonry (Reisen, 1854, ii, 318). According to Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 296), the ruins are still called Beth-Haram.—Smith, s. v.

Betharamphtia. See BETH-ARAM.

Beth-ar'bel (Heb. Beyth Arbel, בֵּית אַרְבֵּל, house of God's court or courts), a place only alluded to by the prophet Hosea (x, 14) as the scene of some great military exploit known in his day, but not recorded in Scripture: "All thy [Israel's] fortresses shall be spoiled, as Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel (Sept. ὡς ἀρχὴν Σαλμανὴν ἐκ τοῦ οἴκου Ἱεροβαὰμ [v. r. Ἱεροβαὰμ and Ἀρβὲλ]) in the day of battle." In the Vulgate, Jerome (following the Sept.) has translated the name "e domo ejus qui judicavit Baal," i. e. Jerubbaal, understanding Salman as Zalmuuna, and the whole passage as a reference to Gideon's victory (Judg. viii); but this is fanciful. Most modern commentators follow the Jewish interpreters (see Henderson, in loc.), who understand the verse to relate to Shalman (q. v.), or Shalmanezar, as having gained a battle at Beth-Arbel against Hoshca, king of Israel. As to the locality of this massacre, some refer it to the Arbel of Assyria (Strabo xvi, 1, 3), the scene of Alexander's famous victory; but there is no evidence of any such occurrences as here alluded to in that place. It is conjectured by Hitzig (in loc.) to be the place called Arbela (Ἀρβήλα) by Eusebius and Jerome in the Onomasticon (s. v.), where it is placed near Pella, east of Jordan; but as it is spoken of in Hosea as a strong fortress, the probability is rather that the noted locality in N.W. Palestine, called Arbela (τὰ Ἀρβήλα) by Josephus and the Apocrypha, is meant. This was a village in Galilee, near which were certain fortified caverns. They are first mentioned in connection with the march of Baecchides into Judea, at which time they were occupied by many fugitives, and the Syrian general encamped there long enough to subdue them (Ant. xii, 11, 1; 1 Macc. ix, 2). At a later period these caverns formed the retreats of banded robbers, who greatly distressed the inhabitants throughout that quarter. Josephus gives a graphic account of the means taken by Herod to extirpate them. The caverns were situated in the midst of precipitous cliffs, overhanging a deep valley, with only a steep and narrow path leading to the entrance; the attack was therefore exceeding difficult. Parties of soldiers, being at length let down in large boxes, suspended by chains from above, attacked those who defended the entrance with fire and sword, or dragged them out with long hooks and dashed them down the precipice. In this way the place was at length subdued (Ant. xiv, 15, 4, 5; War, i, 16, 2-4). These same caverns were afterward fortified by Josephus himself against the Romans during his command in Galilee. In one place he speaks of them as the caverns of Arbela, and in another as the caverns near the Lake of Gennesareth (Life, 37; War, ii, 20, 6). According to the Talmud, Arbela lay between Sepphoris and Tiberias (Lightfoot, Cherig. Cent. c. 85). These indications leave little doubt that Arbela of Galilee, with its fortified caverns, may be identified with the present Kulat iln Maan and the adjacent ruins now known as Irbil (probably a corruption of Irbil, the proper Arabic form of Arbela). The latter is the site which Pococke (ii, 58) supposed to be that of Bethsaida, and where he found columns and the ruins of a large church, with a sculptured doorway of white marble. The best description of the neighboring caves is that of Burckhardt (p. 231), who calculates that they might afford refuge to about 600 men.—Kitto, s. v. See ARBELA.

Beth-a'ven (Heb. Beyth A'ven, בֵּית אַוֵּן, house of wickedness, i. e. wickedness, idolatry; Sept. usually Βαζών v. r. Βηζαῖν), a place on the mountains of Benjamin, east of Bethel (Josh. vii, 2, Sept. Baathā; xviii, 12), and lying between that place and Michmas (1 Sam. xiii, 5, Sept. Βαζαῖν v. r. Βαζωοῖν); also xiv, 23, Sept. τιβ. Βαζούτ). In Josh. xviii, 12, the "wilderness" (Milbar = pasture-land) of Beth-aven is mentioned. In Hosea iv, 15; v, 8; x, 5, the name is transferred, with a play on the word very characteristic of this prophet, to the neighboring Bethel—once the "house of God," but then the house of idols, of "naught." The Talmudists accordingly everywhere confound Beth-aven with Bethel (comp. Schwarz, Pol. est. p. 89), the proximity of which may have occasioned the employment of the term as a nickname, after Bethel became the seat of the worship of the golden calves. See BETHEL. The name Beth-aven, however, was properly that of a locality distinct from Bethel (Josh. vii, 2, etc.), and appears to have been applied to a village located on the rocky eminence Bury Beitin, twenty minutes south-east of Beitin (Bethel), and twenty minutes west of Tell-el-Hajar (At) (Van de Velde, Memoir. p. 294).

Beth-az'maveth (Heb. Beyth-Azma'veth, בֵּית אֶזְמַוֶּת, house of Azmaveth; Sept. Βαζαμωῖθ v. r. Βήζθ), a village of Benjamin, the inhabitants of which, to the number of forty-two, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. vii, 28). In Neh. xii, 29; Ezra ii, 24, it is called simply AZMAVETH (q. v.).

Beth-ba'al-me'ón (Heb. Beyth Ba'al Me'ón, בֵּית בְּעַל מְעֹן, house of Baal-Meon; Sept. οἶκος Βεελμῶν v. r. οἶκος Μελμῶν; Vulg. oppidum Baal-maon), a place in the possession of Reuben, on the Mishor (מִישׁוֹר) or downs (Auth. Vers. "plain") east of Jordan (Josh. xiii, 17). At the Israelites' first approach its name was Baal-meon (Num. xxxii, 28, or in its contracted form Beon, xxxii, 3), to which the Beth was possibly a Hebrew prefix. Later it would seem to have come into possession of Moab, and to be known either as Beth-meon (Jer. xlviii, 23) or Baal-meon (Ezek. xxv, 9). It is possible that the name contains a trace of the tribe or nation of Meon—the Maonites or Meunim. See MAON; MEUNIM. The name is still attached to a ruined place of considerable size a short distance to the south-west of Hesbān, and bearing the name of "the fortress of M'ion" according to Burckhardt (p. 865), or Ma'in according to Seetzen (Reisen, i, 408), which appears to give its appellation to Wady Zerka Main (b. p. 402).—Smith. See BAAL-MEON.

Beth-barah (Heb. Beyth Earah, בֵּית בְּרָחָה, prob. for בֵּית בְּרָחָה, Beth-Abarah, i. e. house of crossing, q. d. ford; Sept. Βηζβραῖα v. r. Βαζβραῖα), a place named in Judg. vii, 24 as a point apparently south of the scene of Gideon's victory (which took place at about Bethshean), and to which spot "the waters" (מַיִם) were "taken" by the Ephraimites against Midian, i. e. the latter were intercepted from crossing the Jordan. Others have thought that these "waters" were the wadis which descend from the highlands of Ephraim, presuming that they were different from the Jordan, to which river no word but its own distinct name is supposed to be applied. But there can hardly have been any other stream of sufficient magnitude in this vicinity to have needed guarding, or have been capable of it, or, indeed, to which the name "fording-place" could be at all applicable. Beth-barah seems to have been the locality still existing by that name in the time of Origen, which he assigned as the scene of John's baptism (John ii, 28), since, as being a crossing rather than a town, the word would be equally applicable to both sides of the river. See BETHABARA. The pursuit of the Midianites may readily have reached about as far south as the modern upper or Latin pilgrims' landing-place on the Jordan. The fugitives could certainly not have been arrested any where so easily and effectually as at a ford; and such a spot in the river was also the only suitable place for John's operations; for, although on the east side, it was yet accessible to Judea and Jerusalem, and all the "region round about," i. e. the oasis of the South Jordan at Jericho. See BETHANY. If the derivation of the name given above be correct, Beth-barah was probably the chief ford of the district, and may therefore have been that by which Jacob crossed on his return from Mesopotamia, near the Jabbok, below Succoth (Gen. xxxii, 22; xxxiii, 17), and at which Jephthah slew the Ephraimites as they attempted to pass over from Gilead (Judg. xii, 6). This can hardly have been any other than that now extent opposite Kurn Sartabeh, being indeed the lowest easy crossing-place. The water is here only knee-deep, while remains of an ancient bridge and of a Roman road, with other ruins, attest that this was formerly a great thoroughfare and place of transit (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 124). See FORD.

Beth'basi (Βηθβασί), a town which, from the mention of its decays (τὰ καθρημύερα), must have been originally fortified, lying in the desert (τῆ ἔρημῳ), and in which Jonathan and Simon Maccabæus took refuge from Bacchides (1 Macc. ix, 62, 61). Josephus (Ant. xiii, 1, 5) has Bethbasi, Βηθβασιγῆ (Beth-bogla), but a reading of the passage quoted by Rehdak (Palest. p. 622) presents the more probable form of Beth-keziz. Either alternative fixes the situation as in the Jordan valley not far from Jericho.—Smith. See KEZIZ.

Beth-bir'eî (Heb. Beṯḥ Bîrî, בֵּית בִּירַי, house of my creation or eastern; Sept. οἶκος Βασίρῃ v. r. οἶκος Βασίρῃσιν [by inclusion of the next name], Vulg. Beth'berai), a town in the extreme south of Simeon, inhabited by the descendants of Shimeî (1 Chr. iv, 31); by comparison with the parallel list in Josh. xiv, 6, it appears to have had also the name of BETH-LEGAOTH (q. v.), or LEGAOTH simply (Josh. xv, 32).—Smith.

Beth'car (Heb. Beṯḥ Car, בֵּית כָּר, sheep-house, i. e. pasture; Sept. Βαζυρίῳ v. r. Βαζυρίῳ), a place named as the point to which the Israelites pursued the Philistines from Mizpeh on a memorable occasion (1 Sam. vii, 11), and therefore west of Mizpeh; apparently a Philistine guard-house or garrison. From the unusual expression "under (בְּתַחַת) Beth-car," it would seem that the place itself was on a height, with the road at its foot. Josephus (Ant. vi, 2, 2) has "as far as Corbæ" (ἀεὶ ἀνὰ Κορβαίον), and goes on to say (in accordance with the above text) that the stone Ebenezer was set up at this place to mark it as the spot to which the victory had extended. See EBEN-EZER; CORBÆ. Schwarz's attempted identification (Palest. p. 136) is not sustained by accurate maps.—Smith, s. v.

Beth-da'gon (Heb. Beṯḥ Dagon, בֵּית דָּגוֹן, house [i. e. temple] of Dagon), the name of at least two cities, one or the other of which may be the place called by this name in the Apocrypha (Βηθδαγον, 1 Macc. x, 65; comp. Josephus, Ant. xiii, 4, 4), unless this be simply Dagon's temple at Ashdod (1 Sam. v, 2; 1 Chron. x, 10). The corresponding modern name Beit-Dejan is of frequent occurrence in Palestine; in addition to those noticed below, one was found by Robinson (Researches, iii, 102) east of Nablous. There can be no doubt that in the occurrence of these names we have indications of the worship of the Philistine god having spread far beyond the Philistine territory. Possibly these are the sites of towns founded at the time when this warlike people had overrun the face of the country to "Michmash, eastward of Bethaven" on the south, and Gilboa on the north—that is, to the very edge of the heights which overlook the Jordan valley—driving "the Hebrews over Jordan into the land of Gad and Gilead" (1 Sam. xiii, 5, 7; comp. 17, 18; xxix, 1; xxxi, 1). See DAGON (MOSES), q. v.

2. (Sept. Βηθδαγον v. r. Βαυαίῳ.) A city in the low country (Shefelah) of Judah (Josh. xv, 41), where it is named between Gederoth and Naamah, and therefore not far from the Philistine territory, with which its name implies a connection. From the absence of the copulative conjunction before this name, it has been suggested that it should be taken with the preceding, "Gederoth-Bethdagon;" in that case, probably, distinguishing Gederoth from the two places of similar name in the neighborhood. But this would leave the enumeration "sixteen cities" in ver. 41 deficient; and the conjunction is similarly omitted frequently in the same list (e. g. between ver. 38 and 39, etc.). The indications of site and name correspond quite well to those of Beit-Dejan, marked on Van de Velde's Map 5½ miles S. E. of Ashkelon.

2. (Sept. Βηθδαγον v. r. Βαζευρηεῖζ.) A city near the S. E. border of the tribe of Asher, between the mouth of the Shihor-libnath and Zebulon (Josh. xiv, 27); a position which agrees with that of the modern ruined village Hajjîl, marked on Van de Velde's Map about 3½ miles S. E. of Athlit. See TRIBE. The name and the proximity to the coast point to its being a Philistine colony. Schwarz's attempt at a location (Palest. p. 132) is utterly destitute of foundation.

3. Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Βηδαγον, Bethdagon) speak of a "large village" by this name (Βαυαίγον, Copharadago) as extant in their day between Diospolis (Lydda) and Jamnia; without doubt the present Beit-Dejan (Robinson, Researches, iii, 30; Tobler, Topog. ii, 405; yet Schwarz says [Palest. p. 104], "not a vestige can be found!").

Beth-diblatha'im (Heb. Beṯḥ Diblathai'im, בֵּית דִּבְלַתַּיִם, house of Diblathaim; Sept. οἶκος Δεβλαθαῖμ [v. r. Δαββλαθαῖμ]), a city of Moab upon which the prophet denounces destruction (Jer. xlviii, 22). It is called ALMON-DIBLATHAIM in Num. xxxiii, 46. It is different from the Diblath of Ezek. vi, 14. See DIBLATHAIM; RIBLAI.

Beth-e'den (Heb. Beṯḥ E'den, בֵּית עֵדֶן, house of pleasantness; Sept. confusedly translates ἀντίοξ Ναβιδών; Vulg. domus roburatis), apparently a city of Syria, situated on Mount Lebanon, the seat of a native king, threatened with destruction by the prophet (Amos i, 5, where the Auth. Vers. renders it "house of Eden"); probably the name of a country residence of the kings of Damascus. Michaelis (Suppl. ad L. g. Hebr. s. v.), following Laroque's description, and misled by an apparent resemblance in name, identified it with Elden, about a day's journey from Baalbek, on the eastern slope of the Libanus, and near the old cedars of Bshirrai. Baur (Amos, p. 224), in accordance with the Mohammedan tradition that one of the four terrestrial paradises was in the valley between the ranges of the Libanus and Anti-Libanus, is inclined to favor the same hypothesis. But Grotius, with greater appearance of probability, pointed to the Paradise (Παράδεισος, park) of Ptolemy (v, 15) as the locality of Eden. The village Jüsich el-Kalimeh, a site with extensive ruins, about 1½ hour S. E. of Riblah, near the Orontes, but now a paradise no longer, is supposed by Dr. Robinson (Later Researches, p. 556) to mark the site of the ancient Paradise; and his suggestion is approved by Mr. Porter (Itin. p. 57), but doubted by Ritter (Ersk. xvii, 997-999). Again, it has been conjectured that Beth-Eden is no other than Beit-Jann, "the house of Paradise," not far to the south-west of Damascus, on the eastern slope of the Hermon, and a short distance from Medjel. It stands on a branch of the ancient Parfar, near its source (Rosenmüller, Bibl. Alt. ii, 291; Hitzig, Amos, in loc.; Porter, Damascus, i, 311).

Beth-e'ked (Heb. Beṯḥ E'ked, בֵּית עֵקֶד, house of the binding, sc. of sheep; Sept. Βαζακῆζ; Vulg. camara; Targum שְׂרָרָה, place of shepherds' gathering), the name of a place near Samaria, being the "shearing-house" at the pit or well (בֵּית) of which the forty-two brethren of Ahaziah were slain by Jehu (2 Kings x, 12, 14, in the former of which occurrences it is fully BETH-E'KED-HARO'IM, having the addition בְּרֵי הַרְוִים, bet-Roim', of the shepherds, Sept. τῶν ποιότων, for which no equivalent appears in the Auth. Vers.). It lay between Jezred and Samaria, according to Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Βαιθακάδ, Bethachad), 15 miles from the town of Legio, and in the plain of Esdraelon. It is doubtless the Beth-Kul noticed by Robinson (Researches, iii, 157) on the edge of "the great plain," east of Jenin, and located on Van de Velde's Map along the south face of Mt. Gilboa, 5½ miles west of Beisan, at the exact distance (in Roman miles) from Lejjun indicated in the Onomasticon.

Beth'-el (Heb. Beṯṯ-El', בֵּית־אֱלֹהִים, house of God [see below]; Sept. usually Βαιθακάδ; Josephus [ῥα] Βιθθακά, or [ῥ] Βιθθακά), the name of one or two towns.

1. A city of central Palestine, memorable as a holy site from early times. Many have inferred (from Judg. i, 23, 26; Josh. xviii, 13) that it was the same place originally called Luz (q. v.), but from other passages it appears that they were different, although contiguous (see below). Of the origin of the name Bethel there are two accounts extant: 1. It was bestowed on the spot by Jacob under the awe inspired by the nocturnal vision of God when on his journey from his father's house at Beersheba to seek his wife in Haran (Gen. xxviii, 19). He took the stone which had served for his pillow and put (בֵּית־אֱלֹהִים) it for a pillar, and anointed it with oil; and he "called the name of that place (בֵּית־אֱלֹהִים) Bethel; but the name of 'the city' (בֵּית־אֱלֹהִים) was called Luz at the first." The expression in the last paragraph of this account is curious, and indicates a distinction between the early Canaanite "city" Luz and the "place," as yet a mere undistinguished spot, marked only by the "stone" or the heap (Joseph. τῶν εἰδῶν ἀμφοροποιήσας) erected by Jacob to commemorate his vision. 2. But, according to the other account, Bethel received its name on the occasion of a blessing bestowed by God upon Jacob after his return from Padan-aram, at which time also (according to this narrative) the name of Israel was given him. Here again Jacob erects (בֵּית־אֱלֹהִים) a "pillar of stone," which, as before, he anoints with oil (Gen. xxxv, 14, 15). The key of this story would seem to be the fact of God's "speaking" with Jacob, "God went up from him in the place where He 'spoke' with him"—"Jacob set up a pillar in the place where He 'spoke' with him," and "called the name of the place where God spoke with him Bethel." Although these two narratives evidently represent distinct events, yet, as would appear to be the case in other instances in the lives of the patriarchs, the latter is but a renewal of the original transaction. It is perhaps worth notice that the prophet Hosea, in the only reference which the Hebrew Scriptures contain to this occurrence, had evidently the second of the two narratives before him, since in a summary of the life of Jacob he introduces it in the order in which it occurs in Genesis, laying full and characteristic stress on the key-word of the story: "He had power over the angel and prevailed; he wept and made supplication unto him; He found him in Bethel, and there He spoke with us, even Jehovah, God of hosts" (Hos. xii, 4, 5). Both these accounts agree in omitting any mention of town or buildings at Bethel at that early period, and in drawing a marked distinction between the "city" of Luz and the consecrated "place" in its neighborhood (comp. Gen. xxxv, 7). Even in the ancient chronicles of the conquest the two are still distinguished (Josh. xvi, 1, 2); and the appropriation of the name of Bethel to the city appears not to have been made till yet later, when it was taken by the tribe of Ephraim, after which the name of Luz occurs no more (Judg. i, 22-26). If this view be correct, there is a strict parallel between Bethel and Moriah, which (according to the tradition commonly followed) received its consecration when Abraham offered up Isaac, but did not become the site of an actual sanctuary till the erection of the Temple there by Solomon. See MORIAH. The actual stone of Bethel itself is the subject of a Jewish tradition, according to which it was removed to the second Temple, and served as the pedestal for the ark, where it survived the destruction of the Temple by the Romans, and was reported to by the Jews in their lamentations (Reland, Palest. p. 638).

At a still earlier date, according to Gen. xii, 8, the name of Bethel would appear to have existed at this spot even before the arrival of Abram in Canaan: he removed from the oaks of Morah to "'the' mountain on the east of Bethel," with "Bethel on the west and Hai on the east." Here he built an altar; and hither he returned from Egypt with Lot before their separation (xiii, 3, 4). In these passages, however, the name seems to be used prophetically, with reference to the history of Jacob. After his prosperous return, Bethel became a favorite station with Jacob; here he built an altar, buried Deborah, received the name of Israel (for the second time), and promises of blessing; and here also he accomplished the vow which he had made on his going forth (Gen. xxxv, 1-15; comp. xxxii, 28, and xxviii, 20-22). Although not a town in those early times, at the conquest of the land Bethel (unless this be a different place [see below]) is mentioned as a royal city of the Canaanites (Josh. xii, 16). It became a boundary town of Benjamin toward Ephraim (Josh. xviii, 22), and was actually conquered by the latter tribe from the Canaanites (Judg. i, 22-26). In the troubled times when there was no king in Israel, it was to Bethel that the people went up in their distress to ask counsel of God (Judg. xx, 18, 31; xxi, 2; in the A. V. the name is translated "house of God"). At this place, already consecrated in the time of the patriarchs, the ark of the covenant was, apparently for a long while, deposited [see ARK], and probably the tabernacle also (Judg. xx, 26; comp. 1 Sam. x, 3), under the charge of Phinehas, the grand-son of Aaron, with an altar and proper appliances for the offering of burnt-offerings and peace-offerings (xxi, 4); and the unwonted mention of a regular road or causeway as existing between it and the great town of Shechem is doubtless an indication that it was already in much repute. It was also one of the places at which Samuel held in rotation his court of justice (1 Sam. vii, 16). After the separation of the kingdoms Bethel was included in that of Israel, which seems to show that although originally, in the formal distribution, assigned to Benjamin, it had been actually possessed by Ephraim in right of conquest from the Canaanites, a fact that may have been held by that somewhat unscrupulous tribe as determining their right of possession to a place of importance close on their own frontier. Jeroboam made it the southern seat (Dan being the northern) of the worship of the golden calves; and it seems to have been the chief seat of that worship (1 Kings xii, 28-33; xiii, 1). The choice of Bethel was probably determined by the consideration that the spot was already sacred in the estimation of the Israelites, not only from patriarchal consecration, but from the more recent presence of the ark; which might seem to point it out as a proper seat for an establishment designed to rival that of Jerusalem. This appropriation, however, completely desecrated Bethel in the estimation of the orthodox Jews; and the prophets name it with abhorrence and contempt—even applying to it, by a sort of jeu de mot, the name of BETH-AVEN (house of idols) instead of Beth-el (house of God) (Amos v, 5; Hos. iv, 15; v, 8; x, 5, 8). The town was taken from Jeroboam by Abijah, king of Judah (2 Chron. xiii, 19); but it again reverted to Israel (2 Kings x, 28), being probably recovered by Basha (2 Chron. xvi, 1). It then remains unmentioned for a long period. The worship of Baal, introduced by the Phœnician queen of Ahab (1 Kings xvi, 31), had probably alienated public favor from the simple erections of Jeroboam to more gorgeous shrines (2 Kings x, 21, 22). Samaria had been built (1 Kings xvi, 24), and Jezebel, and these things must have all tended to draw public notice to the more northern part of the kingdom. It was during this period that Elijah visited Bethel, and that we hear of "sons of the prophets" as resident there (2 Kings ii, 2, 3), two facts apparently incompatible with the active existence of the calf-worship. The mention of the bears so close to the town (iii, 23, 25) looks, too, as if the neighborhood were not much frequented at that time. But after his destruction of the Baal worship throughout the country, Jehu appears to have returned to the simpler and more national religion of the calves, and Bethel comes once more into view (2 Kings x, 29). Under the descendants of this king the place and the worship must have greatly flourished, for by the time of Jeroboam II, the great-grandson of Jehu, the rude village was a town a royal residence with a "king's house" (Amos vii, 13); there were palaces both for "winter" and "summer," "great houses" and "houses of ivory" (iii, 15), and a very high degree of luxury in dress, furniture, and living (vi, 4-6). The one original altar was now accompanied by several others (iii, 14; ii, 8); and the simple "incense" of its founder had developed into the "burnt-offerings" and "meat-offerings" of "solemn assemblies," with the fragrant "peace-offerings" of "fat beasts" (v, 21, 22).

Bethel was the scene of the paradoxical tragedy of the prophet from Judah, who denounced the divine vengeance against Jeroboam's altar, and was afterward slain by a lion for disobeying the Lord's injunctions, being seduced by the false representations of another prophet residing there, by whom his remains were interred, and thus both were eventually preserved from profanation (1 Kings xiii; 2 Kings xxiii, 16-18). Josephus gives the name of the prophet from Judah as Judon, and adds an extended account of the character of the old Bethelite prophet (Ant. viii, 9), which he paints in the darkest hues (see Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr.; Patrick's and Clarke's Comment., in loc.). The lion probably issued from the grove adjoining Bethel (comp. 2 Kings ii, 23, 24). (See Keil, Com. on Josh. p. 180-182; Stöberitz, De propheta a leone necato, Hal. 1733).

After the desolation of the northern kingdom by the King of Assyria, Bethel still remained an abode of priests, who taught the wretched colonists "how to fear Jehovah," "the God of the land" (2 Kings xvii, 28, 29). The buildings remained till all traces of this illegal worship were extirpated by Josiah, king of Judah, who thus fulfilled a prophecy made to Jeroboam 350 years before (2 Kings xiii, 1, 2; xxiii, 15-18). The place was still in existence after the captivity, and was in the possession of the Benjamites (Ezra ii, 28; Neh. vii, 32), who returned to their native place while continuing their relations with Nehemiah and the restored worship (Neh. xi, 31). In the time of the Maccabees Bethel was fortified by Bacchides for the King of Syria (Joseph. Antiq. xiii, 1, 1c). It is not named in the New Testament, but it still existed and was taken by Vespasian (Josephus, War. iv, 9, 9). Bethel is mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome in the Onomasticon (s. v. Baṣṣūq), Bethel as 12 miles from Jerusalem, on the right hand of the road to Shechem.

Bethel and its name were believed to have perished until within these few years; yet it has been ascertained by the Protestant missionaries at Jerusalem that the name and a knowledge of the site still existed among the people of the land. The name was indeed preserved in the form of Beitā—the Arabic termination for the Hebrew el being not an unusual change. Its identity with Bethel had been recognised by the Oriental Christian priests, who endeavored to bring into use the Arabic form Beitā, as being nearer to the original; but it had not found currency beyond the circle of their influence. The situation of Beitā corresponds very exactly with the intimations afforded by Eusebius and others, the distance from Jerusalem being 3½ hours. The ruins cover a space of "three or four acres," and consist of "very many foundations and half-standing walls of houses and other buildings."

"They lie upon the front of a low hill, between the heads of two hollow wadis, which unite and run off into the main valley es-Suweinit" (Robinson, Researches, ii, 125, 126). Dr. Clarke, and other travellers since his visit, have remarked on the "stony" nature of the soil at Bethel as perfectly in keeping with the narrative of Jacob's slumber there. When on the spot little doubt can be felt as to the localities of this interesting place. The round mount S.E. of Bethel must be the "mountain" on which Abram built the altar, and on which he and Lot stood when they made their division of the land (Gen. xii, 7; xiii, 10). It is still thickly strewn to its top with stones formed by nature for the building of an "altar" or sanctuary. (See Stanley, Sinai and Palest. p. 217-223). The spot is shut in by high-er land on every side. The ruins are more considerable than those of a "large village," as the place was in the time of Jerome; and it is therefore likely that, although unnoticed in history, it afterward revived and was enlarged. The ruined churches upon the site and beyond the valley evince that it was a place of importance even down to the Middle Ages. Besides these, there yet remain numerous foundations and half-standing walls of houses and other buildings: on the highest part are the ruins of a square tower, and in the western valley are the remains of one of the largest reservoirs in the country, being 314 feet in length by 217 in breadth. The bottom is now a green grass-plot, having in it two living springs of good water. (See Hackett's Illustra. of Script. p. 171-178).

Professor Robinson (Biblioth. Sac. 1843, p. 456 sq.) thinks that Bethel may be identical with the Bether, not far from Jerusalem, where the revolt under Barcocheba (q. v.), in the time of Adrian, was finally extinguished (Euseb. Hist. Ecc. iv, 6); the Betaron, which lay 18 Roman miles from Cæsarea toward Lydda (Itin. Ant. p. 150), and differently named and located by other ancient notices. This place, he shows, is once called Bethel (Jerome, Comment. in Zach. iii, 13); and Bethel is once called Bethar (Bourdeaux Pilgrim, Itin. Hieros. p. 588). See BETHIER.

2. A town in the south part of Judah (1 Sam. xxx, 27, where the collocation of the name is decisive against its being the well-known Bethel; many copies of the Sept. read Baṣṣarōlo, i. e. Bethzur). Perhaps the same city is denoted in Josh. xii, 16; but comp. ch. viii, 17. By comparison of the lists of the towns of Judah and Simeon (Josh. xv, 30; xix, 4; 1 Chron. v, 29, 30), the place appears to have borne also the names of CHESIL, BETHUL (q. v.), and BETHUEL.

Beth'elite (Heb. Beṯṯhā-El', בֵּית־אֵל; Sept. ὁ Βαῦθηλιτης), a designation of Hiel, who rebuilt Jericho, and experienced the curse pronounced long before (1 Kings xvi, 34); doubtless a native of Bethel in Benjamin.

Beth-o'mel (Heb. Beṯṯhā-El', בֵּית־אֵל, house of the valley; Sept. Βαζαῖμικ v. r. Βαζῆμ), a city of the tribe of Asher, apparently near its S.E. border (Josh. xix, 27). Dr. Robinson found a village called Amkakh about eight miles N.E. of Akka (Bib. Beth. Sacra, 1853, p. 121), which is probably the place in question, although he suggests that the above text seems to require a position south of the "valley of Jiphthah-el" or Jofat (Later Bib. Researches, p. 103, 108). The identification proposed by Schwarz (Palest. p. 192) with the modern Amiaka (according to him also noticed in the Talmud, 12 miles N.N.W. of Safed, is altogether out of the region indicated.

Bether (Heb. id. בֵּתֵר), the name of certain "mountains" mentioned only in Cant. ii, 17. The word means, properly, disssection (as in Gen. v, 19; Jer. xxxiv, 18, 19, "piece"); the mountains of Bether may therefore be mountains of disjunction, of separation, that is, mountains cut up, divided by ravines, etc. The Sept. gives ὄρη κοιλομάτων, mountains of hollows, in this sense. They may be the same with those rendered "mountains of spices" in viii, 14, from the growth of trees from which odorous gums distilled. See BIRRON.

If it be the name of a place, it may possibly be identical with the Bether where the impostor Barcocheba (q. v.) was at last overcome by Hadrian (see the Zemach David, cited by Eisenmenger, Eutheck. Judenth., ii, 656), a strongly fortified city (see Buxtorf, Lex. Talm., col. 371, where the Heb. form is given בֵּתְרָא, Bithra, Chald. בֵּתְרָא, Bithra; the correct pointing being perhaps בֵּתְרָא, i. e. Baethar, for בֵּתְרָא, Beth-Tar, Lat. Bether, Biter, etc.), not far from Jerusalem (Br² 399a, Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., iv, 6). For the history of the campaign at this place, see Münter, Jud. Krieg., § 20, translated under the title "Jewish War under Adrian," in the Bibliotheca Sacra, 1843, p. 393 sq.; and for notices of the place, see the editor's remarks appended to the translation, p. 456 sq. The locality is thought by Dr. Robinson (Liter. Bib. Researches, p. 263-271) to be identical with that of the Benjamite Bethel (q. v.), the modern Beitin; but Williams (Holy City, ii, 210) and Stewart (Tent and Khan, p. 347), apparently with better reason, fix it in the present village Bittir, two hours W.S.W. of Jerusalem (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 295). This latter position also seems to agree with that of a Bether (בֵּתְרָא, i. e. Baethar, v. r. Bethir) mentioned by the Sept. in Josh. xv, 50, among the names of an additional group of eleven towns near Bethlehem, in the tribe of Judah (q. v.), thought by some to have accidentally dropped from the Heb. text (see Keil, Comment., in loc.).

Evidently different from this place was a Bether (with the same orthography) mentioned in the Talmud as lying four Roman miles from the sea (see Reland, Palest., p. 639), the Betarum (of the Itin. Anton. and Hieros.) on the way from Caesarea to Antipatris; now probably the village of Barin, about $\frac{1}{2}$ hour south of Kakuu (Schwarz, Palest., p. 144; Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 295).

Bethes'da (Βηθεσδα, for Chald. בֵּתְרָא, house of the mercy, q. d. charity-hospital; or, according to others, for Chald. בֵּתְרָא, place of the flowing, sc. of water), the name of a reservoir or tank (κολλησίθηθα, i. e. swimming-pool), with five "porches" (στωάε), close upon the sheep-gate or "market" (ἄγιον τῆς βοοβατακῆς—it will be observed that the word "market" is supplied) in Jerusalem (John v, 2). The porches—i. e. cloisters or colonnades—were extensive enough to accommodate a large number of sick and infirm people, whose custom it was to wait there for the "troubling of the water." One of these invalids is recorded to have been cured by Christ in the above passage, where also we are told that an angel went down at a certain season into the pool and troubled the water, and then whoever first stepped in was made whole. There seems to have been no special medicinal virtue in the water itself, and only he who first stepped in after the troubling was healed. It may be remarked that the evangelist, in giving the account of the descent of the angel into the pool and the effects following, does not seem to do any more than state the popular legend as he found it, without vouching for its truth, except so far as it explained the invalid's presence there.

Eusebius and Jerome—though unfortunately they give no clew to the situation of Bethesda—describe it in the Onomasticon (s. v. Βηθεσδα, Bethesda) as existing in their time as two pools, the one supplied by the periodical rains, while the water of the other was of a reddish color, due, as the tradition then ran, to the fact that the flesh of the sacrifices was anciently washed there before offering, on which account the pool was also called "the Sheep-pool" (Peculiaris, Ποοβατακῆς). See, however, the comments of Lightfoot on this view, in his Exercit. on St. John, v, 2. Eusebius's statement is partly confirmed by the Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333), who mentions in his Itinerary "twin fish-pools, having five porches, which are called Bethesda" (quoted in Barclay, p. 299). The large reservoir called by the Mohammedans Birket Israel, within the walls of the city, close by the St. Stephen's gate, and under the north-east wall of the Haram area, is generally considered to be the modern representative of Bethesda. This tradition reaches back certainly to the time of Saewulf, A.D. 1102, who mentions it under the name of Bethesda (Early Trav., p. 41). It is also named in the Citez de Jerusalem, A.D. 1187 (sect. vii), and in more modern times by Maundrell and all the late travellers. The pool measures 360 feet in length, 130 feet in breadth, and 75 in depth to the bottom, besides the rubbish which has accumulated in it for ages. Although it has been dry for above two centuries, it was once evidently used as a reservoir, for the sides internally have been cased over with small stones, and these again covered with plaster; but the workmanship of these additions is coarse, and bears no special marks of antiquity. The west end is built up like the rest, except at the south-west corner, where two lofty arched vaults extended westward, side by side, under the houses that now cover this part. Dr. Robinson was able to trace the continuation of the work in this direction under one of these vaults for 100 feet, and it seemed to extend much farther. This gives the whole a length of 460 feet, equal to one half of the whole extent of the sacred enclosure under which it lies. Mr. Wolcott, writing since, says, "The southern vault extends 130 feet, and the other apparently the same. At the extremity of the former was an opening for drawing up water. The vaults are stuccoed" (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1843, p. 33). It would seem as if the deep reservoir formerly extended farther westward in this part, and that these vaults were built up in and over it in order to support the structures above. Dr. Robinson considers it probable that this excavation was anciently carried quite through the ridge of Bethza, along the northern side of Antonia to its N.W. corner, thus forming the deep trench which separated the fortress from the adjacent hill (Ib. Researches, i, 433, 434). The title that can be said on the subject, however, goes nearly as much to confirm as to invalidate the traditional identification. (1) On the one hand, the most probable position of the sheep-gate is at the east part of the city. See SHEEP-GATE. On the other hand, the Birkat Israel exhibits none of the marks which appear to have distinguished the water of Bethesda in the records of the Evangelist and of Eusebius; it certainly is neither pentagonal nor double. (2) The construction of the Lirkh is such as to show that it was originally a water-reservoir, and not the moat of a fortress. See JERUSALEM. (3) There is certainly a remarkable coincidence between the name as given by Eusebius, Bezetha, and that of the north-east suburb of the city at the time of the Gospel history—Bezetha (q. v.). (4) There is the difficulty that if the Birkat Israel be not Bethesda, which of the ancient "pools" does it represent? On the whole, however, the most probable identification of the ancient Bethesda is that of Dr. Robinson (i, 508), who suggests the "fountain of the Virgin," in the valley of the Kedron, a short distance above the Pool of Siloam. In favor of this are its situation, supposing the sheep-gate to be at the south-east of the city, as Lightfoot, Robinson, and others suppose, and the strange intermittent "troubling of the water" caused by the periodical ebbing and flowing of the supply. Against it are the confined size of the pool, and the difficulty of finding room for the five stæ. (See Barclay's detailed account, City of the Great King, p. 516-524, and 325, 6.) See JERUSALEM.

Traditionary "Pool of Bethesda."

Franc.* i, vi, p. 82 sq.), Olearius (Lips. 1706), Ziebjeh (Gert. 1768), Schelvigz (Gedan. 1681, 1701); also general treatises, De piscina Bethesda, by Arnold (Jen. 1661), Frischmuth (Jen. 1661), Hottinger (Tigur. 1705), Sommelius (Lund. 1767), Wendeler (Viteb. 1676). The place has been described more or less fully by nearly every traveller in Jerusalem. (See especially De Sanley, Dead Sea, ii, 244 sq.)

Beth-e'zel (Heb. Beth ha-E'zel, בֵּית הָעֶזֶל, house of the firm root, i. e. fixed dwelling; Sept. translates οἶκος ἐξυμνηστικὸν ἀδελφῶν, "neighboring house," as in our margin), a town in Judæa, mentioned Mic. i, 11, where there is an allusion to the above etymology. Ephraim Syria understands a place near Samaria; but the context seems to locate it in the Philistine plain, perhaps at the modern Beth-lyfa (Robinson, Researches, ii, 369, note), 5½ miles S.E. of Ashdod (Van de Velde's Map).

Beth-ga'der (Heb. Beth-Gader, בֵּית גַּדְרָה, house of the wall; Sept. Βαθρυγάδων v. Βαθρυγάδων), a place in the tribe of Judah, of which Hareph is named as "father" or founder (1 Chron. ii, 51); apparently the same with the GADER (q. v.) of Josh. xii, 13, and probably identical also with the GADOUR (q. v.) of Josh. xix, 58, as it seems (from the associated names) to have been in the mountains.

Beth-ga'mul (Heb. Beyth Gamul, בֵּית גַּמּוּל, house of the weaned, or possibly camel-house; Sept. οἶκος Γαμῶλ v. Γαμῶλα), a city, apparently in the "plain country" of Moab, denounced by the prophet (Jer. xlviii, 23). Dr. Smith suggests (Biblical Researches, iii, Append. p. 153) that it is the modern Um-Jemal, a ruined site on the road (south according to Burckhardt, p. 106) from Busrah to Dera (his Edrei); which is probably correct, although it is difficult to believe that Moab ever extended so far north. See BOZRAN.

Beth-gan. See BETH-HAGGAN.

Beth-gil'gal (Heb. Beyth hay-Gilgal, בֵּית הַגִּלְגַּל, house of the Gilgal; Sept. omits, but some copies have Βαθρυγάλα v. Βηθρυγαλάλα), a place from which the inhabitants gathered to Jerusalem for the purpose of celebrating the rebuilding of the walls on the return from Babylon (Neh. xii, 29, where the name is translated "house of Gilgal"); doubtless the same elsewhere called simply GILGAL (q. v.), probably that near Bethel (2 Kings ii, 2).

Beth-hac'cerem (Heb. Beyth hak-Ke'cerem, בֵּית הַכְּעֶרֶם, house of the vineyard; Sept. Βηθαικαριμ [v. r. Βηθαιγαριμ, Βηθαιγαβουριμ] and Βαθαικαριμ [v. r. Βηθαιγαριμ, Βηθαιγαριμ]), a place in the tribe of Judah, not far from Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 14), where the children of Benjamin were to set up a beacon when they blew the trumpet of warning at Tekoa against the invading army of Babylonians (Jer. vi, 1). From the notice in Nehemiah, it appears that the town, like a few other places, was distinguished by the application to it of the word pelek (פֶּלֶק, Auth. Ver. "part"), and that it had then a "ruler" (שׂר). According to Jerome (Comment. in loc. Jer.), there was a village called Bethacharum, situated on a mountain between Jerusalem and Tekoa. The name also occurs in the Talmud (Nidda ii, 7; Middoth, iii, 4) as belonging to a valley containing a quarry. Hence Pococke (East, ii, 42) suggests that this was the fortress Herodium (Ἡρώδιον or Ἡρώδιστος), founded by Herod the Great (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 2, 1; War. i, 13, 8; 21, 10), and where he died (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 8, 3), being 200 stadia from Jericho (Josephus, War. i, 13, 8; conp. iii, 3, 5), and identical with the modern "Frank Mountain," or Jebel Fawâris (Wolcott, in the Bibliotheca Sacra, 1843, p. 69, 70); but this is denied by Robinson (Researches, ii, 174), although affirmed by Wilson (Lands of Libe, i, 196), Donar (Mission to Jews, p. 247), Stanley (Sinai and Palest. p. 163, 164), and Van de Velde (Narrative, ii, 39). See HERODIUM.

Beth-hacerem (i. e. Beth-Kerem) appears also to be identical with CAREM (q. v.), one of the towns added in the Sept. to the Hebrew text of Josh. xv, 59, as in the mountains of Judah, in the district of Bethlehem.

Beth'haggan (Heb. Beyth-hag-Gan, בֵּית הַגַּן, house of the garden; Sept. Βαθρυγάρ; Auth. Vers. "the garden-house," 2 Kings ix, 27), one of the spots which marked the flight of Ahaziah from Jehu. It is doubtless the same place as EN-GANNIM (q. v.) of Issachar (Josh. xix, 21), "spring of gardens," the modern Jenin, on the direct road from Samaria northward, and overlooking the great plain (Stanley, Palest. p. 213, note).

Beth-hanan. See ELON-BETH-HANAN.

Beth-ha'ran (Heb. Beyth Haran, בֵּית הָרָאן, a variation of Beth-Haram; Sept. ἡ Βαθρυγάρ), one of the "fenced cities" on the east of Jordan, "built" by the Gadites (Num. xxxii, 36). It is named with Beth-nirrah, and therefore is no doubt the same place as BETH-ARAM (q. v.), accurately Beth-haram (Josh. xii, 27). The name is not found in the lists of the towns of Moab in Isaiah (xv, xvi), Jeremiah (xlviii), and Ezekiel (xxv, 9).

Beth-hog'la (Josh. xv, 6) or Beth-hog'lah (Heb. Beyth Choglah, בֵּית הַחֹגְלָה, partridge-house; though Jerome [Onomast. s. v. Area-atad, where he states that Betagna was three miles from Jericho and two from the Jordan] gives another interpretation, locus ggrī, reading the name בֵּית הַחֹרֶן, and connecting it with the funeral races or dances at the mourning for Jacob [see ATAD]; Sept. Βηθᾶγαλά v. r. Bathay-lámu, Bethyáwó, Bathayáya, a place on the border of Judah (Josh. xv, 6) and of Benjamin (xviii, 19), to which latter tribe it was reckoned as belonging (xviii, 21). Eusebius and Jerome speak (Onomast. s. v. Βηθᾶγαλά, Bethagla) of two villages of this name, but they assign them both to the vicinity of Gaza. Josephus (Ant. xiii, 1, 5) reads Bethag'u (Βηθᾶγαλά, doubtless for Βηθᾶγαλά) instead of the BETHEAST (q. v.) of 1 Macc. ix, 62. Dr. Robinson found a ruined site, doubtless the same, called by the Arabs Kusr-Hajla, twenty minutes S.W. by W. of a fine spring in this region called by the same name (Ain-Hajla), although he saw no ruins at the spring itself (Researches, ii, 268). It was also visited by M. de Sauney, who states that he picked up large cubes of primitive mosaic at the place, indicating, in his opinion, the existence of a Biblical city in the neighborhood (Narrative, ii, 35); comp. Wilson, Lands of Bible, ii, 15; Schwarz, Pal. p. 94.

Beth-ho'ron (Heb. Beyth Chorom', בֵּית הַחֹרֶן or בֵּית הַחֹרֶן, once [1 Kings ix, 17] בֵּית הַחֹרֶן, in Chron. fully בֵּית הַחֹרֶן, house of the hollow; Sept. Βηθῶρον or Βαθῶρον; Βαθῶρον, Βαθῶρα, and Βεθῶρον), the name of two towns or villages (2 Chron. viii, 5), an "upper" (בֵּית הַחֹרֶן) and a "nether" (בֵּית הַחֹרֶן) (Josh. xvi, 3, 5; 1 Chron. vii, 24), on the road (2 Chron. xxv, 13; Judith iv, 4) from Gibeon to Azekah (Josh. x, 10, 11) and the Philistine Plain (1 Sam. xiii, 18; 1 Macc. iii, 21). Beth-horon lay on the boundary-line between Benjamin and Ephraim (Josh. xvi, 3, 5, and xviii, 13, 14), was counted to Ephraim (Josh. xxi, 12; 1 Chron. vii, 21), and given to the Kohathites (Josh. xxi, 22; 1 Chron. vi, 68 [53]). In a remarkable fragment of early history (1 Chron. vii, 24) we are told that both the upper and lower towns were built by a woman of Ephraim, Sherah, who in the present state of the passage appears as a granddaughter of the founder of her tribe, and also as a direct progenitor of the great leader with whose history the place is so closely connected. Nether Beth-horon lay in the N.W. corner of Benjamin; and between the two places was a pass called both the ascent and descent of Beth-horon, leading from the region of Gibeon (el-Jib) down to the western plain (Josh. xviii, 13, 14; x, 10, 11; 1 Macc. iii, 16, 24). Down this pass the five Kings of the Amorites were driven by Joshua (Josh. x, 11; Eccles. xlv, 6). The upper and lower towns were both fortified by Solomon (1 Kings x, 17; 2 Chron. viii, 5). At one of them Nicanor was attacked by Judas Maccabeus; and it was afterward fortified by Bacchides (1 Macc. vii, 39 seq.; ix, 50; Josephus, Ant. xii, 10, 5; xiii, 1, 3). Cestius Gallus, the Roman proconsul of Syria, in his march from Caesarea to Jerusalem, after having burned Lydda, ascended the mountain by Beth-horon and encamped near Gibeon (Joseph. War. ii, 19, 1); and it was near this place that his army was totally cut up (Joseph. War. ii, 19, 8 and 9). In the time of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Βηθῶρον, Bethoron) the two Beth-horons were small villages, the upper Beth-horon being 12 Roman miles from Jerusalem; according to Josephus (comp. War. ii, 12, 2, with Ant. xx, 4, 4) it was 100 stadia from thence, and 50 stadia from Gibeon. From the time of Jerome (Epist. Paul. 3) the place appears to have been unnoticed till 1801, when Dr. E. D. Clarke recognised it in the present Beit-Ur (Travels, vol. i, pt. ii, p. 628); after which it appears to have remained unvisited till 1838, when the Rev. J. Paxton, and, a few days after, Dr. Robinson arrived at the place. The Lower Beit-Ur is upon the top of a low ridge, which is separated by a wady, or narrow valley, from the foot of the mountain upon which the Upper Beit-Ur stands. Both are now inhabited villages. The lower is very small, but foundations of large stones indicate an ancient site—doubtless that of the Nether Beth-horon. The Upper Beit-Ur is likewise small, but also exhibits traces of ancient walls and foundations. In the steep ascent to it the rock is in some parts cut away and the path formed into steps, indicating an ancient road. On the first offset or step of the ascent are foundations of huge stones, the remains perhaps of a castle that once guarded the pass. It is remarkable that the places are still distinguished as Beit-Ur el-Foka (the Upper), and Beit-Ur el-Tahta (the Lower), and there can be no question that they represent the Upper and Lower Beth-horon. "In the name," remarks Dr. Robinson (iii, 59), "we find the rather unusual change from one harsh Hebrew guttural to one still deeper and more tenacious in Arabic; in all other respects the name, position, and other circumstances agree" (compare Schwarz, Pal. p. 140, 146). See GIBEON.

The importance of the road on which the two Beth-horons are situated, the main approach to the interior of the country from the hostile districts on both sides of Palestine—Philistia and Egypt on the west, Moab and Ammon on the east—at once explains and justifies the frequent fortification of these towns at different periods of the history (1 Kings ix, 17; 2 Chron. viii, 5; 1 Macc. ix, 50; Judith iv, 4, 5). The road is still the direct one from the site which must have been Gibeon (el-Jib), and from Michmash (Múkhmás) to the Philistine plain on the one hand, and Antipatris (Joseph. War. ii, 19, 9) on the other. On the mountain which lies to the southward of the nether village is still preserved the name (Yaló) and the site of Ajalon, so closely connected with the proudest memories of Beth-horon; and the long "descent" between the two remains unaltered from what it was on that great day, "which was like no day before or after it." From Gibeon to the Upper Beth-horon is a distance of about 4 miles of broken ascent and descent. The ascent, however, predominates, and this therefore appears to be the "going up" to Beth-horon which formed the first stage of Joshua's pursuit. With the upper village the descent commences; the road rough and difficult even for the mountain-paths of Palestine; now over sheets of smooth rock flat as the flagstones of a city pavement; now over the upturned edges of the limestone strata; and now among the loose rectangular stones so characteristic of the whole of this district. There are in many places steps cut, and other marks of the path having been artificially improved. But, though rough, the way can hardly be called "precipitous;" still less is it a ravine (Stanley, p. 208), since it runs for the most part along the back of a ridge or water-shed dividing wadys on either hand. After about three miles of this descent, a slight rise leads to the lower village standing on its hillock—the last outpost of the Benjamite hills, and characterised by the date-palm in the enclosure of the village mosque. A short and sharp fall below the village, a few undulations, and the road is among the divra of the great corn-growing plain of Sharon. This rough descent from the upper to the lower Beit-Ur is the "going down to Beth-horon" of the Bible narrative. Standing on the high ground of the upper village, and overlooking the wild scene, we may feel assured that it was over this rough path that the Canaanites fled to their native lowlands. This road, still, as in ancient times, "the great road of communication and heavy transport between Jerusalem and the sea-coast" (Robinson, iii, 61), though a route rather more direct, known as the "Jaffa road," is now used by travellers with light baggage, leaves the main north road at Tuleil el-Ful, 3½ miles from Jerusalem, due west of Jericho. Bending slightly to the north, it runs by the modern village of el-Jib, the ancient Gibeon, and then proceeds by the Beth-horons in a direct line due west to Jimzu (Gimzo) and Ludd (Lydda), at which it parts into three, diverging north to Caphar-Saba (Antipatris), south to Gaza, and west to Jaffa (Joppa).

Beth-jesh'imoth or (as it is less correctly Anglicized in Num. xxxiii, 49) Beth-jes'imoth (Heb. Beṯṯh kī-Yeshimoth', בֵּית־יֵשִׁימוֹת [in Num. xxxiii, 49, בֵּית־יֵשִׁימוֹת], house of the wastes; Sept. Ἀσιμῶς [v. r. Ἀσιμῶς], but Byzasiμῶς in Josh. xiii, 20, and Byzasiμῶς [v. r. Ἰασιμῶς, Byzasiμῶς] in Ezek. xxv, 9), a town or place not far east of Jordan, near Abel-Shittim, in the "deserts" (בְּרָדָה) of Moab—that is, on the lower level at the south end of the Jordan valley (Num. xxxiii, 49)—and named with Ashdod-pisgah and Beth-peor. It was one of the limits of the encampment of Israel before crossing the Jordan. It lay within the territory of Sihon, king of the Amorites (Josh. xii, 3), and was allotted to Reuben (Josh. xiii, 20), but came at last into the hands of Moab, and formed one of the cities which were "the glory of the country" (Ezek. xxv, 9). According to Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Byzasiμῶς, Bethsimoth) it was still called by the same name (ὀνόματι τῆς Ἰσμηῶς, Isimoth), being "opposite Jericho, 10 miles to the south, near the Dead Sea," meaning apparently south-east, and across the Jordan. It is evidently the Beth-moth (Βηθμῶς) captured by Phœnix, the general of Vespasian (Josephus, War, iv, 7, 6). Schwarz (Palest. p. 228) states that there are still "the ruins of a Beth-Jesimoth situated on the north-eastermost point of the Dead Sea, half a mile from the Jordan;" a locality which, although reported by no other traveller, cannot be far from correct (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 296).

Beth-Joāb. See ATAROTH (BETH-JOAB).

Beth-leāph'rah (Heb. Beṯṯh le-Aphrah', בֵּית־לֵאפְרָח, house [to, i. e.] of the fawn; Sept. and Vulg. falsely translate οἶκος κατὰ γέλωτα ἰψῶν, domus pulveris; Auth. Vers. "house of Aphrah"), a place named (only in Mic. i, 10, where there is evidently a play upon the word as if for בֵּית־דָּוִד, David) in connection with other places of the Philistine coast (e. g. Gath, Achish ["weep ye"], Sappir, etc.), and not to be confounded (as by Henderson, in loc., after Gesenius and Wiener) with the Benjamite Ophrah (Josh. xviii, 23), but probably identical with the present village Beth-Affū, 6 miles south-east of Ashdod (Robinson's Researches, ii, 369 note; Van de Velde, Map).

Beth-leb'āoth (Heb. Beṯṯh Lebā'oth', בֵּית־לֵבְאוֹת, house of lionesses, Sept. Byzalebaōs [v. r. Βαζαλεβῶς and Bezalebōs]), a town in the lot of Simeon (Josh. xix, 6), and therefore in the extreme south of Judah (xv, 32, where it is called simply LEBAOTH [q. v.]), probably in the wild country to which its name bears witness. In the parallel list in 1 Chron. iv, 21, the name is given BETH-BIREL. Roland (Palest. p. 648) conjectures that it may have been the "toparchy of Bethleptepha" (Βεθλεπτεφῶν), mentioned by Josephus (War, iv, 8, 1) and Pliny (Bethlephure, v, 15), south of Jerusalem; but this is hardly probable (see also the improbable surmise of Korb in Jahn's Jahrb. f. Philol. iv, 111 sq.).

Beth'lehem (Heb. Beṯṯh Le'hem, בֵּית־לֵחֶם, house of bread, perh. from the fertility of the region; Sept. and N. T. Byzaleph [but v. r. Bezaleph in Josh. xix, 13; Bezaleph in Ezra ii, 21; Bezaleph in Neh. vii, 26]; Josephus, Byzaleph; Steph. Byz. Byzaleph), the name of two places.

1. One of the towns in Palestine, already in existence at the time of Jacob's return to the country, when its name was EPHRATH or EPHRATAH (see Gen. xxxv, 16; xlviii, 7; Sept. at Josh. xv, 59), which seems not only to have been the ancient name of the city itself, but also of the surrounding region; its inhabitants being likewise termed EPHRATHITES (Ruth

i, 2). It is also called "BETH-LEHEM-EPHRATAH" (Mic. v, 2), and "BETH-LEHEM-JUDAH" (1 Sam. xvii, 12), and "BETH-LEHEM OF JUDEA" (Matt. ii, 1), to distinguish it from another town of the same name in the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. xix, 15), and also "the city of David" (Luke ii, 4; John vii, 42). The inhabitants are called BETH-LEHEMITES (1 Sam. xvi, 1, 18; xvii, 58). It is not, however, till long after the occupation of the country by the Israelites that we meet with it under its new name of Bethlehem. Here, as in other cases (comp. Bethmeon, Bethdiblatim, Beth-peor), the "Beth" appears to mark the derivation of a Hebrew appellation; and, if the derivations of the lexicons are to be trusted, the name in its present shape appears to have been an attempt to translate the earlier Ephratah into Hebrew language and idiom, just as the Arabs have, in their turn, with a further slight change of meaning, converted it into Beit-lahm (house of flesh). However this may be, the ancient name lingered as a familiar word in the mouths of the inhabitants of the place (Ruth i, 2; iv, 11; 1 Sam. xvii, 12), and in the poetry of the psalmists and prophets (Psa. cxxxii, 6; Mic. v, 2) to a late period. In the genealogical lists of 1 Chron. it recurs, and Ephrath appears as a person—the wife of Caleb and mother of Hur (יְהוּר) (ii, 19, 51; iv, 4); the title of "father of Bethlehem" being bestowed both on Hur (iv, 4) and on Salma, the son of Hur (ii, 51, 54). The name of Salma recalls a very similar name intimately connected with Bethlehem, namely, the father of Boaz, Salmah (בְּרִי־שָׁלֵם, Ruth iv, 20; Auth. Vers. "Salmon") or Salmon (יְהוֹשָׁפָט, ver. 21). Hur is also named in Exod. xxxi, 2, and 1 Chron. ii, 20, as the father of Uri, the father of Bezalcel. In the East a trade or calling remains fixed in one family for generations, and if there is any foundation for the tradition of the Targum that Jesse, the father of David, was "a weaver of the veils of the sanctuary" (Targ. Jonathan on 2 Sam. xxi, 19), he may have inherited the accomplishments and the profession of his art from his forefather, who was "filled with the Spirit of God," "to work all manner of works," and among them that of the embroiderer and the weaver (Exod. xxv, 35). At the date of the visit of Benjamin of Tudela there were still "twelve Jews, dyers by profession, living at Beth-lehem" (Benj. of Tudela, ed. Asher, i, 75). The above tradition may possibly elucidate the allusions to the "weaver's beam" (whatever the "beam" may be) which occur in the accounts of giants or mighty men slain by David or his heroes, but not in any unconnected with him.

After the conquest Bethlehem fell within the territory of Judah (Judg. xvii, 7; 1 Sam. xvii, 12; Ruth i, 1, 2). As the Hebrew text now stands, however, it is omitted altogether from the list of the towns of Judah in Joshua xv, though retained by the Sept. in the eleven names which that version inserts between verses 19 and 60. Among these it occurs between Thcko (Tekeoa), Θεκό (comp. 1 Chron. iv, 4, 5), and Phigor (? Peor, φαιγορ). This omission from the Hebrew text is certainly remarkable, but it is quite in keeping with the obscurity in which Bethlehem remains throughout the whole of the sacred history. Not to speak of the nativity, which has made the name of Bethlehem so familiar to the whole Christian and Musulman world, it was, as the birthplace of David, a place of the most important consequence to ancient Israel. And yet, from some cause or other, it never rose to any eminence, nor ever became the theatre of any action or business. It is difficult to say why Hebron and Jerusalem, with no special associations in their favor, were fixed on as capitals, while the place in which the great ideal king, the hero and poet of the nation, drew his first breath and spent his youth remained an "ordinary Judean village." No doubt this is in part owing to what will be noticed presently—the isolated nature of its position; but that circumstance did not prevent Gibeon, Ramah, and many other places situated on eminences from becoming famous, and is not sufficient to account entirely for such silence respecting a place so strong by nature, commanding one of the main roads, and the excellence of which as a military position may be safely inferred from the fact that at one time it was occupied by the Philistines as a garrison (2 Sam. xxiii, 14; 1 Chron. xi, 16). Though not named as a Levitical city, it was apparently a residence of Levites, for from it came the young man Jonathan, the son of Gershom, who became the first priest of the Danites at their new northern settlement (Judg. xvii, 7; xviii, 30), and from it also came the concubine of the other Levite, whose death at Gibeah caused the destruction of the tribe of Benjamin (xix, 1-9). The Book of Ruth is a page from the domestic history of Bethlehem; the names, almost the very persons of the Bethlehemites are there brought before us; we are allowed to assist at their most peculiar customs, and to witness the very springs of those events which have conferred immortality on the name of the place. Many of these customs were doubtless common to Israel in general, but one thing must have been peculiar to Bethlehem. What most strikes the view, after the charm of the general picture has lost its first hold on us, is the intimate connection of the place with Moab. Of the origin of this connection no record exists, no hint of it has yet been discovered; but it continued in force for at least a century after the arrival of Ruth, till the time when her great-grandson could find no more secure retreat for his parents from the fury of Saul than the house of the King of Moab at Mizpeh (1 Sam. xxii, 3, 4). But, whatever its origin, here we find the connection in full vigor. When the famine occurs, the natural resource is to go to the country of Moab and "continue there;" the surprise of the city is occasioned, not like at Naomi's going, but at her return. Ruth was "not like" the handmaidens of Boaz: some difference of feature or complexion there was, doubtless, which distinguished the "children of Lot" from the children of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; but yet she gleams after the reapers in the field without molestation or remark; and when Boaz, in the most public manner possible, proclaims his intention of taking the stranger to be his wife, no voice of remonstrance is raised, but loud congratulations are expressed; the parallel in the life of Jacob occurs at once to all, and a blessing is invoked on the head of Ruth the Moabitess, that she may be like the two daughters of the Mesopotamian Nabor, "like Rachel and like Leah, who did build the house of Israel." This, in the face of the strong denunciations of Moab contained in the law, is, to say the least, very remarkable (see Thomson, Levi and Book, ii, 500 sq.). Moab appears elsewhere in connection with a place in Judah, Jashub-lehem (1 Chr. iv, 22). We might be tempted to believe the name merely another form of Beth-lehem, if the context—the mention of Mareslah and Chozeba, places on the extreme west of the tribe—did not forbid it.

The elevation of David to the kingdom does not appear to have affected the fortunes of his native place. The residence of Saul acquired a new title specially from him, by which it was called even down to the latest time of Jewish history (2 Sam. xxi, 6; Josephus, War, v, 2, 1, Γαζαβασουλιγ), but David did nothing to dignify Bethlehem, or connect it with himself. The only touch of recollection which he manifests for it is that recorded in the statement of his sudden longing for the water of the well by the gate of his childhood (2 Sam. xxiii, 15). Bethlehem was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi, 6), but it does not appear to have been a place of much importance; for Micah, extolling the moral pre-eminence of Bethlehem, says, "Thou, Bethlehem-Ephrathah, thou ought thou be little among the thousands of Judah," etc. (Micah v, 2). Matthew quotes this as, "And thou, Bethlehem of Judah, art not the least of the cities of Judah," etc. (Matt. ii, 6), which has the appearance of a discrepancy. But it is answered that a city may be little without being the least, or that the evangelist may have quoted from memory, and hence the slight difference in expression, while the sense remains the same. By the time of the captivity, the inn of Chimham by (כִּימָח = "close to") Bethlehem appears to have become the recognised point of departure for travellers to Egypt (Jer. xli, 17)—a caravanserai or khan (כַּחֵן; see Stanley, App. § 90), perhaps the identical one which existed there at the time of our Lord (κατάλυμα), like those which still exist all over the East at the stations of travellers. Lastly, "children of Bethlehem" to the number of 123 returned from Babylon (Ezra ii, 21), which, with the 56 from the neighboring Netophah, slightly differs from the sum 188 of the parallel passage (Neh. vii, 26). In the New Testament Bethlehem retains its distinctive title of Bethlehem-judah (Matt. ii, 1, 5), and once, in the announcement of the angels, the "city of David" (Luke ii, 4; and comp. John vii, 42; κόμη; custellam). Its connection with the history of Christ is too familiar to all to need any notice here; the remark should merely be made, that as in the earlier history less is recorded of the place after the youth of David than before, so, in the later, nothing occurs after the birth of our Lord to indicate that any additional importance or interest was fastened on the town. In fact, the passages just quoted and the few which follow exhaust the references to it in the N. T. (Matt. ii, 6, 8, 16; Luke ii, 15).

After this nothing is heard of it till near the middle of the 2d century, when Justin Martyr speaks of our Lord's birth as having taken place "in a certain cave very close to the village," which cave he goes on to say had been specially pointed out by Isaiah as "a sign." The passage from Isaiah to which he refers is xxxiii, 13-19, in the Sept. version of which occurs the following: "He shall dwell on high; His place of defence shall be in a lofty cave of the strong rock" (Justin. Dial. c. Tryph. § 78, 79). Such is the earliest supplement we possess to the meagre indications of the narrative of the Gospel; and while it is not possible to say with certainty that the tradition is true, there is no certainty in discrediting it. There is nothing in itself very probable—nor certainly is there in most cases where the traditional scenes of events are laid in caverns—in the supposition that the place in which Joseph and Mary took shelter, and where was the "manger" or "stall" (whatever the φάτνη may have been), was a cave in the limestone rock of which the eminence of Bethlehem is composed. Yet it is not necessary to assume that Justin's quotation from Isaiah is the ground of an inference of his own; it may equally be an authority happily adduced by him in support of the existing tradition. Still the step from the belief that the nativity may have taken place in a cavern, to the belief that the present subterranean vault or crypt is that cavern, is an equally doubtful one. (See below.) Even in the 150 years that had passed when Justin wrote, so much had happened at Bethlehem that it is difficult to believe that the true spot could have been accurately preserved. In that interval not only had the neighborhood of Jerusalem been overrun and devastated by the Romans at the destruction of the city, but the Emperor Hadrian, among other desecrations, is said to have planted a grove of Adonis at the spot (Quercus inunabrabit Adonis, Jerome, Ep. Paul.). This grove remained at Bethlehem for no less than 180 years, viz. from A.D. 135 till 315. After this the place was purged of its abominations by Constantine, who, about A.D. 330, erected the present church (Euseb. Vit. Const. 3, 40. See Toller, p. 102, note). The brief notice of Eusebius in the Onomasticon (s. v. Βηθλεέμ) locates it 6 miles S. of Jerusalem, to which Jerome (ib., s. v. Bethlehem) adds a reference to the "tower of Edar" and his own cell in the locality. The Crusaders, on their approach to Jerusalem, first took possession of Bethlehem, at the entreaty of its Christian inhabitants. In A.D. 1110, King Baldwin I erected it into an episcopal see, a dignity it had never before enjoyed; but, although this was confirmed by Pope Pascal II, and the title long retained in the Romish Church, yet the actual possession of the see appears not to have been of long continuance. In A.D. 1241, Bethlehem, like Jerusalem, was desolated by the wild hordes of the Kharisimians. There was formerly a Mohammedan quarter, but, after the rebellion in 1834, this was destroyed by order of Ibrahim Pasha (Tobler, Bethlehem, Bern, 1849).

There never has been any dispute or doubt about the site of Bethlehem, which has always been an inhabited place, and, from its sacred associations, has been visited by an unbroken series of pilgrims and travellers. The modern town of Bethlehem lies to the E. of the main road from Jerusalem to Hebron, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the former. It covers the E. and N.E. parts of the ridge of a "long gray hill" of Jura limestone, which stands nearly due E. and W., and is about a mile in length. The hill has a deep valley on the N. and another on the S. The west end shelves down gradually to the valley; but the east end is bolder, and overlooks a plain of some extent. The slopes of the ridge are in many parts covered by terraced gardens, shaded by rows of olives with figs and vines, the terraces sweeping round the contour of the hill with great regularity. The many olive and fig orchards, and vineyards round about, are marks of industry and thrift; and the adjacent fields, though stony and rough, produce, nevertheless, good crops of grain. On the top of the hill lies the village in a kind of irregular triangle, at about 150 yards from the apex of which, and separated from it by a vacant space on the extreme eastern part of the ridge, spreads the noble basilica of St. Helena, "half church, half fort," now embraced by its three convents, Greek, Latin, and Armenian. It is now a large and straggling village, with one broad and principal street. The houses have not domed roofs like those of Jerusalem and Ramleh; they are built for the most part of clay and bricks; and every house is provided with an apiary, the beehives of which are constructed of a series of earthen pots ranged on the house-tops. The inhabitants are said to be 3000, and were all native Christians at the time of the most recent visits; for Ibrahim Pasha, finding that the Moslem and Christian inhabitants were always at strife, caused the former to withdraw, and left the village in quiet possession of the latter, whose numbers had always greatly predominated (Wilde's Narrative, ii, 411). The chief trade and manufacture of the inhabitants consist of beads, crosses, and other relics, which are sold at a great profit. Some of the articles, wrought in mother-of-pearl, are carved with more skill than one would expect to find in that remote quarter. The people are said to be remarkable for their ferocity and rudeness, which is indeed the common character of the inhabitants of most of the places accounted holy in the East. Travellers remark the good looks of the women, the substantial, clean appearance of the houses, and the general air of comfort (for an Eastern town) which prevails.

At the farthest extremity of the town is the Latin convent, connected with which is the Church of the Nativity, said to have been built by the Empress Helena. It has suffered much from time, but still bears manifest traces of its Grecian origin, and is alleged to be the most chaste architectural building now remaining in Palestine. It is a spacious and handsome hall, consisting of a central nave amid aisles separated from each other by rows of tall Corinthian pillars of gray marble. As there is no ceiling, the lofty roof is exposed to view, composed (according to some) of the cedars of Lebanon, still in good preservation, and affords a fine specimen of the architecture of that age. Two spiral staircases lead to the cave called the "Grotto of the Nativity," which is about 20 feet below the level of the church. This cave is lined with Italian marbles, and lighted by numerous lamps. Here the pilgrim is conducted with due solemnity to a star inlaid in the marble, marking the exact spot where the Saviour was born, and corresponding to that in the firmament occupied by the meteor which intimated that great event; he is then led to one of the sides, where, in a kind of recess, a little below the level of the rest of the floor, is a block of white marble, hollowed out in the form of a manger, and said to mark the place of the one in which the infant Jesus was laid. His attention is afterward directed to the "Sepulchre of the Innocents;" to the grotto in which St. Jerome passed the greater portion of his life; and to the chapels dedicated to Joseph and other saints. There has been much controversy respecting the claims of this cave to be regarded as the place in which our Lord was born. Tradition is in its favor, but facts and probabilities are against it. It is useless to deny that there is much force in a tradition regarding a locality (more than it would have in the case of a historical fact), which can be traced up to a period not remote from that of the event commemorated; and this event was so important as to make the scene of it a point of such unremitting attention, that the knowledge of that spot was not likely to be lost. This view would be greatly strengthened if it could be satisfactorily proved that Adrian, to cast odium upon the mysteries of the Christian religion, not only erected statues of Jupiter and Venus over the holy sepulchre and on Calvary, but placed one of Adonis over the spot of the Nativity at Bethlehem. But against tradition, whatever may be its value, we have in the present case to place the utter improbability that a subterranean cavern like this, with a steep descent, should ever have been used as a stable for cattle, and, what is more, for the stable of a khan or caravanserai, which doubtless the "inn" of Luke ii, 7 was. Although, therefore, it is true that cattle are, and always have been, stabled in caverns in the East, yet certainly not in such caverns as this, which appears to have been originally a tomb. Old empty tombs often, it is argued, afford shelter to man and cattle; but such was not the case among the Jews, who held themselves ceremonially defiled by contact with sepulchres. Besides, the circumstance of Christ's having been born in a cave would not have been less remarkable than his being laid in a manger, and was more likely to have been noticed by the evangelist, if it had occurred; and it is also to be observed that the present grotto is at some distance from the town, whereas Christ appears to have been born in the town; and, whatever may be the case in the open country, it has never been usual in towns to employ caverns as stables for cattle. To this we may add the suspicion which arises from the fact that the local traditions seem to connect with caverns almost every interesting event recorded in Scripture, as if the ancient Jews had been a nation of troglodytes. See CAVE. All that can be said about the "holy places" of Bethlehem has been well said by Lord Nugent (i, 13-21), and Mr. Stanley (p. 438-442). (See also, though interspersed with much irrelevant matter, Stewart, p. 246, 334 sq.) Of the architecture of the church very little is known; for a resumé of that little, see Fergusson's Handbook of Architecture, p. 524; also Salzmann's Photographs and the Etude accompanying them (p. 72). Mr. Stanley states that the present roof is constructed from English oak given to the church by Edward IV (Sin. and Pal., p. 141, 479). Tobler, p. 104 note, adduces the authority of Eusebius that the present church is the work of Justinian, who destroyed that of Constantine as not sufficiently magnificent. One fact is associated with a portion of the crypt of this church, namely, that here, "beside what he believed to be the cradle of the Christian faith," St. Jerome lived for more than 20 years, leaving a lasting monument of his sojourn (as is commonly believed) in the Vulgate translation of the Bible (Werner, De Bethl. op. Hieron., Stade, 1769).

On the north-east side of the town is a deep valley, alleged to be that in which the angels appeared to the shepherds announcing the birth of the Saviour (Luke ii, 8). It is situated in the plain below and east of the convent, about a mile from the walls; and adjacent is a very small, poor village, called Beth-Schar, to the east of which are the unimportant remains of a Greek church. These buildings and ruins are surrounded by olive trees (Seetzen, ii, 41, 42). Here, in Arculf's time, "by the tower of Adar," was a church dedicated to the three shepherds, and containing their monuments (Arculf, p. 6). But this plain is too rich ever to have been allowed to lie in pasturage, and it is more likely to have been then occupied, as it is now, and as it doubtless was in the days of Ruth, by corn-fields, and the sheep to have been kept on the hills.—Smith, s.v.; Kitto, s.v.

In the same valley is a fountain, said to be that for the water of which David longed, and which three of his mighty men procured for him at the hazard of their lives (2 Sam. xxiii, 15-18). Dr. Clarke stopped and drank of the delicious water of this fountain, and from its correspondence with the intimations of the sacred historian and of Josephus (Ant. vii, 12, 4), as well as from the permanency of natural fountains, he concludes that there can be no doubt of its identity. (See Hackett's Illustra. of Script., p. 294-300.) Others find the traditional well of David in a group of three cisterns, more than half a mile away from the present town, on the other side of the wady on the north. A few yards from the western end of the village are two apertures, which have the appearance of wells; but they are merely openings to a cistern connected with the aqueduct below, and, according to Dr. Robinson (Res. sacres., ii, 158), "there is now no well of living water in or near the town." See WELL.

Bethlehem has been more or less fully described by most travellers in Palestine (comp. also Reland, Paläst., p. 643 sq.; Rosenmüller, Alterth. II, ii, 276 sq.; Verpoortenn, Fascic. Dissert. Coburg, 1739; Spanheim, De præsep. Dom. nostri. Berl. 1695; Wernsdorf, De Bethlehem ap. Hieron. Viteb. 1769). Treatises on various points connected with the place, especially as the scene of the Nativity, have been written by Ammon (Gott. 1779), Buddens (Jen. 1727), Ernesti (Lips. 1776), Fenerlein (Gott. 1744), Frischmuth (Jen. 1692), Königsmann (Schlesw. 1807), Krause (Lips. 1699), Müller (Rost. 1652), Oetter (Nürnb. 1774), Osiander (Tab. 1722), Rehkopf (Helmst. 1772), Scalden (Optim. theol., p. 795 sq.), Scherf (Lips. 1704), Schwarz (Cob. 1728), same (ib. 1732), same (ib. eod.), Strauch (Viteb. 1661), same (ib. 1683), Vogel (Regiom. 1706), Wegner (Brandeb. 1699), Ziebach (Viteb. 1751); Cundis (Jen. 1730).

2. A town in the portion of Zebulun, named only in connection with Idalah in Josh. xix, 15. It has been discovered by Dr. Robinson (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1853, p. 121) at Beth-Lahm, about six miles west of Nazareth, and lying between that town and the main road from Akka to Gaza (comp. Schwarz, Paläst., p. 172). Robinson characterizes it as "a very miserable village, none more so in all the country, and without a trace of antiquity except the name" (Bib. Res. new ed. iii, 113).

Bethlehem, COUNCIL OF, held at Bethlehem in March, 1672, but commonly named the Council of Jerusalem. It seems to have been brought about by French influence, with the aim of procuring from the Greeks a confession of the doctrine of transubstantiation (Covel, Greek Church, p. 146). Dionysius, patriarch of Constantinople, at the suggestion of Dositheus, patriarch of Jerusalem, in January, 1672, prepared an encyclical letter, which was sent round to the various prelates for the approval of those who should be unable to attend the council. It asserts, in the first place, the seven sacraments, and declares an unequivocal belief that the living body of our Lord Jesus Christ is invisibly present with a real presence in the blessed Eucharist, and that the bread is really, and truly, and properly changed into the very body of our Saviour Christ, and that it, the holy Eucharist, is offered up as a sacrifice for all Christians, both quick and dead. It then asserts the doctrine of baptism; denies the doctrine of final perseverance, maintains the necessity of episcopacy to a church, the superiority of virginity to matrimony, the infallibility of the Catholic Church, the invocation of saints, the use of images, and the necessity of fasting. This letter received the signatures of forty-six metropolitans and bishops, including that of Dionysius. In March the council assembled at Bethlehem, Dositheus of Jerusalem presiding. The first act of the council was an ineffectual attempt to exculpate Cyril Lucar from the charge of Calvinism brought against him, and to deny the authenticity of the confession attributed to him. They then proceed to declare that the confession, whoever was its author, was never that of the Greek Church, and they repeat and authenticate the synods of Constantinople and Jassy, concluding with a confession of faith founded on that of Peter Megilas, though in many respects differing from it. Its contents are: Art. 1. On the Trinity and the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father alone. 2. On the authority of the Church to interpret Holy Scriptures. 3. Against the doctrine of irrelative predestination. 4. Against those who call God the author of evil. 5. On the same; and on Divine Providence in turning evil into good. 6. On original sin. 7. On the incarnation and passion. 8. That there is but one Mediator, Jesus Christ; nevertheless, that the Church may and ought to have recourse to the intercession of the blessed Virgin and other saints. 9. That faith working by love, i. e. by the fulfilment of the commandments, justifies. 10. That there is a visible Catholic Church; that episcopacy is essential to it, and that it is an order entirely distinct from the priesthood. 11. Of members of the church living in sin. 12. Of the teaching of the Holy Ghost by the fathers and by the œcumenical Church. 13. Of good works. 14. Of free will. 15. That there are seven sacraments. 16. Of the necessity of regeneration in baptism. 17. Of the Holy Eucharist; asserts the doctrine of transubstantiation, and condemns consubstantiation. 18. Clearly admits the Latin doctrine of purgatory. As to the canon of Scripture, the council admitted the title of the apocryphal books to be considered as canonical. It assented to the doctrine of the second Council of Nicea with regard to images. The acts are signed by Dositheus, the patriarch of Jerusalem, Nectarius, the ex-patriarch, seven other prelates, and the proxy of one absent; also by sixty-one other ecclesiastics; ten signed in Arabic, the rest in Greek; the date is March 20, 1672.—Neale, History of the Oriental Church; Landon, Manual of Councils, p. 80 sq.; Palmer, Dissertations on the Orthodox Communion (Lond. 1853); Christian Remembrancer, July, 1853, p. 90.

Beth'lehemite (Heb. Beṯlēmī ha'Lochemi, בֵּית־לֶחֶם, Sept. Βηθλεμίτης or Βαθλεμίτης, occasionally ἑως Βηθλεμίμ or ἐν τῇ Βηθλεμίμ), an inhabitant of BETHLEHEM (q. v.) in Judah (1 Sam. xvi, 1, 18; xvii, 58; 2 Sam. xxi, 19).

Bethlehemites. 1. An order of knights, established by Pope Pius II, on Jan. 18, 1459. The chief mission of this order was to fight against the Turks, and to oppose their farther advance in Europe. Their chief seat was to be at Lemnos. They were to have an elective grand master, and to embrace knights and priests. Their costume was to be white, with a red cross, and for their support the pope assigned to them the property of several military orders which he suppressed. As the Turks soon after retook Lemnos, the order of the knights of Bethlehem was suppressed. See Dictionnaire des Ordres Religieux, i, 472.

2. An order of English monks. Our information of this order is very meagre. According to Matthew Paris (Hist. Anglic. p. 630), they obtained in 1257 a residence at Cambridge, England, and had a costume similar to that of the Dominicans, with the only exception that they wore on the breast a red star with five rays and a small disc of blue color, in memory of that star which, according to the Scriptures, guided the Eastern magi to Bethlehem at the birth of the Saviour. The time of the foundation of the order, its subsequent development, and its specific object are not known. All the authors which speak of it confine themselves to a description of the costume, and even with regard to this there is a discrepancy in their statements, as Schoenebeck (Histoire des Ordres Religieux) reports that it was black. One author (Hadrian Dammand) speaks of star-wearing knights, and it has therefore been doubted whether the "star-wearing knights" and the Bethlehemites were the same order (with different costumes), or two different orders.—Wetzer und Welte, i, 687.

Bethlehemite Monk in England.

3. An order of monks and nuns in Central America, founded at Guatemala about 1660. The founder of the order was Pierre de Betencourt, born in 1619 at Teneriffe, one of the Canary Islands. He showed from boyhood a great predilection for an ascetic life. In 1650 he made a voyage to Guatemala, and while there resolved to enter the priesthood, and to become a missionary in Japan. To that end he studied for three years in the college of the Jesuits; but, making no satisfactory progress in his studies, he became a tailor, and subsequently a sexton. In 1655 he distributed his savings, twenty piastres, among the poor, entered the third order of the Franciscans, and established a free-school for poor children. Soon after he established a hospital and several more schools, and began to receive associates, whom he organized into a "Congregation of Bethlehem." He died April 25, 1667. Some time before his death he had sent Brother Anthony of the Cross to Spain for the purpose of obtaining the royal sanction of his hospital. The patent did not arrive at Guatemala until eight days after his death. It commanded the Spanish authorities not only to protect the new congregation, but to seek to enlarge it. The bishop of the diocese received similar orders, and he accordingly granted to them the right of publicly celebrating in their church the mass. After the death of Betencourt, Brother Anthony became his successor as chief of the congregation, and gave to it, in accordance with the wish of the founder, a regular monastic constitution, which, after some opposition on the part of the Franciscans, was approved by the bishop. The main object of this order is to look after and attend to the sick in hospitals. Pope Innocent XI approved of the order in 1687, and commanded the Hospitaliers, or brethren of the order, to follow the rule of Augustine. They wear round the neck a medal representing the birth of Jesus Christ at Bethlehem; and as to their dress, they follow the Capuchins, but wear shoes, and have a leathern girdle round the waist. A female branch of the order was founded at the same time by Mary Ann del Galdo. The parent-house is at Guatemala, and there are about forty houses in Central and South America.—Helyot, Ord. Religieux, i, 477; Wetzer und Welte, i, 688.

Bethlehemite Monk.

Bethlehemite Nun.

Beth'lehem-Ju'dah (Heb. Beṯ Le'chem Yehudah, בֵּית לֶחֶם יְהוּדָה, Sept. Beṯleim Iouda), a more distinctive title (Judg. xvii, 7, 8, 9; xix, 1, 18; Ruth i, 1; 1 Sam. xvii, 12) for the place usually called simply BETHLEHEM (q. v.), in the tribe of Judah.

Beth-leptepha (Ireland, Palast. p. 648), the capital of Bethleptephene (Pliny, v, 15), a district opposite Pella, on the west of the Jordan (Josephus, War, iv, 8, 1); perhaps identical with the ruined site Beit-Iffa, at the north base of Mt. Gilboa (Van de Velde, Narrative, ii, 366). See BETHFLIA.

Bethlo'mon (Baṯloṁon), an incorrect form (1 Esdr. v, 17) of the name BETHLEHEM in Judah (comp. Ezra ii, 21).

Beth-ma'achah (Heb. Beṯ Ma'achah [or ham-Ma'achah], [or בֵּית מַאֲכָה], house of [the] Ma'achah; always with the prefix Abel or Abelah; Sept. Baṯma'achā, or Baṯma'achā v. r. Θαμααχά, etc.), a place named in 2 Sam. xx, 14, 15, and there occurring more as a definition of the position of ABEL than for itself; more fully called ABEL-BETH-MAACHAH (q. v.) in 2 Kings xv, 29. In the absence of more information, we can only conclude that it is identical with MAACHAH, or ARAM-MAACHAH, one of the petty Syrian kingdoms in the north of Palestine. See ARAM.

Beth-mar'cabōth (Heb. Beṯ Markabōth, בֵּית מַרְכָּבוֹת, house of chariots, in Chron.; Sept. Baṯma'arabōth v. r. Baṯma'arabōth; or with the art. in Josh., Beth-ham-markaboth, בֵּית הַמַּרְכָּבוֹת, house of the chariots; Sept. Bēthmarēpharabōth v. r. Baṯma'arabōth, and Baṯma'arabōth), one of the towns of Simeon, situated to the extreme south of Judah, with Ziklag and Hormah (Josh. xix, 5; 1 Chron. iv, 31). What "chariots" can have been in use in this rough and thinly-inhabited part of the country, at a time so early as that at which these lists of towns purport to have been made, we know not. At a later period—that of Solomon—"chariot cities" are named, and a regular trade with Egypt in chariots was carried on (1 Kings ix, 19; 2 Chron. viii, 6; 1 Kings x, 29; 2 Chron. i, 17), which would naturally require dépôts or stopping-places on the road "up" to Palestine (Stanley, p. 163). In the parallel list, Josh. xv, 30, 31, MADMANNAH (q. v.) occurs in place of Beth-marcaboth; possibly the latter was substituted for the former after the town had become the resort of chariots.—Smith, s. v. Comp. HAZAR-SUSAH.

Bethmäus (Βηθμαούς), a place located by Josephus (Lijé, § 12) at 12 stadia from Tiberias, toward Sepphoris, and thought by Lightfoot (Chorogr. ch. 78) to be the Beth-Maon (בֵּית מַעֲנַן) of the Talmud (Tosepith Shebith, ch. vii), in Lower Galilee; probably the present ruins Kalat Ibn-Maon, a little west of Mejdil (Magdala), along the Sea of Galilee (comp. Schwarz, p. 177). Comp. BETH-MEON; MAON.

Beth-me'ôn (Heb. Beyth Me'ôn, בֵּית מַעֲוֹן, house of habitation or of Baal-Meon; Sept. oikos Maon v. r. Μαῶν), a place in the tribe of Reuben (Jer. xlviii, 23); elsewhere (Josh. xiii, 17) given in the full form BETH-BAL-MEON (q. v.). See also BETHMAUS.

Beth-mer'hak (Heb. Beyth ham-Merchak, בֵּית מֵרְחָק, house of the remoteness; Sept. translates oikos ὁ μακρῶν, Vulg. procul a domo; A. V. "a place that was far off"), apparently the proper name of a locality near Jerusalem, and not far beyond the brook Kidron, where King David first halted in his exit from the city on the rebellion of Absalom (2 Sam. xv, 17); doubtless a designation of the environs outside the city wall, in the valley of Jehoshaphat, as being the extreme limit of the houses.

Beth-mil'lo (Heb. Beyth Millo, בֵּית מִלּוֹ, [or מִלּוֹז], wall-house; Sept. oikos Μαλῶ or Μαλλῶ; Vulg. oppidum [or domus] Mello; Auth. Vers. "house of Millo"), the name of two localities. See MILLO.

1. A fortress (or, according to the Targum, a village) near Shechem (Judg. ix, 20); apparently the same with the citadel (בֵּית הַמִּצְדָּה, tower) of the place (Judg. ix, 46-49). See SHECHEM.

2. A castle or fortification of Jerusalem, where King Jehoshaphat was slain (2 Kings xii, 20, where it is defined as being situated "on the descent to Sillo," q. v.); probably in the quarter of the same name. See JERUSALEM.

Beth-nim'rah (Heb. Beyth Nimrah, בֵּית נִמְרָה, house of limpid water; Sept. ἡ Ναριβῶα and Βηθναμαρά, with many var. readings), one of the " fenced cities" on the east of the Jordan taken and "built" by the tribe of Gad (Num. xxxii, 36), and described as lying "in the valley" (בֵּית נִמְרָה) beside Beth-haran (Josh. xiii, 27). In Num. xxxii, 3, it is named simply NIMRAH (q. v.). The "Waters of Nimrim," which are named in the denunciations of Moab by Isaiah (xv, 6) and Jeremiah (xlviii, 24), must, from the context, be in the same locality. See NIMRIM. By Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. v. Βηθναμαρά, Bethannaram) the village (called by them Bethnabris, Βηθναβρίαις, Bethannaris) is said to have been still standing five miles north of Livias (Beth-haran). The Talmudists call it also Beth Nimrin (בֵּית נִמְרִין, comp. Targum on Num. xxxii, 3) or Beth-Namer (בֵּית נַמֵּר, ? "panther-house," Peah, iv, 5; comp. Schwarz, p. 232). The name still survives in the Nahr-Nimrin, the Arab appellation of the lower end of the Wady Shoail, where the waters of that valley discharge themselves into the Jordan close to one of the regular fords a few miles above Jericho (Burekhardt, Syriac, p. 355). It has been seen by Seetzen (Reisen, 1851, ii, 318) and Robinson (Researches, ii, 279), but does not appear to have been explored, and all that is known is that the vegetation is very thick, betokening an abundance of water. The Wady Shoail runs back up into the eastern mountains as far as es-Salt. Its name (the modern form of Hobab?) connects it with the wanderings of the children of Israel, and a tradition still clings to the neighborhood that it was down this valley they descended to the Jordan (Seetzen, ii, 377).

It seems to have escaped notice how nearly the requirements of BETHABARA (q. v.) are met in the circumstances of Bethnimrah—its abundance of water and its situation close to "the region round about Jordan" (ἡ περιχώρος τοῦ Ἰουδαίου, i. e. the Γεῖταρ of the O. T., the Oasis of Jericho), immediately accessible to "Jerusalem and all Judæa" (John i, 28; Matt. iii, 5; Mark i, 5) by the direct and ordinary road from the capital. Add to this that in the Sept. the name of Bethnimrah is found very nearly as usual (the form of Bethabara—Βαθαραβῶα, Βηθαβῶα, Βεθαραβῶα (see Holmes and Parsons' text).—Smith, s. v.

Beth'ron (Βαθρονών), a Grecized form (Judith iv, 4) of the town BETH-HORON (q. v.).

Beth-pa'let (Heb. Beyth Pa'let, בֵּית פֶּלֶט, house of escape, but found only "in pause," Beyth Pa'let, בֵּית פֶּלֶט [or בֵּית פֶּלֶת]; Sept. Βηθπέλεθ and Βηθφαλάτ or Βαθφαλάθ), one of the towns in the extreme south of Judah (i. e. assigned to Simeon), named between Heshmon and Hazar-shual (Josh. xv, 27), and inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi, 26, where it is Anglicized "Beth-phetlet"). It corresponds possibly to the "considerable ruin" on Tell el-Kuseifeh (Robinson's Researches, ii, 620), a short distance N.E. of Moladah (Van de Velde, Mop).

Beth-paz'zez (Heb. Beyth Patzsets, בֵּית פִּצְצֵז, house of dispersion; Sept. Βηθπασιζ v. r. Βηθπαζιζ), a town (2 near the border) of Issachar, named in connection with En-haddah (Josh. xix, 21); possibly the ruined site Beth-Jann, about five miles west of the south end of the Lake of Galilee (Van de Velde, Mop).

Beth-pe'ôr (Heb. Beyth Pe'ôr, בֵּית פִּעֹר, house of Peor, i. e. temple of Baal-Peor; Sept. oikos Φυγῶν, but in Josh. Βηθφαγῶν or Βαθφαγῶν), a place in Moab, no doubt dedicated to the god Baal-peor, on the east of Jordan; according to Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Βεθφαγῶν, Bethfogzo), it lay opposite Jericho, and six miles above Livias or Beth-haran. It was in the possession of the tribe of Reuben (Josh. xiii, 20). In the Pentateuch the name occurs in a formula by which one of the last halting-places of the children of Israel is designated—"the ravine" (בֵּית פִּעֹר) over against (בֵּית) Beth-peor" (Deut. iii, 29; iv, 46). In this ravine Moses was probably buried (Deut. xxxiv, 6). It appears to have been situated on the slope of the eminence (Nebo or Peor), about half way between Heshmon and the north end of the Dead Sea.

Here, as in other cases, the Beth- may be a Hebrew substitution for Baal-, or the name may be an abbreviation of Baal-peor (q. v.).—Smith, s. v.

Beth'phagè (Βηθφαγιή and Βηθφαγῆ, prob. for Syro-Chal. Βηθ φῶγῆ, house of the unripe fig), the name of a village (κομῆ) on the Mount of Olives, along the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, and situated at a fork of the road, where our Lord, on his way from Bethany to Jerusalem, procured an ass just before reaching the summit of the Mount of Olives (Matt. xxi, 1; Mark xi, 1; Luke xix, 29). From the two being twice mentioned together (Mark xi, 1; Luke xix, 29), it was apparently close to BETHANY (q. v.), and it appears (from Matt. xxi, 1) to have been nearer to the city. The fact of our Lord's making Bethany his nightly lodging-place (Matt. xxi, 17, etc.) is no confirmation of its direction from Bethphage, since he would doubtless take up his abode in a place where he had friends, even though it were not the first place at which he arrived on the road. Dr. Robinson argues (Researches, ii, 103) from the order of the names in these passages that Bethphage lay to the east of Bethany instead of westward, as the local tradition states; but his view has evidently been biased by his arrangement of the gospel narrative at that point, by which he places this event on the way from Jericho instead of after the feast at Bethany (see his Harmony of the Gospels compared with Strong's Harmony and Exposition). The name of Bethphage occurs often in the Talmud (Buxtorf, Lex Talm. col. 1691), and the Jewish glossarists misled (see Iluz, Eiul. i, 18, 19) Lightfoot (Choreg. Cent. ch. 38) and Otho (Lex. Rab. p. 101 sq.) to regard it as a district extending from the foot of the Mount of Olives to the precincts of Jerusalem, and including the village of the same name (comp. Schwarz, Paläst. p. 257). By Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.), and also by Origen (see Büsching, Harmonia d. Evang. p. 35), the place was known, though no indication of its position is given; they describe it as a village of the priests, possibly deriving the name from "Beth-phage," signifying in Syriac the "house of the jaw," as the jaw in the sacrifices was the portion of the priests (Reland, p. 653). Schwarz (p. 263 sq.) appears to place Bethphage on the southern shoulder of the "Mount of Offence," above the village of Siloam, and therefore west of Bethany. No remains which could answer to such a position have been found (Robinson, ii, 103), and the traditional site is above Bethany, half way between that village and the top of the mount (see Feustel, De Bethphage, Lips. 1686). Dr. Olin mentions (Trav. ii, 257) having seen foundations of houses and a cistern hewn in the rock at that place. Dr. Barclay, however (City of the Great King, p. 66), identifies Bethphage with traces of foundations and cisterns on the rocky S.W. spur of Olivet, a few hundred yards to the south of the Jericho-Jerusalem road, between Bethany and the K'dron (comp. Stewart, Text and Khan, p. 332). The name of Bethphage, the signification of which, as given above, is generally accepted, is, like those of Bethany, Capernaum, Bethzeth, and the Mount of Olives itself, a testimony to the ancient fruitfulness of this district (Stanley, p. 387).

Beth'-phelet (Neh. xi, 26). See BETH-PALET.

Beth'-rapha (Heb. Beṯṯh Rāphā', בֵּית רָפָא, house of Rapha, or of the giant; Sept. Βαβυλῶν v. r. Βαβυλων, a name occurring in the genealogy of Judah as apparently the eldest of the three sons of Esbon, "men of Rechab" (1 Chron. iv, 12). B.C. post 1618. There is a Rapha in the line of Benjamin and elsewhere, but no apparent connection exists between those and this, nor has the name been identified as belonging to any place.—Smith, s. v. See REPHAIM.

Beth'-rehab (Heb. Beṯṯh Reḥab', בֵּית רֵחָב, house of Rehab; Sept. οἶκος Ραβῆ [v. r. Ραβῆ] and Βαβυλωνῶν [v. r. Ραβῆ], Βαβυλωνῶν, and even Ραβῆ), a place mentioned as having near it the valley in which lay the town of Laish or Dan (Judg. xviii, 28). It was one of the little kingdoms of Aram or Syria, like Zolah, Machah, and Ish-tob, in company with which it was hired by the Ammonites to fight against David (2 Sam. x, 6). See ARAM. In ver. 8 the name occurs in the shorter form of Rehab, in which form it is doubtless again mentioned in Num. xiii, 21. Being, however, "far from Sidon" (Judg. xviii, 28), this place must not be confounded with two towns of the name of Rehab in the territory of A-her. See REHOB. Robinson conjectures (Later Researches, p. 371) that this ancient place is represented by the modern Hibin, a fortress commanding the plain of the Huleh, in which the city of Dan (Tell el-Kady) lay. See CESAREA-PHILIPPI. Hadadezer, the king of Zolah, is said to have been the son of Rehab (2 Sam. viii, 3, 12).—Smith.

name which nearly all writers on Palestinian geography since Reland have assigned to two places, not far from each other, on the opposite shores near the head of Lake Tiberias (see Raumer, Palästina, p. 103), but which there appears to be no good reason for distinguishing from each other (see Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 81 sq.).

1. A town (πόλις, John i, 45) in Galilee (John xii, 21), apparently on the western side of the sea of Tiberias, being in "the land of Gennesareth" (q. v.), and yet toward the northern extremity of the lake (Mark vi, 45). It was the native place of Peter, Andrew, and Philip, and the frequent resort of Jesus (John i, 44; xii, 21, etc.). It was evidently in near neighborhood to Capernaum and Chorazin (Matt. xi, 21; Luke x, 13; and comp. Mark vi, 45 with John vi, 16), and, if the interpretation of the name is to be trusted, close to the water's edge. By Jerome (Comm. in Esai. ix, 1) and Eusebius (Onom.) these towns and Tiberias are all mentioned together as lying on the shore of the lake. Epiphanius (adv. Hær. ii) says of Bethsaida and Capernaum that they were not far apart. Willibald (A.D. 722) went from Magdala to Capernaum, thence to Bethsaida, and then to Chorazin. These ancient notices, however, though they fix its general situation, none of them contain any indication of its exact position, and as, like the other two towns just mentioned, its name and all memory of its site have perished, no positive identification can be made of it. It is true that Pococke (ii, 90) finds Bethsaida at Irbid; Seetzen at Kham Minglyh (Zach's Monatl. Correspond. xviii, 248); Nau at Mejhl (Voyage, p. 578; Quaresimus, ii, 866), apparently between Kham Minglyh and Mejdél; and others at Tabiyah (so Robinson—all different points on the western shore of the lake. The Christians of Nazareth and Tiberias are indeed acquainted with the name, as well as that of Capernaum, from the New Testament; and they have learned to apply them to different places according to the opinions of their monastic teachers, or as may best suit their own convenience in answering the inquiries of travellers. It is thus that Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Researches, iii, 295) accounts for the fact that travellers have sometimes heard the names along the lake. Whenever this has not been the consequence of direct leading questions, which an Arab would always answer affirmatively, the names have doubtless been heard from the monks of Nazareth, or from the Arabs in a greater or less degree dependent upon them. The position of this Bethsaida mainly depends upon that of Capernaum, from which it was not far distant, to the north, on the shore (Robinson, new ed. of Researches, iii, 358, 359). If Capernaum be fixed at Khan Minglyh, then Bethsaida was probably at 'Ain el-Tabiyah; but if (as on some accounts is more likely) Capernaum is to be located at 'Ain el-Mudawarah, then Bethsaida itself must be placed at Kham el-Minglyh; and in that case it may have sprung up as a restoration of the more ancient CĪSRETH, but nearer the shore. See CAPERNAUM.

2. Christ fed the 5000 "near to a city called Bethsaida" (Luke ix, 10); but it has been thought from the parallel passages (Matt. xiv, 13; Mark vi, 32-45) that this event took place, not in Galilee, but on the eastern side of the lake. This was held to be one of the greatest difficulties in sacred geography (Celler. Nat. Orb. ii, 536) till the ingenious Reland seemed to have afforded materials for a satisfactory solution of it by distinguishing two Bethsidas, one on the western and the other on the north-eastern border of the lake (Paläst. p. 653). The former was undoubtedly "the city of Andrew and Peter;" and, although Reland did not himself think that the other Bethsaida is mentioned in the New Testament, it has been thought by later writers to be more in agreement with the sacred text to conclude that it was the Bethsaida near which Christ fed the 5000, and also, probably, where the blind man was restored to sight. This appears also to have been the Bethsaida of Gaulonitis, afterward called Julias, which Pliny (Hist. Nat. v, 15) places on the eastern side of the lake and of the Jordan, and which Josephus describes as situated in Lower Gaulonitis, just above the entrance of the Jordan into the lake (War, ii, 9, 1; iii, 10, 7). It was originally only a village, called Bethsaida (Βηθσαιδᾶ), but was rebuilt and enlarged by Philip the Tetrarch not long after the birth of Christ, and received the name of Julias in honor of Julia, the daughter of Augustus (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 2, 1). Philip seems to have made it his occasional residence; and here he died, and was buried in a costly tomb (Ant. xviii, 4, 6). At the northern end of the lake of Gennesareth the mountains which form the eastern wall of the valley through which the Jordan enters the lake, throw out a spur or promontory which extends for some distance southward along the river. This is known by the people on the spot by no other name than et-Tell (the hill). On it are some ruins, which were visited by the Rev. Eli Smith, and proved to be the most extensive of any in the plain. The place is regarded as a sort of capital by the Arabs of the valley (the Ghawarimeh), although they have lost its ancient name, and now occupy only a few houses in it as magazines. The ruins cover a large portion of the tell, but consist entirely of unheun volcanic stones, without any distinct trace of ancient architecture (Robinson, Bibl. Researches, iii, 398). M. De Saulcy, however, objects to this location of Bethsaida, that in et-Tell there are only what may be called ruins of a barbarous age, and not such as would mark the remains of the splendid structures of Julius; that it is situated too far from the lake to be properly called a "fishing-town," and that this position is inconsistent with Josephus's account of his military operations against Sylla (Life, § 72). He therefore thinks that Bethsaida was located at Tell-Hann, formerly regarded as the site of Capernaum (Narrative, ii, 377). But this position is inconsistent with his own identification of other neighboring localities, and fails also to meet the requirements of the scriptural texts.

Of this Bethsaida we have certainly one, and probably two mentions in the Gospels: (1.) That named above, of the feeding of the 5000 (Luke ix, 10). The miracle took place in a τόπος ἄημος, a vacant, lonely spot, somewhere up in the rising ground at the back of the town, covered with a profusion of green grass (John vi, 3, 10; Mark vi, 39; Matt. xiv, 19); and in the evening the disciples went down to the water and went home across the lake (εἰς τὸ πέραρ) to Bethsaida (Mark vi, 45), or, as John (vi, 17) and Matthew (xiv, 34) more generally express it, toward Capernaum, and to the land of Gennesareth. The coincidence of the two Bethsaiidas occurring in the one narrative, and that on the occasion of the only absolutely certain mention of the eastern one, is extraordinary. In the very ancient Syriac recension (the Nitrian) just published by Mr. Cureton, the words in Luke ix, 10, "belonging to the city called Bethsaida" are omitted.

(2.) The other, highly probable, mention of this place is in Mark viii, 22, where it is called a "village" (κώμη). If Dalmanutha (viii, 10) or Magdala (Matt. xv, 39) was on the west side of the lake, then was Bethsaida on the east, because in the interval Christ had departed by ship to the other side (Mark viii, 13). And with this well accords the mention immediately after of the villages of Caesarea-Philippi (v. r. 27), and of the "high mountain" of the transfiguration (ix, 2), which was not the traditional spot (Mt. Tabor), but a part of the Hermon range somewhere above the source of the Jordan.

3. It is doubtful, however, whether, after all, there exists any real necessity for supposing two places of this name. As they could not have been very far from each other, the assumption is in itself a very improbable one, especially as the name nowhere occurs with any epithet or note of distinction, and neither Josephus nor any other ancient writer speaks of such a difference or duplication. In fact, all the circumstances under which every mention of the locality occurs, whether in Scripture or elsewhere, may be met by a location at the mouth of the Upper Jordan on the lake: (1.) This corresponds to the only definite mention of the spot by Josephus (Ant. xviii, 2, 1), as being "situate at Lake (παρὰ λίμνῃ) Gennesareth." (2.) This would be popularly called a part of Galilee (John xii, 21), and yet might very easily be reckoned as belonging to Lower Gaulonitis (Joseph. War, ii, 9, 1), since it was really on the border between these two districts. (3.) It would thus lie directly on the route from the western shore of the lake to Caesarea-Philippi (Mark vii, 22, comp. with 10 and 27). (4.) Such a position readily reconciles the statements in the accounts of Christ recrossing the lake after both miracles of the loaves: [1.] In Mark vi, 32 (comp. John vi, 1), the passage was directly across the northern end of the lake from Capernaum to a retired spot on the shore somewhat S.E. of Bethsaida; thence the disciples started to cross merely the N.E. corner of the lake to Bethsaida itself (Mark vi, 45), but were driven by the head-wind during the night to a more southerly point, and thus reached Capernaum (John vi, 17, 21, 24), after having traversed the plain of Gennesareth (Matt. xiv, 34; Mark vi, 53). [2.] In Mark viii, 10, the passage was likewise directly across the upper portion of the lake, but in an opposite direction, from the Decapolis (v. r. 31) to the vicinity of Magdala (Matt. xv, 39), thence along the shore and around the N.W. head of the lake to Bethsaida (Mark viii, 22), and so on northward to the scene of the transfiguration in the region of Caesarea-Philippi (Matt. xvi, 13). [3.] The position of et-Tell is too far from the shore to correspond with the notices of Bethsaida and Livias, which require a situation corresponding to that of the modern ruined village el-Araj, containing some vestiges of antiquity (Robinson, Researches, iii, 394), immediately east of the debouchure of the Upper Jordan. (See Forbiger, Situs desertorum Bethsaiide, Lips. 1742).

Beth'samos (Βαθσαιμών v. r. Βαθσαιμῶν), a place of which 42 inhabitants are stated to have returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 18); evidently the BETH-AZMAVEH (q. v.) of the genuine text (Neh. vii, 28; simply AZMAVEH in Ezra ii, 24).

Beth'san (Βαθσαιών), a Græcized form (1 Macc. v, 52; xii, 49, 41) of the name of the city BETH-SHEAN (q. v.).

Beth'shan (Heb. Beyth-Shean, בֵּית שֵׁעָן, Sept. Βαθσαιών v. r. Βαθσαιών), an abridged form (1 Sam. xxxi, 10, 12; 2 Sam. xxi, 12) of the name of the city BETH-SHEAN (q. v.).

Beth-she'an (Heb. Beyth She'an, בֵּית שֵׁעָן, house of security; Sept. Βηθσαιών, also [in 1 Kings iv, 12] Βηθσαιών, and oikos Sa'an, and [in 1 Chron. vii, 29] Βαθσαιών v. r. Βαθσαιών; in Samuel BETH-SHAN, in the Apocrypha BETHSAS, in Josephus Βηθσαινα or Βεθσαινα; in the Talmud Beisan, בֵּית שֵׁעָן [but see Otho, Lex. Rabh. p. 193]; in Steph. Byz. [p. 675] Βασαῶν; in the Onomasticon, Euseb. Βηθσαιρα, Jerome Bethsan; also [according to Schwarz, Palst. p. 148, note] in 1 Kings xxii, 39, the "ivory-house" of Solomon, בֵּית שֵׁעָן, Beyth hash-She'an, house of the tooth; Sept. oikos Elepharavoc), a city which, with its "daughter" towns, belonged to Manasseh (1 Chr. vii, 29), though within the original limits of Issachar (Josh. xvii, 11), and therefore on the west of Jordan (comp. 1 Macc. v, 52). It was not subdued, however, by either tribe, but remained for a long time in the hands of the Canaanites and Philistines (Judg. i, 17). The corpses of Saul and his sons were fastened up to the wall of Bethshean by the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi, 10, 12) in the open "street" or space (בֵּית), which—then as now—fronted the gate of an Eastern town (2 Sam. xxi, 12). In Solomon's time it seems to have given its name to a district extending from the town itself to Abel-meholah; and "all Beth-shean" was under the charge of one of his commissariat officers (1 Kings iv, 12). From this time we lose sight of Beth-shean till the period of the Maccabees, in connection with whose exploits it is mentioned more than once in a cursory manner (1 Macc. v, 52; comp. 1 Macc. xii, 40, 41). Alexander Jannæus had an interview here with Cleopatra (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 13, 3); Pompey marched through it on his way from Damascus to Jerusalem (ib. xiv, 3, 4); Gabinius fortified it (ib. xiv, 5, 3); and in the Jewish war 13,000 Jews were slain by the Scythopolitans (War. ii, 18, 3). It was 600 stadia from Jerusalem (2 Macc. xii, 29), 120 from Tiberias (Josephus, Life, 65), and 16 miles from Gadara (Itin. Anton.; comp. Ammian. Marc. xix, 12). In the Middle Ages the place had become desolate, although it still went by the name of Metropolis Palæstinae tertia (Will. Tyr. p. 749, 1034; Vitruvius, p. 1119). We find bishops of Scythopolis at the councils of Chalcedon, Jerusalem (A.D. 536), and others. During the Crusades it was an archbishopric, which was afterward transferred to Nazareth (Kaumer's Palæstina, p. 147-149).

Beth-shean also bore the name of Scythopolis (Σκυθῶν πόλις, 2 Macc. xii, 29), perhaps because Scythians had settled there in the time of Josiah (B.C. 631), in their passage through Palestine toward Egypt (Herod. i, 265; comp. Pliny, Hist. Nat. v, 16, 20; Georg. Synecellus, p. 114). This hypothesis is supported by 2 Macc. xii, 39, where mention is made of "Jews who lived among the Scythians (Σκυθῶν πολιτῶν) in Beth-shean"; and by the Septuagint version of Judg. i, 27 (Βαθσάν, ἡ ἐστὶ Σκυθῶν πόλις). In Judith iii, 2, the place is also called Scythopolis (Σκυθῶν πόλις), and so likewise by Josephus (Ant. v, 1, 22; xii, 8, 5; xiii, 6, 1) and others (Strabo, Ant. vi, 763; Ptolemy, v, 15, 23). The supposition that these were descendants of the Scythians in Palestine (comp. Ezek. xxxix, 11) renders more intelligible Coloss. iii, 11, where the Scythian is named with the Jew and Greek; and it also explains why the ancient rabbins did not consider Scythopolis (Λύβαν) as a Jewish town (comp. Joseph. Life, 6), but as one of an unholy people (Havercamp, Observat. ad Joseph. Ant. v, 1, 22). On coins the place is called Scythopolis and Nysa (so Pliny, v, 16), with figures of Bacchus and the pindar (Eckhel, p. 438-440; comp. Roland, p. 993 sq.). As Succoth lay somewhere in the vicinity east of the Jordan, some would derive Scythopolis from Succothopolis (Roland, p. 992 sq.; Gesenius, in Burckhardt, p. 1053, German edit.). It has also, with as little probability, been supposed to be the same as Beth-hittin (Judg. vii, 22). Josephus does not account Scythopolis as belonging to Samaria, in which it geographically lay, but to Decapolis, which was chiefly on the other side of the river, and of which he calls it the largest town (War. iii, 9, 7). See SCYTHOPOLIS.

The ancient native name, as well as the town itself, still exists in the Beisan of the present day (Robinson, Researches, iii, 171). It stands on a rising ground somewhat above the valley of the Jordan, or in the valley of Jezreel where it opens into the Jordan valley. It is on the road from Jerusalem to Damascus, and is about three miles from the Jordan, fourteen from the southern end of Lake Gennesareth, and sixteen from Nazareth. The site of the town is on the brow of the descent by which the great plain of Esdraelon drops down to the level of the Ghor. A few miles to the west are the mountains of Gilboa, and close beside the town, on the north, runs the water of the Ain-Jalud, the fountain of which is in Jezreel, and is in all probability the spring by which the Israelites encamped before the battle in which Saul was killed (1 Sam. xxix, 1). Three other large brooks pass through or by the town; and in the fact of the abundance of water, and the exuberant fertility of the soil consequent thereon, as well as in the power of using their chariots, which the level nature of the country near the town conferred on them (Josh. xvii, 16), resides the secret of the hold which the Canaanites retained on the place. So great was this fertility, that it was said by the rabbins that if Paradise was in the land of Israel, Beth-shean was the gate of it, for its fruits were the sweetest in all the land (see Lightfoot, Chor. Cent. lx). If Jabesh-Gilead was where Dr. Robinson conjectures—at ed-Deir in Wady Yai—the distance from thence to Beisan, which it took the men of Jabesh "all night" to traverse, cannot be much beyond ten miles. The modern Beisan is a poor place containing not more than sixty or seventy houses. The inhabitants are Moslems, and are described by Richardson and others as a set of inhospitable and lawless fanatics. The ruins of the ancient city are of considerable extent. It was built along the banks of the rivulet which waters the town and in the valleys formed by its several branches, and must have been nearly three miles in circumference. The chief remains are large heaps of black hewn stones, with many foundations of houses and fragments of a few columns (Burckhardt, p. 243). The principal object is the theatre, which is quite distinct, but now completely filled up with weeds; it measures across the front at out 180 feet, and has the singularity of possessing three oval recesses half way up the building, which are mentioned by Vitruvius as being constructed to contain the brass sounding-tubes. Few theatres had such an apparatus even in the time of this author, and they are scarcely ever met with now. The other remains are the tombs, which lie to the north-east of the Acropolis, without the walls. The sarcophagi still exist in some of them; triangular niches for lamps have also been observed in them; and some of the doors continue hanging on the ancient hinges of stone in remarkable preservation. Two streams run through the ruins of the city, almost insulating the Acropolis. There is a fine Roman bridge over the one to the south-west of the Acropolis, and beyond it may be seen the paved way which led to the ancient Ptolemæis, now Acre. The Acropolis is a high circular hill, on the top of which are traces of the walls which encompassed it (Irby and Mangels, Travels, p. 301-303). See also Robinson, Later Lib. Res. p. 329 sq.; Van de Velde, Narrative, ii, 359-363; Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 172 sq.

Beth'-shemesh (Heb. Beyth She'mesh, בֵּית שֵׁמֶשׁ, house of the sun; in pause Beyth She'mesh, בֵּית שֵׁמֶשׁ; Sept. in Josh. xv, 10, πόλις ἡλιου, elsewhere in Josh. and Judg. Βηθσαάμε, in Sam. and Chron. Βαιθσαμεί, in Kings Βαιθσαάμε, in Jer. Ἥλιος πόλις; Josephus Βηθσαάμη, Ant. vi, 1, 3), the name of four places. See HILLOPOLIS.

1. A sacerdotal city (Josh. xxi, 16; 1 Sam. vi, 15; 1 Chron. vi, 59) in the tribe of Dan, on the northern border (between Chesalon and Timnath) of Judah (Josh. xv, 16), toward the land of the Philistines (1 Sam. vi, 9, 12), probably in a lowland plain (2 Kings xiv, 11), and placed by Eusebius and Jerome (Oriens. s. v. Βηθσαάμε, Bethsamis) ten Roman miles from Eleutheropolis, in the direction of the road to Nicopolis. The expression "went down" in Josh. xv, 10; 1 Sam. vi, 21, seems to indicate that the position of the town was lower than Kirjath-jearim; and it is in accordance with the situation that there was a valley (בְּגֵזֶר) of corn-fields attached to the place (1 Sam. v, 13). It was a "suburb city" (Josh. xxi, 16; 1 Chron. vi, 59), and it is named in one of Solomon's commissariat districts under the charge of Ben-Dekar (1 Kings iv, 9). It was the scene of an encounter between Jehoash, king of Israel, and Amaziah, king of Judah, in which the latter was worsted and made prisoner (2 Kings xiv, 11, 13; 2 Chron. xxv, 21, 23).

Later, in the days of Ahaz, it was taken and occupied by the Philistines, together with several other places in this locality (2 Chr. xxviii, 18).

From Ekron to Beth-sheMesh a road (בְּתֵשֶׁםֶשׁ, ôcôc) existed along which the Philistines sent back the ark by mîleh-kîne after its calamitous residence in their country (1 Sam. vi, 9, 12); and it was in the field of "Joshua the Beth-shemite" (q. v.) that the "great Abel" (whatever that may have been, prob. a stone; see ABEL) was on which the ark was set down (1 Sam. vi, 18). On this occasion it was that, according to the present text, "fifty thousand and threescore and ten men" were miraculously slain for irreverently exploring the sacred shrine (1 Sam. vi, 19). This number has occasioned much discussion (see Schran, De plaga Bethshemitarum, Herb. 17. .). The numeral in the text has probably been erroneously transcribed. See ABBREVIATION. The Syriac and Arabic have 5070 instead of 50070, and this statement agrees with 1 Cod. Kennicott (comp. Gesenius, Gesch. der Hebr. Sprache, p. 174). Even with this reduction, the number, for a provincial town like Beth-sheMesh, would still be great. We may therefore suppose that the number originally designated was 570 only, as the absence of any intermediat denomination between the first two digits would seem to indicate. The fact itself has been accounted for on natural principles by some German writers in a spirit of variance with that of Hebrew antiquity, and in which the miraculous part of the event has been explained away by ungrammatical interpretations. See NUMBER.

By comparison of the lists in Josh. xv, 10; xix, 41, 43, and 1 Kings iv, 9, it will be seen that IR-SHEMESH (q. v.), "city of the sun," must have been identical with Beth-sheMesh, Ir being probably the older form of the name; and again, from Judg. i, 35, it appears as if Har-cheres, "mount of the sun," were a third name for the same place, suggesting an early and extensive worship of the sun in this neighborhood.—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v. See HERES.

Beth-sheMesh is no doubt the modern Ain-shems found by Dr. Robinson in a position exactly according with the indications of Scripture, on the north-west slopes of the mountains of Judah—"a low plateau at the junction of two fine plains" (Later Researches, p. 153)—about two miles from the great Philistine plain, and seven from Ekron (Researches, iii, 17-29; comp. Schwarz, Paläst., p. 365). It is a ruined Arab village constructed of ancient materials. To the west of the village, upon and around the plateau of a low swell or mound, are the vestiges of a former extensive city, consisting of many foundations and the remains of ancient walls of hewn stone. With respect to the exchange of Beth for Ain, Dr. Robinson remarks (iii, 19): "The words B-eth (Beth) and Ain are so very common in the Arabic names of Palestine, that it can excite no wonder there should be an exchange, even without an obvious reason. In the same manner the ancient Beth-sheMesh (Heliopolis of Egypt) is known in Arabian writers as Ain-shems" (see below). See BETH-; EX-.

2. A city near the southern border of Issachar, between Mount Tabor and the Jordan (Josh. xix, 22); probably the same with the present village Kaukab ("the star") al-Banî (Schwarz, Paläst., p. 167), which is also identical with the Belvoir of the Crusaders (see Robinson, Researches, iii, 226).

3. One of the "fenced cities" of Naphtali, named (Josh. xix, 38; Judg. i, 33) in connection with Beth-anath, from neither of which places were the Canaanite inhabitants expelled, but became tributaries to Israel. Jerome's expression (Onom. Bethsanis) in reference to this is perhaps worthy of notice, "in which the original inhabitants (cultores, ? worshippers) remained;" possibly glancing at the worship from which the place derived its name. Keil (Comment on Josh.

p. 440) confounds this place with the foregoing. M. De Sauley suggests (Varratée, ii, 422) that it may have been identical with a village called Medjet el-sh-Shems, seen by him on the brow of a hill west of the road from Banias to Lake Phiala; it is laid down on Van de Velde's Map at 2½ miles north of the latter.

4. By this name is mentioned (Jer. xliii, 13) an idolatrous temple or place in Egypt, usually called Heliopolis (q. v.) or On (Gen. xli, 45). In the Middle Ages Heliopolis was still called by the Arabs Ain-shems, which is the modern name (Robinson, Researches, i, 36). See AVEN; ON.

Beth'-shemite (Heb. Beyth hash-shimshî', בְּתֵשֶׁםֶשׁ־שִׁמְשִׁי; Sept. ἐκ Βαυσαμίε, ὁ Βαυσαμίωιταις), an inhabitant (1 Sam. vi, 14, 18) of the BETH-SHEMESH (q. v.) in Judaea.

Beth-shit'tah (Heb. Beyth hash-shittah', בְּתֵשֶׁםֶשׁ־שִׁיטָּה; Sept. Βυζασίττα v. r. Βυζασίττα and Βασίττα), a place near the Jordan (comp. Josephus, who only names it as a "valley encompassed with torrents," Ant. v, 6, 5), apparently between Beth-shean and Abel-meholah, or at least in the vicinity of (Heb. toward) Zareath, whither the flight of the Millianites extended after their defeat by Gideon in the valley of Esdraon (Judg. vii, 20); probably the village of Shatta discovered by Robinson (Researches, iii, 219) south-east of Jebel Duhy (Schwarz says, incorrectly, one mile west, Paläst., p. 163), and east of Jezreel (De Sauley, Deud. Scen., ii, 307); although this is west of Bethshean, and farther from the Jordan than we should expect. See SHITTIM.

Bethso (Βηθσω), a place mentioned by Josephus (Jar. v, 4, 2) as "so named" (καλούμενος), through which the old or first wall of Jerusalem ran southward from the Gate Gennath around Mount Zion, and before reaching the Gate of the Essenes. It is apparently for the Heb. בֵּית־צְוֹאֵל בְּתֵשֶׁםֶשׁ, Beyth-Tso'âl', house of dung, q. d. dunghill; probably from the adjoining Dung-gate (q. v.), through which ordure seems to have been carried to the valley of Hinnom. Schwarz (Paläst., p. 254) incorrectly locates it on the north-east part of the city. See JERUSALEM.

Bethsu'ra (ἢ or τὰ Βαυσοῦρα), a Græcized form (1 Macc. iv, 29, 61; vi, 7, 26, 31, 49, 50; ix, 52; x, 14; xi, 65; xiv, 7, 33; 2 Macc. xi, 5; xiii, 19, 22) of the BETH-ZER (q. v.) of Judah (Josh. xv, 58).

Beth-tap'pu'ah (Heb. Beyth-Tappu'âch, בְּתֵשֶׁםֶשׁ־תַּפּוּאָה; Sept. Βηθταπποῦάχ v. r. Βαυταποῦάχ), a town of Judah, in the mountainous district, and near Hebron (Josh. xv, 53; comp. 1 Chr. ii, 43), where it has been discovered by Robinson (Researches, ii, 428) under the modern name of Tappûh, 1½ hour, about five miles, west of Hebron, on a ridge of high table-land. The terraces of the ancient cultivation still remain in use; and though the "apples" have disappeared, yet olive-groves and vineyards, with fields of grain, surround the place on every side (Schwarz, Paläst., p. 165).—Smith, s. v. See APPLE.

The simple name of Tappuah was borne by another town of Judah, which lay in the rich lowland of the Shefela (Josh. xiv, 34). See TAPPUAH. Also by one on the border between Manasseh and Ephraim (Josh. xvi, 8). See EN-TAPPUAH.

Bethu'el (Heb. Bethu'el', בְּתוּרֵל), the name of a man and also of a place.

1. (For בְּתוּרֵל בְּתוּרֵל, individual of God [see MERTU-]; Sept. Βαθουήλ, Josephus Βαθουήλως.) The son of Nahor by Milcah, nephew of Abraham, and father of Rebekah (Gen. xxii, 22, 23; xxiv, 15, 24, 47; xxviii, 2). In xxv, 20, and xxviii, 5, he is called "Bethuel the Syrian" (i. e. Aramite). Though often referred to as above in the narrative of Rebekah's marriage, Bethuel only appears in person once (xxiv, 50), for her brother Laban takes the leading part in the transaction. Upon this an ingenious conjecture is raised by Blunt (Coincidences, i, 4) that he was the subject of some imbecility or other incapacity. The Jewish tradition, as given in the Targum Ps.-Jonathan on Gen. xxiv, 55 (comp. 23), is that he died on the morning after the arrival of Abram's servant, owing to his having eaten a sauce containing poison at the meal the evening before, and that on that account Laban requested that his sister's departure might be delayed for a year or ten months. Josephus was perhaps aware of this tradition, since he speaks of Bethuel as dead (Ant. i, 16, 2). B.C. 2023.—Smith. See SISTER.

2. (For בֵּית־אֱלֹהִים, house of God; Sept. Βαζούλα v. r. Βαζούλα.) A southern city of Judah, i. e. Simeon (1 Chron. iv, 30), elsewhere (Josh. xix, 4) called BETHUL (q. v.).

Beth'ul (Heb. Bethul', בֵּית־עֻל, contracted for Bethul'; Sept. Βαζούλα v. r. Βορλαΐ), a town of Simeon in the south, named with Etload and Hormah (Josh. xix, 4). In the parallel lists in Josh. xv, 30, and 1 Chron. iv, 9, the name appears under the forms of CHESIL and BETHUL, and probably also under that of BETHUL in Josh. xii, 16. Calmet incorrectly supposes it to be also the Bethulia of Judith (iv, 5; vi, 1). He has somewhat greater probability, however, in identifying it with the Bethulia (Βηθούλια) of which Sozomen speaks (Ecol. Hist. v, 15), as a town belonging to the inhabitants of Gaza, well peopled, and having several temples remarkable for their structure and antiquity; particularly a pantheon (or temple dedicated to all the gods), situated on an eminence made of earth, brought thither for the purpose, which commanded the whole city. He conjectures that it was named (house of God) from this temple. Jerome (Vita S. Hieronimo, p. 84) alludes to the same place (Bethulia); and it is perhaps the episcopal city Bethulium (Βηθούλιον, Ireland, Palæst. p. 630). There is a Ucit-Ula extant a little south of the road from Jerusalem toward Gaza (Robinson's Res. ii, 342 note), about seven miles N.W. of Hebron (Van de Velde's Map); but this is entirely too far north for the region indicated, which requires a location in the extreme S.W., possibly at the present water-pits called Thornil (Robinson, i, 299), or rather the ruins just north of them, and four miles south of Beer-sheba (Van de Velde, Map). According to Schwarz (Palæst. p. 113), it is identical with a hill (Jebel Hassy, Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 295) S.W. of Eleutheropolis, which he says is still called Bethulia; but this lacks confirmation, and is also too far north.

Bethu'lia (or rather Bethulia, Βηθούλια, for the Heb. בֵּית־עֻל [Simonis, Onom. X. T. p. 41] or בֵּית־עֻל for בֵּית־אֱלֹהִים, house of God Jehovah), a place mentioned only in the apocryphal book of Judith (iv, 6; vi, 10, 11, 14; vii, 1, 3, 6, 13, 20; viii, 3, 11; x, 6; xi, 19; xii, 7; xiii, 10; xv, 3, 6; xvi, 21, 23), of which it was the principal scene, and where its position is minutely described. It was near Dothaim (iv, 6), on a hill which overlooked (ἀνταρτί) the plain of Esdraelon (vi, 11, 13, 14; vii, 7, 10; xiii, 10), and commanded the passes from that plain to the hill country of Manasseh (iv, 7; vii, 1), in a position so strong that Holofernes abandoned the idea of taking it by attack, and determined to reduce it by possessing himself of the two springs or wells (πηγαί) which were "under the city," in the valley at the foot of the eminence on which it was built, and from which the inhabitants derived their chief supply of water (vi, 11; vii, 7, 13, 21). Notwithstanding this detail, however, the identification of the site of Bethulia has hitherto been so great a puzzle as to form an important argument against the historical truth of the book of Judith (see Cellarii Notit. iii, 13, 4). See JUDITH. In the Middle Ages the name of Bethulia was given to "the Frank Mountain," between Bethlehem and Jerusalem

(Robinson, ii, 172), but this is very much too far to the south to suit the narrative. Modern tradition has assumed it to be Sufed in North Galilee (Robinson, iii, 152), which again, if in other respects it would agree with the story, is too far north. Von Raumer (Palæst. p. 135) suggests Saïr, which is perhaps nearer to probability, especially since the discovery of Dothan (q. v.), which is probably meant by the Dothaim of Judith (see Schubert, iii, 161; Stewart, p. 421; Van de Velde, Narrative, i, 367). The ruins of that town are on an "isolated rocky hill," with a plain of considerable extent to the east, and so far as situation is concerned, naturally all but impregnable (Robinson, iii, 325). It is about three miles from Dothan, and some six or seven from Jenin (Engamim), which stand on the very edge of the great plain of Esdraelon. Though not absolutely commanding the pass which leads from Jenin to Sebastieh, and forms the only practicable ascent to the high country, it is yet sufficiently near to bear out the somewhat vague statement of Judith v, 6. Nor is it unimportant to remember that Saïr actually endured a siege of two months from Djezzar Pasha without yielding, and that on a subsequent occasion it was only taken after a three or four months' investment by a force very much out of proportion to the size of the place (Robinson, iii, 152). The most complete identification, however, is that by Schultz (in Williams's Holy City, i, Append. p. 463), who finds Bethulia in the still extant though ruined village Bit-Ifji, on the northern declivity of Mt. Gilboa, containing rock graves, sarcophagi, and other marks of antiquity, and having a fountain near (comp. Ritter, Erdk. xv, 423 sq.; Gross, in the Zeitschr. d. werg. Gesch. iii, 58, 59). Dr. Robinson (Later Bib. Res. p. 337), with his usual pertinacity, disputes this conclusion. See BETH-LEHEM.

Bethune, GEORGE W., D.D., a Reformed Dutch minister and eminent orator, was born in the city of New York in 1805. His father, Divie Bethune, was an eminent merchant, noted for his piety and philanthropy. His mother was the daughter of Isabella Graham (q. v.), whose saintly virtues she inherited. After an academical education in New York, he pursued his collegiate studies at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania, at that time under the presidency of Dr. Mason, and, after graduating, entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton in 1822. In 1825 he was licensed by the New York Presbytery, and ordained to the ministry. After serving a year as naval chaplain at Savannah, he accepted the pastoral charge of the Reformed Protestant Dutch church at Rhinebeck, where he remained until 1830, when he was called as pastor to Utica; from there he went to Philadelphia (1831) as pastor of the Crown Street church. He resigned his charge in the latter city in 1849, and removed to Brooklyn, where a new church was built expressly for him, and in which he ministered until 1859, when illness compelled him to resign and spend a year in Europe. On his return he became associate pastor of Dr. Van Nest's church in New York, but, his strength continuing to decline, he was again compelled to go to Europe in search of health. On this tour he died at Florence, Italy, April 27, 1862, of congestion of the brain. Dr. Bethune was one of the leading men of the Reformed Dutch Church. All the boards of the Church shared his sympathies and labors, but, in particular, he devoted himself to the service of the Board of Publication. He was of opinion that a sound religious literature, doctrinal as well as practical, was needed, and must be brought down to the means of the masses, and that treatises on special doctrines, which general societies could not publish, should be prepared and issued. To show his interest in this work, he made over to the board several of his own works of high character. Though always a conservative in politics, he was a determined opponent of slavery, and it was principally due to him that the General Synod declined receiving the class of North Carolina into the body. When James Buchanan was elected president, Dr. Bethune wrote a long letter to that gentleman, with whom he had close personal relations, imploring him, as he loved his country, and would prevent the calamity of a civil war, to use his great influence, when in the presidential chair, to arrest the march of the slave power. Dr. Bethune was for many years one of the most distinguished ornaments of the American pulpit. He was exceedingly effective, and always popular on the platform and before a lyceum; but the place in which, above all others, he loved to appear, was the pulpit, and the themes on which he delighted to expatiate were the distinctive doctrines of the old theology of Scotland and Holland. As a writer he was luminous and vigorous, with a rare grace of style. His theological acquirements were large and solid, and his general culture rich and varied. As a belles-lettres scholar he had few superiors. Himself a poet, he had rare critical taste, as was shown in his British Female Poets, with Biographical and Critical Notices. He also edited Walton's Complete Angler with a loving devotion. His works also include Lays of Lore and Faith (12mo); Early Lost, Early Saved (Philad. 18mo); History of a Penitent (18mo); Fruits of the Spirit (Philad. 8vo); Sermons (Philad. 1846, 12mo); Life of Mrs. Bethune (N. Y. 1863, 12mo); Lectures on the Heidelberg Catechism (N. Y. 1864, 2 vols. 12mo).

Beth-Zechariah. See BATH-ZACHARIAS.

Beth-zur (Heb. Beṭh-zur, בֵּית־זֶרַח, house of the rock; Sept. Βηθζαοῦρ, in 2 Chron. Βαθζαοῦρ, in 1 Chron. v. r. Βαθζαοῦρ; Apocrypha and Josephus Βεθζαοῦρα), a town in the mountains of Judah, named between Halhul and Gedor (Josh. xv, 58). So far as any interpretation can, in their present imperfect state, be put on the genealogical lists of 1 Chron. ii, 42-49, Beth-zur would appear from verse 45 to have been founded by the people of Maon, which again had derived its origin from Hebron. However this may be, Beth-zur was "built," i. e. probably fortified, by Rehoboam, with other towns of Judah, for the defence of his new kingdom (2 Chron. xi, 7). After the captivity the people of Beth-zur assisted Nehemiah in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 16); the place had a "ruler" (רֹמֵם), and the peculiar word Pekel (פֶּקֶל) is employed to denote a district or circle attached to it, and to some other of the cities mentioned here. See TOPOGRAPHICAL TERMS. In the wars of the Maccabees, Beth-zur or Beth-sura (then not a large town, πολίτιον, Joseph. War, i, 1, 4) played an important part. It was "the strongest place in Judaea" (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 5, 6), having been fortified by Judas and his brethren "that the people might have a defence against Idumaea," and they succeeded in making it "very strong, and not to be taken without great difficulty" (Josephus, Ant. xii, 9, 4); so much so that it was able to resist for a length of time the attacks of Simon Mac. (1 Macc. xi, 65) and of Lysias (2 Macc. xi, 5), the garrison having in the former case capitulated. Before Beth-zur took place one of the earliest victories of Judas over Lysias (1 Macc. iv, 29), and it was in an attempt to relieve it when besieged by Antiochus Eupator that he was defeated in the passes between Beth-zur and Bath-zacharias, and his brother Eleazar killed by one of the elephants of the king's army (1 Macc. vi, 32-47; Joseph. Ant. xiv, 9, 3). According to Eusebius and Jerome (Onomasticum, s. v. Βεθζαοῦρ, Bethsur), it was still called Bethsuram (Βηθζαοῦρα), a village twenty miles from Jerusalem, on the road to Hebron, containing a fountain at the foot of a hill, said to be that where Philip baptized the officer of queen Candace. The distance of five stadia from Jerusalem in 2 Macc. xi, 5, is too small (Cellarii Notit. ii, 565). The traditional Beth-sur of the Crusaders, near Bethlehem, where the fountain of St. Philip is pointed out (Cotovic, p. 247; Pococke, ii, 67; Maundrell, p. 116), cannot be the real place, for Eusebius places it much more to the south, and is in this supported by its history, which shows that it lay on what was the southern border of the Jordan in the time of the Maccabees, when the Idumaeans had taken possession of the southernmost part of the country and made Hebron their chief town. In those times, indeed, Beth-zur, or Bethsur, appears to have been the corresponding fortress on the Jewish side of the fountain to that of Hebron on the side of Idumaea, standing at a short distance, and probably over against it, as many similar fortresses are found to do at the present day. Near Hebron there is another well, called Bir es-Sur, which also gives name to the wady; this place may have been the ancient Beth-zur. However, here is no trace of ancient ruins (Robinson's Researches, iii, 14). M. De Sauley states that he heard of a modern village, corresponding in name to Beth-Zur, lying a short distance to the west of the road, soon after he left Hebron in passing northward, opposite Halhul, but he did not visit it (Narrative, i, 451). It is therefore nearly certain that Beth-zur is near the modern el-D'rash, notwithstanding the distance (about five Roman miles) of this latter place from Hebron; it has a ruined tower, apparently of the time of the Crusades, and close by, a fountain with ruins as of an ancient fortress, built of very large stones upon rocks hewn away to a perpendicular face (Robinson, Researches, i, 320). Mr. Wolcott learned that this hill still retained among the natives the name B el-Sur (Bib. Sac. 1843, p. 56). The recovery of the site of Beth-zur (Robinson's Literary Researches, p. 277) explains its impregnability, and also the reason for the choice of its position, since it commands the road from Beersheba and Hebron, which has always been the main approach to Jerusalem from the south. A short distance from the tell, on which are strewn the remains of the town, is a spring, Ain el-Dh'irrah, which in the days of Jerome and later was regarded as the scene of the baptism of the eunuch by Philip. The tradition has apparently confounded this place with another Beth-zur (Βεθζαοῦρα), which the Onomasticum (ut sup.) locates one mile from Eleutheropolis; it may be noticed that Beit-sur is not near the road to Gaza (Acts viii, 26), which runs much more to the north-west. See GAZA. This identification of Beth-zur is adopted by Wilson (Lands of the Bible, i, 386), and apparently coincides with that of Schwarz (Palest., p. 107).

Bethzius, JOACHIM, a German pastor, noted for fervent piety in a time of spiritual declension, was born in Berlin 1601, studied at Wittenberg, and was pastor of the village of Lintum for 39 years. He died 1663. He was one of the few German pastors of his time (before the rise of Pietism [q. v.]) who preached and enjoyed a deep religious life. His favorite ejaculation was, "Lord, thou knowest that I love thee." He published Christianismus Ethicus (Berlin, 1633);—Mysterium crucis (Berlin, 1637);—Sacerdotium, i. e. N. T. Kingly Priesthood (Berlin, 1640, 4to);—Mensura Christianismi et Ministerii Germaniae (Measure of the Christianity and Ministry of Germany by the Christian standard; Berlin, 1648, 6th ed.);—Antichristenhum (Amst. 1650);—Ironieum, seu fortitudo pacis (Amst. 1760);—Ercidium Germaniae (Amst. 1766). He charged the religion of his age as being anti-Christian, partly from the faults and negligence of the pastors, and partly from the preaching of justification as if there were no sanctification.—Hezog, Real-Encyclopaedie, ii, 123.

Betogabris. See ELEUTHEROPOLIS.

Beto'lius (Βετὸλιος), a place of which 52 Jews that returned from Babylon were inhabitants (1 Esdr. v, 21); evidently the BETHEL (q. v.) of the Hebrew texts (Ezra ii, 28; Neh. vii, 32).

Betomas'them (Βατομασθαιμ, Judith xv, 4), or Betomes'tham (Βετομασθαιμ, Judith iv, 6), a place mentioned only in the apocryphal book of Judith, as a town "over against Esdracel, facing the plain that is near Dothaim" (Judith iv, 6), and in the vicinity of "Belai, Chohai, and Cola, in the coasts of Israel" (xv, 4). From the manner of its mention, it would seem to have been of equal importance with Bethulia (q. v.) itself, but it is doubtful whether it indicates any historical locality whatever. See JUDITH.

Bet'omim (Heb. Bet-omim, בֵּית־עֲמִים, pistachio-nuts [comp. the lotium, Gen. xliii, 11, and the Arabic butm TEREBINTH]; Sept. Boravip), a town in the tribe of Gad, mentioned in connection with Ramath-mizpeh and Mahanaim (Josh. xiii, 26); probably identical with a ruined village Batub (Robinson, Res. arches, iii, Appendix, p. 162), on Mt. Gilead, about five miles west of es-Salt (Van de Velde, Map).

Betray (παράδοσις), a term used especially of the act of Judas in delivering up his Master to the Jews (Matt. x, 4; xxvii, 4, etc.). See JUDAS. Monographs on several circumstances of the transaction have been written by Krackewitz (Rost, 1702), Oeler (in his Miscell. Sæc., p. 502-20), Opitius (Kilon, 1750), Sommel (Lund, 1786), Gurliit (Hamb. 1805).

Betroth (properly אֲרָשׁ, arash', μνηστῆριον). A man and woman were betrothed or espoused, each to the other, when they were engaged to be married. See ESPOUSE. Among the Hebrews this relation was usually determined by the parents or brothers, without consulting the parties until they came to be betrothed. The engagement took place very early, as is still the case in Oriental countries, though it was not consummated by actual marriage until the spouse was at least twelve years of age. The betrothing was performed a twelvemonth or more before the marriage, either in writing, or by a piece of silver given to the espoused before witnesses, as a pledge of their mutual engagements. Sometimes a regular contract was made, in which the bridegroom always bound himself to give a certain sum as a portion to his bride. From the time of espousal, however, the woman was considered as the lawful wife of the man to whom she was betrothed; the engagement could not be ended by the man without a bill of divorce; nor could she be unfaithful without being considered an adulteress. Thus Mary, after she was betrothed to Joseph, might, according to the rigor of the law, have been punished if the angel of the Lord had not acquainted Joseph with the mystery of the incarnation (Deut. xxviii, 30; Judg. xiv, 2, 8; Matt. i, 18-21). Beil'ah (Heb. Beilah, בַּיְלָה, married; Sept. paraphrases aikorpéva) occurs in Isa. lxii, 4, metaphorically of Judea, as of a land desolated, but again filled with inhabitants, when "the land shall be married" (בְּאִשׁוֹתָא), referring to the return from Babylon; or it may be applied to the Jewish Church to denote the intimacy of its relation to God.

BEVAN, JOSEPH GERSEY, one of the ablest writers of the Society of Friends. He is the author of a number of theological works, among which the following are the most important: 1. A Refutation of some of the most modern Misrepresentations of the Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, with a Life of James Nayler (Lond. 1800);—2. The Life of the Apostle Paul (Lond. 1807). The latter work is highly recommended in Horne's Introduction, and the geographical notes are said to stamp a real value on the book.

BEVANS, JOHN, a theological writer of the Society of Friends. He wrote: 1. A Defence of the Christian Doctrine of the Society of Friends against the Charge of Socinianism (Lond. 1805);—2. A brief View of the Doctrines of the Christian Religion as professed by the Society of Friends (Lond. 1811);—3. A Vindication of the Authenticity of the Narratives contained in the first two Chapters of the Gospel of St. Matthew and St. Luke (Lond. 1822). The latter work is directed against the objections of the editors of the Unitarian version of the New Testament.

Beverage. The ordinary drink of the Jews was water, which was drawn from the public wells and fountains (John iv, 6, 7), and which was to be refused to no one (Matt. xxv, 35). Water also was the usual beverage of the Egyptians. Modern travellers attest that the water of the Nile, after it has been deposited in jars to settle, is particularly wholesome and pleasant, and is drunk in large quantities; while that from the few wells which are to be met with in that country is seldom palatable, being unpleasant and insalubrious. When the modern inhabitants of Egypt depart thence for any time, they speak of nothing but the pleasure they shall find on their return in drinking the water of the Nile. The knowledge of this circumstance gives a peculiar energy to the words of Moses, when he announced to Pharaoh that the waters of the Nile should be turned into blood, even in the very filtering vessels; and that the Egyptians should "loathe to drink of the water of the river" (Exod. vii, 17-19); that is, they should loathe to drink of that water which they used to prefer and so eagerly to long for. The common people among the Mohammedans drink water; the rich and noble drink a beverage called sherbet, which was formerly used in Egypt (Gen. xl, 11), where something like our ale or beer, termed barley-wine, was also used, though probably not so far back as the time of Moses. The strong drink, שָׂרֵב, shakar', or σίκερα, of Luke i, 15, mentioned Levit. x, 9, means any sort of fermented liquors, whether prepared from corn, dates, apples, or any other kind of fruits and seeds. After the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan they drank wine of different sorts, which was preserved in skins. Red wine seems to have been the most esteemed (Prov. xxiii, 31). In the time of Solomon spiced wines were used, mingled with the juice of the pomegranate (Cantic. viii, 2), and also with myrrh. Wine was also diluted with water, which was given to the buyer instead of good wine, and was consequently used figuratively for any kind of adulteration (Isa. i, 22). Wine in the East was frequently diluted after it was bought, as may be inferred from two Arabic verbs, which still remain to indicate its dilution. From the pure wine there was made an artificial drink, شامس, chamets', which was taken at meals with vegetables and bread. It was also a common drink (Num. vi, 3), and was used by the Roman soldiers (Matt. xxvii, 48). Medicated wines, it seems, were given to those who were to be crucified, in order to blunt the edge of pain and lessen the acuteness of sensibility, which may explain the passage in Matthew xxvii, 34. See WINE.

The vessels used for drinking among the Jews were at first horns; but these were afterward used only for the purpose of performing the ceremony of anointing. The other drinking vessels were cups and bowls. See CUP. The cup was of brass covered with tin, in form resembling a lily, though sometimes circular; it is used by travellers to this day, and may be seen in both shapes on the ruins of Persepolis. The bowl in form generally resembled a lily (Exod. xxv, 33), although it may have varied, for it had many names. Some had no cover, and were probably of a circular shape, as the Hebrew names seem to indicate. Bowls of this kind which belonged to the rich were, in the time of Moses, made of silver and gold, as appears from Num. vii, 84. The larger vessels from which wine was poured out into cups were called urns, bottles, small bottles, and a bottle of shell, קַל, kal, with a small orifice.—Jahn, Archæology, §144. See DRINK.

Beveridge, Thomas H., a Presbyterian divine, was born in March, 1830. He was the eldest son of Dr. Thomas Beveridge, professor in the Theological Seminary of the United Presbyterian Church in Xenia, Ohio. He graduated at Jefferson College, and was ordained to the ministry in 1853 by the Associate Presbytery of Philadelphia, and in Dec. 1854, installed pastor of the Third Associate congregation of Philadelphia. He was clerk of his presbytery from the time of his ordination, assistant clerk of the general assemblies of the United Presbyterian Church in 1859 and 1860, a member of the Board of Foreign Missions of his denomination, as also of the executive committee of the Presbyterian Historical Society. He was a man of fine literary attainments, and for several years the able editor of the Evangelical Repository, a United Presbyterian monthly. He died suddenly of congestion of the brain, Aug. 15, 1860. See Evangel. Repository, Sept. 1860.

Beveridge, William, D.D., bishop of St. Asaph, was born at Barrow, Leicestershire, in 1638. He was educated at Oakham, and entered the College of St. John, Cambridge, in May, 1653. He was not ordained until after the Restoration, an interval which he probably employed in the investigation of the subject to which the temper and tumult of the times directed so many others—the primitive records and history of the Church. He applied himself in the first instance to the Oriental languages; and his first publication, when he was only twenty years of age, was entitled De Linguarum Orientalium, etc., præstantiâ et usu, cum Grammaticâ Syriacâ (Lond. 1658, again in 1684, 8vo). In 1661 he was appointed to the vicarage of Ealing, and in 1672 to the living of St. Peter's, Cornhill. In 1669 he published Institut. Chronol. libri duo (Lond. 1669, 4to). In 1681 he was made archdeacon of Colchester, and in 1691 he was offered the see of Bath and Wells, from which Ken had been expelled by the government. This see Beveridge refused; but in 1704 he accepted that of St. Asaph, which he held till his death, March 5th, 1708. In every ecclesiastical station which he held he exhibited all the qualifications and virtues which ought to distinguish an ecclesiastic. He was a man of a very religious mind, and has been styled "the great reviver and restorer of primitive piety." His profound erudition is sufficiently evidenced by his works, which include, besides those named above, 1. Συναγωγὴ σive Πανόκτης Συνοδῶν ἑκ. Ἀποστολικῶν ἢ Conciliorum, necnon canonicarum SS. Patrum epistolarum, cum scholiis (Oxf. 1672, 2 vols. fol.). Vol. i contains the Prolegomena, canons apostolical, and those of the ancient councils, together with the Commentaries of Balsamon, Zonaras, and Aristenes, in Greek and Latin, in double columns; the Arabic paraphrase of Joseph the Egyptian on the first four councils, and a translation by Beveridge. Vol. ii contains the Canons of Dionysius, Peter of Alexandria, St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, St. Athanasius, St. Basil, and St. Gregory Nazianzen, together with the Scholia of the Greek Canonists, the Synagoga of Matthew Blastares, and the Remarks, etc., of Beveridge.—2. Index Canonum Eccl. Primitivæ vindicatus et illustratus (Lond. 1678).—3. An Explication of the Church Catechism (5th ed. 1714, 12mo).—4. Private Thoughts (Lond. 1709; written in his youth, but not printed until after his death).—5. Sermons (2 vols. fol. 1720; and besides many other editions, in 1842, Oxf. 8vo).—6. Thesaurus Theologicus (Lond. 1711, 4 vols. 8vo; Oxf. 1820, 2 vols. 8vo). His writings were collected into a new edition by T. Hartwell Horne (Lond. 1824, 9 vols. 8vo), also in a more complete edition in the "Anglo-Catholic Library" (Oxf. 1844-1848, 12 vols. 8vo).

Beverley, JOHN of, a celebrated English ecclesiastic of the 7th and 8th centuries. He was one of the first scholars of his age, having been instructed in the learned languages by Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, and he was himself tutor of the Venerable Bede.

The following works are attributed to him: 1. Pro Lucâ Exponebto, an essay toward an exposition of St. Luke, addressed to Bede.—2. Homiliæ in Evangelia.—3. Epistolæ ad Heribaldum, Amlænum, et Bertinum.—4. Epistolæ ad Hildam Abbatisam. He was advanced to the see of Haguetold, or Hexham, by Alfred, king of Northumberland; and on the death of Bosa, archbishop of York, in 687, he was translated to the vacant see. In 704 he founded a college at Beverley for secular priests. In 717 he retired from his archiepiscopal functions to Beverley, where he died, May 7th, 721.—Fuller, Worthies; Engl. Cyclopaedia.

Bewitch signifies to deceive and lead astray by juggling tricks and pretended charms (Acts viii, 9, 11), where the Greek verb ἐξάρταται means literally to put out of one's self, to be out of one's mind. See STROX (MAGUS). The word used by the apostle, in the passage Gal. iii, 1, "O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you?" is βαρκαίρω, which may be understood to mis-lead by pretences, as if by magic arts, to fascinate. See SORCERY.

When Christianity was first promulgated, the nations under the dominion of the Romans, which comprehended the larger part of the civilized world, were greatly addicted to mysterious practices, supposing that there existed in nature certain influences which they could control and manage by occult signs, expressed in different ways and on different materials, and among the nations most notorious for these opinions were the Jews and the Egyptians. It is not, therefore, surprising that some should have brought with them and grafted on Christianity such opinions and practices as they had formerly entertained. Accordingly, we see that the apostles found it necessary very early to guard their converts against such persons, cautioning them to avoid "profane and vain babblings and oppositions of science, falsely so called" (1 Tim. vi, 20); and in several other passages there are evident allusions to similar errors among the first professors of Christianity. Nor did the evil cease as the doctrines of the Gospel expanded themselves: a number of persons in succession, for two centuries afterward, are recorded as distinguished leaders of these wild opinions, who mixed up the sacred truths of the Gospel with the fantastic imaginations of a visionary science. Bewley, ANTHONY, one of the Methodist anti-slavery martyrs of America, was born in Tennessee, May 22, 1804. In 1829 he was admitted on trial for the Methodist ministry in the Tennessee Conference, and in 1843 he entered the Missouri Conference. On the division of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1844 on the slavery question, Mr. Bewley refused to join the Missouri Conference in its secession, and preached for several years independently, supporting himself and his family by the labor of his own hands. Other preachers, faithful to the Church, gathered about him, and he was, by common consent, their "presiding elder." In 1848 the Methodist Episcopal Church in Missouri was reorganized, and Mr. Bewley entered its service. Persecution of the "abolitionist" preachers sprang up every where in the South-west, fomented by politicians of the slaveholding class. But Mr. Bewley held on his way, and in 1858 was appointed to Texas. He was compelled by violence to leave his work, but returned to it in 1860. His friends sought to dissuade him, but his reply was to say, "Let them hang or burn me on my return if they choose, hundreds will rise up out of my ashes." Accordingly he and his family, including his two sons-in-law, one of whom lived in Kansas and the other in Missouri, returned to Texas. Within a few weeks an increased excitement broke out, when he was threatened anew by the people, and he concluded to leave Texas, believing he could do no good there; for, as mob law had been established by the Legislature, he remembered the injunction of our Lord, "When they persecute you in one city, flee to another." After his departure a reward of £1000 was offered for his capture. He was taken in Missouri in September, 1860, and carried back to Texas, and hanged on a tree at Fort Worth by the mob, on Sept. 13, 1860. — Methodist Quarterly Review, Oct. 1863, p. 626.

Bewray (in Isa. xvi. 3, $\pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\alpha\iota$, gabah', to reveal, or disclose, as elsewhere rendered; in Prov. xxix. 24, $\pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\alpha\iota$, aygal', to tell, as elsewhere; in Prov. xxvii. 16, $\kappa\alpha\lambda\acute{\alpha}$, kal', to call, i. e. proclaim, as elsewhere; in Matt. xxvi. 73, $\pi\alpha\tau\epsilon\rho\sigma\ \epsilon\gamma\theta\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\iota$, to make (or deny), an old English word equivalent to "BETRAY.")

Bexley, LORD (NICHOLAS VANSITTART), was the son of Henry Vansittart, Esq., governor of Bengal. He was born April 29, 1766, was educated at Oxford, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1791. He entered Parliament for Hastings in 1796. In 1801 he was sent to Denmark as minister plenipotentiary, and after his return he was appointed secretary of the treasury in Ireland, and in 1805 secretary to the lord lieutenant, and also a member of the Privy Council. He was chancellor of the exchequer under Lord Liverpool until January, 1823, when he was raised to the peerage under the title of Lord Bexley, of Bexley, Kent. Lord Bexley was a constant supporter of many of the great religious institutions of our age. He was a liberal contributor to the Religious Tract Society, and his services to the British and Foreign Bible Society, especially amid its early difficulties, were of pre-eminence value. On the decease of Lord Teignmouth, February, 1834, he was chosen by the unanimous vote of the committee President of the Bible Society, an office which he held until his death in 1850, giving constant attention to the interests of the institution. A few weeks before his decease he presented to it a donation of £1000. — Timpon, Bible Triumphs, p. 379.

Beyond. The phrase "beyond Jordan" ($\pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\alpha\iota$ $\pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\alpha\iota$ $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \iota\omicron\rho\acute{\alpha}\nu\delta\alpha\rho\omicron\upsilon$) frequently occurs in the Scriptures, and to ascertain its meaning we must, of course, attend to the situation of the writer (see Kuinöl, Comment. in John i. 28). With Moses it usually signifies the country on the western side of the river, as he wrote upon its eastern bank (Gen. i. 20, 21; Deut. i. 1, 5; iii. 8, 20; iv. 16); but with Joshua, after he had crossed the river, it means the reverse (Josh. v. 1; xii. 7; xxii. 7). In Matt. iv. 15, it means "by the side of the Jordan." See ΑΔΑΔ.

Beza (Théodore de Bèze), one of the most eminent of the Reformers, the friend and coadjutor of Calvin, was born at Vezelai, in the Nivernais, June 24, 1519. He passed the first years of his life with his uncle, Nicholas de Beza, counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, who sent him, before he was ten years old, to study at Orleans, where his preceptor was Melchior Wolmar, a convert to Protestantism. Beza accompanied Wolmar to the University of Bourges, and remained, in the whole, for seven years under his tuition. During this time he became an excellent scholar, and he afterward acknowledged a deeper obligation to his tutor for having "imbued him with the knowledge of true piety, drawn from the living fountain of the Word of God." In 1535 Wolmar returned to Germany, and Beza remained at Orleans to study law; but his attention was chiefly directed to the classics and the composition of verses. His verses, published in 1548, under the title Juvenilia, were chiefly written during this period of his life, and their indelicacy caused him many a bitter pang in after life. Beza obtained his degree as licentiate of civil law in 1539, upon which he went to Paris, where he spent nine years. He was young, handsome, and of ample means; for, though not in the priesthood, he enjoyed the proceeds of two good benefices, amounting, he says, to 700 golden crowns a year. The death of a brother added to his income, and an uncle, who was abbot of Froimond, expressed an intention of resigning that preferment, valued at 15,000 livres yearly, in his favor. Thus, in a city like Paris, he was exposed to strong temptation, and his conduct has incurred great censure. That his life was grossly immoral he denies; but he formed a private marriage with a woman of birth, he says, inferior to his own. He was to marry her publicly as soon as the obstacles should be removed, and, in the mean time, not to take orders, a thing entirely inconsistent with taking a wife. Meanwhile his relatives pressed him to enter into the Church; his wife and his conscience bade him avow his marriage and his real belief; his inclination bade him conceal both and stick to the rich benefices which he enjoyed; and in this divided state of mind he remained till illness brought him to a better temper. On his recovery he fled to Geneva, at the end of October, 1548, and there publicly solemnized his marriage and avowed his faith. After a short residence at Geneva, and subsequently at Tübingen, Beza was appointed Greek professor at Lausanne. During his residence there he took every opportunity of going to Geneva to hear Calvin, at whose suggestion he undertook to complete Marot's translation of the Psalms into French verse. Marot had translated 50, so that 100 Psalms remained: these were first printed in France, with the royal license, in 1561. Beza, at this time, employed his pen in support of the right of punishing heresy by the civil power. His treatise De Hæreticis a Civili Magistratu puniendis is a defence of the execution of Servetus at Geneva in 1553. Beza was not singular in maintaining this doctrine: the principal churches of Switzerland, and even Melancthon, concurred in justifying by their authority that act which has been so fruitful of reproach against the party by whom it was perpetrated. His work De Jure Magistratum, published at a much later time in his life (about 1572), presents a curious contrast to the work De Hæreticis, etc. In this later work he asserted the principles of civil and religious liberty, and the rights of conscience; but, though he may be considered as before most men of his age in the boldness of his opinions as to the nature of civil authority, his views of the sovereign power are confused and contradictory. During his residence at Lausanne, Beza published several controversial treatises, which his biographer, Antoine la Faye, confesses to be written with a freer pen than was consistent with the gravity of the subject. To this part of Beza's life belongs the translation of the N. T. into Latin, completed in 1556, and printed at Paris by R. Stephens in 1557. It contains the commentary of Camerarius, as well as a copious body of notes by the translator himself. For this edition he used a manuscript of the four Gospels, which in 1581 he gave to the University of Cambridge. It is generally known as Beza's Codex, and a fac-simile edition of it was published in 1793. After ten years' residence at Lausanne, Beza removed to Geneva in 1559, and entered into holy orders. At Calvin's request he was appointed to assist in giving lectures in theology; and when the University of Geneva was founded he was appointed rector upon Calvin declining that office. At the request of some leading nobles among the French Protestants, he undertook a journey to Nerac in hope of winning the King of Navarre to Protestantism. His pleading was successful, and he remained at Nerac until the beginning of 1561, and, at the King of Navarre's request, attended the Conference of Poissy, opened in August of that year, in the hope of effecting a reconciliation between the Catholic and Protestant churches of France. Beza was the chief speaker on behalf of the French churches. He managed his cause with temper and ability, and made a favorable impression on both Catherine of Medicis and Cardinal Lorraine, who said, "I could well have wished either that this man had been dumb or that we had been deaf." Catharine requested him to remain in France on the plea that his presence would tend to maintain tranquillity, and that his native country had the best title to his services. He consented, and after the promulgation of the edict of January, 1562, often preached publicly in the suburbs of Paris. He soon after greatly distinguished himself at the Conference of St. Germain, where the queen-mother summoned a number of Romanist and Protestant divines to discuss the subject of images. In a memorial to the queen, he discussed the question with a force and vigor never surpassed. "In reply to the customary argument that honor is not directed to the image, but to that which the image represents, Beza triumphantly inquired (and the inquiry has never yet been answered) why then is any local superiority admitted? Why is one image considered more holy and more potent than another? Why are pilgrimages made to distant images, when there are others, perhaps of far better workmanship, near at hand? Again, is it tolerable that in a Christian Church an image of the Virgin Mary should be addressed in terms appropriate solely to the Almighty Father, 'omnibus es omnia!' If the Virgin were yet alive and on earth, how would the humility and lowliness of heart, which she ever so conspicuously evinced, be shocked by the hourly impious appeals to her supposed maternal authority over her blessed Son: 'Regna Patrem, jube Natam!' 'Jure Matris impera!' Then, advertent to the reputed miracles performed by images, he contended that, by the evidence of judicial inquiries, most of them had been indisputably proved impostures; and even with regard to such as remained undetected, it was detracting honor from God, the sole author of miracles, to attribute any hidden virtue or mystic efficacy to wood or stone. Passing on to a review of the long controversy about images maintained in the Greek Church, he concluded by affirming that not less idolatry might be occasioned by crucifixes than by images themselves. The propositions appended to this document were that images should be altogether abolished; or, if that measure were thought too sweeping, that the king would consent to the removal of all representations of the Trinity or its separate Personages; of all images which were indecorous, as for the most part were those of the Virgin; of such as were profane, as those of beasts and many others, produced by the fantastic humors of artists; of all publicly exhibited in the streets, or so placed at altars that they might receive superstitious veneration; that no offerings or pilgrimages should be made to them; and finally, that crucifixes also should be removed, so that the only representation of the passion of our Lord might be that lively portrait engraved on our hearts by the word of Holy Scripture.

"Beza had converted the king of Navarre so far as to make him a partisan of Calvinism; but the royal convert remained as profligate when a Calvinist as he had been when he professed Romanism, and the court soon found means to bring him back once more to the established church. His hostility to Beza was shown at an audience Beza had with the queen-mother, when deputed by the Huguenot ministers to lay their complaint before her with reference to the violations which had occurred of the edict of January, to which allusion has been made before. The king of Navarre, sternly regarding Beza, accused the Huguenots of now attending worship with arms. Beza replied that arms, when borne by men of discretion, were the surest guarantee of peace; and that, since the transactions at Vassy (where a fracas had taken place between the retainers of the duke of Guise and a Huguenot congregation, the duke's people being the aggressors), their adoption had become necessary till the Church should receive surer protection—a protection which he humbly requested, in the name of those brethren who had hitherto placed so great dependence on his majesty. The cardinal of Ferrara here interrupted him by some incorrect representation of the tumult at St. Meard, but he was silenced by Beza, who spoke of those occurrences as an eye-witness, and then reverted to the menacing advance of the duke of Guise upon Paris. The king of Navarre declared with warmth that whoever should touch the little finger of 'his brother,' the duke of Guise, might as well presume to touch the whole of his own body. Beza replied with gentleness, but with dignity; he implored the king of Navarre to listen patiently, reminded him of their long intercourse, and of the special invitation from his majesty in consequence of which he had returned to France in the hope of assisting in its pacification. 'Sire,' he concluded in memorable words, 'it belongs, in truth, to the church of God, in the name of which I address you, to suffer blows, not to strike them. But at the same time let it be your pleasure to remember that THE CHURCH IS AN ANVIL WHICH HAS WORN OUT MANY A HAMMER.' Well would it have been if Beza and his partisans had always remembered this, and, instead of taking up arms to defend their cause, had maintained it like the primitive Christians by patient suffering. Perhaps they would then have led to the gradual reformation of the Church of France, whereas now they took the sword, and perished by the sword. Each party armed. With the leaders of the Protestants Beza acted, and he was kept by the prince of Condé near his person; but the leaders, for the most part, abstained from encouraging the cruelties of their followers, although they excited the people to rise up in arms against the government. Beza continued with the insurgents, following the prince of Condé in all his marches, cheering him by his letters when in prison, and reanimating the Huguenots in their defeats, until his career as a herald of war was terminated by the battle of Dreux. At that battle, fought on the 19th of December, 1562, in which the Huguenots were defeated, Beza was present; but he did not engage in the battle, he was merely at hand to advise his friends.

"In the following February the duke of Guise, the lieutenant general of the kingdom, was assassinated before Orleans. When the assassin was seized, he accused Beza, among other leading Huguenots, as having been privy to his design. Beza declared that, notwithstanding the great and general indignation aroused against the duke of Guise on account of the massacre at Vassy, he had never entertained an opinion that he should be proceeded against otherwise than by the methods of ordinary justice. He admitted that since the duke had commenced the war, he had exhorted the Protestants, both by letters and sermons, to use their arms, but he had at the same time inculcated the utmost possible moderation, and had instructed them to seek peace above all things next to the honor of God."

After the peace of 1563, Beza returned to Geneva, and in 1564, upon the death of Calvin, was called to succeed to all his offices. Beza did not return to France till 1568, when he repaired to Vezelay on some family business. He visited his native country again to attend and preside over a Huguenot synod which assembled at La Rochelle in 1571. Never had any Huguenot ecclesiastical meeting been attended by so many distinguished personages as graced this synod. "There were present," says the report of its acts, "Joane, by the grace of God, queen of Navarre; the high and mighty prince Henry, prince of Navarre; the high and mighty prince Henry de Bourbon, prince of Condé; the most illustrious prince Louis, count of Nassau; Sir Gaspar, count de Coligni; the admiral of France, and divers other lords and gentlemen, besides the deputies who were members of the Church of God." At this assembly the Huguenot confession of faith was confirmed, and two copies of it were taken, one of which was deposited at Rochelle, the other in the archives of Geneva. After the execrable massacre of St. Bartholomew's Eve, Beza honorably exerted himself to support those of the French whom the fear of death drove from their native land; he interested in their behalf the princes of Germany. He also founded a French hospital at Geneva.

In 1572 he assisted at an assembly of the Huguenots at Nismes, where he opposed John Morel, who desired to introduce a new discipline. The prince of Condé caused him to come to him at Strasburg in the year 1574, to send him to prince John Casimir, administrator of the palatinate. In 1586 he was employed in the conference of Montbeliard against John Andreas, a divine of Tübingen. He died at the age of eighty-six, October 13th, 1605. Among his numerous works may be specified—1. Confessio Christiana fidei (1590);—2. Histoire Ecclesiastique des Eglises Reformees du royaume de France, from 1521 to 1563 (1580, 3 vols. 8vo);—3. Iconus virorum illustrium (1580, 4to);—4. Tractatus de repudiis et divorciis, accedit tractatus de polygamia (Geneva, 1590, 8vo);—5. Notum D. N. Jesu Christi Testamentum (often reprinted);—6. Annotatiunculae Novum Testamentum (best edition that of Cambridge, 1642, fol.). Beza was a man of extraordinary quickness and fertility of intellect, as well as of profound and varied learning. His life has been often written, e. g. by Bolzee (Paris, 1577); Taillepiéd (Paris, 1577); Zeigenheim (Hamb. 1789); Schlosser (Heidelberg, 1809); the latest and most elaborate is Theodor Beza nach autographischen und andern gleichzeitigen Quellen, by Professor Baum, of Strasburg (1843-1851, 2 vols.), but it only extends to 1563. See also Haag, La France Protestante, ii, 250-284. Perhaps no one of the reformers has been more fully and constantly calumniated by the Romanists than Beza.

Beza took a lively interest in the affairs of the Church of England, and his letters were (and still are) very unpopular to the High-Church party there. Dr. Hook quotes largely from his letters to Bullinger and Grindal to prove that Beza "regarded the Church of England in Elizabeth's time as Popish." In his letter to Grindal, dated June 27, 1566, he complains that he has heard of "divers ministers discharged their parishes by the queen, the bishops consenting, because they refused to subscribe to certain new rites; and that the sum of the queen's commands were, to admit again not only those garments, the signs of Baal's priests in popery, but also certain rites, which also were deenerated into the worst superstitions—as the signing with the cross, kneeling in the communion, and such like; and, which was still worse, that women should baptize, and that the queen should have a power of superintending other rites, and that all power should be given to the bishop alone in ordering the matters of the Church; and no power, not so much as that of complaining, to remain to the pastor of each church; that the queen's majesty, and many of the learned and religious bishops, had promised far better things; and that a great many of those matters were, at least as it seemed to him, feigned by some evil-meaning men, and wrested some other way; but willed he beseeched the bishop that they two might confer a little together concerning these things. He knew, as he went on, there was a twofold opinion concerning the restoration of the Church: first, of some who thought nothing ought to be added to the apostolical simplicity; and so that, without exception, whatsoever the apostles did ought to be done by us; and whatsoever the Church that succeeded the apostles added to the first rites, were to be abolished at once; that, on the other side, there were some who were of opinion that certain ancient rites besides ought to be retained, partly as profitable and necessary, partly, if not necessary, yet to be tolerated for concord sake; that he himself was of opinion with the former sort; and, in fine, that he had not yet learned by what right (whether one looks into God's Word or the ancient canons) either the civil magistrate of himself might superinduce any new rites upon the churches already constituted, or abrogate ancient ones; or that it was lawful for bishops to appoint any new thing without the judgment and will of their presbytery."—Eng. Cyc.; Bib. Sac. 1850, p. 501; Cunningham, Reformers, Essay vii (Edinb. 1862, 8vo); Hook, Eccles. Hist. ii, 384 sq.

Be'zai (Heb. Betsay', בֵּצַי, probably the same name as BESAI; Sept. Βασαί, Βασί, and Βησαι, v. r. Βασαί, Βησαι, and Βησαι), the head of one of the families who returned from the Babylonian captivity to the number of 324, including himself (Ezra ii, 17; Neh. vii, 23). B. C. 536. He was perhaps one of those that sealed the covenant (Neh. x, 18). B. C. 410.

Beza'el (Heb. Betsalel', בְּזַעַל, in [otherwise son of; q. d. בְּזַעַל] the shadow of God, i. e. under his protection; Sept. Βεσαείλ v. r. [in Ezra] Βεσαίλ and Βεσαίλ), the name of two men.

1. The artificer to whom was confided by Jehovah the design and execution of the works of art required for the tabernacle in the wilderness (Exod. xxxi, 2; xxxv, 20; xxxvii, 1; 2 Chron. i, 5). B. C. 1657. His charge was chiefly in all works of metal, wood, and stone, Aholiab being associated with him for the textile fabrics; but it is plain from the terms in which the two are mentioned (xxxvi, 1, 2; xxxviii, 22), as well as from the enumeration of the works in Bezalel's name in xxxvii and xxxviii, that he was the chief of the two, and master of Aholiab's department as well as his own. Bezalel was of the tribe of Judah, the son of Uri, the son of Hur (or Chur). Hur was the offspring of the marriage of Caleb (one of the chiefs of the great family of Pharez) with Ephrath (1 Chron. ii, 20, 50), and one of his sons, or descendants (comp. Ruth iv, 20), was Salma or Salmon, who is handed down under the title of "father of Bethlehem," and who, as the great-grandfather of Boaz, was the direct progenitor of king David (1 Chron. ii, 51, 54; Ruth iv, 21).—Smith, s. v. See BETHLEHEM; HUR.

2. One of the sons of Palath-moab, who divorced the foreign wife whom he had taken after the exile (Ezra x, 30). B. C. 458.

Be'zel: (Heb. id. בְּזַעַל, lightning; Sept. Βέζεκ and Βεζέκ), the name apparently of two places in Palestine.

1. The residence of Adoni-bezek, i. e. the "lord of Bezek" (Judg. i, 5), in the "40 lot (בְּזַעַל) of Judah" (verse 5), and inhabited by Canaanites and Perizzites (verse 4). This must have been in the mountains ("up"), not far from Jerusalem (ver. 7); possibly on the eminence near Deir el-Ghafir, marked by Van de Velde (Map) at four miles S.W. of Bethlehem (comp. Robinson, Researches, ii, 357, 358). Sand (Itiner. p. 182) mentions a village Bezek two miles west of the site of Beth-zur, but this lacks confirmation. Others propose other identifications, even the Bezetha on the north of Jerusalem. See BEZETH.

2. The rendezvous where Saul numbered the forces of Israel and Judah before going to the relief of Jabesh-gilead (1 Sam. xi, 8). From the terms of the narrative this cannot have been more than a day's march from Jabesh, and was therefore doubtless somewhere in the centre of the country, near the Jordan valley. In accordance with this is the mention by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Βέζεκ, Ezeck) of two places of this name seven miles from Neapolis (Shechem), on the road to Beth-shean. This would place it at Khalat-Mathb. on the descent to the Jordan, near Succoth. The Sept. inserts in Baqá after the name, possibly alluding to some "high place" at which this solemn muster took place. This Josephus gives as Baba (Βαβά, Ant. vi, 5, 3). Schwarz (Palest. p. 158) says that "Bezek is the modern village Azibik, five English miles south of Beth-shean;" but no other traveller speaks of such a name.

Be'zer (Heb. Be'zer, בְּצֵר, ore of gold or silver, as in Psa. lxxvi, 13), the name of a place and also of a man.

1. (Sept. Βοσόρ or Βόσορ.) A place always called "Bezer in the wilderness" (בְּצֵר בְּיַבְשָׁרָה), being a city of the Reubenites, with "suburbs," in the Mishor or downs, set apart by Moses as one of the three cities of refuge on the east of the Jordan (Deut. iv, 43; Josh. xx, 8), and allotted to the Merarites (Josh. xxi, 36; 1 Chron. vi, 78). In the last two passages the exact specification, בְּצֵר בְּיַבְשָׁרָה, "in the plain country," of the other two is omitted, but traces of its former presence in the text in Josh. xxi, 16 are furnished us by the reading of the Sept. and Vulg. (τὴν Βοσόρ ἐν τῇ ἰσημηρῷ, τὴν Μισώρ [Alex. Μισορ] καὶ τὰ περισπύρια; Bosor in solitude, Misor of Jaser). Bezer may be the Bosor (q. v.) of 1 Macc. v, 26, 36. Ireland rashly identifies it with the Bezer of Arabii Deserta (Paläst., p. 661); and Schwarz (Paläst., p. 229) makes it to be a Talmudical Kenatharin (קִנְתָרִין), which he finds in "an isolated high mound called Jebel Knetta, S.E. of Aroer, near the Arzon," meaning doubtless Jebel-Ghuweith, which lies entirely without the bounds of Reuben. Bezer seems to correspond in position and name with the ruined village Buzzin, marked on Van de Velde's Map at 12 miles N. of E. from Heshbon (comp. Robinson, Researches, iii, Append. p. 170).

2. (Sept. Βαζάο v. r. Βαζάρ.) The sixth name of the eleven sons of Zophai, of the descendants of Asher (1 Chron. vii, 36). — B. C. post 1658.

Be'zeth (Βηζέθ), a place at which Bacchides encamped after leaving Jerusalem, and where there was a "great pit" (τὸ φῶταρ τὸ μέγα, 1 Macc. vii, 19). By Josephus (Ant. xii, 10, 2) the name is given (in the account parallel with 1 Macc. ix, 4) as "the village Beth-zetho" (κώμη Βηθζηθώ λεγομένη), which recalls the name applied to the Mount of Olives in the early Syriac recension of the N. T. published by Mr. Cureton—Beth-Zuth (which, however, is simply a translation of the name = Heb. בְּתֵר יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, olive-Jesse). The name may thus refer either to the main body of the Mount of Olives, or to the eminence opposite it to the north of Jerusalem, which at a later period was called BEZETHA (q. v.). Pucecke (Est. II, i, 19) speaks of seeing "a long cistern" in this quarter of the city, and several tanks are delineated here on modern plans of Jerusalem.—Smith, s. v.

Bezetha (Βεζέθα), the name of the fourth hill on which a part of Jerusalem was built, situated north of Antonia, from which it was separated by a deep fosse, but not enclosed till the erection of the third wall by Agrippa, according to Josephus (War, v, 4, 2), who interprets the name as equivalent to "New City" (καινή πόλις), perhaps regarding it as the Heb. בְּתֵר יְהוֹשֻׁעַ; but as this can hardly be considered a representative of the name, and as Josephus elsewhere (War, ii, 19, 4) seems expressly to distinguish Bezetha from Cœnopolis or the New City (τὴν τε Βεζέθαν πρὸς ἀγορῆσφωμένην καὶ τὴν Καινὴν πόλιν, unless, as Ireland suggests, Pal. res., p. 855, we should read τὴν καὶ Καινὴν πόλιν, making them identical), we may perhaps better adopt the derivation given above under the BEZETH (q. v.) of 1 Macc. vii, 19. The general position of the hill is clear; but it has been nevertheless disputed whether it should be regarded as the eminence north of the present Damascus gate (Robinson, Bibl. Res. i, 592; Bibl. Sac. 1846, p. 438 sq.) or (as is more probable) that immediately north of the present Haram enclosure (Williams, Holy City, ii, 50). See JERUSALEM.

Beziers, one of the earliest episcopal sees in France. Quite a number of synods had been held at Beziers; A. D. 356, on account of the Arians; 1234 and 1243, against the Albigenses; and in 1279, and 1351, on account of other ecclesiastical controversies.

Bi'atas (Φαζιάς v. r. Φαλιας, Vulg. Philiis), one of the Levites that expounded the law to the Jews at Jerusalem as read by Ezra (1 Esdr. ix, 48); evidently a corruption for the פְּלִיאִים (q. v.) of the genuine text (Nch. viii, 7).

Biathanãti (from βία, violence, and θάνατος, death). Among other reproachful epithets applied by the pagans to Christians in the first centuries we find Biathanãti, self-murderers, imposed in consequence of their contempt of death, and cheerful endurance of all kinds of suffering for Christ's sake. We also meet with the term Biathanãti (βίωσι, live), men who expect to live after death. The enemies of the Christians might employ this phrase to ridicule the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. It is recorded in Bede's Martyrology that when the seven sons of Symphoras were martyred under Hadrian, their bodies were cast into one pit together, which the temple-priests named from them Ad septem Biathanatos.—Binzham, Orig. Eccles. bk. i. ch. ii, § 8; Farrar, Eccles. D'ct. s. v.

Bibbighaus, HENRY, D. D., a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born in Bucks County, Penn., Aug. 2d, 1777. He was first merchant, then farmer; later, organist, and teacher of a parochial school in Philadelphia. He studied theology privately; was licensed and ordained in 1824, in the forty-eighth year of his age. He became pastor of the German Reformed Salem Church, Philadelphia, where he continued to labor with great zeal and success till his death, Aug. 20th, 1851. He is remembered as a mild, modest, venerable father in the Church. He was a good preacher, a faithful pastor, and always exerted a strong and happy influence in the judicatory of the Church. He preached only in the German language.

Bibbins, Elisha, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Hampton, N. Y., July 16, 1799; was converted November 8, 1805; was licensed to preach in January, 1812, and was admitted on trial in the Genesee Conference in July of the same year. He was for twelve years of his ministry in the effective ranks, three years a supernumerary, and thirty-two years a superannuated preacher. Mr. Bibbins was a man of good natural abilities. His powers of perception were quick, and his reasoning faculties vigorous. His sensibilities were strong and well disciplined. He had a strong sense of the ludicrous. He was always in earnest, a quality which gave almost overwhelming power to his sermons, exhortations, and prayers. He was a good theologian, but a better preacher. In his best moods he poured out a torrent of eloquence which was very effective. He was a man of noble impulses, of a genial nature, of a lofty spirit, of a strong will, and of inexhaustible patience. He died at Scranton, Penn., on the 6th of July, 1859, of disease of the heart.—Peck, Early Methodism (N. Y. 1860, 12mo, p. 489).

Bibbins, Samuel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, one of the fathers of the Black River Conference. He was born about 1768, preached for about fifty years, and died in Brutus, N. Y., Jan. 1826. "As a preacher he was eminently owned of God," and revivals generally attended his ministry. His death was especially triumphant.—Minutes of Conferences, ii, 410.

Bible (Anglicized from the Greek βιβλία, i. e. little books, libelli; Latinized Biblia), the popular designation (usually in the phrase "Holy Bible") now everywhere current for the Sacred Scriptures of the Old and New Testament in their present collected form. The sacred books were denominated by the Jews the writing (כְּתוּבִים, ketub'ot, or סְפָרִים, mikra', recitation), a name of the same character as that applied by the Mohammedans (Koran) to denote their sacred volume. See SCRIPTURES, HOLY.

The Bible is divided into the Old and New Testaments, ἡ παλαιά, καὶ ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη. The name Old Testament is applied to the books of Moses by Paul (2 Cor. iii, 14), inasmuch as the former covenant comprised the whole scheme of the Mosaic revelation, and the history of this is contained in them. This phrase, "book of the covenant," taken probably from Exod. xxiv, 7; 1 Macc. i, 57 (βιβλίον διαθήκης), was transferred in the course of time by a metonymy to signify the writings themselves. The word διαθήκη signifies either a testament or a covenant, but we now render it testament, because the translators of the old Latin version have always rendered it from the Sept., Testamentum (covenant), by the word Testamentum. The names given to the Old Testament were the Scriptures (Matt. xxi, 42), Scripture (2 Pet. i, 20), the Holy Scriptures (Rom. i, 2), the sacred letters (2 Tim. iii, 15), the holy books (Sanhed. xci, 2), the law (John xii, 34), the law, the prophets, and the psalms (Luke xxiv, 44), the law and the prophets (Matt. v, 17), the law, the prophets, and the other books (Prolog. Eccles.), the books of the old covenant (Nch. viii, 8), the book of the covenant (1 Macc. i, 57; 2 Kings xxiii, 2)—Kitto, s. v. See TESTAMENT.

The other books (not in the canon) were called apocryphal, ecclesiastical, and dextracanonical. The term New Testament has been in common use since the third century, and is employed by Eusebius in the same sense in which it is now commonly applied (Hist. Eccles. iii, 23). Tertullian employs the same phrase, and also that of "the Divine Instrument" in the same signification. See ANTILEGOMENA; APOCRYPHA.

I. Appropriation of the term "Bible."—1. In its Greek form.—The application of the word βιβλία, the Books, specially to the collected books of the Old and New Testament, is not to be traced farther back than the 5th century. The terms which the writers of the New Testament use of the Scriptures of the Old are ἡ γραφή (2 Tim. iii, 16; Acts viii, 32; Gal. iii, 22), αἱ γραφαί (Matt. xxi, 42; Luke xxiv, 27), τὰ ἱερά γράμματα (2 Tim. iii, 15). Βιβλίον is found (2 Tim. iv, 13; Rev. x, 2; v, 1), but with no distinctive meaning; nor does the use of τὰ λοιπὰ τῶν βιβλίων for the Hagiographa in the Preface to Ecclesiastics, or of αἱ ἱερά βιβλία in Josephus (Jud. i, 6, 2), indicate any thing as to the use of τὰ βιβλία alone as synonymous with ἡ γραφή. The words employed by early Christian writers were naturally derived from the language of the New Testament, and the old terms, with epithets like θεία, ἁγία, and the like, continued to be used by the Greek fathers, as the equivalent "Scriptura" was by the Latin. The use of ἡ παλαιά διαθήκη in 2 Cor. iii, 14, for the law as read in the synagogues, and the prominence given in the Epistle to the Heb. (vii, 22; viii, 6; ix, 15) to the contrast between the παλαιά and the καινή, led gradually to the extension of the former to include the other books of the Jewish Scriptures, and to the application of the latter as of the former to a book or collection of books. Of the Latin equivalents which were adopted by different writers (Instrumentum, Testamentum), the latter met with the most general acceptance, and perpetuated itself in the language of modern Europe. One passage in Tertullian (adv. Marc. iv, 1) illustrates the growing popularity of the word which eventually prevailed, "instrumenti vel quod magis in usu est dicere, testamenti." The word was naturally used by Greek writers in speaking of the parts of these two collections. They enumerate (e. g. Athan. Synop. Sac. Script.) τὰ βιβλία of the Old and New Testament; and as these were contrasted with the apocryphal books circulated by heretics, there was a natural tendency to the appropriation of the word as limited by the article to the whole collection of the canonical Scriptures. Jerome substitutes for these expressions the term Bibliotheca Divina (see Hieronymi Opera, ed. Martianay, vol. i, Proleg.), a phrase which this learned father probably borrowed from 2 Maccabees, ii, 13, where Nehemiah is said, in "founding a library" (βιβλιοθήκη), to have "gathered together the acts of the kings, and the prophets, and of David, and the epistles of the kings concerning the holy gifts." But although it was usual to denominate the separate books in Greek by the term Biblia, which is frequently so applied by Josephus, we first find it simply applied to the entire collection by St. Chrysostom in his Second Homily, "The Jews have the books (βιβλία), but we have the treasure of the books; they have the letters (γράμματα), but we have both spirit and letter." And again, Hom. ix in Epist. ad Coloss., "Provide yourselves with books (βιβλία), the medicine of the soul, but if you desire no other, at least procure the new (καινή), the Apostolos, the Acts, the Gospels." He also adds to the word βιβλία the epithet divine in his Tenth Homily on Genesis: "Taking before and after meals the divine books" (τὰ θεία βιβλία), or, as we should now express it, the Holy Bible. It is thus applied in a way which shows this use to have already become familiar to those to whom he wrote. The liturgical use of the Scriptures, as the worship of the Church became organized, would naturally favor this application. The MSS. from which they were read would be emphatically the books of each church or monastery. And when this use of the word was established in the East, it was natural that it should pass gradually to the Western Church. The terminology of that Church bears witness throughout (e. g. Episcopos, Presbyter, Diaconus, Litanias, Liturgia, Monachus, Abbas, and others) to its Greek origin, and the history of the word Biblia has followed the analogy of those that have been referred to. Here, too, there was less risk of its being used in any other than the higher meaning, because it had not, in spite of the introduction even in classical Latin of Bibliotheca, Bibliopola, taken the place of libri, or libelli, in the common speech of men.

2. The English Form.—It is worthy of note that "Bible" is not found in Anglo-Saxon literature, though B'blithece is given (Lye, Anglo-Sax. Diet.) as used in the same sense as the corresponding word in mediæval Latin for the Scriptures as the great treasure-house of books (Du Cange and Adelung, s. v.). If we derive from our mother-tongue the singularly happy equivalent of the Greek εὐαγγέλιον, we have received the word which stands on an equal eminence with "Gospel" as one of the later importations consequent on the Norman Conquest and fuller intercourse with the Continent. When the English which grew out of this union first appears in literature, the word is already naturalized. In R. Brunne (p. 290), Piers Plowman (1916, 427), and Chaucer (Prolog. 437), it appears in its distinctive sense, though the latter, in at least one passage (House of Fame, bk. iii), uses it in a way which indicates that it was not always limited to that meaning. From that time, however, the higher use prevailed to the exclusion of any lower; and the choice of it, rather than of any of its synonyms, by the great translators of the Scriptures, Wickliffe, Luther, Coverdale, fixed it beyond all possibility of change. The transformation of the word from a plural into a singular noun in all the modern languages of Europe, though originating probably in the solecisms of the Latin of the 13th century (Du Cange, s. v. Biblia), has made it fitter than it would otherwise have been for its high office as the title of that which, by virtue of its unity and plan, is emphatically THE Book.

II. The Book as a Whole.—The history of the growth of the collections known as the Old and New Testament respectively will be found fully under CANON. It falls within the scope of the present article to indicate in what way and by what steps the two came to be looked on as co-ordinate authority, and therefore as parts of one whole—how, i. e. the idea of a completed Bible, even before the word came into use, presented itself to the minds of men. As regards a large portion of the writings of the New Testament, it is not too much to say that they claim an authority not lower, nay, even higher than the Old. That which had not been revealed to the "prophets" of the Old dispensation is revealed to the prophets of the New (Eph. iii, 5). The apostles wrote as having the Spirit of Christ (1 Cor. vii, 40), as teaching and being taught "by the revelation of Jesus Christ" (Gal. i, 12). Where they make no such direct claim their language is still that of men who teach as "having authority," and so far the old prophetic spirit is revived in them, and their teaching differs, as did that of their Master, from the traditions of the scribes. As the revelation of God through the Son was recognised as fuller and more perfect than that which had been made πολιμερῶς καὶ πολυτρόπως to the fathers (Heb. i, 1), the records of what He had done and said, when once recognised as authentic, could not be regarded as less sacred than the Scriptures of the Jews. Indications of this are found even within the N. T. itself. Assuming the genuineness of the 2d Epistle of Peter, it shows that within the lifetime of the apostles, the Epistles of Paul had come to be classed among the γραφαὶ of the Church (2 Pet. iii, 16). The language of the same Epistle in relation to the recorded teaching of prophets and apostles (iii, 2; comp. Eph. ii, 20; iii, 5; iv, 11) shows that the πᾶσα προφητεία γραφῆς can hardly be limited to the writings of the Old Testament. The command that the letter to the Colossians was to be read in the church of Laodicea (Col. iv, 16), though it does not prove that it was regarded as of equal authority with the γραφὴ θεόπνευστος, indicates a practice which would naturally lead to its being so regarded. The writing of a man who spoke as inspired could not fail to be regarded as participating in the inspiration. It is part of the development of the same feeling that the earliest records of the worship of the Christian Church indicate the liturgical use of some at least of the writings of the New, as well as of the Old Testament. Justin (Apol. i, 66) places τὰ ἀποσημειώματα τῶν ἀποστόλων as read in close connection with, or in the place of τὰ συζυγώματα τῶν προφητῶν, and this juxtaposition corresponds to the manner in which Ignatius had previously spoken of αἱ προφητεῖαι, νόμος Μωσῆος, τὸ εὐαγγέλιον (Ep. ad Smyrn. c. 7). It is not meant, of course, that such phrases or such practices prove the existence of a recognised collection, but they show with what feelings individual writings were regarded. They prepare the way for the acceptance of the whole body of the N.-T. writings, as soon as the Canon is completed, as on a level with those of the Old. A little farther on and the recognition is complete. Theophilus of Antioch (ad Autolye, bk. iii), Irenæus (adv. Her. ii, 27; iii, 1), Clement of Alexandria (Stromata, iii, 10; v, 5), Tertullian (adv. Prax. 15, 20), all speak of the New Testament writings (what writings they included under this title is of course a distinct question) as making up, with the Old, μία γνῶσις (Clem. Al. l. c.), "totum instrumentum utriusque testamenti" (Tert. l. c.), universæ scripturæ. As this was in part a consequence of the liturgical usage referred to, so it reacted upon it, and influenced the transcribers and translators of the books which were needed for the instruction of the Church. The Syrian Peshito in the 3d, or at the close of the 2d century, includes (with the omission of some of the ἀναλεγομένα) the New Testament as well as the Old. The Alexandrian Codex, presenting in the fullest sense of the word a complete Bible, may be taken as the representative of the full maturity of the feeling which we have seen in its earlier developments. The same may be said of the Codex Sinaiticus, lately brought to light by Prof. Tischendorf.

III. Order of the Books.—The existence of a collection of sacred books recognised as authoritative leads naturally to a more or less systematic arrangement.

The arrangement must rest upon some principle of classification. The names given to the several books will indicate in some instances the view taken of their contents, in others the kind of notation applied both to the greater and smaller divisions of the sacred volumes. The existence of a classification analogous to that adopted by the later Jews and still retained in the printed Hebrew Bibles, is indicated even before the completion of the O. T. Canon (Zech. vii, 12). When the Canon was looked upon as settled, in the period covered by the books of the Apocrypha, it took a more definite form. The Prologue to Ecclesiasticus mentions "the law and the prophets and the other books." In the N. T. there is the same kind of recognition. "The Law and the Prophets" is the shorter (Matt. xi, 13; xxii, 40; Acts xiii, 15, etc.); "the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms" (Luke xxiv, 44), the fuller statement of the division popularly recognised. The arrangement of the books of the Heb. text under these three heads requires, however, a further notice.

1. The Law, Torah, תּוֹרָה, νόμος, naturally continued to occupy the position which it must have held from the first as the most ancient and authoritative portion. Whatever questions may be raised as to the antiquity of the whole Pentateuch in its present form, the existence of a book bearing this title is traceable to a very early period in the history of the Israelites (Josh. i, 8; viii, 34; xxiv, 26). The name which must at first have attached to those portions of the whole book was applied to the earlier and contemporaneous history connected with the giving of the law, and ascribed to the same writer. The marked distinctness of the five portions which make up the Torah shows that they must have been designed as separate books; and when the Canon was completed, and the books in their present form made the object of study, names for each book were wanted and were found. In the Hebrew classification the titles were taken from the initial words, or prominent words in the initial verse; in that of the Sept. they were intended to be significant of the subject of each book, and so we have—

- (1.) בְּרֵאשִׁית Γένεσις, Genesis.
- (2.) שְׁמֹת (שְׁמֹתַי) Ἔξοδος, Exodus.
- (3.) לֵוִי Λευϊτικόν, Leviticus.
- (4.) בְּמִדְבָּר Ἀριθμοί, Numbers.
- (5.) דְּבָרִים Δευτερονόμιον, Deuteronomy.

The Greek titles were adopted without change, except as to the fourth, in the Latin versions, and from them have descended to the Bibles of modern Christendom.

2. The PROPHETS.—The next group presents a more singular combination. The arrangement stands as follows:

Nebim'.	{	בְּרֵאשִׁית	{	Joshua.
		(priorēs)		Judges. 1 and 2 Samuel. 1 and 2 Kings.
Propheta.	{	יִשְׁעָיָה	{	Isaiah.
		(majores)		Jeremiah. (Ezekiel.

The Hebrew titles of these books corresponding to those of the English Bibles; so also in the Septuagint, except that this version (like the Vulgate) reckons 1 and 2 Sam. as 1 and 2 Kings, and 1 and 2 Kings as 3 and 4 Kings.

The grounds on which books simply historical were classed under the same name as those which contained the teaching of prophets, in the stricter sense of the word, are not, at first sight, obvious, but the O. T. presents some facts which may suggest an explanation. The sons of the prophets (1 Sam. x, 5; 2 Kings v, 22; vi, 1), living together as a society, almost as a caste (Amos vii, 14), trained to a religious life, cultivating sacred ministrals, must have occupied a position as instructors of the people, even in the absence of the special calling which sent them as God's messengers to the people. A body of men so placed naturally become historians and annalists, unless intellectual activity is absorbed in asceticism. The references in the historical books of the O. T. show that they actually were such. Nathan the prophet, Gad, the seer of David (1 Chron. xxix, 29), Ahijah and Iddo (2 Chron. ix, 29), Isaiah (2 Chron. xxxvi, 22; xxxvii, 32), are cited as chroniclers. The greater antiquity of the earlier historical books, and perhaps the traditional belief that they had originated in this way, were likely to co-operate in raising them to a high place of honor in the arrangement of the Jewish canon, and so they were looked upon as having the prophetic character which was denied to the historical books of the Hagiographa. The greater extent of the prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, no less than the prominent position which they occupied in the history of Israel, led naturally to their being recognised as the Prophetae Majores. The exclusion of Daniel from this subdivision is a more remarkable fact, and one which has been differently interpreted, the Rationalistic school of later criticism (Eichhorn, De Wette, Bertholdt) seeing in it an indication of late date, and therefore of doubtful authenticity, the orthodox school on the contrary, as represented by Hengstenberg (Dissert. on Dan. ch. ii, § iv, v), maintaining that the difference rested only on the ground that, though the utterer of predictions, he had not exercised, as the others had done, a prophet's office among the people. Whatever may have been its origin, the position of this book in the Hagiographa led the later Jews to think and speak slightly of it, and Christians who reasoned with them out of its predictions were met by remarks disparaging to its authority (Hengstenberg, l. c.). The arrangement of the Prophetae Minores does not call for special notice, except so far as they were counted, in order to bring the whole list of canonical books within a memorial number, answering to that of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet, as a single volume, and described as τὸ ὡς ἐκατηστόβητος.

3. THE HAGIOGRAPHIA.—Last in order came the group known as Kethubim, ספרים קטובים (from ספר, to write), good writings, ἀγαθὰ βιβλία, i. e. "holy writings," including the remaining books of the Hebrew canon, arranged in the following order, and subordinate divisions: (a) Psalms, Proverbs, Job. (b) The Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther. (c) Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, 1 and 2 Chronicles.

Of these, (a) were distinguished by the memorial word ספרים, "truth," formed from the initial letters of the three books; (b) as ספרים קטובים, the five rolls, as being written for use in the synagogues on special festivals on five separate rolls. Of the Hebrew titles of these books, these which are descriptive of their contents are: ספרים קטובים, Tehillim, the Psalms; ספר משלים, Mishle, Proverbs; ספר איוב, Ejebah, Lamentations (from the opening word of wailing in i. 1); the Song of Songs, ספר שיר השירים, Shir hash-Shirim; Ecclesiastes, ספר קהלת, Kel'leh, the Preacher; 1 and 2 Chronicles, ספר ימים טובים, Diary of happy-days, words of the days—records.

The Sept. presents the following titles of these last: Ψαλμοί, Hymnologia, Omnia, ἅπαντα ἀσκήσια, Ekklesiastika, Παροιμιασμοί (i. e. things omitted, as being supplementary to the Books of Kings). The Latin version imports some of the titles, and translates others: Psalmi, Proverbia, Threni, Canticum Canticorum, Ecclesiastes, Paralipomenon, and these in their translata form have determined the received titles of the book in our English Bible—Ecclesiastes, in which the Greek title is retained, and Chronicles, in which the Hebrew and not the Greek title is translated, being exceptions. The Sept. presents also some striking variations in the order of the books (we follow the Sixt. ed.—MSS. differ greatly). Both in this and in the insertion of the ἀποκρυφόμενα, which we now know as the Apocrypha, among the other books, we trace the absence of that strong reverence for the Canon and its traditional order which distinguished the Jews of Palestine. The Law, it is true, stands first, but the distinction between the greater and lesser prophets, between the Prophets and the Hagiographa, is no longer recognised. Daniel, with the Apocryphal additions, follows upon Ezekiel; the Apocryphal 1st or 2d Book of Esdras comes in as a 1st, preceding the canonical Ezra. Tobit and Judith are placed after Nehemiah, Wisdom (Σοφία Σαλωμών) and Ecclesiasticus (Σοφία Σειράχ) after Canticles, Baruch before and the Epistle of Jeremiah after Lamentations, the twelve lesser prophets before the four greater, and the two books of Maccabees at the close of all. The common Vulg. follows nearly the same order, inverting the relative position of the greater and lesser prophets. The separation of the doubtful books under the title of Apocrypha in the Protestant versions of the Scriptures left the others in the order in which we now have them. See SEPTUAGINT; VULGATE.

4. The history of the arrangement of the books of the NEW TESTAMENT presents some variations, not without interest, as indicating differences of feeling or modes of thought. The four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles uniformly stand first. They are thus to the New what the Pentateuch was to the Old Testament. They do not present, however, in themselves, as the books of Moses did, any order of succession. The actual order does not depend upon the rank or function of the writers to whom they are assigned. The two not written by apostles are preceded and followed by one which was, and it seems as if the true explanation were to be found in a traditional belief as to the dates of the several Gospels, according to which Matthew's, whether in its Greek or Hebrew form, was the earliest, and John's the latest. The arrangement once adopted would naturally confirm the belief, and so we find it assumed by Irenæus, Origen, Augustine. The position of the Acts as an intermediate book, the sequel to the Gospels, the prelude to the Epistles, was obviously a natural one. After this we meet with some striking differences. The order in the Alexandrian, Vatican, and Ephraem MSS. (A, B, C) gives precedence to the catholic Epistles, and as this is also recognised by the Council of Laodicea (Can. 60), Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. iv, 25), and Athanasius (Flist. Fest. ed. Bened. i, 462), it would appear to have been characteristic of the Eastern churches. Lachmann and Tischendorf (7th ed.) follow this arrangement. (The Sinaitic MS. places Paul's Epistles even before the Acts.) The Western Church, on the other hand, as represented by Jerome, Augustine, and their successors, gave priority of position to the Pauline Epistles; and as the order in which these were given presents, (1.) those addressed to churches arranged according to their relative importance, (2.) those addressed to individuals, the foremost place was naturally occupied by the Epistle to the Romans. The tendency of the Western Church to recognise Rome as the centre of authority may perhaps, in part, account for this departure from the custom of the East. The order of the Pauline Epistles themselves, however, is generally the same, and the only conspicuously different arrangement was that of Marcion, who aimed at a chronological order. In the four MSS. above referred to, Hebrews comes after 2 Thessalonians (in that from which Cod. B was copied it seems to have stood between Gal. and Ephes.). In those followed by Jerome, it stands, as in the English Bible and the Textus Receptus, after Philemon. Possibly the absence of Paul's name, possibly the doubts which existed as to his being the sole author of it, possibly its approximation to the character of the catholic Epistles, may have determined the arrangement. The Apocalypse, as might be expected from the peculiar character of its contents, occupied a position by itself. Its comparatively late recognition may have determined the position which it has uniformly held as the last of the sacred books.

IV. Division into Chapters and Verses.—As soon as any break is made in the continuous writing which has characterized in nearly all countries the early stages of the art, we get the germs of a system of division. But these divisions may be used for two distinct purposes. So far as they are used to exhibit the logical relations of words, clauses, and sentences to each other, they tend to a recognised punctuation. So far as they are used for greater convenience of reference, or as a help to the memory, they answer to the chapters and verses of our modern Bibles. At present we are concerned only with the latter.

1. The Hebrew of the Old Testament.—It is hardly possible to conceive of the liturgical use of the books of the Old Testament without some kind of recognised division. In proportion as the books were studied and commented on in the schools of the rabbins, the division would become more technical and complete, and hence the existing notation which is recognised in the Talmud (the Gemara ascribing it to Moses [Hupfeld, Stud. und Krit. 1830, p. 827]) may probably have originated in the earlier stages of the growth of the synagogue ritual. The New-Testament quotations from the Old are for the most part cited without any more specific reference than to the book from which they come. The references, however, in Mark xii. 26, and Luke xx. 37 (ἰπὶ τῆς βάρῃ), Rom. xi. 2 (ὡς Ἡλιού), and Acts viii. 32 (ὡς περιούσιος τῆς χάριτος), indicate a division which had become familiar, and show that some, at least, of the sections were known popularly by titles taken from their subjects. In like manner, the existence of some cycle of lessons is indicated by Luke iv. 17; Acts xiii. 15; xv. 21; 2 Cor. iii. 14; and this, whether identical or not with the later rabbinic cycle, must have involved an arrangement analogous to that subsequently adopted.
